championed by David Ulansey. His interpretation rests primarily on astronomical data and then it's application to the symbolic organization of the Tauroctony's images. The main crux of his analysis is that the organization of the Tauroctony's images symbollizes the Zodiac's precession from the age of the Taurus to the age of Pisces, and that during the constellation's precession, during the age of the Taurus, the organization of the Zodiac's constellations, namely, Canis Minor (dog), Hydra (snake), Corvus (raven), Scorpio (scorpion) and of course, that of Taurus the Bull, were alligned directly with their corresponding images within the Tauroctony. Considering the influence of Chaldaean astrology upon Mazdaism and as such upon Mithraism it is not difficult to reason that between the connexion of the Tauroctony's symbollic similarities with Avestan lore and the astrological significance of the organization of the imagery, that this was one of the many points at which Iranian mythology created a peculiar syncretism with one of the many influences that bore upon its travel west - namely that of Chaldaean astrology. There was also a ritual baptism of blood performed by Mithraists, where a bull was slain and whose blood was allowed to drip into a pit below, drenching an initiate. This ritual was believed to hold redemptive and regenerative powers; it is also known that during the Mithraic liturgy there was a communion of bread, sombolizing the body of Mithras and wine, which, has been recognized by cultures long the antecedents of Mithraism, as a symbol for blood and its power. There was a ritual sacrifice held during the vernal equinox. And, finally, Mithraists, like that of many other pagan faiths, celebrated December 25 as the birth period of their god. For the initiate there were seven levels to ascend: Corax (Raven), Nymphus (Male Bride), Miles (Soldier), Leo (Lion), Perses (Persian), Heliodromus (Sun-runner), and Pater (Father), each associated with their own celestial body. Men and boys of all ages were allowed for initiation; although women were strictly forbidden. As one passed through each level, one had to undergo an ordeal, each filled with symbolic meaning, for instance, the Miles had to undergo a branding upon the forehead of the symbol of the cross, which symbolized the sun and an affirmation that only Mithras was his crown. One of the primary understandings of a Mithraist was that Mithras was his savior, mediator between the eternal god and the men below him, and through his salvation could be reached heaven - this, a direct adoption from the Avestan scriptures; it was his [the Mithraist's] understanding that through this salvation his soul would once again return to heaven, whence it had come when he was born into this world. Through prayer, following a strong moral code, and maintaining oneself pure, through such rituals as the baptism of blood, this could all be acheived.

JUDAISM AND ZOROASTRIANISM

That Zoroastrian beliefs made an impression upon the religion of the Judeans is apparent. Although the complete extent to which this imfluence played is debatable, there are several points of interests concerning this Zoroastrian influence, four of which, shall be mentioned here.

THE ORIGIN OF THE WORD FOR "PHARISEE"

As to the means of influence, some suggest that the sect of the Pharisees derived it's name from "Farsi" the Iranian name for the district Parsa, which might indicate direct Zoroastrian preistly influence in the region, however, this can not be confirmed with certainty, although it is not impossible; another possible etymology of the term is that it originated from the term for "heretic" or that of "separatist" as initially the Pharasaic movement was a vastly outnumbered sect within the Judean community.

THE ZOROASTRIAN INFLUENCE ON THE JEW'S CONCEPT OF GOD

One clear adaption from Zoroastrian doctrine was the Judean conception of god. The idea of a universal, non-partisian, monotheistic deity was the result of their contact with the Zoroastrian Ahura-Mazda, which allowed them transcend the tribal, henotheistic conception of god that they had hitherto espoused. This can be seen in the literary works of the time of the Persian occupation; at that time they began to more clearly talk of a single god as opposed to pronouncing their god as the greatest among many other gods - which was clearly the conception espoused by Abraham, Moses and other mythical figures from their ancient past.

THE INFLUENCE OF ZOROASTRAIAN DUALISM AND THE CONCEPT OF HA-SATAN

Another significant manner in which Judaism was affected by Zoroastrian doctrines was in the concept of an enemy to God; the Judean conception of Ha-satan, that is - Enemy - did not occur until its mention in Zechariah during the late 6th century B.C.E. under Persian rule and the influence of Zoroastrian dualism - that cosmic fight between Ahura Mazda and Ahriman.

THE ZOROASTRIAN INFLUENCE UPON THE JEWS AND THE CONCEPT OF HELL

Yet another adaptation from Zoroastrian belief was that of Ge-hinnom (valley of Hinnom) or Hell, which was a doctoring of the earlier Judean conception of sheol (grave) such that sheol became only the upper most level of a multi-level underworld - a clear account of which is given in the creation myth of the Haggadah (collection of non-canonical legends). Although there can also be seen Egyptian themes in the Judean conceptions of hell, it can be confidently argued that, at the least, Zoroastrian ideas of hell influenced Judean religious development coupled with Egyptian influences, while at the most they were the primary influence in the formation of these beliefs. This significant grafting on of the concept of monotheistic god, the adversary Ha-satan and of hell would prove instrumental in the later Christian conceptions of Satan and hell. As such, apart from direct influences with Mithraism and the Zoroastrian dualism imbedded within it upon the later Christian community, we can see a distant influence many centuries earlier upon Christianity through the Judean adoption of Ha-stan, Ge-hinnom, and the 'One God.'

THE INFLUENCE OF MITRAISM UPON CHRISTIANITY

The cult of Mithras affected early Christianity in two fashions.

Firstly, although doctrinally speaking it was not one of the most significant impressions, it was vital to the spread and survival of Christianity. It was with Constantine I that Christianity finally became tolerated within the Roman Empire, a window of opportunity through which it was able to ultimitately gain supreme say within the empire to the unfortunate fate of everything deemed un-christian. Constantine himself was born into the Romanized Mithraic religion of Sol Invictus following in the religion of his father and, indeed, much of Rome at the time adopted the same faith. Diocletian who had, for ease of management of an empire too bloated, divided it into two regions, giving caesarship of the Western half to Constantine's father - Constatius - also in religious affairs, contrary to popular monotheistic tendencies of the people, reverted to a worship of the old gods of Zeus, et cetera, although, without dismissing newer deities such as that of Mithras. Diocletians distaste of all that was Christian and opposed the old order of gods, which seems to have been more a politically motivated distate rather than a philosophical or religious one, was epitomized in severe persecutions, the last of which, before his demise, ocurred in C.E. 303. Constantine's devotion to his religion can be noted when immediately following his father's death, references to the older Zeus-class of gods was removed from the coinage and in their stead were places references to Sol Invictus. Now, to understand Constantine's conversion to Christianity one must understand Constantine himself. Scholars agree that he had a mysticized impression of the Sol Invictus and considered himself doing the bidding of the sun, that is, Mithras. His was a character of confidence, ambition, and drive for success - altho, a man given to calm delicate mannerisms, as was shown several years later in his presence at the Nicean Council. He inhereitted a strong character, yet clear tolerance of the Christian community from his father, under whom, during the purges of Diocletian, the Western half of the empire remained essentially without persecution. When on the eve of battle in September of C.E. 312 of the Milvian Bridge Constantine found in his dream the visage of Christ approach him, telling him how to act in order to secure victory in the battle the following day, it is clear that Constantine understood this mystical encounter in terms of his own Sol Invictus sending him a messenger in the form of the Christian deity. Having secured victory, Constantine did indeed convert to Christianity, but not upon the virtue of any words the historical Christ may have uttered in his travels in Judea, but in the understanding as Christ a force of victory and triumph in the battlefield and so on. Constantine, upon having received his dream, neither requested baptism nor even indoctrination into any of the rites a new convert would take and, indeed, it would not be until his deathbed that he would receive baptism. Also, during the schismatic dilemmas during the early 4th century C.E. that the church was suffering through splintering of dogma, Constantine took little interest, only after the trouble had escalated and involved his own districts, following the defeat of Licinius, both his brother-in-law and caecar of the Eastern Empire, did Constantine dispatch letters to the leaders of the opposing Christian camps: that of the Alexander in Egypt, representing the Roman Based Christian faction, and that of the Antiochan based camp of Arius. Even in this letter Constantine's near indifference to the significant arguments concerning Christian doctrine could be seen, which furthers the conclusion that Christianity - namely Christ - for him was no more than a instrument of the one god, Sol Invictus. It can be assumed that he fell back on no other religious background than that which he was born in as obviously his interest in the religious tenets of Christianity was quite lax and the only apparent interest that Christ bore for him was as a deitific messenger of what Constantine understood as his own manifest destiny. However, even with this personalized interpretation of the Christian god, Constantine's conversion bore two vital results for the Christian community. Firstly, with his Edict of Milan, in 313 C.E. persecution of the Christians was halted, and practice in the faith could go without the fear of governmental retribution; secondly, Constantine's calling of the Nicean Council to dispel strife between various Christian factions allowed for a solidified Christian doctrine to be forged, particularly in the dispelling of various "heretical" movements, and in the construction of the Nicean Creed, which henceforth would herald the trinitarian nature of Christianity and sound as the official testamant of all Christians. This was, however, a crystalizating of only one of the many flavours of Christianity being preeched at this time. It must be understood a canonical New Testamtent although in the working was not formalized yet; there were a score of different Gospels being circulated at the time, each written to appeal to the people of the region in which it was found, and also influenced by various philosophical and religious movements of the time. For instance, when the Gospel of John was written sometime around the end of the 2nd Century C.E. (the earliest mention of the Gospel is in 180 C.E.) it was clearly influenced by Greek philosophical ideas of the "logos" - clearly a very Hellenized work. Also, Constantine's Mithraic interpretation of the Christ influenced the usage of the symbol of the Cross as a sign of victory and triumph as opposed to one of hulimity and even disgrace that was felt by many of the Christian community - his order for the painting of the Cross onto the shields of his soldiers drove in a deep psychological effect. As influences of Mithraism still deeply resided within the Roman armies, and the Cross, definitely not a symbol distinct to Christianity, but one of much greater antiquity, also was a reminder of Mithras' own sacrifice and ascension unto heaven. And this, both unto the enemies that would oppose Constantine in the battlefield, and for the soldiers fighting under his sovereign word would inflict profound psychological reactions - either that of increased bravery or that of increased fear. And this would in turn, through the boroughs having already been incised by Mithraic belief, allow Christianity yet another avenue by which to engage the hearts of the people.

Early followers of the Christ, Paul, and Mithraism To understand the second, and by far doctrinally the more profound of Mithraic influences upon Christianity, we must go back to the burgeouning years of the faith. To understanding Mithraic influence here, one must realize that it was a Mithraic world that Christianity bore itself into. The first years of Christianity and indeed, the years of the Christ himself are shrowded in mystery. It was, however, clearly a time of prophets. the Christ, if he were to have existed, was not the only preacher of the day spreading words of a new kingdom. The Gospels themselves having been written many years following the time the Christ was to have lived can not be used as accurate historical accounts for this, their tardy arrival on the world scene, and also because of spirit behind the pens that wrote them. Scholars are in vast agreement that the original Christian community was convinced upon a quick return of the Christ; this is the primary reason a general lack of interest in compiling a New Testament plagued them. And this also, as is the case with other religious Gospels from different faiths, as well must be suspect with regard to historical accuracy: exaggeration was a primary technique employed throughout history simply for the virtue of conversion. In the case of many ancient Roman and Greeks religious texts, it was common place for their dates to be increased by a thousand years and their authorship attributed to some personage of great antiquity. Likewise, the Gospels were attributed to historical figures such as Matthew, Luke, John even when they had been written many decades following their deaths - and it was the semblance of antiquity that was the primary criteria by which documents to be included in the New Testament were eventually chosen. There were dozens of Gospels other than the synoptic Gospels and the Gospel of John that were being circulated at the time - and apart from the few bits of literature finally chosen as canonical, a whole treasure of Christian literature was ignored. Even what was to be included in the New Testament was fiercly debated - each Christian center, from Alexandria, to Antioch, to Nicodemia, to Jerusalem, to Rome, to Carthage used their own particular host of Christian literature to pass on the faith. And one must not forget that within this encompassing term "Christian" also many Gnostic works were being circulated and proved very influential. Such was the drive to encapsulate their own scope of doctrinal writings that some early Church officials worked towards excluding any piece of literature simply if it on a non-polemical note referenced within itself some other work that was not wholly recognized as authoritative. Such was the scene on the Christian religious front during the late 2nd and 3rd centuries C.E. Clearly, the works that were finally chosen reflected a religious system of belief that was not representative of the entire Christian community, and moreover, they reflected beliefs that were themselves influenced over the course of nearly two centuries by the various unique positions of a host of different sects. Also, in efforts to convert, the earliest Christians were faced with a pagan world heavily imbued in Mithraic doctrine - particularly in the regions of Anatolia and Armenia. And it was in the southern Anatolian town of Tarsus that Paul did much of his spreading of the good word. There are a few clear references to Mithraism within his letters and it is not so far as to construe that in efforts to convert the Mithraicists in the region that he may have condoned certain religious understandings of theirs to remain perhaps because for their expedient conversion and their beliefs in a savior god did not much contradict what he himself believed - as such, allowing a mutated version of his Christianity to become accepted and henceforth affect future Christian doctrinal movements; and it is reasonable, considering some of the stark similarities concerning, for instance, the Mithraic Communion or Baptism and later Christianity, or in the terming of the Christ as the "light of this world" - a clear grafting on of the title bestowed upon Mithra - that such fundamental aspects of the Christianity of the second and third centuries if not in spirit then at least in form were adopted in part from this ancient Mystery Religion.

DESTRUCTION OF MITHRAISM BY CHRISTIANITY

That Mithraism was a virulent competitor of Christianity is proved by the hatred which the latter exhibited toward it and the terrible persecution which it perpetrated against it after the accession of Constantine. The followers of Mithra were hounded with such pertinacity that no one even dared to look at the sun, and farmers and sailors dared not observe the stars for fear of being accused of the heresy. Julian attempted to re-establish the cult; but after his untimely murder, the onslaught of the Christians became more furious than ever. Nevertheless, Mithraism was not easily extirpated: its temples were numerous from India to Scotland, and it numbered sincere devotees among slaves, laborers, merchants, soldiers, and senators, who were alike inspired by the ethical elevation of its teachings and the assurance of the immortality which it promised. But the persecution was persistent, sanguinary, and indiscriminate; the great Mithraeum at Alexandria was razed by the Arian George in 358 (Sozomen, Eccl. Hist, V, vii); Theodosius took the most extreme measures against the cult after his accession in 379 (Socrates, V, xvi); and after the fourth century, it seems to have had no organized existence.

Since it was exclusive, Mithraism was not equipped to do battle against a priest-state; it accepted only the dedicated and the Elect who would consecrate their lives to virtue and devotion. Since its objective was not to control the government, it was tolerant of other creeds and disciplines. It invited all men, but persuaded no one, to reject the temptations of the world. The struggle between Catholicism on the one hand and the esoteric mysterycults on the other proved once and for all that any religion which becomes the state will most certainly destroy all its competitors and, at the same time, every vestige of freedom. And one of the first to fall before the Church Trimphant was the cult of Mithra, to which Christianity owed so much.

ORIGINATORS OF CULT UNKNOWN

That such an effective and elaborate synthesis could have been developed only by a religious genius or by a very resourceful group of priests is obvious; but, since the cult glorified Mithra alone and sought to invest the new creation with primordial authority, the founder or originators remained forever unknown. And this was one of the basic weaknesses of Mithraism: it had no historical founder. Manichaeism, its child, had no reputedly divine originator: and it paid Christianity the ultimate tribute by incorporating into its system both its Jesus and His Gospel, without which it could never have mounted its assault upon the ramparts of the Catholic Church.

JUDAISM & THE INFLUENCE OF GENTILE RELIGIONS THAT PARTLY SHAPED IT

Although there were various major religions in the ancient world, it remained for the small and despised Jewish nation to cradle the Essene cult, which would create an ideology capable of conquering the occident" (Martin Larson, The Story of Christian Origins, p. 195). This was possible because the Jews were dedicated to religion in a manner elsewhere unknown. Among other people, dependence upon the supernatural was only a single phase of life: but the Jews considered themselves the chosen of Yahweh and attributed to Him their every victory, defeat, or chastisement. If historical religion may be defined as a system of beliefs, doctrines, or rituals designed to please or placate the unseen powers, then the Jews were religious par excellence.

"Philostratus, agreeing with classical writers generally, declares that "the Jews have long been in revolt not only against the Romans but against humanity"; and that they are "a race . . . apart and irreconcilable" (Life of Apollonius of Tyana, V, xxxiii). This separation stemmed from, and then intensified, the Jewish faith. At least half a dozen times in three thousand years, their annihilation has been decreed; and it was partially executed by Sennacherib of Assyria, Ahasuerus (Artaxerses?) of Babylon, Antiochus Epiphanes, Titus, Hadrian, the Inquisition, and Hitler. It was experiences such as these which enabled the Hebrew genius to create a savior-cult which could defeat all others" (Ibid.).

THE MESSIANIC EXPECTATION OF THE JEWS

The cherished records of the Jews amply reveal their own aspirations. The doctrine is repeated ad infinitum:

- "The Lord bath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto Himself, above all the nations that are upon the earth" (Deut. 14:2).
- "And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the Lord thy God to observe and to do all his commandments which I command thee this day, that the Lord thy God will set thee on high above all the nations of the earth" (Deut. 38:1).
- "Thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee" (Deut. 15:6).

No other people has ever been so conscious of ultimate primacy through supernatural intervention. This has given them cohesion and courage to persevere in the face of persecution and decimation. The conviction that every Jew will one day share in his divine destiny as a member of the world's ruling race has made him proud and has enabled him to survive unassimilated among the nations of the earth. At the Passover meal, Jews still place wine upon their tables and leave their doors ajar, so that Elijah, who is to precede the Messiah, may enter and drink; and then they repeat this devout prayer: "May the Merciful One cause us to inherit a day which is all good. May the Merciful One permit us to live unto the days of the Messiah!" (The Haggadah of Passover).

CRAIG'S COMMENTARY

What is important for our understanding is that in the face of such continued persecution and decimation by the non-Jewish nations of the world, the Jewish people, motivated by faith in the revelation of God at Sinai and before, looked to the fulfillment of the promises made to them by God and saw that such fulfillment was possible ultimately through Divine intervention and this was to be in the form of an "anointed" one sent from God himself. Such was their hope; their "Messianic hope." This Jewish Messianic had arisen even earlier than the Zoroastrian and was original with the Jews. What again is important for our study is that this "Jewish Messianic hope" was fundamentally different from the Persian; at least in the beginning. What we find, however, is that in the New Testament we have a "fusion" of both the Persian Messianic concept with the Jewish concept of this "anointed one." Without study and familiarity with the documents of both nations then it is impossible to read the New Testament and tell the difference between them.

But yet it is still not that simple. If one begins with Osiris, the Egyptian "soter" and savior, and begins a "chronological" study of Egyptian religious religious beliefs and how they were later assimilated and adapted by each succeeding nation who conquered or was influenced by the former nation, then one sees unmistakenly a "pattern" developing which will influence the subsequent religions of the non-Jewish world. Even the Jews, inspite of their "unique revelation" at Sinai, would be heavily influenced at times by these "world-religions" and the record of the Old Testament records how certain Kings did "good in the sight of the LORD" and how others "did evil in the sight of the LORD." Some kings led the nation of Israel into pagan worship while others caused the nation to repent of such evil. These "evils" of which we speak are nothing more than pagan religious worship which had been passed down since Egypt and adapted by each succeeding Gentile nation. For our study what is important to note is that these same "religious beliefs" as held by Israel's kings which "did evil in the sight of the LORD" will be found to be the core beliefs of the Essenes of Jesus' day! As if that was not enough, many of these Essene, or proto-Christian, beliefs will be found in the New Testament

If one wants to fully understand the "Messianic concept" in the New Testament then one must familiarize himself with Egyptian religion and how these religious beliefs were later assimilated and adapted by each succeeding Gentile nation throughout the history of mankind. If one undertakes such a study, as I did, then one sees a "pattern" developing in each successive Gentile nation which conquers another, or which is influenced by another though commerce and trade as the religions traveled from nation to nation through trade routes. One sees each successive nation assimilating portions of the previous nation's religious beliefs and fusing them with their own into a new amalgamation. If one begins with sun-worship, the earliest religion of mankind, and traces sun-worship in its various stages and manifestations through each succeeding nation throughout the history of mankind, then one sees the repetition of this "pattern" of worship through the history of mankind. If one begins with Egypt and Osiris, then this "pattern" can be seen reproduced in its entirety, or in part, in the subsequent Gentile nations and their religious beliefs; from Adonis, Aphrodite, Dionysus, Attis, Cybele, Demeter, Persephone, Orpheus, Zoroastrianism, Brahmanism, Buddhism, Pythagoreanism, Isis, Serapis, Mithra, etc. What will amaze the student is that the culmination of this "religious synthesis" can be found in Judaism as well, in particular the Essenes. This is of major importance when one understand that it is through Essenism that we have the New Testament today with its many "religious beliefs" which millions believe today to be "Divine and unique revelation from God in Heaven" when a little study will show that is is nothing more than Osiris re-invented. This makes it all the more important for a child of God, when reading the New Testament, to be able to discern the "truth from the fiction" for we are commanded to worship God in Spirit and in Truth. It would be a shame of unbelievable proportion to end our lives and before God hear that we have, like the prior Kings of Israel, "did evil in the sight of the LORD" because we worshiped like the pagans and never knew it because we accepted the New Testament without question or investigation as to if what is recorded there can be verified to be "truthful."

THE ABSOLUTE RELIGIOUS DEPENDENCE OF THE JEWS ON

GOD

The ancient Jews never found it necessary to master the art of war. Yahweh would do everything for them and protect them from harm: at the command of Joshua, the sun stood still; at the sound of trumpets, the walls of Jericho fell; under the outstretched hand of Moses the waters of the Red Sea parted. As long as the Israelites were obedient to Yahweh, all was well; but when the people worshiped strange gods, Yahweh turned His face away, rain ceased to fall, pests devastated their fields, enemies defeated them, and universal desolation ensued. The Assyrians and the Babylonians were simply the instruments by which God chastised His disobedient children. Even though Yahweh would never destroy the Jewish race utterly, He would, because of their disobedience, visit upon them every punishment, including humiliation, captivity, slavery, poverty, dispersion, persecution, and reduction to a despised remnant. So thundered the Yahweh prophets. It was indeed a Judaeo-centric world.

THE RELIGION OF IKHNATON [AKHENATON] AND ITS INFLUENCE UPON ISRAEL AND MONOTHEISM

Believe it or not the Egyptians had at one time their own prototype of Yahweh. Many today believe that the Jews obtained their concept of Yahweh from Egypt: indeed nothing could have been more natural. For we know that a great Egyptian school of philosophic theology flourished under Amenhotep IV, known as Ikhnaton; and that this gave to monotheism its first full expression. The abortive revolution of this young Pharaoh, who came to the throne in 1375 B.C.E. as a very young man and who died only seventeen years later, was overthrown at his death by the reactionary priests of Amen in coalition with the wealthy and imperialist elements of the nation. The Egypt priests of Amon rejected his grandiose and humanitarian principles, yet Ikhnaton's beliefs they were, we believe, absorbed in part by the Jews as later seen in their writings.

The conception of the sun-god had arisen during the reign of Amenhotep III, father of Ikhnaton. Egypt had just established a great and stable empire; and men had begun to think in universal terms. Amenhotep IV proclaimed himself the high priest of Aton, who was, however, something far more than the material sun and whose symbol was "a disk from which diverging rays radiated downward, each ray terminating in a human hand" (Ency. Brit., 12:77). It was as if the creator were clasping his children, all the inhabitants of the earth, in His protecting power. The plural "gods" and the name Amen were expunged from all public monuments; and Aton was proclaimed the benevolent father of all mankind, no matter of what speech, race, or color. He was the creator of the natural world and was "actively concerned for the daily maintenance of all his creatures, even the meanest" (Ibid.).

Ikhnaton and his religious campaign in Egypt was a profound revolution of sorts. Ikhnaton's monotheistic religion actually entailed a profound revolution among the Egyptian religious establishment. It called for a "naturalism" in art and living which attempted to throw off at a single stroke the traditions of two thousand years. Ikhnaton freed the slaves and released the convicts from the prison mines; he confiscated the huge landed estates of the Amen priesthood and gave them to the peasant-serfs in the form of freeholds; he attempted to establish schools, wherein all were to learn to read and write. And this was to be only the beginning.

One must understand what such actions had on the Osirian-Amenite priesthood who, up to Ikhnaton's time, lived in wealth, luxury, power, and ease; they were in possession of huge and magnificent temples, great treasure houses, and enormous influence among all classes of the people. Imagine, then, their frenzied rage when the new Pharaoh decreed the division of their lands, the confiscation of their wealth, the revocation of their income, and the dissolution of their order.

Ikhnaton attempted to banish the worship of Isis, Osiris, and Horns by discrediting the eschatology of their faith, which, as we have seen, was its central article and which, as it turned out, the people loved more than secular well-being.

Furthermore, Ikhnaton's program called for the dissolution of the Empire. If God is the universal father who loves all His creatures equally, irrespective of speech, color, or nationality, how can it be just for one nation to send soldiers to kill and oppress, and to collect tribute from another? As a result of this philosophy, the imperial armies received scant appropriations, and the empire withered away.

It is also natural that the beneficent principles of Ikhnaton should have taken some root among the Israelites who had been reduced to slave-laborers; and even more likely that various Egyptians of noble ideals continued to cherish his doctrines. What is again important for our understanding is that Ikhnaton lived just before Moses and Moses would have been influenced by Ikhnaton's history and legacy. It is likely that Moses was a royal Egyptian who, banished and ostracized from his own country, found in the Jews a people whose leader, lawgiver, and emancipator he could become.

But the Jews were not only to accept Ikhnaton's God; they were to alter him. It was natural enough that the Israelites should reconstruct the god of Ikhnaton according to their own needs. He remained the God of all the earth, but not equally of all men. Ikhnaton's [Akhenation] god was the Creator, more powerful than other gods; but the children of Jacob alone were to become His chosen race. He was infinitely ardent concerning Hebrew welfare, but indifferent to that of the Gentiles. The Chosen People were to bind themselves together by bonds of mutual solidarity, but all others they might deceive and exploit at will. To another Hebrew who was "waxen poor," monies must be loaned without interest; but "unto a stranger mayest thou lend upon usury" (Lev. 25:35-36). Aton was the father of all living creatures and he cared for all alike; but when Yahweh commanded, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," this was intended to apply only to "the children of their people'' (Lev. 19:18). After the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, the Jew continued no less conscious of his magnificent destiny, which caused the fervent author of Fourth Esdras to exclaim: "as for the rest of the nations which are sprung from Adam, you have said that they are nothing and are like spittle.... And now, Lord, behold, these nations . . . rule over us and devour us. But we, your people, whom you called your first-born, only-begotten, chosen, and beloved, are delivered into their hands. If it was for our sakes that the world was created, why do we not possess it as our inheritance?"

It is important we get a clear picture of the religious beliefs of the Jews at this time period of their history. In one respect, however, Judaism remained the child of its Egyptian parent:

- It was a one-world, nominally monotheistic religion
- It had no interest in the hereafter
- It had no concept of hell or heaven
- It had no system of rewards or punishments after death. In this respect, it was also similar to all Semitic religions, notably those of Assyria and Babylonia.

Inspired by a great leader who organized their escape, the Jews later attributed to him their Law, which differs from other ancient codes principally by certain distinctive customs and by its great emphasis upon the worship of Yahweh. Many of its features, however, were reminiscent of Ikhnaton. For example, all debts were to be canceled and all Hebrew slaves freed in the sabbatical year (Deut. 15:12); no usury was to be exacted from Hebrews; and land was to be returned to the family of the original owner at the close of each jubilee (Lev. 24:12-13). Even though these provisions were never honored, we may believe that the original lawgiver was actuated by such ideals.

THE GENTILE INFLUENCE UPON ISRAEL

Israelite history from David to Bar-Cochba was little else than a series of national disasters perpetrated by the Gentile nations upon the Jews, yet these are of the utmost importance because through these the Jewish race developed characteristics which enabled it to re-create a religion of ultimate renunciation.

The descendants of Jacob burst into Palestine about the beginning of the twelfth century B.C.E., declaring that God had given them the land and had also commanded them to uproot and often wipe-out its inhabitants. Not only had they persuaded themselves that they were justified in robbing, killing, and expropriating: to them it was impious to refrain from so doing. And so the Jews lived precariously in the midst of Philistines, Canaanites, Ammonites, Moabites, Amalekites, Jebusites, and Edomites, virtually in state of perpetual warfare.

David finally gave his people a brief period of peace, glory, and national unity under a people's government; and the outward tranquillity continued under Solomon, the most crafty, splendid, and opportunistic king ever to rule over Israel. He had a sporting house of seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines; he imposed crushing tax-burdens throughout the empire; every social injustice began to flourish; and he built many altars to heathen gods.

Israel Kingdom would be divided because of Solomon's false worship. At his death, the submerged resentment flared above the surface. The Ten Tribes sent Jeroboam to plead with Rehoboam, the heir of Solomon, for a reduction in their taxes. But Rehoboam "answered the people roughly ... and spoke.... My father made your yoke heavy, but I will add to your yoke: my father also chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions'' (I Kings, 12:13-14). As a result, the nation divided into the northern kingdom of Israel, comprising the Ten Tribes with their capital at Samaria, and the smaller southern state, including only Judah and Benjamin, with headquarters at Jerusalem. From that day forward, there was almost continuous war between these two divisions of the descendants of Jacob (I Kings, 15:16, 32), and each was constantly making alliances with heathen nations against the other. This continued until the destruction and disappearance of Israel in 721 B.C.E.

Between 950 and 745 B.C.E., both Judah and Israel paid constant tribute to Egypt, Syria, or Assyria; and both Judah and Israel suffered invasions from Gentile nations who brought their gods with them and exerted religious influence upon the Israelites; wars, lootings, and destruction so many times and to such a degree that one becomes sick at heart merely in perusing the sanguinary record. There was a major catastrophe in almost every decade. The Assyrians laid siege to and captured Damascus in 742 B.C.E., carried away many into captivity, scattered them through Media and Mesopotamia, and replaced them with Assyrians. The Israelites, nevertheless, refused to humble themselves; Shalmaneser and Sargon II therefore besieged Samaria, 724-721 B.C.E.; and, after a fearful struggle, captured King Hoshea, utterly destroyed the city, and resettled the population in Media. Thus ended the kingdom of Israel; the Ten Tribes were scattered and forever lost. They intermarried with their new neighbors, forgot their ancestor Jacob, and disappeared from the stage of history. In the villages and the countryside of Galilee, however, some of the Chosen People continued for centuries; and it was from these that Jesus and His disciples were born.

Judah was to be submitted to Assyrian and Egyptian domination and religious influence. Judah, the sole organized remnant of Yahweh's people after 720 B.C.E., escaped extinction through abject submission and the payment of heavy and constant tribute to Assyria. About 607 B.C.E. Pharaoh Necho invaded Judah and slew the "good" King Josiah at the battle of Megiddo, put upon the throne his puppet-son, Jehoiakim, and required ruinous tribute.

Judah was to be submitted to Babylonian domination and religious influence. When the Babylonians defeated the Egyptians at the decisive battle of Carchemish in 605 B.C.E., the Jews fell prey to a new empire. Nebuchadnezzar reduced Jerusalem and exacted heavy tribute. At the end of three years, in 598 B.C.E., the Jews rebelled; Nebuchadnezzar took the capital a second time, looted the treasure houses, and carried away several thousand captives. When the puppet-king Zedekiah revolted ten years later, the Babylonians in 586 B.C.E. took the city, razed not only the Temple but the city generally and carried away the whole population, except a remnant who were left to till the soil as peasants. This was and remains the most overwhelming catastrophe in Jewish history.

Judah was to be submitted to Persian domination and religious influence. After the return from Babylon, the Jews continued in subservience to the Persians, whose religion they began to absorb.

Judah was to be submitted to Grecian domination and religious influence. When the Greeks arrived in 333 B.C.E., tribute was paid to them; when the Seleucidae were established at Antioch about 313 B.C.E., the Jews became at times their tributaries and at intervals groaned under the heel of the Egyptian Ptolemies. It is important for our understanding to note that "Ptolemies" is a term which refers to one of Alexander the Great's generals who acquired part of Alexander's lands upon his death; the name of this Greek general was Ptolemy.

And now a new threat to Judaism appeared, different from any that had preceded, but certainly no less potent. This was Greek culture, which penetrated and conquered almost everywhere. And perhaps it was only an accident that it was not victorious among the Jews also; for we learn from the First Book of the Maccabees that a great many Jews had begun to despise their own Law, and we know that Hebrew Hellenization was proceeding apace.

In 175 B.C.E., the eighth Seleucid king, the fanatical Antiochus IV Epiphanes, came to the throne. In 167 B.C.E., he took Jerusalem, looted and desecrated the Temple, established the Dionysiac-Eleusinian sacrifice there for three years, and systematically depopulated the city of all Jews who rejected Hellenic culture. This aroused the faithful more against their own apostates than against the foreign foe; and the Maccabaean wars, which resulted, continued with almost unabated fury for thirty years, when victory, peace, and unity, finally established under Simon in 142 B.C.E., gave the nation its second brief interval of independence.

Judah was to be submitted to Hasmonean political and religious control.

But the Hasmoneans were not the answer for Israel. Secularization under the Hasmoneans was just as damaging as had been the exposure to the prior Gentile cultures and religions. When the Maccabees began their revolt, they were imbued with a strong religious and crusading fervor. But as they succeeded beyond the expectation or aims of the pietistic Chasidim, who gave impetus to Mattathias and his five sons, known as the Hasmoneans, their government became more materialistic and political, and no longer coincided with the interests of the Pharisees, who had, in the meanwhile, developed from the Chasidim.

It was during the reign of John Hyrcanus, 134-104, that a profound change occurred. Quite suddenly, about 109 B.C.E., John Hyrcanus shifted allegiance from the party of the Pharisees to that of the Sadducees. This must have reflected the cooling of the Hasmonean fervor for Yahweh in favor of material progress. At all events, in spite of Pharisaic popularity (Josephus, Antiquities, XIII, xv, 5), the new development reached its climax under Alexander Jannaeus, 103-76 B.C.E. So bitter was the struggle between the rich and secularist Sadducees on the one hand and the primarily pietistic Pharisees on the other that the strife so engendered resulted in acts of unbelievable barbarism: "Alexander . . . ordered eight hundred [Pharisees] to be hung upon crosses in the midst of the city: he had the throats of their wives and children cut before their eyes; and these executions he saw as he was drinking and lying down with his concubines" (Josephus, Wars of the Jews, I, iv, 6). Such were the atrocities committed by the Jews upon each other only a few years after they had been freed from Syrian tyranny.

Judah was to be submitted to Roman political and religious control.

Shortly after the death of Alexander Jannaeus, we find his two sons, Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus II, rivals not only for the throne of Judah but also for the favor of Pompey; but when Aristobulus, first favored by the Roman, dealt doubly with him, Pompey entered Jerusalem in 63 B.C., plundered the Temple, and desecrated the Holy of Holies. Thus ended the brief Hasmonean dynasty and the Jews became tributaries of Rome.

THE TRAGEDY OF PRIOR EVENTS PROMOTED MESSIANIC HYSTERIA AMONG THE JEWS

We must begin with the past. Successive invasions and indoctrinations and influences by pagan nations which used Israel not only as a land bridge from west to east, and east to west, as well as wars fought on their soil, as well as commerce and trade routes from the east to the west, and west to the east, made Israel a "melting-pot" of religious ideas and beliefs. With all the foreign domination and persecution the Jewish cup of sorrow now ran over; and the Messianic utterances of many centuries became the principal element in the national consciousness. No longer could the fervent hopes of Israel be limited to silent yearning or prophetic announcements. Israel needed to be delivered no less than when their forefathers were slaves in Egypt. The land of Israel was a boiling cauldron of Messianic expectation, and many were daily awaiting the Son of Man arriving upon the clouds and surrounded by myriads of angels, coming to establish the "everlasting kingdom."

In 37 B.C.E., Herod the Great came to the throne and ruled for thirty-three years. In the eyes of the Hebrew, he was "persona non grata" partly because he was half Idumean and only half Jew, and even more because he ruled by the grace of the Roman overlord. But he suppressed the universal robbers, maintained tranquillity, and rebuilt the Temple on lines exceeding the magnificence of Solomon. However, at his death, in 4 B.C.E., open disturbances again erupted. Josephus declares that "Judaea was full of robberies: and, whenever the several companies of the seditious found any one to lead them, he was created a king immediately. . . . Varus . . . crucified on this account two thousand" (Antiquities, VXII, x, 8-10).

In 7 A.D. Judas the Gaulonite, the originator of the fourth Jewish sect known as the Zealots, "whose doctrines infected the nation to an incredible degree"(Ibid., XVIII, i, 1), led an insurrection, which was crushed. But his movement only went underground. About 44 A.D., came a number of "such men as deceived and deluded the people under pretense of divine inspiration"(Wars, II, xiii, 4), including one Theudas the Egyptian, who led thousands into the wilderness and who was expected to march straight through the Jordan dry shod after the manner of Joshua (Antiquities, XX, v, 1). But these uprisings were drowned in Jewish blood.

Israel was on the verge of revolt against Rome due to the persecutions, heavy taxation, and horrible crucifixions carried out almost daily. Palestine was filled with robbers, and no man's life was secure. Any wide-eyed seditionist could procure a following through extravagant promises. The activities of the Zealots were supplemented by those of the Sicarii, a secret society of assassins who mingled with the multitude in the crowded streets especially during feast and holy days, and struck down their victims with daggers. The High Priest Jonathan was one of the first to fall. Life had become a species of universal terrorism (Wars, II, xiii, 3).

Josephus describes a succession of greedy and unscrupulous Roman procurators, of whom Florus was the worst; he licensed bandits to steal, murder, and plunder, on condition that he receive a share of the loot (Ibid., II, xiv, 2). Tension continued to mount, and, in 66 A.D., it could no longer be suppressed. The sorrow of the Jews approached a crescendo; like a tragedy of terrifying immensity, striding toward its denouement, came the war with Rome. As Tacitus observes (History, V, 10), Roman indignation was aroused since the Jews alone were rebellious. In due course, Vespasian reduced Galilee, marched into Judaea, and laid siege to Jerusalem, overflowing with its Passover throngs. Called away to accept the royal purple in Rome, he left his son Titus to prosecute the siege, in which three claimants to the Messiahship, John of Gischala, Eleazor the Zealot, and Simon of Gioras, conducted a triple war: first, against the rich Jews; second, against each other; and, third, against the Romans.

Civil war was inevitable for the Jews were divided. The narrative of Josephus reveals the social content of the conflict as well as the mutual ferocity of the Jewish leaders. Each Jewish sect and their respective religious leaders based their uncompromising hatred on the fact that each was certain of divine election and feared no human opposition. The three generals were leaders of various outlaw elements, all of whom took exquisite delight in murdering wealthy Jews. The enmity they exhibited toward the prosperous could have been born only of the fiercest ideological antagonism. Any Jew of means who so much as looked sorrowful when his dearest ones were murdered was himself put to the sword and his possessions were confiscated.

At the outset of the revolt, conservative Jews sent both to Agrippa (Jewish puppet king) and to Florus for help in suppressing the revolutionaries (Wars, II, xvii, 4) but they "set fire to the house of Ananias, the high-priest, and to the palace of Agrippa and Berenice; after which they carried the fire to the place where the archives were deposited, and made haste to burn the contracts belonging to their creditors, and thereby to dissolve their obligations for paying their debts; and this was done to gain the multitude of those who had been debtors and that they might persuade the poorer sort to join in their insurrection with safety against the more wealthy."

Again and again Titus offered generous terms for capitulation, which were scornfully rejected by men hourly awaiting the apocalyptic Messiah. Instead of uniting in a common defense, the warring factions within the city burned each other's food supplies, and so brought on a famine in which cow's dung became a delicacy and mothers cooked and devoured their infant children.

The Jews defended themselves behind their triple wall for nearly eight months; but in the end their courage was unavailing. Titus burned the Temple and the Cloisters, demolished the Antonia, and, in general, destroyed the city. According to Josephus, nearly 1,350,000 Jews were killed, or died of starvation, and several hundred thousand more were carried away into captivity or sold into slavery.

Thus perished the Jewish state: but not utterly or finally. In 132 A.D., under Hadrian, Bar Cochba, declared by the Rabbi Akiba to be the Star of Jacob, foretold in Numbers 24:17, began the final revolt of the Jews against the Roman power. The bitter war continued for three years, after which Jerusalem was razed and Jews forbidden to approach the site again.

From Solomon to Bar-Cochba more than ten centuries elapsed; during this immense period, the Jewish state enjoyed peace, unity, internal tranquillity, and independence less than a total of fifty years. In one millennium, Jerusalem was taken, looted, or destroyed twenty times; and it was saved from the same fate on many other occasions by abject surrender and heavy tribute. Had the kingdom of Israel not split about 975 B.C.E., had there been less enmity between them and their neighbors, had the Hebrews been able to live in harmony with themselves, and had they not looked so entirely to Yahweh for aid, they could have enjoyed centuries of prosperity, tranquillity, and independence. But then there would have been no apocalyptists, and there would never have been a New Testament.

THE TRIUMPH OF THE YAHWEH-CULT

The cult of Yahweh was proclaimed over a millennium from Samuel through Zechariah and Malachi by a succession of prophets who claimed divine inspiration, declaimed against social injustice, and proclaimed the inevitable supremacy of Israel or Judah. The triumph of this movement, consummated about 450 B.C.E., is of definite importance in the study of Christianity, because Jesus considered himself in direct line with these prophets and because substantial elements of his teaching seem closely in accord with theirs.

The Jews were not easily unified under the novel monotheism of Moses. For centuries they Jews were deeply contaminated by the neighboring cults, which were those common to the Semitic world. The prophets thundered against this debasement of the Yahweh worship, which even so became triumphant only after making enormous concessions to heathen rituals.

The Prophets were the hope of Israel, but few heeded their Divine words. In the books of Samuel, we first begin hearing a good deal about the prophets. Exactly who they were or what was their economic base remain obscure problems; but that they were poor and crude, hysterical and fanatical, and, at times, numerous and influential, is certain (I Sam. 19:20-24). According to Isaiah 20:2, they were clad in rough raiment or went "naked and barefoot." They spoke for the humble, the oppressed, the exploited, the outcast, as did the Buddhists of India; they hated the prosperous, the proud, the powerful. In fact, they may have been roving bands of robbers, from whom David recruited his following: "every one that was in distress and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented, gathered themselves unto him; and he became captain over them" (I Sam. 22:2).

We gain a vivid view of the prophets from I Samuel 19:20-24. The devotees of Yahweh were pariahs and malcontents who conducted frenzied religious rites known as prophesying. It was they who overthrew the judges, who anointed Saul, and who, when he became reactionary, replaced him with David. During peace and prosperity, they were driven back into their caves; but during periods of enslavement, captivity, and degradation they came into their own. For then the people listened to their fulminations against the rich and the wicked, and believed that their misfortunes resulted from disobedience to Yahweh. Ezekiel 6:9 declares that in captivity will Judah return to the Lord: and Jeremiah states (Lam. 1:7) that in the days of her affliction will Jerusalem remember.

David drew his initial strength from these fanatics and outlaws; and the chief "prophets," who were their leaders, held a quasi-legal status throughout his reign. Such men as Gad and Nathan continued to denounce him whenever he strayed from strict obedience to Yahweh and they relayed to him the threats and promises of the deity. With the advent of Solomon, however, the conservatives resumed power, and the Israelites returned to the immemorial worship of the agricultural god Baal and to that of the great Ashtoreth, Queen of Heaven.

When the next great battle for Yahweh occurs, the scene has shifted northward from Judah and Jerusalem to Israel and Samaria. The leader of the Yahweh cult was Elijah, "an hairy man, and girt with a girdle of leather about his loins" (II Kings 1:8). We are told (I Kings 18:19 ff) that the wicked Queen Jezebel had 450 prophets of Baal and 400 of the grove, or Ashtoreth, who ate at her table, and that Elijah was the sole remaining prophet of the Lord (I Kings 18:22). Nor were conditions much better in Judah, for, concerning Manasseh, we read that "he reared up altars for Baal, and made a grove, as did Ahab king of Israel.... And he built altars for all the host of heaven in the two courts of the house of the Lord" (II Kings 21:3-6). It is clear that the priesthoods of Baal and Ashtoreth converted Solomon's Temple to their own use for centuries. Idolatry in Judah was nearly, but not quite, complete, down to about 700 B.C.E. And in the kingdom of Israel, conditions were even more deplorable; for there the worship of Yahweh had never really taken any root at all. That was the reason the Ten Tribes disintegrated and were lost when Tiglath-Pileser III and Sargon II carried them into captivity in 742 and 721 B.C.E.. They had never become deeply conscious of being the Lord's especial and chosen people.

It is however reasonable to believe that the destruction of the Ten Tribes exercised a powerful emotional influence upon Judah. For Hezekiah, who came to the throne in 726 B.C.E., with the ruin of Samaria before his eyes and with Sennacherib's army at his gates about 704 B.C.E., not only humbled himself before Assyria and paid enormous tribute (II Kings 18:14-16), but he also "removed the high places, and broke down the images, and cut down the groves.... He trusted in the Lord God of Israel" (II Kings 18:4-5).

Here was a tremendous event in the history of the Jews; at last and for the first time, about 700 B.C.E., the worship of Yahweh was officially and publicly triumphant in Jerusalem. However, that worship was neither pure nor undefiled; for Jeremiah (Jer. 7: 21-23) other prophets (Hos. 6:6; 8:13; 9:4; Micah 6:6-8) declaimed against the iniquity of blood sacrifices borrowed from the heathen. Isaiah, 1:11, exclaimed indignantly: "I am full of the blood offerings of rams.... I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of he-goats." The prophets continued to denounce the kings and the official priesthood with a ferocity similar to that once employed against the Baalim.

The Old Testament contains at least forty passages in which the Yahweh prophets denounce the temple groves of Ashtoreth (Ishtar) with their sacred prostitution; and it is obvious that the Israelites celebrated her ritual almost universally until the middle of the seventh century. It was her universal worship that Hezekiah removed when he "cut down the groves," and which his son Manasseh restored. It was because of this prostitution that the Mosaic Law specifically outlawed harlots and excluded money earned by them from the Temple (Deut. 23:18).

As soon as the priests of Yahweh seized control of the Temple ritual, they set out to consolidate their position. This required the commitment of their history, ceremonials, and sacerdotal law to writing. Thus it was that about 630 B.C.E. "Hilkiah the high priest . . . found the book of the law in the house of the Lord" (II Kings 22:8; II Chron. 34:3-7; 14; 21). Its complete novelty was emphasized by King Josiah when he heard its words read by Shaphan, because "he rent his clothes" (II Kings 22:11). The reaction of Jeremiah (Jer. 8:8), however, was quite different; for he made clear his conviction that the document of Hilkiah was a forgery from "the false pen of the scribes," or at least a corruption of the Mosaic Law. Nevertheless, all the vestiges of idolatry remaining from the days of Hezekiah were now destroyed by Josiah, who "brake in pieces and made dust of" the molten images (II Chron. 34:4-5).

From that day forward, the authority of the Mosaic Law was supreme among the Jews, whose unity was consolidated during the Babylonian captivity. Despite the Diaspora they remained thenceforth a separate race. Empires rose and fell, civilizations came and went, but the Jew continued his changeless way.

It was not until well after the return from the Captivity and the rebuilding of the Temple that the scriptures assumed their definitive form around 450 B.C.E. We are told that Ezra, or Esdras, was sent from Babylon to be governor of Jerusalem (Ezra 7:6 ff); much of the work of writing, assembling, and editing the sacred writings must be attributed to him.

When the Jews returned to Palestine about 545 B.C.E., they established a theocracy, or prieststate. Judah was from that time on as much a church as a nation.

The story of Ezra's horror at the intermarriage of the Hebrews with the neighboring heathen is related in Ezra 9, and is told in the apocryphal First Book of Esdras. Whereas in the days preceding the Captivity, the greatest crimes had been idolatry and social injustice, now we find that violation of racial purity had become the most heinous of all offenses. This was another great milestone in Jewish progress toward ultimate isolation.

When the Mosaic Law at last became the law of life, prophecy was forbidden. The new priesthood, with their symbols, their scrolls, their learned jargon, their ephods, their special costumes, their goodly incomes, their authority and power, their altars and their Temple, made short shrift of independent prophets claiming divine inspiration. The priests now possessed the Written Word, attributed to Moses himself: and this was to be the sole and final authority to be interpreted by the established priesthood and by none other. Prophecy was no longer to be tolerated: "When any shall yet prophesy, then his father and his mother that begat him shall say unto him, Thou shalt not live; for thou speakest lies in the name of the Lord; and his father and his mother . . . shall thrust him through when he prophesieth . . . neither shall they wear a rough garment to deceive" (Zech. 13:3-4).

This was the culminating act by which the religion of Yahweh was congealed into its final form. The prophets made prophecy a mortal offense.

Once it was established that prophecy was blasphemy, Jewish dissidents were forced into a novel expedient: in order to promulgate their ideology, they presented it as the vision of some ancient Hebrew. Such literature is known as the pseudepigrapha because the purported author had long been dead, and it commonly took the form of the apocalypse.

CONSTANT OPPRESSION AND REVOLT IN ISRAEL....THE FAMILY DIVIDED

We must recognize revolt among the Israelites as of decisive importance because it is inextricably intertwined and inseparable with the Messianic hope as depicted in the Jewish writings as well as the New Testament. Out of constant strife, frequent defeat, and constant frustration germinated their Messianic aspirations, which were their peculiar contribution to Christian ideology.

Up to now we have dealt with oppression from without as the catalyst for the cries of the people for deliverance and a Messianic deliverer. Now we must look within the nation itself; to the very people and their divisiveness that fostered cries for their salvation from themselves.

The religion of Yahweh proclaimed the brotherhood of all Israelites; but this idea, which appealed to all during periods of universal slavery, became instead a divisive force when they were organized as an independent state. For, as such, they soon developed antagonistic social classes; and with the normal operation of these, the equalitarianism of the Yahweh prophets was incompatible. An irreconcilable struggle therefore developed and continued to the very end of the nation's existence. When successful Jews could exploit no one except others of their own race, the bond of solidarity was broken; as a result, there was always a revolutionary movement, until all were scattered in the Diaspora. Jesus considered himself one in the line of these revolutionary prophets; and had it not been for this long tradition of social revolt, the ministry of Jesus could never have developed in Galilee and Judaea.

The Jews began to oppress their brothers. About 880 B.C.E., Jehu, aided and abetted by Elijah and Elisha, led a revolt against the landowners in the northern or Samarian division of Israel. Ahab and his aggressive Baal-worshiping wife, Jezebel, had been dispossessing the small operators of their freeholds, which they consolidated into large estates. Such prophets as Amos, Joel, and Micah thundered against the injustice of this development. Micah declared that they "eat the flesh of my people and flay their skin from off them.... They build up Zion with blood, and Jerusalem shall become heaps" (Micah 3:3-12).

After the second capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in 598 B.C.E. the Jews, in sudden burst of piety, set free their slaves in accordance with the provision of the recently published Mosaic Law; however, the masters immediately repossessed their servants (Jer. 34:8-12). This enormity elicited a fierce denunciation from Jeremiah in which he declared that because of this iniquity, the Lord would "proclaim a liberty for you . . . to the sword, to the pestilence, and to the famine; and I will make you to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth" (Ibid., 13-17).

As we have seen, usury from Hebrews was strictly forbidden by the Mosaic Law. Jeremiah righteously avers, 15:10, that he neither gave nor accepted usury; but Ezekiel, 22:15, declares that God will scatter and destroy Israel for their many mortal sins, among which was this, At: that "thou hast taken usury and increase, and thou hast greedily gained of thy neighbors by extortion, and hast forgotten me, saith the Lord."

Let me also mention that the permanent enslavement of Hebrews by Hebrews was a common practice even after the revolt of Bar Cochba (Bosker, Wisdom of the Talmud, p. 72). It is somewhat disconcerting to learn that when they returned from the Babylonian captivity, they carried with them 7,337 Hebrew slaves (Ezra 2:65). No wonder the prophets were unpopular among the wealthy Jews. And we know from the edict of Gregory the Great that, at the end of the sixth century, the Jews were still holding their brethren in slavery, because this prelate was constantly attempting to entice these bondmen to Christianity by offering them their freedom in return for apostasy from the faith of their fathers.

The sayings of Jesus are replete with echoes and quotations from the Psalms and the prophets. Although his social and ethical doctrines were in reality those of Buddha and Pythagoras, he thought of himself with some justification as one inspired by the Jewish prophets.

ESCHATOLOGY

In Psalm 49:12, we read that man is like the beasts that perish; in 103:16, that his days are as the grass; in 115: 17, that the dead cannot praise the Lord; and in 143:3, that they dwell in darkness.

The Sadducaic Ecclesiastes treats the subject with gloomy finality: men are like beasts—"as one dieth, so dieth the other"; man "hash no pre-eminence above a beast"; "all go into one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again," 3:19-20. We read also, 9:5, that the living know that they shall die, "but the dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward." All the dead, in short, have only an identical and semi-conscious existence.

Even so late a composition as Job, dealing as it does with the problem of good, evil, suffering, and undeserved punishment, never once surmises that there will be compensation hereafter for the inequities of this life. Quite the contrary: for Job emphasizes the inscrutability of God's way, and declares that there is no life beyond the present; men, 6: 18, "go to nothing, and perish"; "so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more," 7:9.

The orthodox Jewish eschatology was similar to the Homeric and modeled upon the Babylonian. The dead are bloodless shades which inhabit Sheol; among them there is neither vitality nor differentiation, neither any reward for the good nor punishment for the wicked. Yet they have an existence; for the witch of Endor was able to summon the reluctant ghost of Samuel.(I Sam. 28:7 ff). Euripides tells us that "The soul of the deceased, although it live no longer, yet cloth still retain a consciousness which lasts forever" (Helen). But, since nothing could be done to achieve happiness in the after life, the Jews, like the Homeric Greeks, evinced little concern over man's eternal and individual destiny.

THE INFLUENCE OF ZORASTER AND THE PERSIAN CAPTIVITY ON JEWISH ESCHATOLOGY

During the Seleucid and the Hasmonean periods, under Greek and Persian influence, a new eschatology began to develop among the Jews. This "new eschatology" began in the second or possibly the third century B.C.E and contained within it:

- The Zoroastrian-Pythagorean doctrines of immortality
- The Zoroastrian-Pythagorean doctrines of resurrection
- The Zoroastrian-Pythagorean doctrines of supernatural judgment,
- The Zoroastrian-Pythagorean doctrines of hell and heaven
- The Zoroastrian-Pythagorean doctrines of punishment after death

These religious ideas and beliefs began to penetrate a segment of Jewish consciousness. The Sadducees certainly had a legitimate argument when they declared, as they must have done, that if all these things are realities, Yahweh would have revealed them through Moses, or at least through the Psalms and the ancient prophets; surely, He would not have left the Great Lawgiver, together with Isaiah, and Ezekiel, in complete ignorance!

The book of Isaiah, however, was composed over several centuries; and it is true that a late interpolation, 26:19, expresses a vague belief in a resurrection: "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead."

But the celebrated declaration of Daniel 12:2 is more definite: "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." Compare these passages: the first, probably written in the third century, simply implies that there will be a resurrection of Jews. The second, written in 163 B. C., declares that many — not all—who have died, shall arise: some to eternal life, others to endless punishment. This is the oldest declaration of this concept in the Bible: there are, according to Daniel, three classes among the dead: first, those who will remain unconscious in the dust; second, those who will ascend to heaven; and, third, those who will be consigned to endless shame.

Let us note that while the Sadducees remained adamant in rejecting the new eschatology, the Pharisees did not remain immune; concerning this, Josephus is our principal authority, and a competent one, since he belonged to their sect. He states that, according to them, "all souls are incorruptible . . . the souls of good men only are removed into other bodies, but . . . the souls of bad men are subject to eternal punishment" (Wars, II, viii, 4). Josephus himself seems to have embraced this Brahmanic-Pythagorean doctrine, since he expresses the same theory in a speech to his soldiers at Jotopata to dissuade them from suicide while facing imminent death at the hands of the Romans (Wars, III, viii, 5). In another passage, he elaborates that, according to the Pharisees, all souls are immortal and subject to rewards and everlasting punishments after death; that the good "shall have power to revive and live again; on account of which doctrine, they are able greatly to persuade the body of the people" (Antiquities, XVIII, 1, 3)

The rabbis, who became the successors to the Pharisees, abandoned this Zoroastrian-Pythagorean eschatology, and returned to that of the Old Testament, possibly in part because of the conflict with Christianity. It is interesting to note that a Jewish colony, discovered in China about 1800 A.D., which had lived there in complete isolation since the first century, still believed in "Purgatory, Hell, Paradise, the Resurrection, and the Last Judgment" (Milman, History of the Jews, II, 178 ff). Thus we know that at least some of the Pharisees had embraced the Zoroastrian doctrine of purgatory six centuries before it appeared as a dogma in the Catholic Church.

THE OLD TESTAMENT MESSIAHS

As you can imagine having read the prior articles in this series, there are many forces which created the Messianic Concept. No disinterested scholar will deny that the surrender and frustration created among their subject peoples by the long Roman oppression prepared them for a religion of renunciation. Likewise, we believe that the innumerable sorrows and catastrophes suffered by the Jews over many centuries created the climate in which apocalyptic hope took precedence over every other. Out of these experiences grew the Messianic concepts of the Jews.

Because of persecution and oppression the Jews acquired an intense faith in the Messiah. The Messianic hope has been a major preoccupation of the Jewish mind for twenty-five centuries. Maimonides, 1135-1204 A.D., declared that belief in the expected Messiah was mandatory; after eighteen centuries in China, the small Jewish colony there was still awaiting its Messiah ((Milman, History of the Jews, II, 178 ff).

Just before and after the destruction of Jerusalem, the Jews, in frenzied excitement, lived in daily anticipation of apocalyptic catastrophe and salvation. The Romans recognized that this hope was a political force with which they must reckon; and that the recalcitrancy of the Jews stemmed from their anticipation of a supernaturally endowed Messiah who would crush and destroy their masters (Tacitus, History, V, 13). For this reason, they executed any Jew professing Messianic pretenses.

There was not just "one" Messianic concept. There were many. Among the Jews, in different periods and among different groups, we find three principal Messianic concepts:

A PROPHET LIKE UNTO MOSES...AN ANOINTED HUMAN MESSIAH

The first had been prevalent since the eighth century B. C.; it envisioned a great human leader, a descendant of David, a kind of second Moses (Deut. 18:18), who, supported by divine approval and perhaps by supernatural intervention, would gather the children of the twelve tribes into Judea, reconstitute them into a unified kingdom, and make Israel the center of a world-empire, to which all the Gentiles would offer allegiance and the religion of which all nations would at last embrace.

A SUPERNATURAL BEING....DANIEL'S SON OF MAN

The second concept was more overwhelming: it conceived of the Messiah as an all-powerful, supernatural being; Daniel called Him the Son of Man and saw Him in a vision surrounded by thousands of thousands of His ministers, coming to defeat and destroy the enemies of Israel, call the dead from their graves, conduct the last judgment, and establish the Jews in their everlasting kingdom.

A SUPERNATUREAL-APOCALYTIC-UNIVERSAL JUDGE OF ALL MANKIND

The third concept retained the supernatural and apocalyptic Messiah coming on the clouds with glory and surrounded by multitudes of saints; but it transformed Him into the almighty moral judge of all mankind, who would establish the kingdom of righteousness on earth. This concept made the Messiah impartially international; it is not found in the Old Testament, which is consistently Judaistic; it occurs only among the Essenes and in the New Testament/

THE PRIMITIVE MESSIANIC CONCEPT OF THE JEWS

Perhaps the oldest expression of the primitive Messianic idea is found in Joel, where we find that agricultural pests and Gentiles would both be destroyed by supernatural intervention. But it is in the majestic poetry of Isaiah that we find the first fully-developed Messianic concept, which was the prophet's reaction to the final destruction of Samaria and Israel in 721 B.C.E. and the imminent dangers surrounding Jerusalem and Judah.

The first twenty-three chapters of Isaiah were composed in the eighth century and portray the kingdom of a purely human Messiah, under which the nations "shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Isa. 2:2-4). We are told of the young woman who, though still a virgin, is soon to conceive and bear a child (Isa. 7:14-17) and before this child is old enough "to cry, My father, my mother, the riches of Damascus and the spoil of Samaria shall be taken away by the king of Assyria" (Isa. 8:4). This, of course, was actual history, then recently consummated; the following genuine prophecy, however, like most of chapters 13-23, was never to be fulfilled: "For unto us a child is born . . . a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulders; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David . . . henceforth even for ever" (Isa. 9:6-7).

Before this child could become the warrior-king of Israel, Judah and Jerusalem must suffer great tribulation (Isa. 10:5-6). Yet a remnant would return (Isa. 10:10-21); the reconstituted tribes would become mighty; "and he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth'' (Isa. 11: 1-12). Some have thought that this wonder-child was Hezekiah; but this is impossible, since the Messiah-to-be was still an infant in 721 B.C.E. when Samaria fell, and Hezekiah was born about 740 B.C.E. and became king of Judah in 726 B.C.E. Isaiah indeed calls him his own child, Mahershalalhashbaz (Isa. 8:3), born of a prophetess.

Micah is celebrated because of the prophecy concerning Bethlehem, which "though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler of Israel" (Micah 5:2). This mighty Messiah king, "the root of Jesse," shall lay his enemies prostrate before him (Micah 7:16-17), create the Jewish kingdom (Micah 4:6-7), and establish the Gentiles in the worship of Yahweh (Micah 4:1-3).

Zechariah reflects an elaborate ideology in which:

- The Messiah is to be a priest-king (Zech. 6:12-13)
- The will bring the scattered Israelites from all nations back to Jerusalem (Zech. 8:7-8)
- Many of the Gentiles will embrace the religion of Yahweh (Zech. 8:23);
- The Jewish Empire will extend to the ends of the earth (Zech. 9:10)
- There will be a great tribulation in which the heathen will sack Jerusalem (Zech. 14:1-2)
- Then the Messiah will appear and destroy all his enemies in a final Armageddon and all their wealth will become the spoil of Israel (Zech. 14:14)
- Finally the whole world will be organized under the Jewish theocracy (Zech. 14:16 ff).

This conception continued substantially unchanged through Revelation and other Jewish apocalypses written as late as 100 A D.

As we have seen, prophets had been condemned. Henceforth, only one more could appear: Elijah, the harbinger. Generation after generation, the Jews awaited his appearance: no one could impersonate him with impunity, since he would be permitted only a brief ministry before the Messiah himself must be made manifest. And from him no mean accomplishments would be required: he would have to recall the scattered children of Israel from the four corners of the earth; establish a powerful and united government; defeat all the enemies of his people; bring the whole world under the rule of Jerusalem; attract all the Gentiles as proselytes to the worship of Yahweh, and establish universal peace and prosperity. Failing to accomplish all these objectives, he would be revealed as an imposter and a blasphemer, and his punishment would be death forthwith by stoning, as provided in Leviticus (Lev. 24:16). Understand prophecy might have been outlawed, but prophecy in the form pseudepigraphic writings flourished. We call them the inter-testamental writings and the Dead Sea Scrolls today.

THE SUFFERING SERVANT AND ATONING MESSIAH....THE MERGING OF ISAIAH AND ZECHARIAH

One of the most pathetic and poignant concepts of the Jewish Messiah is that of the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53, which may have been this prophet himself. This was, furthermore, the model upon which Jesus consciously patterned his own career: "despised and rejected of men: a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief . . . wounded for our transgressions . . . bruised for our iniquities . . . the Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all.... He was oppressed and . . . afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth."

Ezekiel saw strange visions and imagined the twelve tribes re-established in Palestine under a new covenant. He even saw the vision of a new and glorious temple; and his prophecy closes with a description of the New Jerusalem, which prefigures the Holy City in Revelation. The most vital portions of Ezekiel, however, consist in his conception of himself as a sacrifice and atonement for the iniquity of Israel. He calls himself "Son of Man" ninety-four times. And this Son of Man (a title which Jesus was to apply to himself almost exclusively) was made a prophet, a teacher, and the vicarious savior of his people.

The atoning Son of Man concept of Zechariah, when merged with the corporate motif of a suffering nation of Israel at the hands of the Gentiles, whereby Israel's suffering is interpreted for the benefit of the non-Jew as depicted by Isaiah, it is easy to apply this "merged" concept not only to the Jews corporate, but to the quintessential Jew...the expected Messiah. Next, depending to whom one identifies as his Messiah, the concept is easily attributed to one such as the historical Jesus.

THE SUPERNATURAL JUDAISTIC MESSIAH

In addition to these concepts, there grew up under Persian influence in the period following the Captivity a new and fearful idea: a Messiah modeled upon the Zoroastrian Soshans, who would be a supernatural manifestation of infinite power who would appear suddenly in the dreadful day of the Lord surrounded by myriads of angels, and who would judge the wicked, destroy the enemies of Israel, and establish the kingdom of the righteous saints.

DEUTERO-ISAIAH

We turn, now, to Deutero-Isaiah, comprising chapters 40-55. The world-power is no longer Assyria; even Babylon has faded, and is now merely staked out for vengeance. Cyrus, who is called God's Anointed (Isa. 45:1), and Persia, now loom large. The probable date is about 536 B.C.E. Elijah, who will be succeeded by the Messiah himself, is about to appear as in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God;" after which "the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, all all flesh shall shall see it together (Isa. 40:1-5). This Messiah shall bring judgment upon the Gentiles and they shall become the slaves of Judah: "the labor of Egypt, and the merchandize of Ethiopia and of the Sabeans, men of stature, shall come over unto thee, and they shall be thine: they shall come after thee: in chains shall they come over, and they shall fall down unto thee and they shall make supplication unto thee" (Isa. 42:1; 45:14; 23).

TRITO-ISAIAH

Trito-Isaiah, consisting of chapters 56-66 probably composed in the fifth century, contains the oldest fully developed concept of the apocalyptic Messiah. There can be little doubt that this, like Daniel, reflects Zoroastrian influence; for there is to be a new heaven and a new earth. And no longer will the savior of Judah be a man, no matter how divinely endowed or supported; instead, he will be God Himself (Isa. 66: 15-16). And to house, as it were, this Messianic kingdom, "behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered" (Isa. 65:17-19). In this blessed new Jerusalem, there shall be universal peace (Isa. 65:25) and blood sacrifices will be abolished forever (Isa. 66:3). And God shall be the light and glory of the Holy City, even as in the Persian heaven (Isa. 60:19) and "the Gentiles shall come to thy light. And the sons of strangers shall build up thy walls, and their kings minister unto thee.... For the nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish" (Isa. 60:3-12).

DANIEL'S MESSIAH

Josephus marveled at the accuracy of Daniel's "prophecies" (Antiq. X, xi, 7) which describe the events of several centuries, and adds that herein we have a refutation of the Epicureans, who deny the existence of providence. He noted however that some of Daniel's predictions remained unfulfilled. But modern scholarship has established that the first chapters of Daniel were written about 238 B.C.E., and the last six in 164-163 B.C.E., or nearly four hundred years after the purported date. This afforded the author a long period of history to present as prophecy.

The book as a whole uses the standard method of apocalyptical revelation, which came into common usage in the second century B.C.E. Some personage was chosen from Hebrew tradition—Enoch, Abraham, Moses, Isaiah, Ezra, Baruch, etc.—and a vision was attributed to him. In this, history is accurately portrayed as prophecy down to the moment of writing; at that point, it passes abruptly from the known to the unknown, and, with the authority established by previous authenticity, seeks to gain credence for actual predictions, never to be fulfilled.

Although certain portions of Daniel remain obscure, the references for the most part are clear enough. For example, we can guess but cannot establish just who were the ten horns or kings preceding the "little horn" who was Antiochus IV Epiphanes. Nor is it possible with certainty to unravel the mystery of the seventy weeks (Daniel 9:24-27). On the other hand, the kingdoms referred to in dreams or visions are unmistakable; it is obvious that the northern and the southern kingdoms, the wars of which are discussed at such length in chapter 11, are those of the early second-century Seleucids and Ptolemies. There are at least eight specific references to Antiochus, who was the great enemy of Israel from 171 to his death in 163 B.C.E. and these run like a red thread through the last six chapters.

We note that the author has a much more accurate knowledge of Seleucid history than of Babylonian. First, there was never a king Belshazzar; second, Babylon was taken, not under Darius, but under Cyrus; third, Darius succeeded Cyrus, not vice-versa; fourth, history knows no Ahasuerus, and if Artaxerxes is meant, Darius was not his son, but his grandfather; and, fifth, had Daniel lived into the reign of Darius Hystaspes, he must have been well over a hundred years of age when the Great King set him "over the whole realm" (Daniel 6:3).

We must also point out that Daniel departs so sharply from his Hebrew predecessors that he is, in reality, only semi-Judaic; he represents a thoroughgoing amalgamation of Jewish aspirations with Zoroastrian eschatology. In him, for the first time, we hear of archangels, immortality, a general resurrection, a last judgment, a book in which the names of the redeemed are written, a system of rewards and punishments after death, and eternal regions of bliss and shame. The Messiah, too, is transformed and becomes much more like the Saoshyant than the descendant of David who is to occupy a temporal throne. In fact the Son of Man is a supernatural agency of the Supreme God, who has very little resemblance to Yahweh; there is not the slightest indication that the Messiah has any human ancestry or relationship; he is not of the root of Jesse, but the effulgent Word of God. Daniel rejects the whole Judaic concept of the Messiah, but retains the conviction that the Jews are the saints and the Chosen People. He reflects foe first great penetration of paganism into Jewish theology and this document stands midway between the most ancient Isaiah and the depiction of the Messiah in the New Testament.

In the second chapter, Daniel interprets Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the Great Image, of which the head was gold, the breast silver, the belly brass, the legs iron, and the feet partly clay and partly iron. As we know, this was a common Zoroastrian metaphor. Finally, all these, which represent the Babylonian, the Median-Persian, the Greek, and the Seleucid-Ptolemaic empires, down to 240 B.C.E. , are to be swept away as dust, to be followed immediately by the Messianic Jewish kingdom, which is to be like a great mountain, or as a stone "cut out without hands" (Daniel 2:34), and which will destroy and replace all the preceding empires (Daniel 2:35).

As to the time of fulfillment, there is no evasion. The eternal kingdom of the Messiah is to be established "in the days of these kings" (Daniel 2:44); that is, of the Seleucids and the Ptolemies of the third century, B. C.

Beginning with chapter 7, we have a series of true apocalyptic visions of the highest and most elaborate category. In December, 167 B.C.E., Antiochus Epiphanes, as we have noted, desecrated the Temple and established there the Eleusinian ritual. The second portion of Daniel was written immediately after the restoration of the Jewish worship in December, 164, but probably before the death of Antiochus, April, 163 B.C.E.

The eighth chapter describes the ram with the two horns, Media and Persia, which was overcome by the rough goat, Grecia. This beast had a great horn, who was Alexander; when this was broken, four kingdoms arose in its place, headed by his four generals, who divided the Empire. In due time, there comes "a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences" (Daniel 8:23). This king (Antiochus) shall vent his fury upon the holy covenant, shall enter into league with the apostate Jews, shall bring tribulation upon the saints, shall desecrate the sanctuary, and "shall place the abomination that maketh desolate" for three and a half years (Daniel 7:25; 11:30-32). This is the fearful tribulation which must precede the Saoshyant, the resurrection, and the Last Judgment (Daniel 12:11-12).

There is an elaborate vision which culminates in the accession of the Son of Man, and in which we find a variant version of the four empires (Daniel 7: 3-8). In order passed before him the Lion (the Babylonian Empire), the Bear (the Median-Assyrian Empire), the Leopard (the Persian Empire), and then "a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible," with "great iron teeth," which was the Greek Empire. And from this had issued ten horns, or kings, and the eleventh, "another little horn," who was Antiochus Epiphanes, presently to be destroyed and consigned to the burning flame (Daniel 7:11). The Ancient of Days now appears on His throne, and He gives the Son eternal dominion over the saints: "I beheld one like the Son of Man" who "came with the clouds of heaven ... to the Ancient of Days.... And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him," whose "dominion is . . . everlasting . . .But the saints of the most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom forever, even for ever and ever" (Daniel 7: 9-18).

And when shall all this come to pass? "From the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days" (Daniel, 12:11-12). Thus, logo days were to elapse between the beginning of the desecration and the establishment of the Messianic kingdom, which according to this computation, was due in July or August, 163 B.C.E. The desolation itself actually endured for a period of 1095 days; there were, therefore, to remain some six months between the restoration of the worship and the advent of the Soshans. The apocalypse was due in less than a year after the second half of Daniel was composed.

THE ESSENE CHRISTIAN MESSIAH

The Messiah of Essenes and the Christians is a Messiah of universal and moral judgment. Among the earlier prophets we find everywhere the orthodox Jewish concept of a purely human Messiah, which was never accepted by Jesus himself, but which often intrudes in the New Testament and from which his original disciples could never free themselves. This was the age-old idea inseparable from Jewish tradition; but with the advent of Zoroastrian influence, the Messiah became a supernatural power; and out of this, when absorbed by Jewish theology, grew the doctrine of the Parousia

One great Messianic doctrine remains to be developed: that the final judgment shall be on ethical and not on Jewish national or racial lines; that the Messianic kingdom will be international, will be based on moral regeneration, and will not simply constitute a division of humanity into saintly Jews and Jewish proselytes on the one hand and wicked Gentiles on the other.

We shall see how this concept was completed by the Essenes and appropriated by the followers of Jesus in the New Testament in subsequent studies.

OTHER VARIOUS SOURCES USED FOR THE CHRIST "MYTHS" IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

If you have been a regular reader of Bet Emet Ministries for any length of time you are acquainted with our desire to enlighten those who are followers of Jesus to the truths behind the "Christ-story" in the New Testament and the religion he is said to have founded. You have seen in varying articles the documentation and facts substantiating that Gentile Christianity is made up of composite products, made up, to a great extent, of the attributes, the doctrines, and the customs of the gods and the religions which preceded them and existed around them. "The Christian believes that Christ is coexistent with his father, Jehovah -- that he has existed from the foundations of the world. This is in a measure true. The years that have elapsed since his alleged incarnation are few compared with the years of his gestation in the intellectual womb of humanity" (John Remsburg, The Christ, Prometheus Books, 1994)."

THE CHRIST MYTH OF THE NEW TESTAMENT A COMPOSITE OF GENTILE RELIGIOUS BELIEFS

To understand the origin and nature of Christ and Christianity it is necessary to know something of the religious systems and doctrines from which they were evolved. Make no mistake about it; the Qumran/Essene community both adopted and applied many of these "myths" to their religious ideas which they later attached to their "Cosmic Redeemer" and when they later joined the Jesus Movement it was simple to apply these same beliefs to Jesus. That in a nutshell explains why the New Testament contains two quite different portraits of Jesus: The Synoptic "human" Jesus and the "supernatural" Jesus of the Gospel of John. More on that in later articles.

The following, some in a large and others in but a small degree, contributed to mold this supposed divine incarnation and inspire this supposed revelation:

- Nature or Sex Worship
- Solar Worship
- Astral Worship
- Worship of the Elements and Forces of Nature
- Worship of Animals and Plants
- Polytheism
- The Mediatorial Idea The Messianic Idea
- The Logos

NATURE OR SEX WORSHIP

The deification and worship of the procreative organs and the generative principles of life is one of the oldest and one of the most universal of religions. It has been called the foundation of all religions. In some nations the worship of the male energy, Phallic worship, predominated; in others the worship of the female energy, Yoni worship, prevailed. But in all both elements were recognized. Mrs. Besant says: "Womanhood has been worshiped in all ages of the world, and maternity has been deified by all creeds: from the savage who bowed before the female symbol of motherhood, to the philosophic Comtist who adores woman 'in the past, the present, and the future,' as mother, wife, and daughter, the worship of the female element in nature has run side by side with that of the male; the worship is one and the same in all religions, and runs in an unbroken thread from the barbarous ages to the present time."

Among the life generating gods may be named Vishnu, Osiris, Zeus, Priapus, Adonis, Bacchus, Saturn, Apollo, Baal, Moloch, and Jehovah. Among the receptive life producing goddesses were Isis, Rhea, Ceres, Venus, Istar, Astarte, Aschera, Devaki, Eve, and Mary. Where the worship of the female element largely prevailed the Virgin and Child was a favorite deity. Isis and Horus, Rhea and Quirinus, Leto and Apollo, Devaki and Krishna, Mary and Christ, all had their inception in the sex worship of primitive man.

The symbol of Phallic worship, the cross, has become the emblem of Christianity

This is rather amazing since Jesus was crucified on a stake without a cross-beam, but the "pattern" of "crucified sun-godmen had to be continued if the legend was to be readily accepted by the Gentile sun-worshipers; nothing has changed.

I quote again from our English authoress:

"We find the cross in India, Egypt, Tibet, Japan, always as the sign of life-giving power, it was worn as an amulet by girls and women, and seems to have been specially worn by the women attached to the temples [sacred prostitutes], as a symbol of what was, to them, a religious calling. The cross is, in fact, nothing but the refined phallus, and in the Christian religion is a significant emblem of its pagan origin; it was adored, carved in temples, and worn as a sacred emblem by sun and nature worshipers, long before there were any Christians to adore, carve, and wear it. The crowd kneeling before the cross in Roman Catholic and in High Anglican churches is a simple reproduction of the crowd who knelt before it in the temples of ancient days, and the girls who wear it amongst ourselves are -- in the most innocent unconsciousness of its real significance -- exactly copying the Indian and Egyptian women of an elder time."

The American Cyclopedia says: "The crux ansata, so common on Egyptian monuments, symbolizes the union of the active and passive principles of nature. In the Etruscan tombs have been found crosses of four phalli."...

The sex worship of the Semitic tribes of Western Asia had its origin, it is believed, in India, where, under the name of Sakti worship, it prevails today, three-fourth of the Hindoos, it is claimed, belonging to this sect. The worship is thus described by the Encyclopedia Britannica's chief authority on the subject, Prof. H. H. Wilson: "The ceremonies are mostly gone through in a mixed society, the Sakti being personified by a naked female, to whom meat and wine are offered and then distributed amongst the company. These eat and drink alternately with gesticulations and mantras -- and when the religious part of the business is over, the males and females rush together and indulge in a wild orgy."

The foregoing is almost an exact description of the Agapae, or Love Feasts, as they were observed for a time in the early Christian church....

The religion of Christ as it exists today is not only in its external forms, but in its very essence, largely a survival of the nature worship of old. That it is closely allied to it is admitted by Christian ministers themselves. The Rev. Frederick Robertson says: "The devotional feelings are often singularly allied to the animal nature. They conduct the unconscious victim of feelings that appear divine, into a state of life, at which the world stands aghast; fanaticism is always united with either excessive lewdness or desperate asceticism," (Essays). The Rev. S. Baring-Gould, in Freaks of Fanaticism, says: "The religious passion verges so closely on the sexual passion that a slight additional pressure given to it bursts the partition, and both are confused in a frenzy of religious debauch." The Rev. J. H. Noyes says: "Religious love is a very near neighbor to sex love, and they always get mixed in the intimacies and social excitement of [religious] revivals."

SOLAR/SUN WORSHIP

Although this website deals extensively elsewhere with "solar myths" and how they were applied to a "Cosmic godman" in detail I will for introductory purposes give a simple synopsis of solar worship in this article in order to give an overall view of all the various sources used to construct the "godman soter/savior" of the nations. Let me remind you that our purposes to not only familiarize ourselves with such information from its varied sources but to follow the "germ" of such theological thought all the way to the Essene/Qumran sect which provided the impetus to the early Christians for the adoption of the same ideas as applied to Jesus. This might be hard for you at first to believe but the testimony of scholars as well as our own Early Church Fathers admit to such a fact!

Scarcely less prevalent than sex worship was the worship of the sun. While sex worship was confined chiefly to the generation of human life, sun worship comprehended the generation of all life. The sun was recognized as the generative power of the universe. He overshadows the receptive earth from whom all life is born. I quote from M. Soury: "Amid all these forces, the mightiest is, without contradiction, the sun, the fire of heaven, father of earthly fire, unique and supreme cause of motion and life on our planet. There is no need or reason to understand that the very life, and as it were the blood of our celestial father flows in the veins of the Earth, our mother. In the time of love, when the luminous heaven embraces her, from her fertilized womb springs forth a world. It is she who quivers on the plains where the soft moist air waves gently on the grasses; it is she who climbs in the bush, who soars in the oak, who fills the solitude with the joyous twitter of birds beneath the cloudlet, or from the leaf-lined nests; it is she who in seas and in running waters, or mountains and in woods, couples the gorgeous male with the ardent female, throbs in every bosom, loves in every life. But all this terrestrial life, all this warmth and all this light are but effluents from the sun." (Religion of Israel, pp. 3, 4.)

Prof. Tyndall says: "We are no longer in a poetical but in a purely mechanical sense, the children of the sun." "The sun," said Napoleon Bonaparte, "gives all things life and fertility. It is the true God of the earth."

John Newton, M.R.C.S., of England, says: "The glorious sun, that 'god of this world' the source of life and light to our earth, was early adored, and an effigy thereof used as a symbol. Mankind watched with rapture its rays gain strength daily in the Spring until the golden, glories of Midsummer had arrived, when the earth was bathed during the longest days in his beams, which ripened the fruits that his returning course had started into life. When the sun once more began its course downwards to the winter solstice, his votaries sorrowed, for he seemed to sicken and grow paler at the advent of December, when his rays scarcely reached the earth, and all nature, benumbed and cold, sunk into a death-like sleep. Hence feasts and fasts were instituted to mark the commencement of the various phases of the solar year, which have continued from the earliest known period, under various names, to our own times" (The Assyrian Grove).

The most prominent deities in the pantheons of the gods were solar deities. Among these were Osiris, Vishnu, Mithra, Apollo, Hercules, Adonis, Bacchus, and Baal. In the worship of some of these gods sex and solar worship were united.

The early Israelites were mostly sun worshipers. And even in later times, the sun god, Baal. divided with Jehovah the worship of the Jews. Saul, Jonathan, and David named their children in honor of this god. "Saul begat Jonathan,...and Esh-baal. And the son of Jonathan was Merib-baal" (1 Chron. viii, 33, 34). David named his last son, save one, Beeliada, "Baal Knows" (1 Chron. xiv, 7). Solomon's worship included not merely the worship of Jehovah, but that of Baal and other gods. His temple was filled with Pagan ornaments and emblems pertaining to solar worship. Regarding this the Rev. Dr. Oort of Holland says: "Solomon's temple had much in common with heathen edifices, and slight modifications might have made it a suitable temple for Baal.

This need not surprise us, for the ancient religion of the Israelitish tribes was itself a form of Nature-worship just as much as the religions of the Canaanites, Phoenicians, Philistines, and other surrounding peoples were. Most of the Israelites certainly saw no harm in these ornaments, since they were not aware of any very great difference between the character of Yahweh [Jehovah] and that of Baal, Astarte, or Moloch" (Bible for Learners, Vol. II, p. 88). Long after the time of Solomon the horses and chariots of the Sun were kept in the temple (2 Kings xxiii, 11). Many of the stories concerning Moses, Joshua, Jonah, and other Bible characters are solar myths. Samson was a sun god. Dr. Oort says: "Sun-worship was by no means unknown to the Israelites.... The myths that were circulated among these people show that they were zealous worshipers of the sun. These myths are still preserved, but, as in all other cases, they are so much altered as to be hardly recognizable. The writer who has preserved them for us lived at a time when the worship of the sun had long ago died out. He transforms the sun god into an Israelite hero [Samson]" (ibid., I, p. 414). St. Augustine believed that Samson and the sun god Hercules were one.

Charles Francois Dupuis, in his Origin of Worship, one of the most elaborate and remarkable works on mythology ever penned, shows that nearly all the religions of the world, including Christianity, were derived largely from solar worship. All the solar deities, he says, have a common history. This history, summarized, is substantially as follows:

"The god is born about December 25th, without sexual intercourse, for the sun, entering the winter solstice, emerges in the sign of Virgo, the heavenly Virgin. His mother remains ever-virgin, since the rays of the sun, passing through the zodiacal sign, leave it intact. His infancy is filled with dangers, because the new-born Sun is feeble in the midst of the winter's fogs and mists, which threaten to devour him; his life is one of toil and peril, culminating at the spring equinox in a final struggle with the powers of darkness. At that period the day and night are equal, and both fight for the mastery. Though the night veil the urn and he seems dead; though he has descended out of sight, below the earth, yet he rises again triumphant, and he rises in the sign of the Lamb, and is thus the Lamb of God, carrying away the darkness and death of the winter months. Henceforth he triumphs, growing ever stronger and more brilliant. He ascends into the zenith, and there he glows, on the right hand of God, himself God, the very substance of the Father, the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, upholding all things by his lifegiving power."

Dr G. W. Brown, author of Researches in Oriental History, says:

"Strange as it may seem whilst Mithras and Osiris, Monysos and Bacchus, Apollo and Serapis, with many others [including Christ] in name, all masculine sun gods, and all interblended, a knowledge of one is generally a knowledge of the whole, wherever located or worshiped."

If Christ was not originally a solar god he wears today the very garb of one. His mother, the Virgin, was the mother of the solar gods; his birthday, Christmas, is the birthday of all the gods of the sun; his Twelve Apostles correspond to the twelve signs of the Zodiac; according to the Gospels, at his crucifixion the sun was eclipsed, he expired toward sunset, and rose again with the sun; the day appointed for his worship, the Lord's day, is the dies solis, Sunday, of the sun worshipers; while the principal feasts observed in memory of him were once observed in honor of their goals. "Every detail of the Sun myth," says the noted astronomer, Richard A. Proctor, "is worked into the record of the Galilean teacher."

The cross we have seen was a symbol of Phallic worship. The cross, and especially the crucifix, was also an emblem of solar worship. It was caned or painted on, or within, a circle representing the horizon, the head and feet and the outstretched arms of the sacrificial offering or crucified Redeemer pointing toward the four quarters of the horizon. The Lord's Supper, observed in memory of Christ, was observed in memory of Mithra, Bacchus, and other solar gods. The nimbus, or aureola, surrounding the head of Jesus in his portraits represents the rays of the sun. It was thus that the ancient adorers of the sun adorned the effigies of their god.

There still exists a pillar erected by the sun worshipers of Carthage. On this pillar is caned the sun god, Baal, with a nimbus encircling his head.

The Christian doctrine of the resurrection had its origin in sun worship. As the sun, the Father, rose from the dead, so it was believed that his earthly children would also rise from the dead. "The daily disappearance and the subsequent rise of the sun," says Newton, "appeared to many of the ancients as a true resurrection; thus, while the east came to be regarded as the source of light and warmth, happiness and glory, the west was associated with darkness and chill, decay and death. This led to the custom of burying the dead so as to face the east when they rose again, and of building temples and shrines with an opening toward the east. To effect this, Vitruvius, two thousand years ago, gave precise rules, which are still followed by Christian architects."

Max Mueller in his Origin of Religion (pp. 200, 201), says: "People wonder why so much of the old mythology, the daily talk, of the Aryans was solar what else could it have been? The names of the sun are endless and so are his stories; but who he was, whence he came and whither he went, remained a mystery from beginning to end.... Man looked up to the sun, yearning for the response of a soul, and though that response never came, though his senses recoiled, dazzled and blinded by an effulgence which he could not support, yet he never doubted that the invisible was there, and that, where his senses failed him, where he could neither grasp nor comprehend, he might still shut his eyes and trust, fall down and worship."

This worship of old survives in the worship of today. A knowledge of the location, the limits and the nature of the sun has gradually convinced the world that this is not God's dwelling place; but somewhere in the infinite expanse of the blue beyond they fancy he has his throne. To this imaginary being is rendered the same adoration that was rendered to him by primitive man -- the adoration of childish ignorance.

ASTRAL WORSHIP

The worship of the planets and stars was probably a later development than sex and solar worship. It flourished for a time in nearly every part of the world, and left its impress on the religions that succeeded it.

In Chaldea/Babylon (remember the Jews were in captivity there and exposed to Babylon's religious ideas as well), one of the principal sources of Judaism and Christianity, the worship of the stars prevailed. I quote from Dr. Ridpath: "In their aspirations for communion with the higher powers, the yearning of the ancient Chaldeans turned upwards to the planets and the stars. The horizon of the Babylonian plain was uniform and boundless. It was the heaven above rather than the earth beneath, which exhibited variety and life. The Zodiac was ever new with its brilliant evolutions. Through the clear atmosphere the tracks of the shining orbs could be traced in every phase and transposition. With each dawn of morning light, with each recurrence of the evening twilight, a new panorama spread before the reverent imagination of the dreamer, and he saw in the moving spheres not only the abode but the manifested glory of his gods" (History of the World, Vol. 1, p. 138)....

After alluding to the ancient Vedic religion, which recognized in the stars the souls of our departed ancestors, Prof. John Fiske says: "The Christianised German peasant, fifty centuries later, tells his children that the stars are angels' eyes, and the English cottager impresses it on the youthful mind that it is wicked to point to the stars, though why he cannot tell" (Myths and Myth Makers, p. 76).

In the Zodiac the Sun had twelve palaces. Each palace had a star for a god, and each was subject to the Sun. Each day of the week was governed by a planet, and each hour of the day had its controlling star. Many scholars, including Jefferson, have held that Christ and his twelve Apostles relate to the zodiac and were derived from this stellar worship. The seven days of the week are still dedicated to the old planetary gods, and, with a few modifications, bear their names.

Chambers' Encyclopedia says: "The Jews, as well as the early Christians, had no special names for the single days, but counted their number from the previous Sabbath, beginning with Sunday, as the first after the Sabbath, and ending with Friday, as the sixth after the previous, or eve (Ereb) of the next Sabbath. After a very short time, however, young Christianity, which in the same manner had endeavored to count from the feria secunda, or second day after Sunday, to the Septima (or Saturday), had to fall back again upon the old heathen names" (Art "Week").

The planetary gods Nardouk (Jupiter), Adar (Saturn), Istar (Venus), Nergal (Mars), and Nebo (Mercury), were all worshiped by the ancient Israelites. Istar was called "Queen of the Stars." Moloch, the rival of Jehovah, who shared for centuries the worship of the Hebrews, had his blazing star, the emblem of his implacable cruelty. The worship of Astarte, daughter of the moon, and "Queen of Heaven," whose emblem was a star, was introduced by Solomon himself (1 Kings xi, 5; 2 Kings xxiii, 13). For more than three hundred years she had her temple in Jerusalem. And even today devout Jews address orizons to the new moon, a relic of the worship of Astarte. The rosary is a survival of astral worship. It was once a symbol of the stars.

The author of Supernatural Religion says: "The belief that sun, moon and stars were living entities possessed of souls was generally held by the Jews at the beginning of our era."

The same belief was entertained by the Christian Fathers. Origen says: "As the stars move with so much order and method that under no circumstances whatever do their course seem to be disturbed, is it not the extreme of absurdity to suppose that so much order, so much observance of discipline and method could be demanded from or fulfilled by irrational beings?"

Out of astral worship grew the so-called science of astrology. Of this Chambers' Encyclopedia says: "Astrology is one of the most ancient forms of superstition, and is found prevailing among the nations of the east at the very dawn of history. The Jews became much addicted to it after the Captivity."

One of the so-called Messianic prophecies of the Old Testament reads: "There shall come a star out of Jacob" (Num. xxiv, 17). "Note when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the King, behold, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem, saying, Where is he that is born king of the Jews? For we have seen his star in the east,...and, lo, the star, which they saw in the east, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was" (Matt. ii, 1, 2, 9). This marvelous event at the advent of the Christian Messiah was believed by many to be a complete "fulfillment" of what had been predicted centuries before concerning the appearance of the expected Persian Messiah, the original of the expected Messiah of the Jews"....if only it had been true and not another "solar-myth."

After referring to the prevalency of astrology at the beginning of, and anterior to, the Christian era, Strauss says in his Jesus: "When such ideas were afloat, it was easy to imagine that the birth of the Messiah must be announced by a star, especially as, according to the common interpretation of Balaam's prophecy, a star was there made the symbol of the Messiah. It is certain that the Jewish mind effected this combination; for it is a rabbinical idea that at the time of the Messiah's birth a star will appear in the east and remain for a long time visible.... In the time of Jesus it was the general belief that stars were always the forerunners of great events."

Jesus in the Apocalypse declares himself to be "the bright and morning star" (xxii, 16). He "had in his right hand seven stars" (i, 16). "The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches" (20). His second coming will be heralded by "signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars" (Luke xxi, 25). Little wonder; it has been done that way since time began.

WORSHIP OF ANIMALS AND PLANTS

In the infancy of the world animals were deified and adored, and trees and plants were regarded as sentient beings and received the homage of man.

Nearly every animal has been an object of worship. This worship flourished for ages in Egypt and India In Egypt the worship of the bull (Apis) was associated with that of Osiris (Serapis). The cow is still worshiped in India. Serpent worship has existed in every part of the world.

Remnants of animal worship survived in Judaism and Christianity. Satan was a serpent; Jehovah, like Osiris, was worshiped as a bull; Christ was the lamb of God, and the Holy Ghost appeared in the form of a dove.

Closely allied to this worship, and to some extent a part of it, is the doctrine of the transmigration of souls. Some of the Jews believed in this. So did many of the early Christians, including Origen....

POLYTHEISM

Polytheism, the doctrine of a plurality of gods, has prevailed in every part of the world. The most interesting pantheons of the gods were those of India, Egypt, Greece, and Rome. The Hebrews, who were polytheists, borrowed their gods from Assyria and Babylonia The pantheon of these nations comprised twelve principal gods and nearly a thousand minor deities. The chief of these gods was El. His consort was Elath. The Hebrews worshiped El under the name of El Shaddai and various other names. Elohim of the Bible, translated God, denotes the plural and included El and the minor gods who surrounded him. Yahweh, Iahveh, Jehovah, etc., as he is variously called -- for Jews and Christians cannot spell and do not even know the name of their principal deity -- is a god of Assyro-Babylonian origin. In addition to their national god, Jehovah, many of the Jews worshiped Baal, Moloch, and Tammous, male deities, and Astarte, Aschera, and Istar, female deities.

That the writers of the Bible recognized a plurality of gods -- were polytheists -- is proved by the following "And the Lord God said, Behold, the man is become as one of us" (Gen. iii, 22). "Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods?" (Ex. xv, 11.) "Among the gods, there is none like unto thee, O Lord" (Ps. Ixxxvi, 8). "The Lord is a great God, and a great king above all gods" (Ps. xcv, 3). "Thou shalt not revile the gods" (Ex. xxii, 28).

Monotheism, the doctrine of one god, is not merely the worship of one god, but the belief in the existence of one god only. Many were monotheistic in worship -- worshiped one god, their national deity -- while at the same time they were polytheistic in belief -- believed in the existence of many gods (Monolatry). The Jews who worshiped Jehovah have been called monotheists. And yet, for a thousand years, they believed in the existence of Kemosh, Baal, Moloch, Tammouz, and other deities. They believed that Jehovah was their national god and that they owed allegiance to him; just as the subjects of an earthly king profess their loyalty to him without denying the existence of other kings.

Sadly, while Christians profess monotheism they are really polytheists as were the early Israelites-- worship three gods -- Father (Jehovah), Son (Christ), and Holy Ghost; and recognize a god of Evil, Satan. To these must also be added a female deity, the Virgin Mary, who is to the devout Catholic as much of a divinity as Isis and Venus were to ancient polytheists. The canonization and adoration of the saints, too, are analogous to the worship of the inferior deities of ancient times....

Regarding the deification and worship of saints Hallam says: "Every cathedral or monastery had its tutelar saint, and every saint his legend, fabricated in order to enrich the churches under his protection, by exaggerating his virtues, his miracles, and consequently his power of serving those who paid liberally for his patronage. Many of those saints were imaginary persons; sometimes a blundered inscription added a name to the calendar, and sometimes, it is said, a heathen god was surprised at the company to which he was introduced, and the rites with which he was honored" (Middle Ages, p. 603).

The church historian Mosheim admits and deplores the truth of this: "It is, at the same time, as undoubtedly certain, as it is extravagant and monstrous, that the worship of the martyrs was modeled, by degrees, according to the religious services that were said to the goals before the coming of Christ" (Ecclesiastical History, p. 98).

Bishop Newton says: "The very same temples, the very same images, which were once consecrated to Jupiter and the other demons [gods], are now consecrated to the Virgin Mary and the other saints."

Milman says that at an early period "Christianity began to approach to a polytheistic forms or at least to permit what it is difficult to call by any other name than polytheistic, habits and feelings of devotion" (History of Christianity, Vol. III, p. 424)....

THE MESSIANIC IDEA

The desire for a deliverer naturally arises in the minds of a people who are in subjection and bondage. This desire was the germ of the Messianic idea. While there are traces of this idea in the earlier writings of the Hebrews, it reached its highest development during and immediately following the Captivity, and again in the Maccabean age.

The Messiah of Judaism and the Messiah, or Christ, of Christianity, were derived from the Persian theology, the adherents of each system modifying the doctrine to suit their respective notions. In its article on Zoroaster, Chambers' Encyclopedia says: "There is an important element to be noticed, viz., the Messiah, or Sosiosh, from whom the Jewish and Christian notions of a Messiah are held by many to have been derived.... Even a superficial glance at this sketch will show our readers what very close parallels between Jewish and Christian notions on the one hand, and the Zoroastrian on the other, are to be drawn."

Christians cite numerous passages from the writings of the Old Testament, which they claim foretold the advent of Jesus. Not one of these passages, as originally penned, refers in the remotest degree to him, though many of them do refer to the office he is said to have filled. The Jews hoped for a deliverer, for a national leader who would reestablish the kingdom of Israel, and restore to it the glory of David's reign. They were loyal to the house of David and believed that this deliverer would be a descendant, a son, of David. Pietists, too, in the fervor of their religious enthusiasm dreamed of universal conversion to the Jehovistic theocracy. In the writings of their prophets and poets these hopes and dreams found expression. "I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David, my servant, thy seed will I establish forever, and build up thy throne to all generations" (Ps. xxxix, 3, 4). "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him" (Dan. vii, 27).

While the Messianic idea was originally a Persian idea, the materials used in the formation of the Christian Messiah were drawn largely from purposefully mistranslated and misquoted Jewish Scriptures. This had to be done to support the religious ideas attached to Cosmic-godmen and "solar myths." There are passages in the Old Testament, as we have seen on our other websites, which predict the coming of a Messiah in the Christian Bibles and Old Testaments which read COMPLETELY DIFFERENT when compared with the true Jewish Scriptures. In others words, the Christian Old Testaments are "fixed" and fraudulent translations; done so to support such foreign "false solar/astral theologies" which were craftily placed among the Law, Prophets, and Writings to give "authority" to such ideas.Possibly "translation" is too kind of a word to use for such hideous alterations of the Jewish Bible. These furnished a portion of the materials out of which this Messianic deity, Christ, was formed. There are many more which have no reference whatever to a Messiah, which have been made to serve as Messianic prophecies. The Old Testament, as we have it, is alleged to be a Jewish work. It is, rather, a Christian work. It is a Christian version of ancient Jewish writings, every book of which has been more or less Christianized. Much of it is scarcely recognizable to a Jewish scholar. This is especially true of so-called Messianic prophecies.

The Christian Messiah was, on the one hand, modeled, to a considerable extent, after the Jewish ideal, while the Jewish materials, on the other hand, were freely altered, by both Essenes and later many in the Gentile Church, to fit the new "theological" conception. Referring to the work of the Evangelists, M. Renan says: "Sometimes they reasoned thus: 'The Messiah ought to do such a thing, now Jesus is the Messiah, therefore Jesus has done such a thing.' At other times, by an inverse process, it was said: 'Such a thing has happened to Jesus; now Jesus is the Messiah; therefore such a thing was to happen to the Messiah.'" (Jesus, p. 27).

That the so-called Messianic prophecies of the Jewish Scriptures were the immediate source of the Christ is apparent. That he was, however, merely a borrowed idea and not a historical realization of these prophecies is equally apparent. The Jews were expecting a Messiah. They were also expecting certain prophecies to be fulfilled. Had Jesus realized these expectations they would have accepted him. But he did not realize them. These prophecies were not fulfilled in him. What so many miss is the fact that the failure of the prophecies were not being fulfilled He was not a son of David if you believe in the "virgin birth;" he did not deliver his race from bondage; he did not become a king, the important events that were to attend and follow Messiah's advent form no part even of his alleged history. There are many who believe that his rejection by the Jews proves him to be either a false Messiah, or an imaginary being -- a historical myth or a pure myth -- in either case a myth. I personally do not subscribe to these views as stated above in the articles on why the prophecies were not fulfilled by Jesus; yet I concur that their failure to be fulfilled is problematic to the identification of Jesus as the Messiah but not yet impossible. Read the articles.

THE LOGOS (THE WORD)

The doctrine of the Logos, or Word: as an emanation or essence of divine wisdom is very old. It is found in the ancient religions of Egypt and India It was recognized in the Persian theology, and was incorporated into the Jewish theology by the Babylonian exiles. It constitutes an important element in the Platonic philosophy. It received its highest development and exposition in the writings of the Jewish philosopher Philo, a contemporary of Jesus....

The presentation of Jesus as an incarnation of the Logos belongs to the second century and is prominent in the Fourth Gospel. The ideas are chiefly those of Plato and Philo. Plato's trinity was Thought, Word and Deed. The Word occupies the second place in the Platonic trinity as it does in the Christian trinity. That the author of the gospel of John, written more than a century after the time of Philo, borrowed largely from that philosopher, is shown by the following parallels drawn from their writings:

Philo. -- "The Logos is the Son of God" (De Profugis).
John. -- '"This [the Word] is the Son of God" (i, 34).

Philo. -- "The Logos is considered the same as God" (De Somniis).
John. -- "The Word was God" (i, 1).

Philo. -- "He [the Logos] was before all things" (De Leg. Allegor.).
John. -- "The same [the Word] was in the beginning with God" (i, 2).

Philo. -- "The Logos is the agent by whom the world was made" (De Leg. Allegor.).
John. -- "All things were made by him [the Word]" (i, 3).

Philo. -- "The Logos is the light of the world" (De Somniis).
John. -- "The Word was the true light" (i, 9).

Philo. -- "The Logos only can see God" (De Confus. Ling.).
John. -- "No man hath seen God.... He [the Word] hath declared him" (i, 18).

CONCLUSION

I stated above that "To understand the origin and nature of Christ and Christianity it is necessary to know something of the religious systems and doctrines from which they were evolved." Let me now add to that comment: "In order to worship God in Spirit and it Truth it is mandatory to know the sources from which Christianity drew for their doctrines and dogmas they applied to Jesus. Only by knowing this and casting out the paganism inherent in the "Christ myths" of the New Testament can one approach God in worship without offending Him.

To say that Christianity and Christian doctrine is a composite of various heathen religious doctrines is a severe understatement.

For our purposes in this website we must face the rather frank conclusion, after sufficient studies have been undertaken, that the Qumran/Essene community applied many of these "myths" to their religious ideas which they adopted regarding their "Cosmic Redeemer," and when they later joined the Jesus Movement, these same religious beliefs were attached to Jesus as well. We read of this in the various doctrines surrounding Jesus in the New Testament.

These various sources for "redeemer myths" are rather loosely connected in the New Testament and applied to the life of Jesus. This explains why the New Testament contains two very contrasting and conflicting portraits of Jesus: The Synoptic Jesus and the Jesus of the Gospel of John.

The problem for the Christian is two-fold:

To become familiar with such "religious myths" as taken from the various nations that preceded the birth of Jesus in order to spot them when reading the New Testament one must undertake serious study.

Having recognized, upon your own personal study of such "myths" in reading the New Testament, then filter out such "religious myths" as attached to Jesus within the pages of the New Testament. Only by doing so can we have any hope of recognizing the truth connected with this man and the real role he was to play as God's representative during his life. To that quest we continue our studies.

IS THE SON OF GOD...THE SUN OF GOD?

...there is nothing new under the sun. (Ecclesiastes 1:9)

Over the ages, the ancients did not simply observe the movements of the celestial bodies but personified them and created stories about them that were recreated upon the earth. Out of this polytheistic, astrological atmosphere came the "greatest story ever told," as the gospel tale is, in many places in fact, astro-theological and non-historical, recording the mythos found around the globe for eons. Thus, the Christian religion, for the most part, created and shored up by forgery, fraud and force, is in reality astro-theological more than historical and its many stories and accounts of Jesus' life in the New Testament mythical, based on many thousands of years of observation by the ancients of the movements and interrelationships of the celestial bodies and the earth, one of the favorite of which was, understandably, the sun.

One has to understand and know of these solar myths in order to read the New Testament and discern the truth from fiction about the life of Jesus as both are intermixed!

The sun figured in the stories of virtually every culture worldwide. In many places and eras, the sun was considered the most visible proxy of the divine and the most potent bestower of Spirit. It was regarded as the first entity in "the Void" and the progenitor of all life and matter. The sun also represented the Archetypal Man, as human beings were perceived as "solar entities." In addition to being a symbol of the spirit because it rises and sinks, the sun was the "soul of the world," signifying immortality, as it is eternally resurrected after "dying" or setting. It was also considered the purifier of the soul, as noted. Hence, from at least the Egyptian age down to the Gnostic Christians, the sun, along with the moon and other celestial bodies, was viewed as a "guide" into the afterlife. By the Gnostic Zoroastrians, the sun was considered "the Archimagus, that noblest and most powerful agent of divine power, who 'steps forth as a Conqueror from the top of the terrible Alborj to rule over the world which he enlightens from the throne of Ormuzd'" (Pike, Albert, The Morals and Dogma of Scottish Free Masonry, LH Jenkins, 1928, p. 612). Long before the Christian era, the sun was known as the" Son of Ormuzd," the "Mediator," while his adversary, Ahriman, (Devil) represented the darkness, which caused the fall of man (Ibid., p. 613).

The sun was considered the "Savior of the World," as it rose and brought light and life to the planet. It was revered for causing seeds to burst and thus giving its life for plants to grow; hence, it was seen to sacrifice itself in order to provide fertility and vegetation. The sun is the "tutelary genius of universal vegetation," as well as the god of cultivation and the benefactor of humankind (Ibid., p. 475). When the sun" dies" in winter, so does the vegetation, to be "resurrected" in the spring. The first fruits, vine and grain were considered symbols of the sun's strength and were ritualistically offered to the divine luminary. The solar heroes and gods were said to be teachers as well, because agriculture, a science developed out of astronomy, freed mankind to pursue something other than food, such as other sciences and the arts.

The various personifications of the sun thus represent the "image of fertility which perpetuates and rejuvenates the world's existence (Ibid., p. 594). In their fertility aspects, the sun was the phallus, and the moon was the vulva, the male and female generative principles, the generators of all life on Earth.

In the mythos, the two pillars or columns of the Celestial Temple, the mysterious Jachin and Boaz, are the sun and moon (Ibid., p. 776). Of the relationship between the sun and moon, Hazelrigg adds:

The Sun may be likened to a wire through which the planetary messages are electrically transmitted, and of which the lunar moisture is the insulation" (Hazelrigg, John, The Sun Book, Health Research, 1971, p. 56).

In the ancient world, light was the subject of awe, and the sunlight's ability to make plants grow was considered magical and miraculous. So special is light that the writer of Ecclesiastes waxes, "Light is sweet, and it is pleasant for the eyes to behold the sun." We know that it is not pleasant for the eyes to behold the direct light of the sun; it is, however, pleasant for humanity to behold the sun as it rises in the morning, bringing light and life. Indeed, the sun itself is the "face of the divine" upon which it is impossible to look.

Thus, the sun was very important to the ancients, so much so that around the world for millennia a wide variety of peoples have built solar temples, monuments and entire religions with priestesses and priests of the Sun, along with complex rituals and accoutrements. Within these religions is contained the ubiquitous mythos, a template or archetypical story that personifies the heavens and Earth, and rolls them into a drama about their interrelationship. Rather than being an entertaining but useless "fairytale," as myths are erroneously considered to be, the mythos is designed to pass along from generation to generation information vital to life on Earth, so that humans do not have to learn it repeatedly but can progress. Without the knowledge, or gnosis, of the celestial mythos, humankind would still be in caves.

The celestial mythos is complicated because the solar myth is intertwined with the lunar, stellar and terrestrial myths. In addition, some of the various celestial players were introduced later than others, and many of them took on new functions as t he focus switched from stars to moon to sun to other planets, and back again. For example, Horus is not only the sun but also the North Pole star, and his twin brother-cum-adversary, Set, represents not only darkness but also the South Pole star.

Furthermore, as time progresses and the skies change, as with the precession of the equinoxes and the movements of the sun annually through the zodiac and daily through its "houses," as well as with cataclysm, the attributes of the planetary bodies within the mythos also change. Moreover, the incorporation of the phases of moon into the mythos adds to its complexity:

The Moon, like the Sun, changed continually the track in which she crossed the Heavens, moving ever to and fro between the upper and lower limits of the Zodiac; and her different places, phases, and aspects there, and her relations with the Sun and the constellations, have been a fruitful source of mythological fables (Pike, Albert, The Morals and Dogma of Scottish Free Masonry, LH Jenkins, 1928, p. 469).

An example of the complexity of the mythos is provided by the story of the "Queen of Heaven," the goddess Isis, mother of Horus, who is not only the moon that reflects the sun, she is the original creator, as well as the constellation of Virgo. As the moon, she is the "woman clothed with the sun, and as the Virgin, she is the sun's mother." She is also Stella Mans, the "Star of the Sea," as she regulates the tides, a fact known of the moon beginning eons ago, as were the facts of the roundness of the earth and of the heliocentricity of the solar system-again, knowledge never actually "lost" and "rediscovered," as popularly portrayed.

The sun and moon were deemed to be one being in some cultures or twins in others. When eclipses occurred, it was said that the moon and sun were uniting to create lesser gods. Thus, the pantheon kept growing.

Although it is generally now considered to be "male," the sun was also regarded as female in several places, including Alaska, Anatolia, Arabia, Australia, Canaan, England, Germany, India, Japan, North America and Siberia. The sun's feminine side was, naturally, suppressed by the patriarchy. As Walker says:

The popular European tradition usually made the sun male and the moon female, chiefly to assert that ·hisº light was stronger, and that ·sheº shone only by reflected glory, symbol of the position of women in patriarchal society. However, Oriental and pre-Christian systems frequently made the sun a Goddess (Walker, Barbara, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, Harper, p. 353).

When one factors into this complexity the fertility aspect of the gods and goddesses of the grape and grain, along with the sexual imagery found in all mythologies and religions, one can understand why it has been so difficult to sort it all out.

THE ZODIAC

As the mythos developed, it took the form of a play, with a cast of characters, including the 12 divisions of the sky called the signs or constellations of the zodiac. The symbols that typified these 12 celestial sections of 30 degrees each were not based on what the constellations actually look like but represent aspects of earthly life. Thus, the ancient peoples were able to incorporate these earthly aspects into the mythos and project them onto the all-important celestial screen.

These zodiacal designations have varied from place to place and era to era over the tens of thousands of years during which the skies have been observed, for a number of reasons, including the changes in the skies brought on by the precession. For example, Scorpio is not only the eagle but also the scorpion. It is difficult to determine absolutely all of their origins, but the current zodiacal symbols or totems are or may have been devised as follows, based on the formula made by inhabitants of the northern hemisphere:

- Aries is represented as the Ram/Lamb because March/April is the time of the year when lambs are born.
- Taurus is the Bull because April/May is the time for ploughing and tilling.
- Gemini is the Twins, so-called for Castor and Pollux, the twin stars in its constellation, as well as because May/June is the time of the "increase" or "doubling" of the sun, when it reaches its greatest strength.
- After the sun reaches its strength at the summer solstice and begins to diminish in Cancer (June/July), the stars are called the Crab, who "backslides."
- Leo is the Lion because, during the heat of July/August, the lions in Egypt would come out of the hot desert.
- Virgo, originally the Great Mother Earth, is the "Gleaning Virgin, who holds a sheath of wheat," symbolizing August/ September, the time of the harvest.
- Libra (September/October) is the Balance, reflecting the autumnal equinox, when the days and night are again even in length.
- Scorpio is the Scorpion because in the desert areas the fierce storms of October/November were called "scorpions" and because this time of the year is the "backbiter" of the sun as it begins to wane.
- "Sagittarius is the "vindictive Archer" who side-wounds and weakens the sun during its approach in November/ December towards the winter solstice.
- In Capricorn, the weakened sun encounters the "filthy, illomened He-goat," who drags the solar hero down in December/January.
- Aquarius is the Water-Bearer because January/February is the time of winter rains.
- Pisces is represented by the Fishes because February/ March is the time when the thinning ice is broken and the fattened fish are plucked out (Hazelrigg, John, The Sun Book, Health Research, 1971, p. 43)

The story of the skies was so important to the ancients that they were singularly focused on it and their lives in effect revolved around it. The heavens were revered not only by so-called Pagans but also by biblical peoples, including the Israelites, whose name and various Elohim were also stars and aspects of the solar-celestial mythos. In the Bible, the sun is worshipped in various forms by the Hebrews and "kings of Judah." It is also overtly personified and imbued with divine and ethical qualities, as in Deuteronomy: "But thy friends be like the sun as he rises in his might." Throughout the Old Testament important deeds are done "in the sight of this sun," "before the sun," or "under the sun," revealing the ages-old perception of the sun as God's proxy, judge or "eye." So significant was the solar orb that it was ever a grave concern that the sun would "go down on the prophets."

At Psalms 113:3, the chosen are instructed to praise the Lord from the "rising of the sun to its setting." Psalms 85:11 states, "Faithlessness will spring up from the ground, and righteousness will look down from the sky." Psalms 84:11 reads, "For the Lord God is a sun and shield." At Psalms 68:32-32, the faithful are instructed to "sing praises to Jah, to him who rides in the heavens, the ancient heavens . . . whose majesty is over Israel, and his power is in the skies," exactly as was said about the ubiquitous solar hero.

At Psalms 72:17, we read, "May his name endure for ever, his fame continue as long as the sun," and, at Malachi 1:11: "For from the rising of sun to its setting my name is great among the nations." The Lord's name is not said to be great after the setting of the sun, during the night, because his "name" is the sun, as we have seen lao, Jah, YHWH and so on, to mean. Thus, the esteem of the sun by the Hebrews is evident; yet, the story of the solar hero is also found in numerous places in the Old Testament, but these stories are masked by carnalization and historicization.

Indeed, so important was the sun to the ancients, including the Israelites, that they created a "Sun Book, a "Helio Biblio," or "Holy Bible," (Hotema, EBD), the original of which can be found in the myths encoded in stone and story around the ancient world millennia before the Judeo-Christian bible was compiled.

The word "Bible" itself comes from the City of the Great Mother: Byblos, in Phoenicia.

Need we remind our reader that Byblos is where Osiris washed up in his wooden casket and was hung on a tree/cross?

As Walker relates, "'Bibles were named after her city because the earliest libraries were attached to her temple" (Walker, Barbara, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, Harper, p. 127). As noted, the Judeo-Christian bible was written by a number of hands, edited numerous times and contains countless errors and inaccuracies. It is a rehash of ancient legends and myths, and is not, therefore, the "infallible Word of God." "Such," says Graham, "is the Bible's 'revealed truth'-other races' mythology, the basis of which is cosmology" (Graham, Lloyd, Deceptions and Myths Of The Bible, Citadel, 1991, p. 74).

The cosmology or celestial mythos has in reality been hidden from the masses for many centuries for the purposes of enriching and empowering the ruling elite. Its conspiring priest-kings have ruled empires in full knowledge of it since time immemorial and have "lorded" it over the heads of the "serfs."

THE SUN OF GOD

Within the Sun Book or Holy Bible was incorporated by such priestcraft the most consolidated version of the celestial mythos ever assembled, the story of the "son of God."

- First, we have seen that "God" is the sun
- Second, in Job 38 the stars are called "sons of God"

Therefore, one star would be a "son of God," as well as the "son of the Sun." Thus, the son of God is the sun of God.

The solar mythos, in fact, explains why the narratives of the sons of God previously examined are so similar, with a godman who is crucified and resurrected, who does miracles and has 12 disciples, etc.: To wit, these stories were in actuality based on the movements of the sun through the heavens. In other words, the majority of the accounts of Jesus Christ in the New Testament and the others upon whom he is predicated are personifications of the sun, and the gospel fable is merely a repeat of a mythological formula revolving around the movements of the sun through the heavens.

For example, many of the world's crucified godmen have their traditional birthdays on December 25th ("Christmas"). This date is set because the ancients recognized that (from a geocentric perspective in the northern hemisphere) the sun makes an annual descent southward until after midnight of December 21st, the winter solstice, when it stops moving southerly for three days and then starts to move northward again. During this time, the ancients declared that "God's sun" had "died" for three days and was "born again" after midnight of December 24th. Thus, these many different cultures celebrated with great joy the "sun of God's" birthday on December 25th.

THE FOLLOWING ARE THE MAIN CHARACTERISTICS OF THE "SUN OF GOD":

- The sun "dies" for three days at the winter solstice, to be born again or resurrected on December 25th.
- The sun of God is "born of a virgin," which refers to both the new or "virgin" moon and the constellation of Virgo.
- The sun's "birth" is attended by the "bright Star," either Sirius/Sothis or the planet Venus, and by the "Three Kings," representing the three stars in the belt of Orion.
- The sun at its zenith, or 12 noon, is in the house or heavenly temple of the "Most High"; thus, "he" begins "his Father's work" at "age" 12. Maxwell relates, "At that point, all Egypt offered prayers to the "Most High" God!" (Leedom, Tim, ed.,The Book Your Church Doesn't Want You To Read, Kendall/Hunt, 1993, p. 23).
- The sun enters into each sign of the zodiac at 300; hence, the "Sun of God" begins his ministry at "age" 30. As Hazelrigg states, ". . . the Sun of the visible heavens has moved northward 300 and stands at the gate of Aquarius, the Water-bearer, or John the Baptist of the mystic planisphere, and here begins the work of ministry in the Palestine" (Hazelrigg, John, The Sun Book, Health Research, 1971, p. 163).
- The sun is the "Carpenter" who builds his daily "houses" or 12 two-hour divisions.
- The sun's "followers" or "disciples" are the 12 signs of the zodiac, through which the sun must pass.
- The sun is "anointed" when its rays dip into the sea. (Anderson, Karl, Astrology Of The Old Testament, Health Research, 1970, p. 206).
- The sun "changes water into wine" by creating rain, ripening the grape on the vine and fermenting the grape juice.
- The sun "walks on water," referring to its reflection. (Massey, Gerald, The Historical Jesus And The Mythical Christ, Health Research, p. 21).
- The sun "calms the sea" as he rests in the "boat of heaven." (Leedom, Tim, ed., The Book Your Church Doesn't Want You To Read, Kendall/Hunt, 1993, p. 27). (Mt. 8:23-7)
- When the sun is annually and monthly re-born, he brings life to the "solar mummy," his previous self, raising it from the dead.

- The sun triumphantly "rides an ass and her foal" into the "City of Peace" when it enters the sign of Cancer, which contains two stars called "little asses," and reaches its fullness. (Pike, Albert, The Morals and Dogma of Scottish Free Masonry, LH Jenkins, 1928, p. 465).
- The sun is the "Lion" when in Leo, the hottest time of the year, called the "throne of the Lord."
- The sun is "betrayed" by the constellation of the Scorpion, the backbiter, the time of the year when the solar hero loses his strength.
- The sun is "crucified" between the two thieves of Sagittarius and Capricorn.
- The sun is hung on a cross, which represents its passing through the equinoxes, the vernal equinox being Easter.
- The sun darkens when it "dies": "The solar god as the sun of evening or of autumn was the suffering, dying sun, or the dead sun buried in the nether world. (Massey, Gerald, The Egyptian Book of the Dead, Health Research, p. 9).
- The sun does a "stutter-step" at the winter solstice, unsure whether to return to life or "resurrect," doubted by his "twin" Thomas.
- The sun is with us "always, to the close of the age" (Mt. 28:20), referring to the ages of the precession of the equinoxes.
- The sun is the "Light of the World," and "comes on clouds, and every eye shall see him."
- The sun rising in the morning is the "Savior of mankind."
- The sun wears a corona, "crown of thorns" or halo.
- The sun was called the "Son of the Sky (God)," "All- Seeing," the "Comforter," "Healer," "Savior," "Creator," "Preserver," "Ruler of the World," and "Giver of Daily Life." (Doane, T.W.,Bible Myths And Their Parallels In Other Religions, Health Research, 1985, p. 472, 476, 492, 562).
- The sun is the Word or Logos of God.
- The all-seeing sun, or "eye of God," was considered the judge of the living and dead who returned to Earth "on a white horse." (Doane, T.W., Bible Myths And Their Parallels In Other Religions, Health Research, 1985, pp. 497-498).

THE IMPORTANCE OF EGYPT

A. Churchward demonstrates the complex yet poetic celestial mythology of the Egyptians, developed around the core mythos long prior to the Christian era:

The Sun was not considered human in its nature when the Solar force at dawn was imaged by the Lion-faced Atum, the flame of the furnace by the fiery serpent Uati, the Soul of its life by the Hawk, the Ram, or the Crocodile. Until Har-ur the elder Horus was depicted as the child in the place of the calf or lamb, fish, or shoot of papyrus plant, which now occurred in the Solar Cult, no human figure was personalized in the Mythology of Egypt.

Isis in this Cult takes the place of Hathor as the Mother-Moon, the reproducer of light in the underworld. The place of conjunction and of rebegettal by the Sun-god was in the underworld, when she became the woman clothed with the sun. At the end of lunation the old Moon died and became a corpse; it is at times portrayed as a mummy in the underworld and there it was revivified by the Sun-god, the Solar fecundation of the Moon representing the Mother, resulting in her bringing forth the child of light the "cripple deity," who was begotten in the dark. (Churchward, Albert, The Origin And Evolution Of Religion, p. 226).

Massey provides another sketch of the mythos as applied to Horus, who, like Baal, was the sun in the Age of Taurus:

"...[The] infant Horus, who sank down into Hades as the suffering sun to die in the winter solstice and be transformed to rise again and return in all his glory and power in the equinox at Easter. (Massey, Gerald, The Egyptian Book of the Dead, Health Research, p. 9).

As we have seen, the story of Jesus is virtually identical in numerous important aspects to that of Horus, a solar myth. Higgins spells it out:

The history of the sun. . . is the history of Jesus Christ. The sun is born on the 25th of December, the birthday of Jesus Christ. The first and greatest of the labours of Jesus Christ is his victory over the serpent, the evil principle, or the devil. In his first labor Hercules strangled the serpent, as did Cristna, Bacchus, etc. This is the sun triumphing over the powers of hell and darkness; and, as he increases, he prevails, till he is crucified in the heavens, or is decussated in the form of a cross (according to Justin Martyr) when he passes the equator at the vernal equinox. (Higgins, Godfrey, Esq., Anacalypsis, A&B Books, 1992, p.144).

At Malachi 4:2, YHWH says, "But for you who fear my name the sun of righteousness shall rise, with healing on its wings." Who is this sun of righteousness with healing on its wings" Malachi is the last book of the Old Testament, and this scripture is one of the last in that book, which leads directly into the story of Jesus, who was indeed called by the Church fathers the "sun of righteousness." Malachi's sun of righteousness rising with "healing on its wings" is, in reality, the saving light that ends the gloom of night, the daily resurrection of sunrise, and the birth of the sun of a new age, who was carnalized and historicized in Jesus Christ. As "shamash," which is the Hebrew word for sun and the name of the Babylonian sun god, Malachi's righteous sun is also Solomon's Moabite god Chemosh, which is the same as shamash in Hebrew, an ironic development considering Chemosh was later demonized by the Christians.

Jesus's solar attributes are also laid plain by the story of his followers waiting to go to his "tomb" until sunrise, when "he is risen." In John 2, Jesus says, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up"; however, as John relates, ". . . he spoke of the temple of his body," an admission of biblical allegory. In this statement Jesus describes his own solar resurrection, not that of the Jerusalem Temple, although the original "Temple of the Most High" is indeed the same Temple of the Sun that is Jesus's "body." In fact, Jesus is called the "son of the Most High God" (Lk. 8:28; Mk. 5:7) and a priest after the order of Meichizedek, who was the priest of the Most High, El Elyon, or Helios, the sun. At Acts 26:13, regarding his conversion Paul says, "At midday, 0 king, I saw on the way a light from heaven, brighter than the sun, shining round me and those who journeyed with me," the light, of course, being Jesus. The words "at midday" represent the sun at its zenith, when it is doing its work in the Temple of the Most High, brighter than at any other time.

As expected, the early Christians were considered sun-worshippers, like their "Pagan" counterparts, although "sun-worship" is an inaccuracy, since the ancients did not "worship" the sun as the "one god" but revered it as one of the most potent symbols of the quality of divinity.For example, Krishna was considered not just the sun itself but the light in the sun and moon, (Doane, T.W., Bible Myths And Their Parallels In Other Religions, Health Research, 1985, p. 224), making him, like Jesus, brighter than the sun. Like their predecessor temples, many early Christian churches faced the east, or the place of the rising sun. In fact, as Doane relates, "Tertullian says that Christians were taken for worshipers of the Sun because they prayed towards the East, after the manner of those who adored the Sun." (Doane, T.W., Bible Myths And Their Parallels In Other Religions, Health Research, 1985, pp. 500-502). Ex-Pagan and Bishop of Carthage Tertullian's actual words from his Apology are as follows:

Others, again, certainly with more information and greater verisimilitude, believe that the sun is our god. We shall be counted Persians perhaps, though we do not worship the orb of day painted on a piece of linen cloth, having himself everywhere in his own disk. The idea no doubt has originated from our being known to turn to the east in prayer. But you, many of you, also under pretence sometimes of worshipping the heavenly bodies, move your lips in the direction of the sunrise. In the same way, if we devote Sun-day to rejoicing, from a far different reason than Sun-worship, we have some resemblance to those of you who devote the day of Saturn to ease and luxury, though they too go far away from Jewish ways, of which indeed they are ignorant.

In his protestations and refutations of critics, Tertullian further ironically admits the true origins of the Christ story and of all other such godmen by stating, "You say we worship the sun; so do you." (Wheless, Joseph, Forgery In Christianity, Health Research, 1990, p. 147). Interestingly, a previously strident believer and defender of the faith, Tertullian later renounced Christianity (Ibid., p. 144).

Christ was frequently identified as and/or with the sun by other early orthodox Christian fathers, including St. Cyprian (A.D., 258), who "spoke of Christ as the true sun (sol verus)," and St. Ambrose (339-397 A.D.), Bishop of Milan, who said of Christ, "He is our new sun." Other Church fathers who identified Christ with, if not as, the sun include St. Gregory of Nazianzus (330- 389 A.D.), and St. Zeno of Verona (375), who "calls Christ "Sol foster, sol verus." Moreover, this overt Christian sun-worship was not a short-lived aberration, as Christian proponents would portray it. Wheless relates that "Leo the Great in his day (440-461) says that it was the custom of many Christians to stand on the steps of the Church of St. Peter and pay homage to the Sun by obeisance and prayers " (Wheless, p. 30).

As to such "insider" knowledge of the true meaning of Christianity, Doane remarks

Many Christian writers have seen that the history of their Lord and Saviour is simply the history of the Sun, but they either say nothing, or, like Dr. Parkhurst and the Rev. J. P. Lundy, claim that the Sun is a type of the true Sun of Righteousness.

This "type of" sophistry has been used frequently in "religious" debate to squeeze out of a tight corner. Yet, the Christian conspirators cannot hide the fact that their "Lord's Day" is indeed Sun-day; hence, their Lord is the sun.

Even though this information has been well hidden, the early Christians were aware that Christ was the sun, as they were truly Gnostic and the solar myth was known all around them. When a member of at least one such Gnostic sect wished to become orthodox, he was compelled to renounce his "heresy" of equating Christ with the sun. Higgins relates of the influential and widespread Gnostic group called the Manichaeans:

When a Manichaean came over to the orthodox he was required to curse his former friends in the following terms: "I curse Zarades [Zarathusta/Zoroaster], who, Manes said, had appeared as a God before his time among the Indians and Persians, and whom he calls the sun. I curse those who say Christ is the sun, and who make prayers to the sun, and to the moon, and to the stars, and pay attention to them as if they were really Gods, and who give them titles of most lucid Gods, and who do not pray to the true God, only towards the East, but who turn themselves round, following the motions of the sun, with their innumerable supplications. I curse those persons who say that Zarades and Budas [Buddha] and Christ and Manichaeans and the sun are all one and the same (Higgins, Godfrey, Esq., Anacalypsis, A&B Books, 1992, p. 722).

In his 2nd Apology, Justin Martyr acknowledges that the Gnostic-Christian Manichaeans were "sun-worshippers" and says:

Accordingly, Menander seems to me to have fallen into error when he said: "0 sun! for thou, first of gods, ought to be worshipped, by whom it is that we are able to see the other gods." For the sun never could show me the true God; but that healthful Word, that is the Sun of the soul, by whom alone, when He arises in the depths of the soul, the eye of the soul itself is irradiated.

In order to obfuscate the origins of Christianity, Justin is attempting to distinguish between the sun of the Gnostics, which was the solar orb, and the "sun (sol) of the soul" in the "person" of Jesus Christ. In fact, the sun of the Gnostics and other "sun-worshippers" also represented the cosmic and cellular "sun" found in living things, including human beings, who, it was perceived, by Gnosticism can become illuminated. Thus, both Gnostic and orthodox Christians were addressing the same "sun of the soul," but the orthodoxy insisted on putting a particular face and shape to it. One might also wonder how the omnipresent divine is separated out of its creation, such that it is "everywhere" but not in the sun, moon, stars, sky, earth and all of creation. To reiterate, the ancients were not just monotheistic, polytheistic and "atheistic"-as the Christians called and were called by their adversaries-but pantheistic, seeing the divine in everything, as is the definition of omnipresence.

It is clear that from early times Christ was correctly perceived by the Gnostic sects as the sun, a fact that the historicizing Christians were continuously compelled to combat, as is evidenced by the anti-Manichaean oath specifically designed to refute such assertions. Yet, as Higgins states, ". . . the Sun, Iao, and Jesus, were all taken for the same being by the ancients, and it will require more than the skill of the whole priesthood to disprove it" (Higgins, Godfrey, Esq., Anacalypsis, A&B Books, 1992, p. 325).

Furthermore, the adoption (or, rather, creation) of Christianity was not much of a stretch for the Roman conspirators:

In the early Christian era, Roman emperors were routinely identifying themselves with the sun god and all his symbols: cross, eagle, fire, gold, lion, and so on. Constantine I, whom conventional history hails as the first Christian emperor, was actually a worshipper of the sun god, whose image he placed on his coins, dedicated to "the invincible sun, my guardian." (Walker, Barbara, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, Harper, 1983, p. 15).

EXAMINING EVIDENCE TO PROVE THAT CHRISTIANITY IS SUN-WORSHIP TO THE VERY CORE.....THE EUCHARIST

Exo 20:4 Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth: Exo 20:5 Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them:

Before we begin I think it best to remind our readers that Osiris, the original and earliest Sun-godman had his own Eucharist whereby his devotees and followers would "eat his body and drink his blood." This same "Eucharist" has been handed down for thousands of years and few know of its relationship with Sun-Worship and Idolatry.

Note that the commandment of God forbids making and bowing down to images. Among pagans, perhaps the most common form of idolatry is sun worship, and the above prohibition would clearly exclude bowing down before images of the sun or moon (things in the heaven above). With that in mind, lets look at solar and lunar images directly associated with the Catholic Mass.

Here is Pope John Paul II holding what is called a Monstrance or Ostensorium. It is used to display a roundwafer of bread, called the host, which is used in what is called the Mass, Lord's Supper, Communion or Eucharistic meal. The Catholic believes this wafer of bread turns into the actual body of Christ when consecrated during the Mass. The Roman Catholic Church even admits the Monstrance to be a sunburst: "During the baroque period, it took on a rayed form of a sun-monstrance with a circular window surrounded by a silver or gold frame with rays." (The Dictionary of the Liturgy by Rev. Jovian P. Lang, OFM., published and copyrighted © 1989 by Catholic Book Publishing Co., New York, ISBN 0-89942-273-X, page 436).

The priest (here the Pope) sometimes holds up the sunburst monstrance with the host encased for the congregation to adore and venerate. Virtually any time the monstrance, a pagan sun symbol, is viewed by the congregation, they kneel in submission. A Catholic cannot walk past this sun symbol without acknowledging it by kneeling and or making the sign of the cross with their hands.

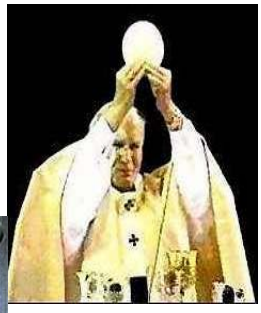
Remember God's commandment forbidding bowing down to images? How can the Catholic justify bowing down before a sun image in veneration? They will tell you that they are paying homage to the host, bread they believe has actually turned into the actual body and blood of Jesus after being consecrated by a priest. Since the wafer, they believe, has been transformed into God Himself, it is the round wafer god inside the sunburst monstrance that they bow down to in worship, not the sunburst monstrance. However, the round wafer of bread itself is also a sun symbol, which is sometimes made quite obvious in Catholic representations of the host in various forms of artwork..

This is the general sunburst pattern used to symbolize the host, the supposed "true body" of Christ. This design has also been adopted by the Jesuits as their symbol. The IHS is thought by some to represent the first letters of each word in the Latin phrase Iesus Hominum Salvator (Jesus Saviour of Men), although according to the Catholics themselves they actually represent the first three letters of the name "Jesus" in Greek .(spelled in Greek iota-eta-sigma-omicron-upsilon-sigma). The pagan though, would quickly see the same sun disk symbol associated with many pagan deities of Egypt, among them Isis, Horus, and Seb. In Egyptian mythology Seb (Geb) was the father of the goddess Isis (Aset), the mother and protectress of her divine son Horus (Harpocrates). Horus (the younger) is frequently depicted on Egyptian temples as a winged sun disk, representing the rays of the rising sun.

On the right is a statuette of the Egyptian goddess Isis. Her headdress shows the sun disk within the horns of an Apis bull, symbology which is virtually identical to that of the sunburst monstrance. Also of note, in Isis lap is her infant son, Horus. In this one image you have the symbology of the Catholic monstrance and Mother / child worship which is so prominent in Catholicism. The Egyptian pharaoh also claimed to be the embodiment of Horus on earth, much like the pope claims to be the infallible Vicar of Christ on earth.

The Apis bull, as depicted in this Egyptian statuette, is likely to be the pattern used for the golden calf the Israelites made at Mount Sinai (Exo. 32), since they were undoubtedly quite familiar with it as a result of their long captivity in Egypt. Note that in front of the sun disk and horns, which looks virtually identical to some Catholic monstrances, there is the serpent poised to strike. In Scripture the serpent is symbolic of Satan. (Gen 3, Rev. 12:9)

At the right is the reverse side of a medal commemorating the Catholic Eucharistic Congress held in Chicago in 1926 (On the front there is a bust of Pope Pius XI). Note that the round wafer host above the golden cup is portrayed as a radiant sunburst.

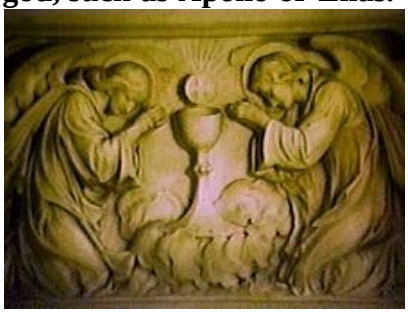


On the left is an artifact unearthed in the holy of holies of the pagan temple in the Canaanite city of Hazor, in northern Israel. It is described as follows: "Of special interest is a square basalt altar for burning incense. On one of its sides, a circle with a cross in the center – the divine symbol of the Canaanite storm god – is carved in low relief..."... a basalt offering table, pillar-shaped, with a carved symbol of the storm god Baal on its side. That symbol was a circle with a cross in the center." Again we need take time to notice that within Sun-Worship we find the concept of a "cross" connected with Sun-Worship; setting the stage for the developing theology of "crucified Sun-godmen" in the Heavens.

Here the Eucharistic host, as Catholics call it, has actually been made as a sunburst (note the flames around the edge). This sun symbol, after consecration, is called the true body of God, to be adored and bowed down to and worshipped by the laity, especially when displayed inside a sunburst monstrance.

At left is a pagan Canaanite cultic pillar or "matstsebah", also found in excavations of the city of Hazor,showing hands raised in praise to the sun disk, portrayed within the crescent moon. Now compare the picture on the right of pope John Paul II celebrating Mass, elevating a large host for adoration. Note the similarity with the pagan Canaanite pillar!

Below notice the pagan sunburst wafer god, inscribed with IHS and the cross, is portrayed above the cup ofwine. This is the door to a place where the wine and wafers are stored.



A 100-lire coin issued by the Vatican depicts a woman, symbolizing the Church, holding a cup in her right hand, which represents the "pagan sunburst wafer god." The cup of wine of the apostate woman (church) represents spiritual and doctrinal fornication, a mixing of truth and error, Christianity and paganism, which she has taught to the world (made the nations drink). This "wafer" or host used in Communion by the Catholic Church as a symbol for the body of Christ is actually a very ancient symbol for the sun. The Catholic "monstrance" or "ostentorium," the device used to serve the "Lord's host," is also a sunburst, as admitted by Catholic authorities. Christian art, like that of Buddhism and Hinduism, makes extensive use of the halo or sunburst behind its godman, mother of God, and saints. As Massey says, "The halo of light which is usually shown surrounding the face of Jesus and Christian saints, is another concept taken from the sun god." The solar nature of Jesus Christ is thus reflected in art, explaining "nobody knew what he looked like" and why he was variously represented as a sun god, such as Apollo or Elias.

At the right notice a carving depicting angels kneeling in idolatrous adoration or worship of the wafer god and wine.

Here you see a photo looking up into the dome of St. Peter's. Notice the very obvious sun wheel. Indeed the light from the sun streams into the center hub of the dome making a genuine sun-lit sunburst image at the center of the wheel.

In Christian iconography the sun, rising over and over again in the East, symbolizes immortality and resurrection. There are fourth-century mosaics showing Christ as a Helios-figure in a solar chariot surrounded by sunbeams, or surrounded by a solar nimbus. Since Christ is also triumphant over time (chronocrator), he is frequently associated with the sun (which measures out the length of each day) in Romanesque art.

The term "associated with" is a typical historicizing obfuscation, because Christ is the sun, which Christian artists have obviously known. The Apollo/Helios/Jesus image is often very light of complexion, with short blond hair, reflective not of an actual person but of the light and color of the sun. Other solar depictions include men with red hair, representative of the setting and summer sun, and black images symbolizing the orb in the dark underworld of night, which is the reason for the black bambinos and crucifixes in churches around the globe, not only of Jesus but also Krishna and other solar heroes. As stated, these black crucifixes have led some to posit that Jesus was black, i.e., African; however, despite this compulsion to make Christ "all things to all people," these images depict the black or nighttime sun. In fact, they are part of the mythos, which holds that the solar orb and night sky are a dual-natured god, represented by "twins" battling for supremacy.

SOLAR MYTHS WITHIN THE JESUS STORIES...FOLLOWING THE SUN'S ANNUAL MOVEMENT THROUGH THE HEAVENLY ZODIAC

Notice if you will that the following astrological accounts have been "personified" into human stories; many of which were applied to the man Jesus after his death by some of his ardent followers. Later such "solar-myths" were recorded in the New Testament and passed off as Divine and unique revelation concerning Jesus. Make no mistake about it but the position of the Sun and the stars had a prior determining effect on the "shaping and the evolution" of the Christ myth in the New Testament.

- According to legend, Jesus was born in a stable between a horse and a goat, symbols of Sagittarius and Capricorn.
- He was baptized in Aquarius, the Water-Bearer.
- He chose his first disciples, fishermen, in Pisces, the sign of the fishes.
- He became the Good Shepherd and the Lamb in Aries, the Ram.
- Jesus told the parables of the sowing and tilling of the fields in Taurus, the Bull.
- In Cancer, "the celestial Sea of Galilee," he calmed the storm and waters, spoke of backsliders (the Crab), and rode the ass and foal in triumph into the City of Peace, Jerusalem.
- Jesus was the Lion in Leo.
- In Libra, Christ was the true vine in the Garden of Gethsemane, the "wine press," as this is the time of the grape harvest.
- Jesus was betrayed by Judas, the "backbiter," or Scorpio.
- In Sagittarius, Jesus was wounded in the side by the Centaur, or centurion.
- He was crucified at the winter solstice between the "two thieves" of Sagittarius and Capricorn, who sapped his strength.

TRACING THE COURSE OF THE SUN...THE SOLAR DRAMA

Roberts elaborates the solar drama:

the passage of the Sun, in its annual course through the constellations of the Zodiac; having his birth in the sign of the Goat, the Augean stable of the Greeks; his baptism in Aquarius, the John the Baptist in the heavens; his triumph when he becomes the Lamb of God in Aries; his greatest exaltation on St. John's, the beloved disciple's day, on the 21st of June, in the Sign of the Twins, the emblem of double power; his tribulation in the Garden of Gethsemane, in the sign of the rural Virgo; his betrayal in the sign of Scorpio, the malignant emblem of his approaching death in the stormy and adverse sign, Sagittarius, and his resurrection or renewed birth on the twenty-fifth of December in the same sign of the celestial Goat...

Regarding the mysterious Garden of Gethsemane, Wells says, "They went to a place which is called Gethsemane". Nothing is known of such a place (Wells, Did Jesus Exist?,Pemberton, 1986, p, 136). In fact, the Garden exists in the sky.

In addition, Jesus in the "upper room" symbolizes the sun in the "upper signs," as the two equinoxes divide the solar orbit into two halves, also represented by the two genealogies of Jesus in the gospels (Hazelrigg, John, The Sun Book, Health Research, 1971, p. 120).

Hazelrigg gives the astrological meaning of the annunciation of the divine one's birth:

Directing our gaze to the right, we see rising on the eastern angle of the planisphere the constellation of the Virgin, the sixth sign of the Zodiac, or sixth month, reckoning from March (Aries). And in the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent from God...to a virgin espoused by a man whose named was Joseph, of the house of David; and the virgin's name was Mary."-Luke 1. 26, 27 (Hazelrigg, John, The Sun Book, Health Research, 1971, p. 105).

He further explains the Passion as it appears in the mythos:

In due order, the next quarter introduces the Passion-a term appositely chosen and applied-prefaced under Aries, the first sign of the fiery triplicity, which is the Vale of Gehenna. . Thence comes Calvary, conformably with the crossification of the Sun of Nature at the gate of Libra, with the zodiacal Virgin recumbent next to this point of supreme sacrifice.

The story of the sun is a daily, monthly, annual and precessional drama that takes place cyclically and over thousands of years. In order to change the mythos into the life of a man-in other words, to personify and historicize it-it was necessary to make the tale linear, such that there are discrepancies between the stories of the sun and that of the "historical" Jesus. For example, while the sun "dies" and is "reborn" or "resurrected" daily, monthly, annually and precessionally, as a "person" Jesus can only undergo such experiences once. In the early Christian period, when the story as still being formulated, yet another debate raged as to how long after beginning his ministry Christ was supposed to suffer his passion, with a common portrayal that it occurred "in the 12th month after his baptism," i.e., at the winter solstice, following his baptism in Aquarius, as acknowledged by Irenaeus, who wrote against the "heretics": They affirm that He suffered in the twelfth month, so that He continued to preach for one year after His baptism." Irenaeus then insists that Christ "did not suffer in the twelfth month after his baptism, but was more than fifty years old when he died." Irenaeus's statements reveal not only Jesus's solar nature but also that by his time (c. 140-c. 200) the gospel story was not "set in stone," as it would have been, had it happened in history. In fact, some of the writings of the early Christian fathers demonstrate that they are discussing a number of different individuals, which is to be expected, since the "Christ character" which finds its way into the New Testament is a composite of many.

These various debates reflect the complexity of the mythos, as further illustrated by Massey:

When it was discovered that the moon was a mirror to the solar light, the sun-god as Osiris was reborn monthly in or of the moon! Thus, the resurrection in three days became that of the luni-solar god. . . . The Christ who rose again in three days for the fulfillment of scripture must be the Christ according to that scripture which contained the mythos, and the fulfillment of scripture was the completion of astronomical cycles, whether lunar, solar, or Precessional.

As stated, the character of Jesus Christ was in fact created as the solar avatar or hero of the Age of Pisces, into which the sun was moving during the first centuries before the Christian era, an illomened time between ages of celestial "no man's land."

Jesus as the Lamb of God was a remnant of the previous Age of Aries:

And as it approached the "gates of Spring," "the Lamb of God," or the Lamb of March gathered up "the sins of the world," or the sins of the Winter, and bore them away. And thus was realized, astronomically, not only "the Lamb of God taking away the sins of the world," but also the death and resurrection of the Son of God, or the sun-God, more properly.

Massey describes the changes of the ages:

When Horns had fulfilled the period of 2155 years with the Easter Equinox in the Sign of Aries, the birthplace passed into the Sign of Pisces, when the Ever-Coming One, the Renewer as the Eternal Child who had been brought forth as a Lion in Leo, a Beetle in Cancer, as one of the Twins in Gemini, as a calf in the Sign of the Bull, and a Lamb in the Sign of the Ram, was destined to manifest as the Fish, in the Sign of the Fishes. The rebirth of Atum-Horus, or Jesus, as the Fish Iusaas, and the Bread of Nephthys, was astronomically dated to occur in Beth Lechem-the House of Bread-about 255 B.C., at the time the Easter Equinox entered the Sign of Pisces, the house of Corn and Bread.

Massey also states that "Horus in Egypt had been a fish from time immemorial, and when the equinox entered the sign of Pisces, Horus was portrayed as Ichthys with the fish sign of over his head." He further says, "The Messiah who manifested in this sign was foreordained to come as Ichthys the fisherman, or, doctrinally, the fisher of men" (Massey, The Historical And The Mythical Christ, Health Research, p. 20).

Thus, Jesus is the Piscean fish god, who, at Luke 24:11-2, upon his resurrection is made to ask, "Do you have any fish"?, establishing the choice of communion food of the new age. Hence, the fish was ordered to be eaten in Catholicism. In addition, the early Christians were called "Pisciculi"-"little fishes" (Higgins, Godfrey, Esq., Anacalypsis, A&B Books, 1992, p. 568). As the solar hero of the Piscean Age, Jesus is also made to say, "I am with you always until the close of the age." It is now the close of the Age of Pisces, and the sun is moving into the Age of Aquarius, a "second coming" that signifies the changing of the guard.

WHAT YOU DON'T KNOW CAN HURT YOU

The attention of the writer having been called to the fact that all Indo-Germanic nations have worshipped crucified Saviours, an investigation of the subject was personally made by me over the last 5 years. Overwhelming proof, both in this and other articles, was obtained that the sun-myths of the ancient Aryans were the origin of the religions in all of the countries which were peopled by the Aryans. The Saviours worshipped in these lands are personifications of the Sun, the chief god of the Aryans. That Pagan nations worshipped a crucified man, was admitted by the Fathers of the early Christian Church. The holy Father Minucius Felix [d. c. 250], in his Octavius ["earliest known work of Latin Christian literature"], written as late as A.D. 211, indignantly resents the supposition that the sign of the cross should be considered as exclusively a Christian symbol; and represents his advocate of the Christian argument as retorting on an infidel opponent thus: "As for the adoration of crosses, which you object to against us, I must tell you that we neither adore crosses nor desire them. You it is, ye Pagans, who worship wooden gods, who are the most likely people to adore wooden crosses, as being parts of the same substance with your deities. For what else are your ensigns, flags, and standards, but crosses gilt and beautified? Your victorious trophies not only represent a simple cross, but a cross with a man upon it"' (Minucius Felix (Octavius)]. "Not until the pontificate of Agathon (A.D. 608 [680]) [Agatho: pope 687 -681] was Christ represented as a man on a cross. During the reign of Constantine Pogonatus [Constans II Pogonatus, Byzantine emperor 641 - 668], by the Sixth Synod of Constantinople (Canon 82) it was ORDAINED that instead of the ancient symbol, which had been the lamb, the figure of a man nailed to a cross should be represented. All this was confirmed by Pope Adrian I ["Hadrian I (d. 795), Pope from 772." (Ox. Dict. C.C.). Quoted in Higgins's Anacalypsis, vol. ii. p. 3."]."

Now please pay attention to what is said next. The whole purpose in presenting this information is to tie such information with the Essenes/Qumran sect which "adopted Sun-Worship" over Judaism in their "theological evolutions" over 250 years. Having said this then the next piece of information is incredible since the documents mentioned are Essene/Qumran writings...admitted by all scholars today. This is the undeniable connection to the FACT that the Essenes/Qumran cult had adopted "Solar-Myths" of crucified Sungods over the Messiah mentioned in the Tanakh:

'THE MESSIAH, AS EARLY AS THE SECOND CENTURY B.C., WAS REGULARLY LIKENED TO THE SUN (The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Testament of Levi, xviii, ed. R.H. Charles, pp. 62 sq.). THE EARLY CHRISTIANS who, like the Essaeans, TURNED TO THE EAST WHEN PRAYING, HELD THEIR FEASTS ON SUN-DAYS, ASSOCIATED THE DEATH OF CHRIST WITH AN

ECLIPSE OF THE SUN, and later celebrated His birthday on the Mithraic 'Natalis dies solis,' were likewise held by the pagans to be SUN-WORSHIPPERS (Tertullian [c. 160 - c. 220], Apologia, xvi). Indeed, CHRIST WAS ALWAYS ASSIMILATED TO THE SUN. The Clementine Homilies state that the disciples of John, the Hemerobaptist ["Jewish sect" ("daily ablution")], looked upon Jesus as the sun, and that he had therefore twelve apostles, whereas they regarded John the Baptist as the moon, and he accordingly had thirty disciples, or, more precisely, twenty-nine and a half, one being a woman, "for a woman, being half a man, made up the number of the triacontad ["set of thirty"], as with the moon whose revolution does not make the complete course of the month" (Clementine Homilies, ii. 23).'

No more evidence needs be presented...the case is proven beyond any doubt!

CONCLUSION

As you can see from the Bible verses quoted above, these symbols of pagan sun worship were associated with Baal worship, or Baalim, which is strongly condemned in scripture. So why are they so prevalent in the Roman Catholic Church and Protestant Christianity if they are associated with paganism and apostasy? Not wanting to "pick" on Catholics, my Protestant friends need to know that they have "inherited" the same "solar-dogmas" as well.

Without a doubt such "beliefs" are an affront and an abomination to God and those who hold such religious beliefs which have been attached to Jesus in the New Testament end up as Sun-Worshipers and Idolators...without ever knowing. Simply, they "do evil in the sight of the LORD"...AND THEY DON'T EVER KNOW IT...UNTIL THEY DIE THAT IS!

Let us close with this thought as taken from Mark 8:27:

27 And Jesus went out, and his disciples, into the towns of Caesarea Philippi: and by the way he asked his disciples, saying unto them, WHOM DO MEN SAY THAT I AM? (KJV),

That is a good question, and after reading this article as well as others on this website, as well as our websites, we sure know "who he is not" as well as "what is and is not a "Divine Document." We know for sure that Jesus and the "Jesus stories" in the New Testament are not an accurate picture as to whom he is; the vast majority of the New Testament accounts of Jesus are sadly "recycled" Sun-Worship and "Solar-Myths" whereby Jesus has been turned into a "new" Osiris/Horus/dying and raising/crucified Sun-godman.

Eccl 1:9 9 The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done is that which shall be done: and there is no new thing under the sun. (KJV)

...pardon my pun!

Having come to this stark revelation and conclusion, don't you think it is about time for you to study and investigate the historical Jesus to determine who he really is and what the "true Gospel" that he both lived and taught really is?

A Christian's religious belief system, when tested and exposed to contradictory facts from Biblical languages, Biblical history, Biblical culture, Religious history, and archeology, must in the Spirit of Truth and Repentance, be flexible enough to change!

We at Bet Emet Ministries stand ready to help you in your search for truth in order that your worship of YHVH be in Spirit and in Truth.

ASTRO THEOLOGY: THE SUN ON THE CROSS… OR…THE SON ON THE CROSS?

It has been said that: "The Christian religion is a parody on the worship of the Sun, in which they put a man whom they call Christ, in the place of the Sun, and pay him the same adoration which was originally paid to the Sun."- Thomas Paine

This is a most serious charge against Christianity as most know it and if such a charge can be shown to have validity then one should be honest enough before God to begin a serious investigation in his religious beliefs in order to separate truth from fiction.

Well it is for certain most who read our articles don't wish to be in "sin". A small article of this size cannot possibly do justice to such a complex and verbose subject as we have at hand but I hope to "break the egg" so to speak to help our readers begin to scrutinize the subject matter at hand in more detail by their personal study. Let's closely examine the original, conceptual foundations of the Christian faith, and then decide what to do with the serious "charge" made at the beginning of the article; that the Christian faith today is nothing but an evolution of "sun" worship transfigured into "Son" worship. Again I wish to reiterate the seriousness of such a charge if it can be proven.

IN THE BEGINNING…

But in order to do that, we must go back not 2000 years to the birth of Christ, but 10 to 15,000 years to the birth of modern man. For when one seeks to establish foundations, one must begin at the beginning. We must begin with the Aryan peoples of the world.

Many thousands of years ago, in what we refer to as the "primordial world" of the ancients, human life was a far different experience from that which we enjoy today. While it is true that we have less documentation on that prehistoric world than we have on our own age, enough is known from the ancient writings to paint a rather clear picture of our remote ancestry. If we have learned anything at all, it is this: "That the more we change, the more we stay the same." And nowhere is this more clearly demonstrated than in the history of man's quest for "God", and the ancient religion we still keep holy.

According to the best understanding we have gleaned from the available records, life for our ancient forefathers was a mixture of wonder and fear. Each day, just finding food for one's family without becoming a meal oneself was a life-and-death struggle. It was from these meager, distressful conditions of the human race that our long history of the search for God and meaning of life has come.

Any evolution, at its most accelerated rate, is always agonizingly slow. But from the beginning, man's profound questions demanded answers. When no clear answers were forthcoming from the universe, man turned inward and developed his own. The study of this subject is termed "Astro-Theology" or the "worship of the heavens".

It did not take ancient man very long to decide that in this world the single greatest enemy to be feared was the darkness of night. Simply stated, man's first enemy was darkness.

With this one fact alone, one can readily understand why the greatest and most trustworthy friend the human race would ever have was heaven's greatest gift to the world . . . the Glorious Rising Orb of Day . .THE SUN. With this simple truth understood, we can now begin to unravel ascent of man and the origin of the "crucifixion of the sun"; or should I say the "crucifixion of the Son". Notice the word-play and stay tuned!

Today, as in all of mankind's history, from almost every nation under the sun, we find the same religious story told over and over. This story transverses all races and nationalities as far as recorded history can be discovered. This is of major importance as it has a direct bearing of what you have been told as "religious truth" by your religious authorities. This same story has once again been told anew to most of you, as well as I, in the churches we attend as well as in the New Testaments we carry. This is the story of Christianity: "The Greatest Story Ever Told." If one could undertake only a simple inquiry into the matter one would quickly see the hundreds of parallels between Christian metaphors concerning its "crucified savior" and the natural reality of the sun and sky which are so striking and startling that one would come to the conclusion rather easily that the "Christian revelation of its crucified savior" does NOT constitute a new and unique revelation, but rather a re-telling of the same old myths which have been handed down since the earliest times of mankind which the earliest written records attest!

The facts are there for your examination.

Modern-day Christianity has often belittled our ancient ancestors who are not here to defend themselves. They accuse them of being nothing more than ignorant worshippers of miscellaneous gods. Therefore we can, with assurance, summarily dismiss 14,000 years of human spirituality as ignominious myth believed by well-meaning but gullible primitives. Too much of this kind of spiritual arrogance and religious pride has continued without challenge . . Until now! The time has come to set matters straight.

WHAT EVERY CHRISTIAN NEEDS TO KNOW…BUT WHICH FEW HAVE EVER READ OR SEEN FOR HIMSELF

The "Greatest Story" went something like this . . .

The ancient peoples reasoned that no one on Earth could ever lay claim of ownership to the Great Orb of Day (the sun). Such a magnificent heavenly body must belong to the unseen Creator of the universe. It became, figuratively speaking, not man's, but "God's Sun." It was only a short hop and skip to the understanding that "God's Sun" was . . ."The Light Of The World."

As stated before, in the dark cold of night man realized his utter vulnerability to the elements. Each night, mankind was forced to wait for the "Rising of The Sun" (resurrection of the Sun) to chase away the physical and mental insecurity brought on by the darkness. Therefore, the morning Sun focused man's attention on heavenly dependence for his frail, short existence on Earth. Doing so, it became an appropriate symbol of divine benevolence from heaven.

So just as a small fire brought limited light into man's own little world of darkness, likewise, the "Great Fire of Day" served the whole Earth with its heavenly presence. For this reason, it was said at Deut. 4:24 and Heb. 12:29 that the God of the Bible was a "Consuming Fire" in heaven. And so He was!

It was accepted by all that man was bound to a life on Earth, but the sky was the abode of God's Sun. He resides "up there" in. . . "Heaven."

Ancient man saw in his male offspring his own image and likeness, and his own existence as a father was proved by the person of his son. Thus, it was assumed that "God's Sun" was but a visible representative of the unseen

Creator in heaven. So it was said, "When you have seen the Son, you have seen the Father." Said another way, "The Father is glorified in His Son."

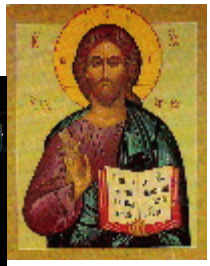
Answer for yourself: Now does this not sound a little too much like the Gospel of John for comfort?

Ancient man had no problem understanding that all life on Earth depended directly on life-giving energy from the Sun. Consequently, all life was lost without the Sun. It followed that "God's Sun" was nothing less than "Our very Savior." This is a major concept in the evolution of religion and should not be under estimated in the creation of future theologies; especially in the Gentile nations who will have their multitudes of "crucified saviors" which would serve again as precursors to the Jesus story of Rome. Logically, even if man himself dies, as long as the Sun comes up each day, life on Earth will continue forever. Therefore, it was said in the ancient texts that everlasting life was "the gift" that the Father gives through his Sun. Not for you personally but for the Earth . . . everlasting life!

Since evil and harm lurked at every turn in the fearful dark of night, all evil or harmful deeds were naturally the . . ."Works of Darkness." And of course the evil of night was ruled over by none other than . . . "The Prince of Darkness." Hence, evil is of the Dark or of the "Dark-Evil"…the "D-Evil" or as we more curently know it by.....the Devil (pretty clever if I might say so)!

Mankind progresses through his history but he retains his fears and phobias as well as his religious concepts based upon such superstitions as we have shown. We now have before us two cosmic brothers - one very good, and one very bad. This would be the basis for all Dualistic Religions that preceded Christianity. One brings the "truth to light" with the "light of truth." The other is the opposite, or in opposition to the light - "The Opposer" . . . Prince of the World of Darkness.

EGYPTIAN RELIGION AND THE SUN/SAVIOR



At this point we come to Egypt. More than three thousand years before Christianity began, the early morning "Sun/Savior" was pictured in Egypt as the "New Born Babe." The infant savior's name was "Horus."

At daybreak each day, this wonderful, newborn child (represented by the Sun…the Sun/Savior) is of course "Born Again". Horus is risen on the Horizon as the sun rises in the East daily.

And of course "God's Sun" goes to His death at sundown wearing a "crown of thorns" or "corona" (the rays of the sun so clearly seen at sunset)/ Remember the Statue of Liberty or the many pictures of Jesus with a halo? To this day, kings still wear a round crown of spikes, symbolizing the rays of the Sun!

The Egyptians knew that the Sun was at its highest point in the sky (or high noon) when no shadow was cast by the pyramid. At that point, all Egypt offered prayers to the "Most High" God! As stated before, to the ancients, the sky was the abode, or heavenly temple, of the "Most High." Therefore, "God's Sun" was doing His heavenly Father's work in the temple at 12 noon!

IMPORTANCE OF THE SUN DIAL & CROSS OF THE ZODIAC…RELIGION ADVANCES

The world of ancient man kept track of times and seasons by the movement of the Sun - daily, monthly, yearly. For this, the sundial was devised. Not only the daily movement of the Sun was tracked on the round dial, but the whole year was charted on a round calendar dial. Examples: Ancient Mexican, Mayan, Inca, Aztec, Sumerian, Babylonian, Assyrian, Egyptian, Celtic, Aryan, etc. With this method, certain new concepts emerged in the mind of ancient man

Since the Earth experiences four different seasons, all the same and equal (in time) each year, the round calendar was divided into four equal parts. This represented the complete story of the life of "God's Sun." The famous painting of The Last Supper pictures the 12 followers of the Son in four groups (of 3) . . . the four seasons of the year! Think on this for a minute!

On the round surface of the yearly calendar, you draw a vertical line directly across the middle, cutting the circle in half - one end being the point of the winter solstice; the other end being the point of the summer solstice. Then draw another straight line (crossing the first one). One end of the new line is the spring equinox; the other end is the autumn equinox.

You now have the starting points for each of the four seasons. This is referred to by all major encyclopedias and reference works, both ancient and modern, as "The Cross of the Zodiac." Thus the life of God's "Sun" is on "the Cross." This is why we see the round circle of the Sun on the crosses of Christian churches. The next time you pass a Christian church, look for the circle (Sun) on the cross.

On December 21 or 22, the Sun, going south, reaches its lowest point in the sky (our winter solstice). It was often described, since the days have the longest darkness of the year, as the sun's descent into Hell where he was subjected to the darkness, or the dark-evil, the D-evil, or Devil. By December 25th, it is clear that the Sun its returning northward. Therefore on December 25th the sun is "Born Again." Christians stole December 25th from the Roman celebration of Sol Invictus-the Sun Unconquered. And to this day, worshippers still celebrate the birthday of the Sun only under the disguise of the birthday of the Son…Jesus.

It was well understood by ancient man that our weather was caused and controlled by the Sun. It was a simple fact that God's Sun had the power to control storms at will. The ancient Egyptians taught that He did this as He rested in His heavenly boat while crossing the sky. The story of Jesus calming the storm (Matt. 8:23-27) echoes this.

The next point to be made requires first a little background. Christians have always referred to God as "The Father." But viewing God as a father didn't start here - it goes back far into the ancient world. The reason is: Our planet was always viewed as our "Mother Earth or Mother Nature." And since rain (the life-bringing fluid), falling from heaven, impregnated and brought life to Mother Earth, it was therefore believed that our Father was in Heaven.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE INFLUENCE OF THE PHARAOHS

Though all of the essential pieces of the Christian story were long in existence before Egypt, it was with the coming of the Pharaohs that the story was finally codified and became religious dogma. Though the story varied in some details from place to place in Egypt, the essence was always the same: God's Sun was the "Light of the World," who gave His life for us.

In ancient Egypt it was said that if you wanted to follow the life of God's Sun and thereby "live in the light of God's Word," one would have to leave his old ways of life to "Follow the Sun." But before beginning this new life in "The Word," one must die to the old way of life and be "Born Again." Your first birth was "out of water" your mother formed you in. Because her water broke and your new life began, rebirth is symbolized by coming out of total immersion in water-baptism-or being born again.

In Mal 4:2, the God of Heaven is described as the "Sun of Righteousness with healing in His wings." The Sun with healing in His wings?? Then in the New Testament in Matt. 23:37 and Luke 13:34, we see God's Son wanting to gather all under "His wings." This is most appropriate for, in Egypt, the Sun was always pictured with His wings. I mention this only to show you that even the Old Testament is not immune from such symbolism within itself.

These points here mentioned are a few of hundreds, if not thousands of direct connections that can be made between the Christian Bible Story and the far more ancient, original story from the origin of religion among mankind. My purpose for drawing your attention to this literary plagiarism is best stated by Alfred North Whitehead who said, "No lie can live forever," and Egyptologist Gerald Massey, "They must find it difficult, those who have taken authority as the truth, rather than truth as the authority."

I would like to leave you with a quote which I hope will serve as an impetus for your further study into these areas in order that you "cast out the leaven" of perverse lies taught as truth:

"All Indo-Germanic nations have worshipped crucified Saviors and overwhelming proof was obtained that the sun-myths of the ancient Aryans were the origin of the religion in all the countries which were peopled by the Aryans"…Charles Morris. Let us study to show ourselves approved by God. Anyone wanting to look into this subject more thoroughly might read Aryan Sun Myths …The Origin of Religion by Charles Morris, Bible Myths by T.W. Doane, or The Story of Christian Origins by Martin A. Larson.

THE MYSTERY RELIGIONS...THE PROTOTYPES FOR CHRISTIANITY

Because the old Roman religion lacked charisma, by the intertestamental years the people of the Empire had already begun seeking alternatives. The Roman pantheon of Jupiter, Mars, Janus, Quirinus and Vesta, with the addition of Sol Indiges provided the principles of decent living and brotherly duty to the citizens of Rome, and opportunities for worship but failed to provide several things that the people found desireable in the mystery religions such as :

- The Roman religion provided no satisfactory concept of life after death
- The Roman religion provided no belief or concept in the Absolute
- The Roman religion did not offer a satisfactory mother goddess
- The Roman religion neglected the mystical and spiritual needs of human nature
- In the Roman religion death brought only Hades where the shadows of worn out souls wandered mechanically, unconsciously, like zombies, forever. Something was needed to fulfil the spiritual needs of the Roman people.

That "something" was provided by the mystery religions.

These mystery religions were no less spiritually satisfying than modern ones - they offered just as much in ceremonial, indeed more, than modern religions and sought equally to influence people's lives. Devotees of Dionysus would have been just as intense in their beliefs as pious Christians today. The initiation into one of the mysteries was possibly the highlight of a believer's life. The mystery religions were personal.

People of different psychological dispositions require different routes to religious enlightenment, according to Jocelyn Godwyn, who classifies religion into the five types: War, Denial, Magic, Love and Knowledge. In practice few people are dominated by one aspect of their psychology and practical religions have mixed characteristics as we can see from Christianity. The eastern religions of Asia Minor, the Near East and Egypt provided one or more of these and ultimately had millions of devotees.

WAR

Followers of this route believe the universe is in perpetual warfare between Good and Evil (a type of Dualism). The Persian religion placed emphasis on this duality and naturally passed it on to those influenced by it like the Essenes and followers of Mithras. War gods besides Mithras were: Mars, Hercules, Sol Invictus and Jupiter Dolichenus. Soldiers in the early period of Christianity preferred Mithraism to Christianity since it postulated a supreme Lord of Light opposed by a Supreme Lord of Darkness, Ahriman. The creator, Ormuzd, sent Mithras into our cosmos to rally the side of the Good in the battle against Evil. He is therefore the god of battles on earth. But the battle continues even after death. Mithraism and other mystery religions had a hierarchy of ranks of initiation like the Essenes and modern Freemasons. Christianity has taken much imagery from Mithraism and has its own salvation armies. One should take notice of the concept of "light versus darkness" since it is used heavily in the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Essene writings showing again the influence of Persian religion upon the Essenes!

DENIAL

Besidesthe dualism of the fight between Good and Evil preferred by those of a military disposition, there is the dualism between spirit and matter preferred by the ascetic. Religion's objective is to free the soul or spirit from the material world which restricts it. The Orphics and Pythagoreans believed we were incarnated on earth to expiate our sins. We are on the lowest plain of the cosmos the sphere beneath the Moon, which, being imperfect, permits pain, suffering decay and death. At higher levels, the spheres of the planets are successive!) purer states leading to perfection in the stars and the realm of the gods.

Though man's spirit is trapped in the material prison of the body, its natura home is the utmost level of the stars and the ascetic seeks to release it by mortifying the body. Non-spiritual people indulge their bodies spoiling it with food, drink, cosmetics and rich clothing. They pamper the prison of the spirit whereas the ascetic seeks to neglect it. Denial substantiates the idea that the spirit is being released by causing feelings of exuberance and hallucination known as mystical experiences. Sometimes, as in the Essenes and the Cathar of Montaillou, the aged would starve themselves to death.

The ascetics' attitude to their bodies is the same irrespective of the religion they profess. But sometimes the self-denial was only for a short time. Believers in Isis walked to her shrines on their hands and knees as do some Christians today. According to Appuleius the initiates to the mysteries of Osiris had to do without food and sexual intercourse for ten days before the ceremony. Chastity is especially valued by ascetics because the untapped sexual energy can give insights into higher spiritual plains, though it also can lead to tyranny through] sexual frustration. Religious ascetics have been known to go so far as to attempt castration, as did the Church father, Origen. The priests of Cybele an Attis were self-castrated Eunuchs, and even circumcision is a form of symbolic castration suggestive of a denial of sexuality.

MAGIC

Followers of this path are those who try to solve the duality of spirit and flesH by trying to unite them. The hierarchies of the universe have influences on each other. Thus man at a low level is made in the image of God; the movements of the planets affect the earth and the human spirit. The Magician attempts to exercise his influence at higher levels. Having offered a sacrifice to the gods the gods had to return the favour. In the Taurobolium of the rites of Attis an Cybele and other mysteries, the blood of the slaughtered bull soaked th devotee who became "eternally born again". The animal's genitals were buried. Blood and sexual energy are the two key elements of magic. The fully evolve Taurobolium lasted from the second century AD to the fourth century AD but vestiges linger until today in the bullfighting and bull running of Spain an France.

Magic also made use of images of the gods to draw them down to the earthl level. The Christian sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist use respectively water, and bread and wine - the image of the flesh and blood of the god - to draw down the spirit of the god, Christ, into the souls of the devotees. The demons who acted as messengers from the gods responded only to meticulously correct ritual. Thus in the Christian magical rites of the seven sacraments, the bread, oil, etc. are treated with a fixed spoken formula that in magic is intended to influence higher planes to the advantage of the communicants.

SEEKERS AFTER LOVE

The fourth path was that of love through which the devotee became part of god. The mystery religions are distinguished by the desire of their adherents to achieve a closer personaL relationship with God. The mystery gods had suffered pain, loss or death as mortals do and had compassion for us. Love was thus an element common to the mystery religions. Osiris, Orpheus, Hercules, Christ, Dionysus, Attis and Adonis were all slain and resurrected; they all descended into the underworld to redeem the souls there also.

Ritual also helped especially in the form of a holy communion in which the blood and flesh of the god is consumed, albeit symbolically. Followers of Cybele and Attis had such a ritual and Dionysus was considered to be really present in the wine and flesh consumed by his worshippers. Godwin quotes a Persian Mithraic. text that sounds remarkab!y Christian:

He who will not eat of my body and drink of my blood, so that he will be made one with me and I with him, the same shall not know salvation.

Adherents of the path of love often conclude that the human condition is unworthy of God's love and become ascetics - a blend of adoration and self-denial is a characteristic of Christian saints.

SEEKERS AFTER KNOWLEDGE

The last route to God is through knowledge. Seeking truth about the god, according to Plutarch, is seeking the god. Aspirants meditated and studied the works of higher adepts or masters who had received a higher knowledge inaccessible to reason. For these, studying and seeking truth is more pious than abstinence or service in the church. Jesus was often depicted as a master, a teacher inspiring his followers, rather than the more popular image of suffering Messiah. Isis was also a lover of wisdom, according to P!utarch.

The mystery religions gave knowledge about life after death and instructions for the journey. The soul can eventually leave the visible universe and avoid any further need to be reborn, or it can remain in the visible universe, the Circle of Necessity of the Orphics and the Wheel of Existence of the Buddhists. All creatures eventually become divine. The mystery novitiate knows it and is purposefully stepping on the road to obtain it.

THE ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES

A Mystery is a rite, secret from all save the initiated. Initiates were required not to describe what they had experienced and many kept silent. If anything was written down, it was subsequently destroyed by the triumphant Christians. Consequently modern researchers know amazingly little about them, whence their name. What knowledge we have comes largely from interpreting pictures of the initiations and festivals, and we cannot always be sure we are right.

The proceedings had to be secret to ensure ritual purity. If they were disturbed they would have been invalidated by the contamination of those who were not ritually pure. The god would be angered and disaster and ill-fortune would be the outcome. Note however that, though the proceedings were secret, they were held openly - that is at known times and places and the rules of membership were known to all. In Rome clandestine meetings were illegal.

Mystery religions had a hierarchy of levels of initiation just as the Freemasons do. The initiates or mystae were prepared under the guidance of a hierophant or "revealer of holy things". Only the hierophant could enter the inner sanctum where the holy objects were kept. Earthly life was considered a trial in which human souls were subjected to various tests. The object of initiation into the mysteries was to assist the soul in passing its tests so that it could proceed to a higher level of existence and, ultimately, to immortality.

INITIATION NORMALLY INVOLVED AT LEAST 4 STEPS:

- Purification;
- Acceptance of mystic knowledge via teachings or exhortations;
- Revelation of holy things where the initiate has to perform certain acts - the central feature of the rites - often some form of sacred drama;
- Crowning or garlanding and concluding festivities.

Greece was the fount of the earliest mysteries. The Mysteries of Eleusis near Athens were the oldest and most famous in Greece. The Eleusinian Mysteries took place in September suggesting they had evolved from a harvest ceremony. But the original reasons were not known to the later initiates who saw the rites as pertaining to the soul not to barleycorn.

There were two grades of membership, the higher one requiring at least a year's fellowship at the lower level. The schedule of events was quite elaborate.

13 September - An opening parade from Athens to Eleusis.

14 September - The parade returned to Eleusis with the holy objects.

16 September - The novitiates heard the proclamation of the hierophant, who told each that if he was unready for or unworthy of the initiation he should withdraw. They had to be Greek (or later Roman), above a minimum but young age, ritually pure and "pure of hand", and later pure of soul. The mystae then purified themselves with pigs blood and washed themselves clean in the sea. Finally a sacrifice was made to the goddess.

19 September - A splendid procession moved along the sacred way with the mystae and acolytes carrying an effigy of the god Iacchus (Dionysus). Each of many shrines along the route had to be attended so the procession did not end until after sunset. Then followed reveling of the mystae with their god. These mysteries were entirely seemly, even Christian critics not suggesting otherwise.

22 September - a mystic ceremony of initiation which took the form of a holy pageant or drama with the Hierophant, the Hierophantis (High priestess) and the Torchbearer playing the central roles of the gods. The daughter Kore (Persephone) is abducted, the Great Mother, Demeter, searches and sorrows and the daughter is at last returned. The setting was simple, there being no evidence of elaborate stages or scenery but a magical effect was secured through costume and lighting. The votaries were probably shown cult objects probably consisting of ancient statues of the goddesses and possibly an ear of corn symbolizing resurrection of the soul after death, a relic of the earlier stage when the Great Mother was a corn goddess.

Some form of communion was also involved. The goddess in the mystery play drinks at one stage from a cup. The votaries would have had to do the same. The drink originally would have been beer. The corn or barley from which it was made represented the body of the goddess and the mystae would therefore have united with her. (In the nearby Samothracian mysteries the priest broke bread and poured a cup of wine for the initiates - just as the Christians do - but the meaning of the body and blood of the god is less obscured than in the Christian communion through its clearer link with the vegetative god of the vine and the vegetative goddess of the corn.) Next the mystae are given a pass word. They raise their heads to the sky calling "rain" then address the earth calling "conceive" - again demonstrating the agrarian origins of the ritual. Finally the Hierophant gives a closing address. It was called the "Logos" - the "Word"!

Now that the mystae have entered into a contract with the goddess: they promise her lives of exemplary morality while she promises them immortality after the death of their earthly bodies.

The Eleusinian mysteries attracted many initiates in Athens from about 600 BC. Later mystery religions followed a similar pattern, each with its own exotic god or goddess offering votaries personal favors, guaranteeing to watch over them after death and even offering them a form of divinity - immortality. Each of the eastern religions had a god who suffered, died and finally triumphed. In each the initiate was invited to partake of the body of the god and thereby gain spiritual immortality.

Christianity was one of these Eastern Mysteries - the last one and the only survivor.

GODS WHO DIE

ATTIS AND THE GREAT MOTHER GODDESS, CYBELE

Cybele was worshipped for over 500 years. She was the Great Mother of All Things: the Mater Deum Magna - Great Mother of the Gods, and of men, animals and plants. She was a mother of nature and a Mountain Mother - her shrines were often on mountains and in caves. She was identified with several other mother goddesses including Demeter and Gaia. She was, in her loving and comforting aspect, the equivalent of Isis, Hera, Juno and the Christians' Mary. But she also had a destructive aspect in which she signified the unknown, the unconscious and mysterious, the magical and intuitive qualities women in particular are considered to have. She is then Astarte, Luna, Hecate, Kali. Cybele was represented by a black meteorite set in the face of a silver statue. Worship of Cybele arose in the prehistoric Phrygian Empire of Asia Minor. The main centre of the cult came to be Pessinus in Galatia. In 204 BC the Sibylline Oracle prophesied that enemies of Rome would be defeated if the Great Mother were taken from Pessinus to Rome. The cult and her symbol, the small black meteorite, were duly moved to Rome and established in 191 BC on the Palatine Hill in the heart of the city. Later the cult incorporated that of Attis who probably never had any following independent of her. The High Priest or Archigallus of Cybele was identified with Attis.

Her priests, the Galli, were eunuchs with hair perfumed and dressed with oils. Priests, priestesses, acolytes and initiates celebrated her rites with fast music and wild dancing until in a frenzy the participants exhausted and finally mutilated themselves by castration becoming candidates for the priesthood. Even the phlegmatic Romans were shocked at first by these rites and at first Roman citizens were banned from participating in them. The ban was not lifted until the beginning of the Empire but then Attis and Cybele worship became one of the three main religions along with those of Isis and Mithras. It made its last appearance under the pagan revival of Eugenius in AD 394.

These, to our mind, horrific rites came from the myth of Attis. Attis was a handsome Phrygian shepherd, the "Good Shepherd", the son of Cybele. Cybele loved her son intensely but Attis fell in love with a nymph and jealousy overcame the mother. In a rage she cast a spell of madness on Attis and he castrated himself at the foot of a pine tree. As his life blood dripped to the earth violets sprang up. Cybele, full of remorse took the body to a cave and wept. She first buried Attis at Pessinus but then used her power to restore him to life and they were reunited. She founded the cult with Attis the priest and made the pine tree sacred.

Just as Jesus acknowledged Yahweh as his senior, Cybele, the mother, is the senior of Attis. Like Yahweh, whose anger at mankind's disobedience could only be assuaged through the death of his son, Cybele's jealous anger could only be assuaged through the death of her son. Cybele's most solemn ritual was the Taurobolium, a sacrifice of a bull, like Mithra's. The blood flowed through the slats of the sacrificial platform. The initiate standing below thereby became "born again". People who could not afford a bull made do with a sheep and were described as "washed in the blood of the lamb".

The festival of Cybele and Attis was at the vernal equinox in the spring (remember the nature and spring festivals connected with the vernal equinox and the rebirth of the earth at spring due to the sun's resurrection from the death of the darkness of winter?). During the reign of Claudius shortly after the crucifixion this was from 15 to 27 March. The calendar was:

15 March - The "reed bearers" enter and a six year old bull is sacrificed.

22 March - A pine (type of a cross) is felled representing the death of the god. The acolytes and initiates proceed to the Temple of Cybele with the sacred pine bearing the effigy of the god in its branches. The tree is laid to rest at the Temple of Cybele.

24 March - The "day of blood". The effigy of Attis is buried in a tomb and a day of mourning, fasting, sexual abstinence and flagellation commemorating the Mother's sorrow follows. The High Priest playing the part of Attis draws blood from his arm and offers it as a substitute for a human sacrifice. Attis, symbolically, becomes the substitute for human sacrifice. That night the tomb is found brightly illuminated but empty, the god having risen on the third day. Initiates undertake the Mysteries and are baptized in bull's blood at the Taurobolium to wash away their sins whereupon they are "born again". They then become ecstatic and frenzied and sometimes castrate themselves in imitation of the god.

- 25 March - Hilaria: the resurrection of Attis and the onset of spring is celebrated with a sacramental meal and a day of joy and feasting. Those who castrated themselves become Galli - cocks - dress in women's clothes and wear perfumed oils.
- 26 March - A quiet day of rest and recovery;
- 27 March - The conclusion of the festival with a procession in which the statue of the goddess, meteorite embedded in her brow, is majestically carried to her temple and a series of religious dramas and entertainments follows.

Clay statues of the gods were made in ancient times just as tawdry statues of saints are sold today at Catholic shrines. Attis was depicted in his death throes drenched in blood, then serene after his resurrection, androgynous, released from his worldly sins and surrounded by solar rays. Or he was shown as a child, naked and dancing for joy. Cybele was depicted much like the virgin Mary with a baby or babies. An ancient figure of a Madonna and child in a church at Enna in Sicily was actually Cybele in her role of corn goddess (Demeter) and her daughter Persephone. The church was on a site formerly dedicated to the goddess. Pope Pius IX had the statues moved to a museum. The Black Madonnas of Italy are also on sites dedicated to Demeter, and the virgin of Chartres Cathedral was taken from a pagan alter.

Attis, the "Good Shepherd", was extremely popular in the Empire around the time of Christ. His death and resurrection were celebrated at the time of year we would call Easter. The "reed bearers" of Attis compare directly with the palm bearers of the entry into Jerusalem and the procession of the tree compares directly with the procession along the Via Dolorosa today when believing Christians enact the carrying of the cross, symbolically a tree. The effigy of the god Attis on the tree meant that ritually the god was hanged from a tree, like Jesus. The High Priest draws blood to symbolize the shedding of blood by the god for the good of men, just as Jesus is believed to have shed his blood for the salvation of believers. The brightly illuminated empty tomb directly parallels the Christian legend, the god having risen on the third day. The resurrection was celebrated with a sacramental meal and initiates baptized with blood to wash away their sins were born again.

The site of a sanctuary to Attis on the Vatican Hill is where now stands the Church of St Peter! In countries where Attis was revered 25 March was adopted as the date of Jesus's passion and crucifixion rather than the moveable feast that was later adopted as Easter. Hilaria, 25 March is precisely nine months before the official birthday of Jesus on 25 December. It is therefore the day on which Jesus was considered to have been miraculously conceived of God. The Church celebrates it as Lady Day. One of the titles of Cybele was Domina - the Lady! It is difficult for any rational man to regard all of this as coincidence.

BABYLONIAN-ASSYRIAN RELIGION & THEIR INFLUENCE ON THE GREEKS...ADONIS AND APHRODITE

THE SEMETIC EMPIRES OF BABYLON AND ASSYRIA AND THEIR RELIGIOUS INFLUENCE

Previous to about 2700 B. C., the Sumerians had ruled the Tigris-Euphrates valley; they were then conquered by a Semitic people, who established the first Babylonian Empire. This was succeeded about 1400 by the Assyrian, also Semitic and very warlike, with its capital at Nineveh, which was destroyed about 612. In 605, the center of power shifted again to the Valley, now ruled by Nebuchadnezzar from Babylon. This great city was captured by the Persian-Aryan Cyrus in 538; and this event marked the end of Semitic empire.

THE INFLUENCE OF BABYLONIAN ESCHATOLOGY ON THE JEWS...AND ESSENES

Assyrian religion and culture, derived from Babylonian, prevailed among all Semitic nations. There was a large pantheon of nature-deities, which were probably the first prototypes of the Hellenic, but there was no basic monotheism, as in Egypt. Babylonian-Assyrian concepts, themselves derived from the Sumerian, were the basic source of Greek and Jewish eschatology, until Buddhism, Zoroastrianism, and the mystery-cults effected their far-flung revolution.

The above statement is very important as it indicated the process of alteration and change of religious beliefs. Somewhere in the evolution of religious beliefs, especially in eschatology, is truth but to discern it leaves one subject to blind faith.

The Babylonians and Assyrians, along with the primitive Greeks, believed that at death very nearly all souls pass into a cold, dark prison-house known as Sheol, Hades, or the House of the Dead, from which there could be no release and in which, for all alike, there was neither activity, joy, nor hope; above all and of major importance for you to note is that there was no differentiation between the wicked and the righteous. Sinai revelation will change all of that. One might say that after death, the soul had an existence but no life. It was believed that unless the body was properly buried the spirit subsisted on dust and mud, and, therefore angered, might do injury to the living. Therefore we see the importance of funeral rites in preparation of the body for burial as preparation for a spiritual-existence.

ISHTAR...THE BABYLONIAN GODDESS: QUEEN OF HEAVEN...MOTHER OF THE GODS

The Babylonian-Assyrian religion does not fall within our province, since it did not exercise direct influence upon the New Testament. But the same cannot be said about Gentile Christianity; especially the Catholic Church!

We concern ourselves only with Ishtar, the great Babylonian goddess, who grew and expanded over the centuries into the Queen of Heaven and the Mother of the Gods, who was adopted by the Assyrians and all the lesser Semitic nations as their greatest deity, and whose worship was absorbed, under various guises, by many Aryan nations as well. She appeared under many names, among which the most popular were Ashtoreth, Astarte, Mylitta, Cybele, Anaitis, Dindymeme, Aphrodite, and Venus; but her character remained substantially unaltered.

Ishtar was worshipped primarily as the goddess of generation and the source of life, whether vegetable, animal, or human. She ached with cosmic sex-desire; and without her influence, no creature could experience the same yearning, and hence no new life could come into being. According to ancient myth, she had taken a mortal lover, Tammuz, who had died and departed into his eternal underworld prison. She wept inconsolably, but could not retrieve him from the clutches of Allatu, mistress of the nether regions. To be with him again, she invaded the House of the Dead, where she was herself condemned by Allatu to perpetual imprisonment.

But now a terrible tragedy supervened upon earth. All the vegetation died, and could not grow green again; none of the wild beasts, the cattle, or even insects would copulate; and all sexual relationships ceased among the human race. In short, love was dead, and the world was doomed.

To meet this fearful emergency, there was a council of the great gods, who determined that Ishtar must be restored to earth. They therefore sent a delegation to Allatu, who reluctantly released her prisoner. But Ishtar could not endure life always separated from her beloved; and so, every fall, she went down into the underworld to be with him for six months, and every spring, on the 20th of June, when the star of Ashtoreth appeared in the East, she came again into the upper world. With her return, the birds, the flowers, the trees, the grain sprang to life; the insects, the beasts, and the cattle copulated once more; and men and women, stirred by strong desire, hastened to embrace.

THE RITUAL OF ISHTAR

Every year, the passion of Ishtar was re-enacted at a great religious festival, at which the women wept for Tammuz, as we read in Ezekiel 8:14. Her ritual was consonant with her character. Close by her temples were her sacred groves, in which men and women performed her rites by uniting in the sex act which is symbolic of life and which was her sacrament. Herodotus declares that the Babylonians have one most shameful custom: "Before marriage, every woman must sit down in the precincts of Aphrodite and wait for a stranger who will pay her a temple fee to have intercourse with her. The woman goes with the first man who throws her money, and rejects no one. As soon as the man made his choice, he led the woman to the sacred grove, where they consummated the ritual. Thereupon, she returned to her home and never again submitted to the embrace of a stranger. Strabo describes the same ceremonial at Byblus.

Wherever the orthodox Semites (Babylon and Assyria) advanced, Astarte, together with her sacred prostitution, came with them. Not only were all women compelled to submit once to this pre-marital ceremony, but we know that the temples of the Queen of Heaven were staffed with professional priestesses, whose earnings swelled her coffers. Herodotus says that formerly Babylonians used to sell their daughters into slavery or wifehood to the highest bidder; but now, to avoid such violence, they reared the damsels to become temple prostitutes in the service of Ashtoreth. We learn from Strabo that not only the Babylonian Ishtar, but also the Median Anaitis, offered the same serviced

Sir James G. Frazer suggests that Ishtar dates from an antiquity so remote that marriage was unknown or regarded as an immoral aggression against the communal rights of many women to many men. Astarte and Aphrodite are therefore unmarried and unchaste. As monogamy and monogamic marriage developed with private property, a relic of primitive communism lingered on in the ritual of Astarte: once in her life, each woman was compelled to surrender to men communally in the person of a single stranger; and we read that if women wished to preserve their chastity, they were required to sacrifice their hair in lieu thereof. The custom by which brothers or fathers married their sisters or daughters was also a relic of ancient communism, in which all property and the line of descent belonged to women alone. Only by marriages regarded as incestuous after private property was consolidated, could wealth be continued among the males of the same family.

THE INCORPORATION OF ISHTAR AND OSIRIS...A NEW MYSTERY CULT

The Semitic culture and religion spread all over Asia Minor to the Hellespont and the Mediterranean. We have already seen in the article about Osiris that ancient Byblus was a colony of Egypt four or five thousand years ago; and that the body of Osiris, later recovered by Isis, was said to have landed there. The story is told by Plutarch, from whom we learn also that the chest containing the body of Osiris was enclosed in a great myrrh or heather tree; and that Isis poured perfume upon the wood, which was still, in the first century, preserved in her shrine at Byblus.

What actually occurred was something of far-reaching importance: for in Byblus, the religions of Babylonia and Egypt met and coalesced; and a new cult emerged, which bore a generic resemblance to both progenitors, but developed certain characteristics of its own. Basically it was the same but different. This was the first time that Osiris was exported; but the old religion he encountered here was so thoroughly established that it could not be displaced in its entirety. Ishtar, therefore, remained almost intact. Osiris, however, continued as the savior-god, and, in this character, drove Tammuz into oblivion. In this first mystery religious-synthesis, Ishtar and Osiris became Aphrodite and Adonis. Lucian notes the identity of these gods and declares that Adonis is Osiris.

THE SAME MYTH AS DEVELOPED BY THE GREEKS

As known to the Greeks, the myth runs as follows: the Ancient Syrian king Cinyras and his wife Astarte, who ruled both at Byblus and in Paphos, had a daughter, Myrrha, whom Aphrodite caused to become desperately enamored of her father, who unwittingly impregnated his own child when she replaced her mother in his bed; on discovering his impiety, he attempted to destroy her, but she escaped his wrath and the gods transformed her into a myrrh tree (remember Osiris and the tree?). After ten months, the tree burst asunder, and forth sprang the beautiful Adonis (A don, in Syrian, means lord) who developed into a handsome youth with whom Aphrodite became hopelessly enamored. But before she could consummate her love, Adonis was killed and his body mangled by a boar in a hunting accidents The disconsolate goddess followed her beloved into Hades (remember how Isis searched for Osiris and as Ishtar had entered Hades in search of Tammuz?), whence she sought his return to the upper air; but Persephone had herself fallen so deeply in love with him that she would not permit his release. Aphrodite thereupon appealed the case to Zeus, who determined that Adonis should spend a portion of each year, four or six months, with Celestial Aphrodite and the remainder with Persephone (before it was Allatu and Tammuz). All this, of course, re-creates in main outline the myth of Ishtar, Allatu, and Tammuz; and as we shall see, it was reproduced in the Demeter-Persephone myth. Furthermore, the aromatic Isis and the myrrh tree of Adonis, Osiris and the child Adonis both enclosed in the tree (will become a cross later)—these are elements reflecting the congenital relationship between Osiris and Adonis.

From Byblus, the Adonis-cult spread far and wide; and Pausanias declares: "among the Athenians, her worship was instituted by Aegeus, thinking that he had no children . . . owing to the wrath of the Celestial One."

The Greeks called Aphrodite a Cyprian, because her worship on Cyprus antedated Greek civilization; and they called her sea-born, because she came from across the Mediterranean. Her temple at Paphos, of which ruins are still extant, probably dates back to 1500 B. C.; but even this, according to Herodotus, was built in imitation of the more ancient one at Ascalon. And that at Byblus was the oldest of all, and was said by the Phoenicians to have been built by the god El, the creator of the world.

ISHTAR AND THE MYSTERY CULTS

The important question for us, however, is to discover the relationship between the Mother Goddess and the savior-cults; for her worship was never celebrated as a mystery in her original habitat. It became such only when Osiris, displacing Tammuz, became known as Adonis. In the new cult, this god was at least equal to the (great Mother: Tammuz, a vegetation-god, had died in the autumn, after which he descended to the underworld; but Adonis, like Osiris, died at seed-time because he was the god of resurrection who symbolized the grain quickened into a second life; and, even more significant, it was his passion and not that of the goddess which was celebrated. Tammuz, who remained forever in the underworld, was simply the lover of Ishtar; but Adonis, like Osiris, symbolized the grain which is placed in the earth and which dies and is reborn that mankind may have abundant life. During the winter months, Ishtar lived in the nether realm with Tammuz; but Adonis was the soter (savior) was made to descend into Hades (Hell) but was seen to be resurrected and thereby ascended each spring from Hades to dwell during the summer with the celestial Astarte.

THE RITUAL OF ADONIS.....OSIRIS ALL OVER AGAIN

The river Adonis empties into the Mediterranean below Byblus, where stood for centuries that stretched into millenniums the celebrated temple of Aphrodite. The worshipers believed that every spring their god, Adonis, was gored and slain by a cruel boar upon the jagged mountainside, and that his blood discolored the waters of the stream and caused a profusion of anemones to redden the earth.

We know that the great festival of Adonis, commemorating his death and resurrection, occurred at midsummer, because that is when the river Adonis runs red and the anemones bloom in Syria. We know this also from the fact that the great fleet fitted out by the Athenians against Syracuse left at just that time in 415 B.C.E.; and the streets of Athens at the same moment were lined with the coffins of Adonis and with the women lamenting and bewailing their slain god. When Emperor Julian arrived in Antioch in 6 A. D., the Festival of Adonis was in progress, and the people plunged in grief; for Venus, the Morning Star of Salvation, had just appeared in the East, the god had just died, but had not yet been resurrected.

SEX BECOMES A SACRAMENT

The ritual of Adonis as celebrated in Alexandria, Egypt, where the Essenes had their college, is described in the fifteenth Idyll of Theocritus. Couches were set up, on which figures of the god and the goddess reclined; their union was celebrated with music, recitations, and rejoicing; and there were altars laden with many fruits and cakes. The phallic Osiris and the lascivious Ishtar were represented by objects symbolizing the male and the female generative organs; and their union was celebrated as a holy mystery, which must be concealed from the uninitiated, but the details of which are described and excoriated by Clement of Alexandria.

Each year at Byblus, Paphos, and other cities, the festival of Adonis was celebrated with a mystery-drama, even as was that of Osiris in Egypt. The time was spring or early summer, because that was the time of sowing in Syria, instead of autumn, as in Egypt. The god was slain by the wild-boar, and his rent and bleeding body crimsoned the earth and the river with his blood. At this fearful tragedy, the women-mourners filled the air with shrieks and lamentations. Yet they did not grieve like those who are without hope; for shortly thereafter, the Star of Venus appeared in the East; this was the goddess coming to rescue her lover from the nether regions, to resurrect him to life, as did Isis in Egypt. Thereupon, before their very eyes, Adonis rose before them and ascended into heaven to be again with his heavenly bride. This festival occurred annually about the twentieth of June.

In the Adonis-Aphrodite cult, there seems to have been no eucharist; there was only a thank-offering of fruits and grains. The sexual ritual seems to have taken the place of the sacred meal. There can be no doubt that each new initiate became a member of the cult through intimacy with the sacred temple personnel: female novitiates became Aphrodites by union with the priestly Adonis (instead of becoming one with the god through partaking of his body and blood/drink, one became one with the god through sexual union with his representative priestess or priest); and the men were similarly sanctified with the sacred prostitutes. Personal immortality through a eucharist was an idea so foreign to the Semitic mind that it could not be engrafted upon the worship of the Great Mother. But that cannot be said for Osiris and Egyptian religion.

SO WHAT HAVE WE LEARNED?

We saw the evolution and synthesis of many of the same Osirian and Egyptian religious beliefs with religious beliefs of the Babylonians, Assyrians, and the Greeks. Understand that is is not a "complete inclusion of all existing religious beliefs," but a selecting in-grafting of religious beliefs through not only trade and commerce that introduced such concepts into other lands, but through military conquest where the victors subjugated the conquered in all areas, even religious beliefs.

THE SACRIFICIAL GOD....MIMICKED THROUGH HUMAN SACRIFICE

There can be no doubt that in the primitive phases of the cult, a priest, impersonating Adonis, was ceremonially slain at each annual festival; as civilization advanced, however, this was replaced by a simulated sacrifice.

ISHTAR AMONG THE GREEKS

Adonis never penetrated the pantheon of the Greeks; nor did the Adonis-Aphrodite cult progress far among them. As Aphrodite freed herself from Adonis, she became in time simply the goddess of beauty and of love and her cultic mysteries retreated from the peninsula. The reason was probably that her sacrament became progressively more repulsive as monogamy and private property became more and more firmly entrenched; it was therefore impossible for the Aphrodisiacs to compete successfully against the Eleusinians and the Dionysiacs, to whom we turn in the next article.

ADONIS OR TAMMUZ, AND THE DESCENT INTO HELL

Answer for yourself: Is it possible that the Jesus story of his descent into hades/hell is the retelling of sun myths and sun worship? Well let us see by investigating the facts of the matter.

1 Pet 3:19 19 By which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison; (KJV)

Well let us examine the facts of the matter.

Adonis or Tammuz, his Babylonian name, simply means, "the Lord". Adonis was the male vegetative principle. In Palestine the mysteries of Adonis seem to have taken place close to the Passover because Adonis denoted the revival of nature in the spring. Mortally wounded by the animal of winter, in the form of a boar, he died but was resurrected to be with his beloved mother Astarte (as spring that comes after winter as the sun begins to rise more northerly on the horizon after the winter solstice on Dec. 21...having remained motionless and dead for 3 days....beginning its northerly rise on Dec. 25th). Attis and Adonis are closely similar, and aspects of Attis and Cybele worship in many ways resemble that of Adonis and Astarte. Possibly Attis and Adonis began by being the same god, Attis being the Semitic version of Adonis, just as Astarte is the Semitic version of Aphrodite. Adonis's mainly female devotees would join with Astarte each year weeping for her lost son then would join in the rejoicing when he was restored to life. The attraction of this religion to women is acknowledged in the Jewish Scriptures by Ezekiel's need to scold the women of Jerusalem who wept for the dead Tammuz at the gate of the Temple. This cult spread from the Lebanon to Alexandria in Egypt, the home of the Essenes, and thence to Rome.

Antioch was early a centre of Christianity. It was also a centre for the worship of Adonis, who had been adopted as the god of Byblos, a few miles down the coast. According to Sir James Fraser, the festival to Adonis at Antioch coincided with the appearance of a star, the morning star - not the star of Bethlehem, but a curious link nonetheless.

THE JESUS CONNECTION...DESCENT INTO HELL (PERSONIFIED DARKNESS WHERE THE SUN STOOD STILL AT THE WINTER SOLSTICE FOR 3 DAYS...DEC 21 THROUGH DEC 24)

The whole tradition of Adonis closely resembles that of Jesus. The birthplace of Jesus identified by early Christians was in fact a shrine to Adonis! Adonis suffered a cruel death, descended into Hell, was resurrected and ascended into Heaven (just the same as Jesus). Each year his death was bewailed, an effigy was buried, the next day he arose to great rejoicing and his ascension to Heaven was enacted to end the festival. In Sicily an effigy of the dead Christ is prepared for burial amid wailing which continues from Good Friday until midnight on Saturday when the bishop announces that the Lord is risen and everyone greets the dawn with shouts of joy. A parallel tradition preserved by Christians in parts of Greece reflects pagan worship of the Spartan god, Hyacinth, whose three day festival was held each year in spring or early summer. On the first day his death was bewailed, on the second his resurrection was rejoiced and on the third his ascension was commemorated.

The Apostles Creed and the Athanasian Creed but not the Nicene Creed say that between the Friday night and the Sunday morning Jesus was in Hell. It did not appear as a tenet of Christianity until the fourth century AD, has no scriptural foundation save the vaguest implications in 1 Peter yet this same story is an ever present in the pagan religions of Hercules, Dionysus, Orpheus, Osiris, Hermes, Krishna, Balder, and so on. Indeed one of the most important aspect of the mystery religions seemed to have been the descent and ascent of the soul. This descent of the soul was taken from the death and rebirth of the sun following the Winter Solstice. This provided the birth stories of all the sun gods and sun godmen.

Answer for yourself: What does this say for the inspiration and infallibility of I Peter or other New Testament books for that matter?

In the Eleusinian Mysteries, Pluto carried off Persephone in winter to the underworld but she returned in spring, an allegory of the vegetative cycle intended as fertility magic.

Answer for yourself: The question is why should this rural allegory of nature's cycle appeal to city dwellers?

Only by giving it a relevant reinterpretation as an allegory of the soul's journey to Heaven. Persephone descended from Heaven into the underworld - the level of earthly existence - but was restored to the freshness of her home (Heaven). Worshippers of Dionysus considered that the squeezing of the juice from the grape to make wine symbolized the soul leaving the body. Journeys like Odysseus's were allegories of the soul's journey home just as Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress is. In the later Empire the cosmos, represented by the Zodiac, signifying the highest level of spirituality, in short Heaven, was used on graves to show what the dead person hoped would happen to his soul.

The story of Narcissus depicts the soul descending to the plant level where it is incarnated as a flower. Psyche is the Greek word for soul and the story of Cupid and Psyche is yet another allegory of the journey of the soul into Hell to be restored. Venus is jealous of Psyche's beauty and banishes her. Venus's son Cupid and Psyche fall in love but she disobeys him and he cannot prevent the punishment. Psyche desperately tries to find Cupid but suffers many tribulations before she descends to Hades. Cupid finds her overwhelmed by a magic sleep representing death and restores her to Olympus (Heaven). The soul is saved by divine love as it is in Christianity.

THE GREEK DIONYSUS & THE RELIGION OF ANCIENT GREECE

In the previous article we saw how Egyptian, Babylonian, and Assyrian religion was synthesized into Greece and how it developed into a unique synthesis. In this article we again look deeper into the religions of Greece and the Dionysus Cult.

Dionysus, also commonly known by his Roman name Bacchus, appears to be a god who has two distinct origins. On the one hand, Dionysus was the god of wine, agriculture, and fertility of nature, who is also the patron god of the Greek stage. On the other hand, Dionysus also represents the outstanding features of mystery religions, such as those practiced at Eleusis: ecstasy, personal delivery from the daily world through physical or spiritual intoxication, and initiation into secret rites. Scholars have long suspected that the god known as Dionysus is in fact a fusion of a local Greek nature god, and another more potent god imported rather late in Greek pre-history from Phrygia (the central area of modern day Turkey) or Thrace.

Dionysus is identified with many other savior-gods. Dionysus was also called Bacchus, Zagreus, Sabazius, Adonis, Antheus, Zalmoxis, Pentheus, Pan, Liber Pater, or "the Liberator." His emblem was the thyrsus, a phallic scepter tipped with a pine cone. His priestesses were the Maenads, or Baccharites, who celebrated his orgies with drunkenness, nakednesss, and sacramental feasting. The maenads, or bacchantes, were a group of female devotees who left their homes to roam the wilderness in ecstatic devotion to Dionysus. They wore fawn skins and were believed to possess occult powers.

Dionysus was good and gentle to those who honored him, but he brought madness and destruction upon those who spurned him or the orgiastic rituals of his cult. According to tradition, Dionysus died each winter and was reborn in the spring. To his followers, this cyclical revival, accompanied by the seasonal renewal of the fruits of the earth, embodied the promise of the resurrection of the dead. The yearly rites in honor of the resurrection of Dionysus gradually evolved into the structured form of the Greek drama, and important festivals were held in honor of the god, during which great dramatic competitions were conducted.

Dionysus later hero-incarnation Orpheus, star of the popular Orphic Mysteries, was the same sacrificial god, torn to pieces by the Maenads. Proclus said, "Orpheus, because he was the principal in the Dionysian rites, is said to have suffered the same fate as the god" (Walker, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, p. 237). Dionysus was hailed as "King of Kings and God of Gods." He was also the god-begotten, virgin-born Anointed One (Christos) whose mother seems to have been all three forms of the Triple Goddesss in his sacrificial Dendrites, "Young Man of the Tree." He was also a Horned God, with such forms as bull, goat, stag (Ibid.).

At Eleusis, the place of his "Advent," Dionysus appeared as a newborn Holy Child laid in a winnowing-basket, from which he was called Dionysus Liknites. Dionysus' cradle was the original form of the "manger" in which the infant Jesus was laid. All gain-gods, whose flesh was eaten in the form of bread, appeared as newborn babes in a vessel intended for seed corn (Ibid.).

Dionysus is often presented as a wine-god. But more than that he was a prototype of Christ, with a cult-center at Jerusalem, as well as nearly every other major city in the middle east. Plutarch said the Jewish Feast of Tabernacles was celebrated in his honor: "I think that the festival of the Sabbath is not whole without relation to the festival of Dionysus." He added that the Jews abstain from pork because their god Dionysus-Adonis (Lord Dionysus) was slain by a boar." In the first century B.C.E. the Jews themselves claimed to worship Dionysus under his Phrygian name of Zeus Sabazius (Walker, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, p. 236). Tacitus said Dionysus Liber was the god of Jerusalem in a former time, but a differnet god had replaced him, a god with less attractive characteristics: "Liber established a festive and cheerful worship, while the Jewish religion is tasteless and mean." Dionysus and Jehovah were literally two sides of the same coin in the 5th century B.C.E., when coins found near Gaza showed Dionysus on one side, and on the other a bearded figure labeled JHWH-Jehovah (Ibid.).

The above information is very important as it shows the Jews' indoctrination with Dionysus and similar religious concepts. This will have a strong influence later as well among the Essenes as they adapt their Messianic beliefs and pattern many of them after Dionysus and these Messianic beliefs come with them when the make conversion to the Jesus Movement following Jesus' crucifixion.

THE TYPICAL SAVIOR PATTERN OF THE DIONYSUS CULT

- First and most primitive, a king is killed and torn to pieces by the Maenads (priestesses) and cannibalized to provide both the earth and women's wombs with fructifying blood...his blood making a sin offering of the "wine" of his blood
- A King surrogate in the form of a condemned criminal or a young man chosen by lot
- Next an animal substitute for the man
- Finally "flesh" and "blood" devoured in the form of bread and wine, the classical Dionysian sacrament at Eleusis

This will become most evident as we get deeper into this article.

THE OFFICIAL RELIGION OF THE GREEKS

Greeks accepted Osiris under the name of Dionysus in their mystery-cults; and he became the universal savior-god and the prototype of Christ.

It was not that the Greeks were without gods or religion; but their official deities were only immortal men and women, subject to all the passions and most of the moral frailties of mankind. When people wanted something of immediate concern, they implored these Olympians for aid, and offered sacrifices as rewards or propitiations. The most informative Greek work dealing with the origin of these deities is the Theogony of Hesiod, which was probably composed about 750 B. C. and of which the following is a brief summary:

In the beginning was Chaos, and Earth, who conceived and bore Heaven, or Uranus, without "the sweet rites of love." And then in the bed of Uranus, she bore the Titans, including Hyperion, Iapetos, Rhea, Mnemosyne, and Cronus, who married Rhea and who, by her, became the father of Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Lades, Poseidon, and Zeus. As Cronus had been told that one of his children would overthrow him, he ate the first five at birth. This so saddened Rhea that she appealed to her parents for aid; "and they conveyed her . . . into the rich land of Crete, when she was about to bring forth . . . Zeus."She hid her child in a cave, and, swaddling a stone, gave it to Cronus, who ate the stone (thinking it was a child), never suspecting the substitution of the child with the stone. When Zeus grew to manhood, he compelled his father to disgorge the stone and the five children he had devoured. After a fearful ten-year battle in which he defeated the Titans, Zeus became the king of the gods, the lord of the sky, the cloud-gatherer, and the master of the thunderbolt.

In the form of a golden shower (sun-worship) Zeus seduced Danae, who bore Perseus; in the form of a bull, he abducted Europa, who bore Minos, Rhadamanthys, and Sarpedon. By various amours and marriages, Zeus became the literal father of the Greek pantheon. And, last of all, Semele, daughter of Cadmus in Thebes, bore him Dionysus, the only child of a mortal ever to be recognized as an immortal god in the Greek pantheon (a godman).

LATER WE FIND A RELIGIOUS SYNTHESIS IN THE GREEK PANTHEON

In the Greek pantheon, three of the most important were not members of the original company, but pushed their way into it later.

- The first of these was Aphrodite.
- The second was Demeter, who was the Hellenic recreation of Isis and who became the great mystery-goddess of the upper classes in ancient Greece.
- The third was Dionysus, who finally became the most important of all: Dionysus was universal in the barbarian world before he penetrated Greece, and he was the last of the Greek gods.

Dionysis obtained many devotees upon the peninsula itself among the lower classes, and particularly among women, before the Trojan War; and after that event, his cult underwent a series of reforms, divisions, and expansions. As the older gods faded, the mystery deities became progressively more powerful: and among these, the greatest was Dionysus.

That the mysteries were neither of Cretan origin nor a part of the original Greek religion is established by the fact that the initiatory rites as practiced among these islanders were open to everyone, in contrast to the secret rituals of Byblus, Cyprus, Thrace, Samothrace, and Eleusis (Diodorus, V, 77). The mystery, which originated in Egypt, was imported into Greece long after Zeus and his strange family had migrated from Mt. Ida to Mt. Olyrnpus.

THE CULT OF DIONYSUS...AGAIN.....OSIRIS REINVENTED

The subject of Dionysus is complex and baffling. The problem is further complicated by the fact that he appears in at least four characters:

- The respectable patron of the theatre and the arts
- The effeminate, yet fierce and phallic mystery-god of the bloodthirsty Maenads
- The mystic deity in the temples of Demeter
- The divine savior who died for mankind and whose body and blood were symbolically eaten and drunk in the Eucharist of the Orphic-Pythagorean celibates. We saw this originally in the Osirian ritual of Egypt.

Beyond this, almost all barbarian nations had their own versions of Dionysus under many names.

And yet there is a simple explanation: Dionysus, Bromius, Sabazius, Attis, Adonis, Zalmoxis, Corybas, Serapis, and Orpheus himself are replicas of their grand prototype Osiris; and the variations which appear among them resulted from the transplantation of the god from one country to another, and reflect simply the specific needs of his multifarious worshipers.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE EGYTPIAN KING SESOSTRIS UPON GREEK RELIGION & THE OSIRIS/DIONYSUS SYNTHESIS

History and tradition alike bear witness to the greatness of this king, who ruled Egypt from 1980 to 1933 B.C.E. We know also that this period saw a great resurgence in the cult of Osiris. If we may trust the account given to Herodotus by the Egyptian priests and confirmed by Diodorus, Sesostris had a career so closely parallel to that attributed to Osiris that we conclude much of his history to have been incorporated into the Osiris-Dionysus myth (Apollonius, Rhodius, IV, p. 263). He is said to have led an army over all portions of Asia; and, passing into Europe, to have made himself master of Thrace and Scythia, where he left not only monuments but also soldiers for permanent colonization, which explains the widespread worship of Osiris/Dionysus in these regions. According to this hypothesis, the mysteries of Osiris were established in Thrace about the twentieth century, perhaps five hundred years after the Astarte-Adonis cult was established at Byblus. Understand that Osirian religious beliefs were instilled in these areas due to a permanent military presence.

Dionysus was entrenched among the barbarians and especially in Thrace long before he appeared in Greece. Although the widely traveled Herodotus never mentions a single shrine or temple of this god in his own country, he found his cult officially established in many other lands. He mentions particularly the Smyrneans (Persian War, I, 150), the Scythians (Ibid., IV, 78-80), the Byzantines (Ibid., IV, 87), the Budini (Ibid., IV, 108), the Getae (Ibid., IV, 93-96), and the Thracians themselves (Ibid., V, 7) who had an oracle of the god with a priestess, similar to that of the Greeks at Delphi (Persian War, VII, 111).

OSIRIS BECOMES DIONYSUS...AN INTERNATIONAL SAVIOR GOD

When Osiris arrived in Thrace, due to the efforts of the Egyptian King Sesostris, he became Dionysus, the god from Nysa. Herodotus uses the names interchangeably and declares: "Osiris is named Dionysus by the Greeks" (Persian War, II, 144). And he continues: "According to the Greek tradition, he was no sooner born than he was sewn up in Zeus's thigh, and carried off to Nysa, above Egypt, Ethiopia" (Ibid., II, 146) where he was said to have been reared.

Many Greek cities claimed Dionysus, but almost all admitted that he was reared at Nysa. He was the only deity who could penetrate nation after nation, become truly an international savior-god, for he was the adored and beloved redeemer who promised resurrection and immortality. That Osiris had become universal by 125 A.D. is established by Plutarch, who declares that we should "identify Osiris with Dionysus . . . the god of all people in common . . . and this they who have participated in the holy rites well know" (Isis and Osiris, p. 28).

Ancient authorities had no doubt concerning the identity of Osiris and Dionysus. Even as the Latins and Romans adopted the entire Greek pantheon intact but gave its members new names, so the Greeks themselves as well as the barbarians at a much earlier time appropriated the gods of other nations, altered them to suit their own needs, and called them by new names. Diodorus, writing in the first century B. C., declares: "the rite of Osiris is the same as that of Dionysus and that of Isis very similar to that of Demeter, the names alone having been interchanged" (Persian War, I, 96). And again: "Osiris is the one whom the Greeks call Dionysus" (Ibid., IV, 1). Plutarch reiterates that Osiris and Dionysus are identical (Isis and Osiris, 34), and declares that the public ceremonies of Osiris in Egypt and those of Dionysus in Greece are one and the same (Ibid., 35).

So we find nothing new; the continual engrafting of original Egyptian religious beliefs of immortality through the Eucharistic sacrament infused into succeeding nations, and these nations continue the Eucharistic meal that brings one into oneness with the gods and possessed immortality. Along with this the nations maintained the belief in a divine-god-man who died and was resurrected

The only possible explanation for the universal Dionysus is that between 3000 and 500 B.C. Osiris was exported from Egypt by foreign visitors and carried along the trade routes by Egyptian armies and commerce into many lands, whose people readily embraced a god who conferred such benefits in this life and promised such unparalleled rewards hereafter. Diodorus reflects the confusion in which Dionysus was inextricably involved, and explains that the myths concerning him do not agree in every land; some say that there was only one, others that there were three, by that name; some believe that he never had a human birth at all; and others that he was simply the symbol of wine (Diodorus, III, 62).

No wonder that the classical historians found it impossible to convey a clear-cut history of Dionysus, or a single image of him: for, in addition to the multiple replicas which existed among the barbarians, we know that there were at least two major penetrations into Greece by his cult before 1200 B.C.E., and at least three far-reaching reforms of it between 1100 and 500 B.C.E. The Dionysus cult was first introduced from Egypt by a priest named Melampus, celebrated for divination, possibly as early as 1300 B.C.E., the second invasion came directly from Thrace, may have occurred about 1200 B.C.E. and is credited to Orpheus, although it probably antedated this prophet. Then followed several reforms of Dionysius worship or reconstitutions of the worship, to which Herodotus alludes when he says that "various sages have since" the time of Melampus "carried his teaching to greater perfection" (Persian War, II, 49). They are as follows:

- The first of these revisions was the Orphean, which must have taken place between the eleventh and the ninth century, when also Dionysus became an integral portion of the Eleusinia
- The second, was that of Onomacritus, which occurred in the sixth century
- The last was the Pythagorean, which occurred contemporaneously and this will have a great impact upon the Essenes in the future.

MELAMPUS INTRODUCES THE GREEK DIONYSUS CULT FROM EGYPT

Melampus was a pre-Trojan hierophant mentioned by Homer and well known among the legendary Greeks of the heroic age. The evidence indicates that he was the first who, as Diodorus declares, "brought from Egypt the rites which the Greeks celebrate in the name of Dionysus" (Diodorus, I, 97). And again: "Isis thought the privates of Osiris worthy of divine honors . . . the Greeks, too, inasmuch as they received from the Egyptians the . . . festivals... of Dionysus, honor this member both in the mysteries and the initiatory rites and sacrifices of the god" (Ibid., I, 22).

That the Melampian cult was definitely phallic and that the great majority of its devotees were women is elaborated by Herodotus (Persian War, II, 49), who calls Osiris "Dionysus" and states that in Egypt his "festival is celebrated almost exactly as Dionysiac festivals are in Greece . . . They use . . . images eighteen inches high, pulled by strings, which the women carry around the villages. These images have male members about the same size, also operated by strings" (Ibid., 48).

While the Dionysian cult as introduced by Melampus bears a strong congenital resemblance to its Thracian relative, we note also a certain divergence. While the Dionysus cult was distinguished by its phallic emphasis, the Thracian cult was characterized by wild orgies, sexual excesses, and feasts of raw flesh, especially that of infants. Both, however, obtained their following almost exclusively among women.

From beginning to end, the Egyptian Osiris and the Greek Dionysus are conjoined by a multitude of congenital ties.

Although the preponderance of evidence indicates that Dionysus was first worshipped in Thrace, there was much uncertainty on this point also; and Strabo points out that both Pindar and Euripides confuse the rites of Cybele, Mother of the Gods in Phrygia, with those of Dionysus (Geography, X, iii, 13). And this we can well understand; for the rituals of Attis, Adonis, Sabazius, and Dionysus all stemmed from those of Osiris. This is confirmed and emphasized by Pausanias.

THE DIONYSIAC SACRAMENT....EATING THE FLESH AND BODY OF A GOD...NOTHING NEW HERE

Thatthe Dionysiacs ate the raw flesh of a bovine, a human enemy, or an infant in order to become immortal Bacchoi or Dionysiacs is attested by incontrovertible evidence. Porphyrios reproduced the following from Euripides' Cretans, now lost: "Pure has my life been since that day when I became an initiate of Idaean Zeus and herdsman of night-wandering Zagreus; and having accomplished the raw feasts and held the torches aloft to the Mountain-Mother, yea torches of the Kuretes, I was raised to the holy estate and called a Bacchus." Plutarch wrote of "the mysteries . . . in which the eating of raw flesh, and the tearing in pieces of victims . . . are in use . . . and the human sacrifices offered of old" (On The Cessation of the Oracles, 14).

Clemens of Alexander declares that "the Bacchanals hold their orgies in honor of the frenzied Dionysus . . . by the eating of raw flesh" (Clement of Alexandria, Exhortation, II). He also states that, according to Dosidas, the Lesbians offered human sacrifices to Dionysus (Ibid., III). And Arnobius describes the feasts of the "wild Bacchanalians, which are named in the Greek omophagia . . . in which with seeming frenzy and the loss of your senses, you twine snakes about you; and to show yourselves full of the divinity and majesty of the god, tear in pieces the flesh with gory mouths" (Adversus Gentes, V, 19).

Let us examine omophagia to understand what we just read:

"Omophagia" means "Eating-into-the Belly." This was a Greek ritual of holy communion by eating the flesh of sacrificial victims, human or animal. This custom goes back to primitive tradition when worshippers would tear apart the victims with their hands and teeth as supposedly happened in the earliest cults of Dionysus, Opheus, Ziagreus, and other gods torn apart in their myths. "The communicants rushed madly upon the sacrificial animal, tore it to pieces and ate it raw, believing that the god was resident in the offering...It was believed thus there took place an identification with the god himself, together with a participation in his substance and qualities." His immorality was consumed too–both in the omophagia and its descendant, the Christian sacrament of communion–though the body is no longer meat but tiny pieces of bread.

Ovid relates the terrible experiences of the daughters of Minyas in Orchomenas' (Metamorphoses, IV, vii). When these dutiful imitators of the industrious Athena were determined to shun the mad revels of the Bacchanalians, Dionysus came into their midst, filled the air with wild beasts, drove the girls mad, and transformed them into bats. According to another version, they drew lots and devoured the infant child of one of their number, Leucippe. Herodotus confirms (History, IX, 34) the tale of Apollodorus concerning the daughters of Proetus to the effect that only by payment of a huge bribe to Melampus could the virgins and matrons of Arcadia be freed from their dementia, in which they "roamed over the whole Argive land . . . abandoned their houses, destroyed their children, and flocked to the desert" (History, II, ii). In another passage, Apollodorus states that Dionysus drove the women of Argos mad because they would not honor him "and they on the mountains devoured the flesh of the infants whom they carried at their breasts" (Ibid., III, v).

W. K. C. Guthrie reproduces the scene from a vase of the fourth century B.C.E., now in the British Museum, showing the sacramental rending and eating of a child (Orpheus and the Greek Religion, p. 131). This depicts the ancient Dionysiac ritual, which the Orphean reform repudiated. We see Dionysus himself at the left looking on in dismay while a Thracian at the right is running away in horror. The central figure, who represents a primitive cultist, is holding an infant; he has just ripped out its arm and is conveying the bloody morsel to his lips. It is at least interesting to note that this is the very ritual which the pagans later attributed to the Christians and of which the Catholics accused their own Montanist sectarians.

It is obvious that neither Herodotus nor Euripides understood the esoteric nature or the dynamic forces which lay at the root of the Dionysiac mystery. It is certain that such wild and passionate excesses must have grown from hopes and promises hitherto unknown and undreamed. It was a religion of the poor, of women, of the common herd; it gave them a sense of worth and significance and offered what seemed a priceless reward. At the very least, it was a romantic halt from the continuous drudgery of a meaningless existence.

Among the barbarians, both men and women seem to have joined the cult of Dionysus: but in Greece, it was peculiarly a religion of women. The reason for this we may surmise. Perhaps women were then, as some say they now are, more religious than men; but we believe rather that in the Dionysiac mystery women found the means to throw off the heavy domination of their husbands which had come with the end of primitive communism, the establishment of private property, monogamic marriage, and the concomitant requirement of chastity among wives, all of which was of such recent origin that the memory of their former freedom, economic independence, and social dominance was still vivid in their consciousness. There is no doubt that this mutiny even involved the murder of their own children, whom the husbands now desired as property-heirs. As additional acts of revenge, the frenzied women also indulged in omophagia and promiscuous sex-orgies under the direction of the Dionysiac priests.

Although these female Dionysiacs revolted against their husbands, they were without taint of celibacy: in fact, there has never been an authentic feminist celibate movement. Women have often mutinied against men, but have never rejected them; for it is the nature of women to desire children, and men are essential for their generation and support. The feminine Osirians and Dionysiacs worshiped the male generative organ in their processions; and at Memphis they displayed their genitals to the sacred bull Apis, or Osiris, so that they might absorb something of his virility (Diodorus, I, 85). The Maenads did not repudiate sex; they simply rebelled against monoandric marriage until such time as they could gain equality with their husbands, or at least a better position in the home. The Amazons constituted another phase of the same revolt.

The Thracian Dionysus reflected the Osirisan Mystery in its crude and ancient form, preceding the era of Ani and Nebseni. It was more like the Osirianism of the Pyramid Texts, in which we find Unas eating gods and ancestors and Horus drinking copiously of the blood of his slain enemies. At that time human beings as well as animals were sacrificed by rending, and the raw flesh was eaten and the warm blood lapped up by the frenzied celebrants, to whom this gruesome sacrament was a precise and identical replica of their own dismembered Osiris (again we see the Egyptian influence of Osiris). The somewhat more mature form of Osirianism imported by Melampus emphasized its phallic nature; but it, too, practiced human omophagia.

The older Dionysiac mysteries which preceded the reforms of Orpheus were, therefore, definitely cannibalistic; except by rending and eating the god Osiris in the form of a divine substitute (which could be a bovine, a human enemy, or an infant) there could be no victory over death and the grave. This Eucharist was necessary for Eternal Life. These rites, orgies, and sacraments had a single purpose: to make the celebrants immortal by transforming them into an essence identical to that of Dionysus. The initiates were therefore called Bacchoi or Dionysiacs, which was no mere symbolism: it was understood as a literal fact. In the same manner, many centuries later, the followers of Christ were called Christians: they also believed themselves mystical members of Jesus' body and they became so by a process identical to that by which the devotees of Dionysus became Bacchantes...eating the body and blood of Jesus (Osiris) in the form of a Eucharist. There is truly nothng new under the sun!

THE ESSENE INFLUENCE UPON CHRISTIANITY...THE CULMINATION OF RELIGIOUS SYNTHESIS

I have dealt extensively with the Essenes, both on this web-site as well as another. The information presented shows you that it would be these Pythagorean-Buddhists Essenes who, having adopted these above pagan concepts, as well as others in their almost total repudiation of Biblical Judaism in the wake of their continued rejection as priests by the outlaw Temple cult, would, following the crucifixion of Jesus, convert in mass to the Jesus Movement of Palestine and bring these religious beliefs with them. In Jesus they identified their re-incarnated Teacher of Righetousness, who like Jesus, had been crucified. Along with their conversion would they bring their religious beliefs; religious beliefs which in that day and age, had more in common with pagan sun-worship and Osirian-Dionysus cults. Of course it goes without saying that they brought their sacred meal and Eucharist with them which they had inherited from these pagan nations since their rejection of Biblical Judaism in toto in the days of Jesus. With this strong influence, and following the destruction of the Temple, these Hellenized Jews, holding Pythagorean and Zoroastrian religious beliefs as the culmination of their religious synthesis over the last two-hundred years as the consequence of their rejection as rightful priests by the renegard Hasmonean priests, would have a demonstrative effect on the theology which would be later moulded around Jesus. This Essenic influence is easily detectable in the New Testament as the following "one" example shows. Let us examine the replication of the Osirian-Dionysus sacrament as coming from the lips of Jesus as detailed not only in the Gospels, but Paul as well:

Matt 26:26-28 26 And as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body. 27 And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it; 28 For this is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins. (KJV)

Mark 14:22-24 22 And as they did eat, Jesus took bread, and blessed, and brake it, and gave to them, and said, Take, eat: this is my body. 23 And he took the cup, and when he had given thanks, he gave it to them: and they all drank of it. 24 And he said unto them, This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many. (KJV)

Luke 22:19-20 19 And he took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave unto them, saying, This is my body which is given for you: this do in remembrance of me. 20 Likewise also the cup after supper, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you. (KJV)

1 Cor 11:23-29 23 For I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you, That the Lord Jesus the same night in which he was betrayed took bread: 24 And when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me. 25 After the same manner also he took the cup, when he had supped, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me. 26 For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do shew the Lord's death till he come. 27 Wherefore whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord, unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. 28 But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup. 29 For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body. (KJV)

The ritual as recorded in the New Testament is the same. This is the same ritual as that adopted by the Essenes; the only difference is that the godman to whom it is sanctified is not Jesus and not Osiris or Dionysus. The immortality is conferred with the identification with the Jesus through a mystical union as detailed the writer of the esoteric Gospel of John:

John 14:20 20 At that day ye shall know that I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you . (KJV)

John 6:30-41 30 They said therefore unto him, What sign shewest thou then, that we may see, and believe thee? what dost thou work? 31 Our fathers did eat manna in the desert; as it is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat. 32 Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Moses gave you not that bread from heaven; but my Father giveth you the true bread from heaven. 33 For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. 34 Then said they unto him, Lord, evermore give us this bread. 35 And Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life: he that cometh to me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst. 36 But I said unto you, That ye also have seen me, and believe not. 37 All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. 38 For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me.

I must interrupt here to make sure you understand something. Jesus just said, or is made to say the the writer of the Gospel of John, that he is the Angel-Messiah of the Essenes. This is not the Davidic Messiah of the Old Testament, but a Messiah adopted by the Essenes which finds its roots in sun-worship of the Aryan nations.

39 And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day. 40 And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day. 41 The Jews then murmured at him, because he said, I am the bread which came down from heaven.

Answer for yourself: Why do you think the Jews were troubled; did they not want the Messiah to come?

Answer for yourself: What did these Jews know that you don't? Simply said, they were familiar with the cults of Osiris, Babylonian and Assyrian religions, even Greek religious ideas. They were well familiar with the cult of Dionysus and the religious synthesis that I am revealing to you. These were hard sayings because this was not a Divine or unique revelation from YHVH they were hearing from the one whom they hoped would be Messiah, but rather a reiteration of paganism and they knew better.

So we have a dilemma on our hands. Either words were put into the mouth of Jesus by the early Essene Church, which we know they did, or else Jesus' Messianic expectations lay more with the Essenes that with Moses and the Prophets. Knowing what I know about the corruption and "fixing" of the New Testament, which is revealed to you at http://faithofyeshua.faith.web.com I prefer to believe that these sayings were put into the mouth of Jesus to further the influence of the Essene Christians, also called Nazarenes or Ebionites who later became believers in Jesus. These oral traditions connected to Jesus had great influence among the masses and the Greeks were quick to adopt them later as they offered nothing new; in fact, they already believed such ideas about Dionysus. Jesus was just a new and lastest version of Dionysus for the Greeks. This explains how a Jewish faith could be so readily adopted by an anti-Semitic Gentile world and how a Jewish Rabbi could be accepted by non-Jews who had a distaste for Jews in general. Finally, understand this is the re-selling of Jesus as a pagan godman and today the same is done through a corrupt document called the New Testament and over a billion people, who know little at all about the origin of the New Testament, accept such religious ideas uncritically and ask few if any questions when presented such material. The fear factor cannot be overlooked. It is a sad thing to worship God you whole life as a Christian and find out late in life you have been wrong and an idolater most of your life! I ought to know, for I was an ordained Pastor no less who studied hard, never expecting to disprove my faith, but when presented with such overwhelming evidence, could no longer deny its validity.

Either Christianity is a unique and Divine revelation or it is not. Once you get the facts, you can know, but until then you invest your emotions into fables which the Gentile Church today calls facts.

YET DIONYSUS WAS ONLY A PARTIAL OSIRIS

Plutarch, who repeats so often that Osiris and Dionysus are one and the same, tells of one Eudoxus, who objected that if these gods were identical, why did not Dionysus "cause the Nile to rise, or rule over the dead?" (Isis and Osiris, p. 64). The answer is simple enough: all who embraced the worship of Osiris under one of his pseudonyms took of him what they required, and otherwise altered him to conform with their own needs. Since they had no Nile to rise, naturally he did not bring any flood in the mountains of Thrace or Phrygia, or upon the rain-blessed fields of Greece. We must also note that nowhere is Dionysus identified with the seed which is buried and which is resurrected in the grain. This, we believe, is the case because at the time he first came among the Thracians, cereal-agriculture was not sufficiently important to be identified as the bread that came down from heaven. However, since they possessed grapes in abundance, he became the god of wine, which now replaced the barley-ale as his blood. And since this eschatology was new to the Hellenes, we need not be surprised that they did not at once import with Dionysus all the Osirian doctrines concerning the after-life. It was enough for these primitive Thracians and Greeks to know that, like their god, they could be resurrected into immortality by becoming one with him through the mystical sacrament.

Such was the god who pushed and elbowed his way into Greece during the second millennium. He was crude, gruesome, and in many respects repulsive; and before he could be widely accepted in a more refined age, it was necessary that he undergo a basic reformation. And this is precisely what happened in Orphism.

We address this in our next article.

DIONYSUS AND ORPHEUS

In 186 BC the cult of Dionysus was introduced into Rome. The republican senate took severe measures to suppress it but it survived and became a major religious institution. In Imperial Rome it consisted both of a serious religion and a conglomerate of supporters' clubs, a variety of eating and drinking societies held under the auspices of the god.

Dionysus seems to mean Son of God from Dio - god, and Nyos - son or child. Dionysus was a god of the lower regions including the earth and the regions below. Thus he was in charge of the fate of men and of their souls and was considered an important god to stay on good terms with.

The Mysteries of Dionysus rivaled those of Demeter at Eleusis but were more active. Dionysus was the son of Zeus and Persephone and was called "Zagreus" as their heir. But the Titans tore him to pieces and completely devoured him except for his heart which Athena saved. Zeus punished the Titans by firing a thunderbolt to turn them to ashes. From the ashes he made mankind. A mortal woman, Semele, took a love potion made from the heart and mated with Zeus. But she forced Zeus to reveal himself and shriveled up, as mortals who see the face of a god do. Her baby however was saved and, sewn into Zeus's thigh, was protected until he was reborn - another interpretation of the name Dionysus is "twice born". The god Dionysus then saved his mother from Hades and elevated her to Olympus.

The rest of his career he spent wandering the world giving mankind arts, crafts and agriculture, particularly cultivation of the vine and wine making. His disciple, Acoetes, was, like Peter, a boatman and in one adventure, like Peter, he was freed from jail when the doors miraculously flew open. Dionysus is the intelligence of the world. Because he is part of everyone he provides us with perception, understanding and creativity - he was the god of poets.

Dionysian initiation is to awaken the higher mind, to comprehend its participation in the whole. Nightly celebrations were held in which the votaries ate animal flesh symbolic of the Titans' eating the body of Dionysus. Since the flesh represented the god the worshippers absorbed part of the god giving them communion with him. Having temporarily received his powers they abandoned themselves to frenzied dancing becoming ecstatic. Because Dionysus was the god of the vine, worshippers practised ritual intoxication and, because he was the god of fertility and the regenerative power of sex, they practised ritual intercourse. The cult survived well into the Christian era despite persecution by the Christians. His life and death cycle however was unusual in being celebrated in alternate years, one for his death then the next for his resurrection as "the Light of the East".

Dionysus was the product of a God's union with a mortal woman - he was a Son of God - and was represented as a bearded young man of distinguished appearance. He taught men laws, gave them happiness and peace as well as the vine, and taught them how to be civilized. He suffered a violent death, descended into Hell, was resurrected and ascended into Heaven. Communion with the god was by a meal.

There was also a story that he had ridden on two asses which he then placed in the heavens as constellations. In the Babylonian calendar the zodiacal sign cancer was the foal and the ass and marked the zenith of the sun's power before it began to decline to winter. Jesus, of course, triumphantly entered Jerusalem on "an ass and a colt, the foal of an ass" curiously matching the Dionysian legend rather than Old Testament prophecy which meant only one animal. A Gnostic jewel shows a foal and an ass together with a crab and is inscribed: "Our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God".

In mythology a god becomes identified with the animal sacred to him. There is an image from the wall of the Domus Gelotiana on the Palatine showing Jesus on the cross but with the head of an ass. The ass is associated with the vine - Justin Martyr speaks of the ass tied to the vine- and Jesus is also associated with the vine. He says, "I am the true vine." To the people of the time he might as well have said "I am Dionysus". Furthermore, the Eucharist cup in the early Christian text, the Didache, is described as "the holy vine of David" so the wine was Jesus and Jesus the wine.

ORPHEUS

The cult of Orpheus remodelled the Dionysian cult. Orpheus was probably a real person, an early reformer of the Dionysian religion just as Jesus is supposed to have transformed Judaism, Zoroaster the Persian religion and Buddha Hinduism. Orpheus became the name of Thracian Priest-Kings who were thought of as the god Dionysus incarnate and originally might have been ritually slain.

In myth Orpheus married Eurydice who was bitten by a snake and died. Orpheus was heartbroken and determined to find her, eventually descending to Hell (notice the descent again but in a different form...all tied to the winter solstice) to recover her. He charmed the nether gods with his music and got them to promise that Eurydice could return with him on condition that he did not look back as she followed him on the journey back to life. But, fearing that she was not behind him, he looked back and Euridice fell back to the underworld. Orpheus was totally distraught and rejected the ministrations of the Thracian women who tried to console him. Enraged they tore him to pieces.

Orphism was an ascetic, more intellectual form of Dionysianism. From the myth of Dionysus the Orphics believed their god died and rose again. They also believed in a form of original sin. Zeus had killed, with a thunderbolt, the Titans who had eaten Zagreus, and mankind sprang from their ashes. Mankind is therefore partially good, from Zagreus, and partially bad, from the Titans. Orpheus worshippers had to rid themselves of the bad and this they did through living lives of ritual and moral purity through a series of incarnations. If they succeeded through all the levels they became free of the "circle of birth" or "cycles of becoming" gaining immortality through divinity. The rules of purity included absence from any kinds of animal foods, avoiding the pollution of death and birth, wearing white raiment and other ascetic practices (many of the same practices of the later Essenes)..

Orphic mysteries re-enacted the death of Zagreus, and its ritual involved the sacrifice of the calf or kid of Dionysus. Small portions were eaten raw (omophagia) as a sacramental meal. When the initiates had fulfilled the "solemn rite of the banquet of raw flesh" they became permanent vegetarians, dressed in pure white garments and avoided the taint of childbirth and funerals. The votary adopted the name Bacchus (the Roman name of the god) to symbolize that he had become at one with his Lord. When Orphics died they were buried with small gold tablets inscribed with instructions for their conduct in the underworld.

Orpheus is a missionary for civilization: a musician, polymath, mystic, astrologer, he travelled the world doing good works. Orphics actually made use of missionaries which was unusual among Western religions. Hitherto there had been no concerted attempts by them to recruit believers but thenceforth missionary zeal began to spread, culminating in the dominance of Christianity. Some scholars consider Saul of Tarsus to have been an initiate of Orpheus, and Orphism and Christianity seem to have coalesced in some places.

Orpheus and Jesus both performed miracles, descended to Hell, suffered cruel deaths and were raised to Heaven by divine fathers. But they offered their adepts different routes to salvation: Orpheus appealed to those who sought salvation through self-effort and knowledge; Jesus appealed to those who favored divine love. Otherwise they were much the same type of religion. Orphism greatly influenced the philosophy of Pythagoras so that Pythagorean philosophy is essentially that of the Orphic religion. The Orphics and Pythagoreans had an ethical approach at least equal to that of Christianity and in Orpheus's ability to charm the beasts extended spirituality to them too, an aspect not seen in Christianity until St Francis of Assisi, more than a thousand years after Christ.

At Delphi Dionysus was received into the priesthood of Apollo, and he also has the title "Dendriticus" meaning "He of the Tree". Sabazius is another name for Dionysus and some old writings suggest that the Jews at one time worshipped him. Orpheus was clearly connected with Jesus in the minds of the early Christians from his frequent depiction in the Roman Catacombs. Orphic figures represented King David or Jesus himself.

ATTIS AND CYBELE

THE MYTH OF ATTIS AND CYBELE...EXPORTED FROM THRACE

It is important that we don't forget what we have just learned in the previous articles as we will continually build upon these ideas.

Barbara Walker says in The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets that "The cult of Attis strongly influenced early Christianity."

The worship of Attis in association with that of the Great Mother of All Things, Cybele, came from Phrygia in Asia Minor. Attis accompanied Cybele, the Great Mother of the Gods, who was brought to Rome from Phrygia in 204 B.C.E. Phrygia is an area that is often called "Thrace," a region of SE Europe comprising NE Greece, S Bulgaria, and European Turkey, bordered by the Black Sea in the northeast, and the Sea of Marmara and the Aegean Sea in the south. Attis and Cybele were established in a temple on the Vatican hill, where they remained for six centuries. Attis was a son of the Goddess' earthly incarnation, the virgin Nana, who miraculously conceived him by eating an almond or a pomegranate, yonic symbols both. Thus Attis was a typical "god without a father," the Virgin's son. He grew up to become a sacrificial victim and Savior, slain to bring salvation to mankind. His body was eaten by his worshippers in the form of bread [the Eucharist of Attis]. He was resurrected as "The Most High God, who holds the universe together." Like his priests he was castrated, then crucified on a pine tree, where his blood poured down to redeem the earth. (Walker, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, p. 77).

Cybele was worshipped for over 500 years. She was the Mater Deum Magna—Great Mother of the Gods, and of men, animals and plants. She was a mother of nature and a Mountain Mother—her shrines were often on mountains and in caves. She was identified with several other mother goddesses including Demeter and Gaia. She was, in her loving and comforting aspect, the equivalent of Isis, Hera, Juno and the Christians' Mary. But she also had a destructive aspect in which she signified the unknown, the unconscious and mysterious, the magical and intuitive qualities women in particular are considered to have. She is then Astarte, Luna, Hecate, Kali. Cybele was represented by a black meteorite set in the face of a silver statue.

Worship of Cybele arose in the prehistoric Phrygian Empire. The main centre of the cult came to be Pessinus in Galatia. In 204 BC the Sibylline Oracle prophesied that enemies of Rome would be defeated if the Great Mother were taken from Pessinus to Rome. The cult and her symbol, the small black meteorite, were duly moved to Rome and established in 191 BC on the Palatine Hill in the heart of the city. Later the cult incorporated that of Attis who probably never had any following independent of her. The High Priest or Archigallus of Cybele was identified with Attis.

Her priests, the Galli, were eunuchs with hair perfumed and dressed with oils. Priests, priestesses, acolytes and initiates celebrated her rites with fast music and wild dancing until in a frenzy the participants exhausted and finally mutilated themselves by castration becoming candidates for the priesthood. Even the phlegmatic Romans were shocked at first by these rites and at first Roman citizens were banned from participating in them. The ban was not lifted until the beginning of the Empire but then Attis and Cybele worship became one of the three main religions along with those of Isis and Mithras. It made its last appearance under the pagan revival of Eugenius in AD 394.

THE ATTIS MYTH

There are associated with the Attis myth horrific rites as will quickly come to learn. Attis was a handsome Phrygian shepherd, the "Good Shepherd", the son of Cybele. Cybele loved her son intensely but Attis fell in love with a nymph and jealousy overcame the mother. In a rage she cast a spell of madness on Attis and he castrated himself at the foot of a pine tree. As his life blood dripped to the earth violets sprang up. Thus it was that death and sadness entered the world. Cybele, full of remorse took the body to a cave and wept. She first buried Attis at Pessinus but then used her power to restore him to life and they were reunited, thus bringing nature back to life and hope and salvation into the world. She founded the cult making Attis the priest and the pine tree sacred (remember the significance of trees from the other gods?).

There are some variations on the Attis myth. One tradition says he was either killed by Cybele, his mother, out of jealousy or by a boar sent by Zeus, possibly an identification of Attis with the Syrian god known as Lord (Adonis). In another tradition Attis castrated himself as stated above. Attis' passion was celebrated on the 25th of March, exactly nine months before the solstitial festival of his birth, the 25th of December. The time of his death was also the time of his conception, or re-conception. To mark the event when Attis entered his mother to beget his reincaration, his tree-phallus was carried into her sacred cavern. Thus the virgin mother Nana was actually the Goddess herself: she who was called Inanna by the Sumerians, Mari-Anna by the Canannites, Anna Perennea by the Sabines, and Nanna, mother of the dying god Balder, in northern Europe (Ibid., p. 77).

The day of Attis' death was Black Friday, or the Day of Blood. His image was carried to the temple and bound to the tree, escorted by "reed-bearers" with the reed scepters representing re-generated phalli and new fertility. During the ceremonies, initiated castrastred themselves in imitation of the castrated god, and presented their severed genitals to the Goddess along with those of the gelded bull sacrificed at the Taurobolium. All these male remnants were deposited in the sacred cave of the Great Mother.

The god died and was buried. He descended into the underworld (Hell). On the third day he rose again from the dead. His worshippers were told: "The god is saved; and for you also will come salvation from your trials." This day was the Carnival or Hilaria, also known as the Day of Joy. People danced in the streets and went about in disguise, indulging in horseplay and casual love affairs. Thus was the Sunday; the god arose in glory as the solar deity of a new season. Christians ever afterward kept Easter Sunday with carnival processions derived from the mysteries of Attis. Like Christ, Attis arose when "the sun makes the day for the first time longer than the night."

So as you can see that is was at the spring festival the death of the god was mourned until he was resurrected by the Great Mother when grief turned to joy. Inscriptions of the 4th century gave Attis the title of Menotyrannus, from the Greek "tyrannos," or "lord," plus Men or Mennu, Osiris as the resurrected ithyphallic moon-bull, "the Lord Who Impregnates His Mother."

Pagans sometimes celebrated the Hilaria or Carnival at the end of their Holy Week (Mardi Gras), bringing it to April 1 and the carnival of the April Fool, or Carnival King, or Prince of Love, all originally synonymous with Attis. He was also identified with Green George of the Old Roman Pahilia, honored on Easter Monday with sacrificial hanging of the god's effigy on a sacred tree.

Some Christians claimed Jesus' crucifixion took place on April 1, so the Fool of April Fool's Day procession became Christ carrying his cross and enduring the mockery of the mob. But the spring Holy Week was not really Christian. Its origin was a universal Indo-European tradition of extreme antiquity, probably traceable to the Holi festivals of India which celebrated the rebirth of spring with joyous orgies (Walker, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, p. 78-79).

Just as Jesus acknowledged YHVH as his senior, Cybele, the mother, is the senior of Attis. Like YHVH, whose anger at mankind's disobedience could only be assuaged through the death of his son, Cybele's jealous anger could only be assuaged through the death of her son. Cybele's most solemn ritual was the Taurobolium, a sacrifice of a bull, like Mithras's. The blood flowed through the slats of the sacrificial platform. The initiate standing below thereby became "born again". People who could not afford a bull made do with a sheep and so were "washed in the blood of the lamb".

In Rome the festival of Cybele and Attis was at the vernal equinox in the spring. During the reign of Claudius shortly after the crucifixion this was from 15 to 27 March. Though the cult had been brought to Rome on the prophecies of the Sibylline oracles, even Romans were shocked by the festival and were forbidden to join in until the time of Claudius according to a late Byzantine source. Previously the ceremonies had been held privately in the temple of Cybele on the Palatine Hill and only Phrygians participated.

Claudius admitted the ceremonies to the official religious calendar of Rome, some say, to counter the growing influence of Isis worship. The chief priests or archigalli of the religion from then on had Roman rather than foreign names. The calendar was:

15 March - The "reed bearers" enter and a six year old bull is sacrificed.

22 March - A pine is felled representing the death of the god. The acolytes and initiates proceed to the Temple of Cybele with the sacred pine bearing the effigy of the god in its branches (the god is on the tree). The tree is laid to rest at the Temple of Cybele.

24 March - The "day of blood". The sacred pine tree and an effigy of Attis is buried in a tomb and a day of mourning, fasting, sexual abstinence, self-flagellation and self-mutilation commemorating the Mother's grief follows (as a form of self-emasculation as we will see in a second). The High Priest playing the part of Attis draws blood from his arm and offers it as a substitute for a human sacrifice. That night the tomb is found brightly illuminated but empty, the god having risen on the third day. Initiates undertake the Mysteries and are baptized in bull's blood at the Taurobolium to wash away their sins whereupon they are "born again". They then become ecstatic and frenzied and recruits to the priesthood, castrate themselves in imitation of the god.

25 March - Hilaria: the resurrection of Attis and the onset of spring is celebrated with a sacramental meal and a day of joy and feasting. Those who castrated themselves become Galli—cocks—dress in women's clothes and wear perfumed oils.

26 March - A quiet day of rest and recovery;

27 March - The conclusion of the festival with a procession in which the statue of the goddess, meteorite embedded in her brow, is majestically carried to her temple and a series of religious dramas and entertainments follows.

Clay statues of the gods were made in ancient times just as tawdry statues of saints are sold today at Catholic shrines. Attis was depicted in his death throes drenched in blood, then serene after his resurrection, androgynous, released from his worldly sins and surrounded by solar rays. Or he was shown as a child, naked and dancing for joy. Cybele was depicted much like the virgin Mary with a baby or babies. An ancient figure of a Madonna and child in a church at Enna in Sicily were actually Cybele in her role of corn goddess (Demeter) and her daughter Persephone. The church was on a site formerly dedicated to the goddess. Pope Pius IX had the statues moved to a museum. The Black Madonnas of Italy are also on sites dedicated to Demeter, and the virgin of Chartres Cathedral was taken from a pagan alter.

Attis, the "Good Shepherd", was extremely popular in the Empire around the time of Christ. His death and resurrection were celebrated at the time of year we would call Easter. The "reed bearers" of Attis compare directly with the palm bearers of the entry into Jerusalem and the procession of the tree compares directly with the procession along the Via Dolorosa today when believing Christians enact the carrying of the cross, symbolically a tree. The effigy of the god Attis on the tree meant that ritually the god was hanged from a tree, like Jesus. The High Priest draws blood to symbolize the shedding of blood by the god for the good of men, just as Jesus is believed to have shed his blood for the salvation of believers. The brightly illuminated empty tomb directly parallels the Christian legend, the god having risen on the third day. The resurrection was celebrated with a sacramental meal and initiates baptized with blood to wash away their sins were "born again".

The site of a sanctuary to Attis on the Vatican Hill is where now stands the Church of St Peter! In countries where Attis was revered 25 March was adopted as the date of Jesus's passion and crucifixion rather than the moveable feast that was later adopted as Easter. Hilaria, 25 March is precisely nine months before the official birthday of Jesus on 25 December. It is therefore the day on which Jesus was considered to have been miraculously conceived of God. The Church celebrates the day on which Jesus was considered to have been miraculously conceived of God as "Lady Day." One of the titles of Cybele was Domina - the Lady! It is difficult for any rational man to regard all of this as coincidence.

So you now understand that Attis was, as it were, a grandchild of Osiris, because Attis was nothing more than a reconstituted Dionysus, joined also, like Adonis, to the Great Mother. What happened is clear: after the Thracians had absorbed the Egyptian mystery of Osiris, they carried it with them, as Strabo declares, first, into the island of Samothrace, and next into Phrygia, as they colonized both (Geography, X, iii, 15-16). In Asian Phrygia, Dionysus, like Osiris at Byblus, encountered the age-old Semitic Mother; and from their conjuncture issued a new and strange amalgam.

We would guess that this cult preceded the Eleusinian, and probably dates back to 1800-1600 B.C.E.

SAMOTHRACIAN VERSION OF THE ATTIS MYTH

Originally, Cybele she was a mountain-dwelling earth-goddess (some of her epithets are "Mountain Mother," "Goddess of the Mountain," and "Lady of Mt. Ida"). A very early deity, in later times her attributes of fertility and unrestrained sexuality predominated. Her later consort is her offspring, the dying god Attis, whom she drives mad, and who castrates himself and dies. Cybele, passionately in love with Attis, revives him in the springtime. In classical times, Cybele's worship spread throughout the northern Mediterranean, and continued in the Roman Empire, when she became known as "Mother of the Gods," "The All-Nurturing One," and "All-Mother". In classical times, her priests were males, who probably castrated themselves. According to the myth current among the Samothracians, "the sacred rites of the Great Mother of the gods . . . together with cymbals and kettledrums and the instruments of her ritual" (Diodorus, V, 49) had first been established there. It seems that Cybele became the mother of Corybas, to whom she bore a daughter, also named Cybele. We note here the similarity to the Cinyras-Aphrodite myth. Corybas gave the name Corybants to all who, in celebrating the sacred rites of his mother, acted like men possessed. Moving to the Asian mainland with their attendant Dardanus, they established the Cybele-Corybas ritual in Phrygia. It would thus appear that Corybas (or Attis) was at once the father, the lover, and the son of Cybele.

THE PHRYGIAN VERSION OF THE ATTIS MYTH

The Phrygians themselves, however, had a variant version (Ibid., III, 58-59). King Meison of Phrygia had married Dindymeme—which often appears as one of the names of the goddess—and she bore a daughter, Cybele, whom he, thinking her illegitimate, exposed to die. She, however, suckled by wild beasts and adopted by herdsmen, grew into great beauty and was the first to devise the pipe of many reeds, the cymbal, and the kettledrum. Upon attaining womanhood, she fell in love with Attis, later called Pappa. She conceived a child by him shortly before her parents discovered that she was the royal princess and brought her back to the palace. When the king learned of her seduction, he executed not only her nurses but Attis also, whose body was cast forth unburied. Cybele, like Isis and Astarte, was disconsolate with grief; and she "became frenzied and rushed out of the palace into the countryside. And crying aloud and beating on a kettledrum she visited every country alone, with hair hanging free.... But a pestilence fell upon human beings throughout Phrygia and the land ceased to bear fruit, and when the unfortunate people inquired of the god how they might rid themselves of their ills, he commanded them, it is said, to bury the body of Attis and to honor Cybele as a goddess" (Ibid.).

ARNOBIUS' VERSION OF THE ATTIS MYTH

Arnobius relates a third version: The Great Mother, sleeping upon a mountain in Phrygia, was assailed by Jupiter but she repelled him; and so he spent his lust upon a stone, which brought forth Acdestis, a fierce and bloody creature. Dionysus made him drunk, and emasculated him; from the drops of his blood sprang a pomegranate tree; Nana, daughter of King Sangarius, placed some of the fruit in her bosom, and she conceived and bore a child, which her father exposed on the mountainside as illegitimate. When the Mother of the Gods beheld his beauty, she loved him exceedingly, as did the wickedly lustful Acdestis, who gave him gifts and forced an unnatural relationship upon him. King Midas of Pessinus, wishing to withdraw the prince from so disgraceful an intimacy, offered him his daughter in marriage. But the Mother Goddess, determined to free Attis forever both from shame and matrimony, filled him "with furious passion," so that he mutilated himself under a pine tree, saying, "'Take these, Acdestis, for which you have stirred up so great and terribly perilous commotions.'" As his life ebbed away with his flowing blood, the Mother of the Gods gathered the parts and spread earth upon them. A violet sprang from the blood. Weeping, the Goddess carried the sacred pine tree to her cave, where "she beats and mutilates her breasts" (Adversus Gentes, V, 5-7; 13-17).

ATTIS: SALVATION THROUGH EMASCULATION

Such are the fragments which survive concerning the tragic fate of Attis. Notice again the repetition to what we have already seen previously:

- Again we have the beloved and mutilated youth as in the Adonis and Osiris myths
- Again we have the goddess lamenting his loss and searching for his dismembered body
- Again we have the image set up as its substitute
- Again, we have the failure of the crops, as in the myths of Ishtar, Artemis, and Demeter

BUT NOTICE THE DIFFERENCE

Up to now we have seen salvation attained by various means:

OMOPHAGIA:

Omophagia means "Eating-into-the Belly." It was a Greek ritual of holy communion by eating the flesh of sacrificial victims, human or animal. This custom goes back to primitive tradition when worshippers would tear apart the victims with their hands and teeth as supposedly happened in the earliest cults of Dionysus, Orpheus, Ziagreus, and other gods torn apart in their myths. "The communicants rushed madly upon the sacrificial animal, tore it to pieces and ate it raw, believing that the god was resident in the offering...It was believed thus there took place an identification with the god himself, together with a participation in his substance and qualities." His immorality was consumed too–both in the omophagia and its descendant, the Christian sacrament of communion–though the body is no longer meat but tiny pieces of bread.

COPULATION

Through copulation, as in the Aphrodite-cult, one partook of the divine essence of the god by becoming one with the god through sexual union with the god representative; either male or female.

But here we encounter something different. Instead of omophagia or copulation for salvation, we have a frenzy of emasculation: in short we find escape from sin and guilt and a highway to blessed immortality through celibacy and castration, the eradication of the sexual urge. And so, by a strange twist of irony, we have two bizarre conjunctures of the Osirian concept with the Mother Goddess of Asia: in the first, the mystery called for sacred sexual communion; in the second, the ritual consisted primarily in the castration of the male initiate and in the mutilation of the woman's breasts.

EXPANSION OF THE CULT

Although the Attis-cult never developed as extensively in Greece as did those of Dionysus, Demeter, and Isis, we learn from Strabo (Geography, X, iii, 18), Pausanias (Description of Greece, II, iv; VIII, xxxvii), and Pindar (Dithyramb for the Thebans) that "the mighty Mother of the Gods" and her desexed lover were by no means unknown in Hellas. But it was among other less sensitive Mediterranean people that the Attis cult made its greatest conquests: in Africa, Gaul, Spain, and Italy. Wondrous powers were attributed to the Phrygian goddess. And so it was that, in the year 204 B.C.E., while Rome was facing crop failures and imminent destruction at the hands of Hannibal, some one suggested that Cybele could make the imperial city the mistress of the world. Livy states that the Delphian Oracle had once declared that should Italy ever be invaded by a foreign foe, he could be driven out "if the Idaean Mother should be brought from Pessinus to Rome" (History, XXIX, 10, 11, 14). Ambassadors were therefore dispatched to Phrygia, who in due time returned with a small black stone. Whatever may have been its efficacy, it is certain that during the ensuing season the crops were excellent and the hosts of Carthage were defeated. Arnobius expresses a commendable skepticism concerning the powers of the diminutive stone and the emasculated priests of Cybele; many, however, were convinced of their puissance; for the cult was soon firmly established, and the mystery-dramas, noisy processions, and bloody rites of Cybele became familiar sights in the streets of Rome; and her temple rose on the very site where the basilica of St. Peter stands today.

THE PUBLIC ORGIES....AS TOLD BY APULEIUS

Apuleius wrote that the devotees of Cybele "went . . . forth, shouting and dancing . . . they bent down their necks and spun round so that their hair flew out in a circle; they hit their own flesh; finally, every one took his two-edged weapon and wounded himself in divers places. Meanwhile, there was one . . . who invented . . . a great lie, noisily . . . accusing himself, saying that he had displeased the divine majesty of the goddess . . . wherefore he prayed that vengeance might be done to himself. And therewithal he tools a whip . . . and scourged his own body . . . so that you might see the ground wet and defiled with the womanish blood that issued forth abundantly" (The Golden Ass, VIII).

The celebrants thereupon brought in a youth whom they had abducted and upon whom they inflicted some form of sodomy. It is clear that the Phrygian mystery reflects its Osirian origin; but it is also obvious that here appeared for the first time that overwhelming sense of guilt which was considered inseparable from the sexual lust residing in our members and which must be conquered by beating, whipping, slashing, torture, and self-mutilation, but which, nevertheless, must needs seek relief through some vile and abnormal practice. Since the frenzied devotees of Attis identified their congenital corruption with erotic desire, they must needs renounce not merely all sexual consummation but sexuality itself before they could be united with their god. The climacteric of the mystery-ritual, therefore, consisted in the same emasculation and castration once performed by Attis and Cybele.

THE PUBLIC ORGIES...AS TOLD BY ARNOBIUS

Arnobius was one of those scholarly converts who rejected paganism more than they accepted Christianity. He flourished about 300 B.C.E., some five hundred years after the cult of Cybele had been introduced into Rome. There is no doubt that he had been outraged by witnessing the gruesome atrocities performed in the public dramas representing the passion of Attis. We gain a vivid impression of what these were like from his description of the emasculated priests, "the Galli, with disheveled hair, beating their breasts." They must, he surmised, "be involved in the infamy of some shameful deed. For who would believe that there is any honor in that which the worthless Galli perform, effeminate debauchers complete?" (Adversus Gentes, V, 16-17).

THE ESOTERIC RITUAL...ACCORDING TO HIPPOLYTUS

There is a long discussion in Hippolytus (Refutation of All Heresies, V, i-v), who wrote about 210 A. D., concerning the Naasenes, one of several Christian heresies deriving certain tenets from the Phrygian mystery. According to them, when Jesus declares that "there be eunuchs, which have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake," he was simply repeating an injunction which had been taught throughout Asia Minor by the cult of Attis for more than a thousand years. Hippolytus elaborates by adding that, according to the Naasenes, "the ineffable mystery of the Samothracians, which it is allowable" only for "the initiated to know" was precisely the same as that proclaimed by Christ when He declared, "If ye do not drink my blood, and eat my flesh, ye will not enter the kingdom of heaven." This flesh-and-blood sacrament, states Hippolytus, is according to the Naasenes, called Corybas by Phrygians as well as by those "Thracians who dwell around Haemus." Hippolytus continues that Attis prohibited all sexual intercourse and quotes his Naasene source as follows: "Hail, Attis, gloomy mutilation of Rhea. Assyrians style thee thrice longed-for Adonis, and the whole of Egypt calls thee Osiris, . . .; Samothracians, venerable Adam; Haemonians, Corybas; and the Phrygians name thee at one time Pappa, at another time God . . . or the Green Ear of Corn that has been reaped" (Ibid., V, iv).

SO WHAT HAVE WE LEARNED? LET US SUMMARIZE IN CONCLUSION

All this establishes further the congenital relationship among the savior-cults; the identification of Attis with the seed that dies and is resurrected; and, most significant of all, that in Attis the soter (savior) appears at last as a eunuch who requires celibacy from his devotees. The fact is that although Osiris and Dionysus were gods of virility, the opposite characteristic was always immanent in them also. For the priests of Osiris had been mandatory celibates since time immemorial; and the images of Dionysus had for centuries resembled an hermaphrodite, a "womanly man," an effeminate god. In Attis, the repudiation of sex took its most drastic form. This is important as we will later see that the Essenes who once advocated marriage will evolve into an ascetic and celibate cult in the days of Jesus as they will adopt mandatory celibacy as well and this continues today in the Roman Catholic Church among its priests as well. Let me remind you the first commandment in the Torah is to have sexual union and produce children. The Essenes disregarded such a Commandment as does the Catholic Church today.

THE PASSION OF ATTIS...THE CRUCIFIXION OF THE GOD AND HIS RESURRECTION

We saw that the annual festival of Cybele, which lasted four days, began on the rend of March, when the trunk of a pine tree (here we find Osiris' tree again) was carried ceremonially into the temple. Wreathed with violets and swathed with woolen cloth, the tree stood in the midst of its worshipers; and to this the effigy of Attis was then affixed or impaled (crucifixion). The god was crucified on a tree (as had Osiris died on a tree as well). On the second day, there were processions of overwrought mourners, bearing images upon their breasts, following the statue of the goddess through the streets; driven to the highest pitch of frenzy by the wild and discordant music of fifes, cymbals, tambourines and kettledrums, they screamed and whirled and leaped about like demented dervishes, and slashed themselves with knives and swords. On the next day, March 24, the bloody passion-drama reached its climax. As Sir J. G. Frazer notes, this was "the Day of Blood," on which the novices sacrificed their virility. Wrought to the highest pitch of religious excitement, they dashed the severed portions of themselves against the image of the cruel goddess" (The Golden Bough, IV: II, i). Thus, while their god hung upon the pine tree, his initiates performed the same sacred mutilation upon themselves which he had undergone, so that they might share in his resurrection.

At the close of March 24, the priests reverently removed the sacred effigy from the tree, and laid it in the tomb, The older as well as the newly desexed initiates watched and fasted all through the long night, until the dawn of March 25. The tomb was then opened; and a great shout of joy went up from the assembled worshipers: for the tomb was empty, the god was not there. He had been resurrected from the grave into eternal life.

With the resurrection, the people gave themselves over to an unrestricted Saturnalia of joy, gaiety, and license. The festival ended with a procession bearing the sacred black stone to the river Almo, where it was washed and purified; after which it was returned amidst singing and rejoicing to its sacred place within the temple.

SIMILARITY TO EASTER...COINCIDENCE?

The similarity between these rites and the pascha or Easter celebration in the Catholic Church is striking indeed. Like the devotees of Attis, the Christians mourned and watched all through the dreadful hours when their god hung upon the tree; but on resurrection morning, they too were filled with joy at the empty tomb. Ambrose in his sermon on "The Mystery of the Pascha" calls the day the real beginning of the year, in which nature revives after the long death of winter (Plutarch, Isis and Osiris, p. 69). The issue of whether the stark similarity with Easter is a coincidence or a "copy" you will have to determine for yourself, but at least you now have the facts.

THE SACRAMENTAL EUCHARIST & THE TAUROBOLIUM ...BEING WASHED IN THE BLOOD OF HE BULL/LAMB BEING BORN AGAIN

The evidence supports the suspicion of Arnobius (Adversus Gentes, V, 17) that other and even more revolting ceremonies were performed: for there were secret rituals which only the emasculated initiates could witness. These consisted of a sacramental meal in which the novices ate out of a drum and drank from a cymbal [the form of their Eucharist] (Clement of Alexander, Exhortation, II).

And there was the great initiatory sacrament known as the taurobolium, or baptismal blood bath, in which the newly-inducted member, wreathed with the violets of Attis, descended into a pit, covered with a grating, on which stood the sacred bull. This was ceremonially slain, so that his blood streamed copiously over the inductees below who, by this ritual, were literally washed in the blood of the bull, and thus born anew into everlasting life. Again, we see the generic relationship to Osirian symbolism. It is ironic to note that on the very spot where the Pope now presides, the initiates of another Pappa were saved by a more realistic sacrament than that which now prevails. Later one the bull was replaced by lambs and the initiates could later say they were "washed in the blood of the lamb."

Sound familiar?

THE HIGH PRIESTS ORIGINALLY CRUCIFIED

There is no doubt that in the original ritual, an Archigallus, or desexed high priest, was annually impaled upon the pine tree; and that, during the era preceding recorded history, a thousand emasculated saviors had been crucified in Phrygia for the original sin of many and had died upon the tree so that others might have eternal life. This idea had become so deeply rooted in pagan consciousness that it was almost an obsession: the god-man must die and rise from the grave so that his devotees might also be resurrected into life immortal. However, as advancing civilization softened the manners of all races, this ceremony became an innocuous scene in a passion-play. And finally the living priest was simulated by a lifeless figure which was first impaled and then laid in his sacred tomb. The curse of Deuteronomy 21:23 against all who are hanged on a tree must have been directed at the crucified priests of Attis.

INFLUENCE OF ATTIS UPON CHRISTIANITY

Attis became one of the most potent savior-gods of the ancient world, and left his heavy imprint upon Christianity. The Gospel injunction commanding auto-emasculation, which was so widely practiced in the early Catholic Church, was derived primarily from the cult of Attis, since it is found nowhere else. Equally significant was its influence in the Easter celebration. We know that for centuries the date of the Christian crucifixion had caused the bitterest dispute; and, next to the Trinitarian controversy, this was the most serious issue which faced the First Ecumenical Council at Nicaea in 325. The Eastern Church had celebrated the resurrection on the 16th Nisan, in April, which was also the Jewish Passover, and which is certainly the time indicated in the Gospel narrative. In the West, however, this date had never been popular and we know from Irenaeus (Fragments, III) that the question was already a burning issue before the end of the second century. Lactantius tells us categorically that Jesus was crucified on March 23 (The Manner in Which the Persecutors Died, II), which would place his resurrection on the 25th; and these are precisely the dates on which the death and resurrection of Attis had been celebrated for nearly two thousand years. To say that the final selection of these dates by the Catholic Church after several centuries of vacillation and bitter controversy was a mere coincidence places too heavy a burden upon credulity; the Christian Easter and the Passion of Christ simply incorporated into a new cult a date and a ritual which had been celebrated by the communicants of the Attis-Cybele mystery beyond the dimmest reaches of history.

Christians claimed the same dates for the conception and birth of their savior. The usual quarrels ensued. The Christians resorted to their favorite argument, that the devil has established pagan Mysteries in imitation of Christianity before there was a Christianity. Tertullian said: "The devil by the mysteries of his idols, imitates even the main parts of the divine mysteries." Followers of Attis eventually lost their sacrificial day to the Christians. Justinian ruled that March 25th would be known as the day of the Annunciation, or Lady Day. Naturally, the day of the Annuncation was the day of Jesus' conception, so that he, like Attis, could be born nine months later at the winter solstice, as were all gods assimilated to the sun and called "Light of the World" (Ibid., p. 78).

John 8:12 12 Then spake Jesus again unto them, saying, I am the light of the world: he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life. (KJV)

Answer for yourself: Do you want the truth concerning the historical Jesus before you die? Well, keep studying and you will find out how the real faith of Jesus has been robbed from you....and you have been given paganism and the Gentile Church calls this "Divine Revelation." You have to be the judge of that, but you need to know the facts. I have given them to you.

DEMETER & PERSEPHONE...THE GREEK ISIS

We have dealt extensively with the mystery-cults which took form in Syria, Thrace, and Phrygia. Now we turn to the Eleusinian ritual of the Greeks. In this Eleusinian ritual, the gory, lustful, and violent elements which distinguish the primitive Dionysus are wholly absent; and the reasons for this are apparent:

- The Eleusinian ritual appropriated a more benign aspect of the Egyptian religion than did the others
- The Eleusinian ritual developed among the Greeks after they had made enormous strides into civilization.

It is probable that the Isis-worship, centered at Coptas in Egypt, had become more or less independent by 1600 B.C.E.; and it is certain that Demeter was Isis with a new name and in another habitat. The upper-class Athenians of 1500-1000 B.C.E. found the fierce and bloody Osiris repellent and revolting; but they took to their hearts his beneficent sister, altered her in a few details, gave her a daughter (Persephone), instead of a son or a brother-husband, to rescue from death and oblivion, and made of them their soter/savior-substitutes.

DEMETER...THE IMPORTED GRAIN

Let us begin with some background information.

Greek meter is "mother." De is the delta, or triangle, a female -genital sign known as "the letter of the vulva" in the Greek sacred alphabet, as in India it was the Yoni Yantra, or yantra of the vulva. Corresponding letters —Sanskrit "dwr," Celtic "duir," Hebrew "daleth" — meant the Door of birth, death, or the sexual paradise. Thus, Demeter was what Asia called "the Doorway of the Mysterious Femi-nine . . . the root from which Heaven and Earth sprang." In Mycenae, one of Demeter's earliest cult centers, "tholos" tombs with their triangular doorways, short vaginal passages and round domes, repre-sented the womb of the Goddess from which rebirth might come. Doorways generally were sacred to women. In Sumeria they were painted red, representing the female "blood of life." In Egypt, door-ways were smeared with real blood for religious ceremonies, a custom copied by the Jews for their Passover rites.

The triangle-door-yoni symbolized Demeter's trinity. Like all the oldest forms of the basic Asiatic Goddess she appeared as Virgin, Mother, and Crone, or Creator, Preserver, Destroyer, like Kali-Cunti who was the same yoni-mother. Demeter's Virgin form was Kore, the Maiden, sometimes called her "daughter," as in the classical myth of the abduction of Kore, which divided the two aspects of the Goddess into two separate individuals. Demeter's Mother form had many names and titles, such as Despoena, "the Mistress"; Daeira, "the Goddess"; the Barley-Mother; the Wise One of Earth and Sea; or Pluto, "Abundance." This last name was transferred to the male underworld god said to have taken the Maiden into the earth-womb during the dark season when fields lay fallow. But this was a late, artificial myth. The original Pluto was female, and her "riches" were poured out on the world from her breasts.

The Crone phase of Demeter, Persephone-the-Destroyer, was identified with the Virgin in late myth, so the Maiden abducted into the underworld was sometimes Kore, sometimes Persephone. Some of the Destroyer's other, earlier names were Melaina, the Black One; Demeter Chthonia, the Subterranean One; or The Avenger (Erinys). Her black-robed, mare-headed idol, her mane entwined with Gorgon snakes, appeared in one of her oldest cave-shrines, Mavrospelya, the Black Cave, in Phigalia (southwest Arcadia). She carried a dolphin and a dove, symbols of womb and yoni. Like the devouring death--goddess everywhere, she was once a cannibal. She ate the flesh of Pelops, then restored him to life in her cauldron. She was as fearsome as every other version of the Crone. The legendary medieval Night--Mare—an equine Fury who tormented sinners in their sleep—was based on ancient images of Mare-headed Demeter.

Her cult was already well established at Mycenae in the 13th century B.C.E. and continued throughout Greece well into the Chris-tian era, a length of time almost equal to the lifespan of Christianity itself. Her temple at Eleusis, one of the greatest shrines in Greece, became the center of an elaborate mystery-religion. Sophocles wrote, "Thrice happy they of men who looked upon these rites ere they go to Hades's house; for they alone there have true life." Aristides said, "The benefit of the festival is not merely the cheerfulness of the moment and the freedom and respite from all previous troubles, but also the possession of happier hopes concerning the end, hopes that our life hereafter will be the better, and that we shall not lie in darkness and filth —the fate that is believed to await the uninitiated." Isocrates said: "Demeter . . . being graciously minded towards our forefathers because of their services to her, services of which none but the initiated may hear, gave us the greatest of all gifts, first, those fruits of the earth which saved us from living the life of beasts, and secondly, that rite which makes happier the hopes of those that participate therein concerning both the end of life and their whole existence."

Eleusis meant "advent." Its principal rites brought about the advent of the Divine Child or Savior, variously named Brimus, Dionysus, Triptolemus, Iasion, or Eleuthereos, the Liberator. Like the corn, he was born of Demeter-the-earth and laid in a manger or winnowing basket. His flesh was eaten by communicants in the form of bread (again the Eucharist), made from the first or last sheaves. His blood was drunk in the form of wine. Like Jesus, he entered the Earth and rose again. Communicants were supposed to partake of his immortality, and after death they were known as Demetreioi, blessed ones belonging to Demeter.

Revelations were imparted to the initiate through secret "things heard, things tasted, and things seen." This formula immediately calls to mind the three admonitory monkeys covering ears, mouth, and eyes, supposed to illustrate the maxim, "Hear no evil, speak no evil, see no evil." Was the "evil" a secret descended from Eleusinian religion? Demeter was worshipped as "the Goddess" by Greek peasants all the way through the Middle Ages, even up to the 19th century at Eleusis where she was entitled "Mistress of Earth and Sea."

Early Christians were much opposed to the Eleusinian rites because of their overt sexuality, even though their goal was "regeneration and forgiveness of sins." Asterius said, "Is not Eleusis the scene of descent into the darkness, and of the solemn acts of intercourse between the hierophant and the priestess, alone together? Are not the torches extinguished, and does not the large, the numberless assembly of common people believe that their salvation lies in that which is being done by the two in the darkness?" Fanatic monks destroyed the temple of these sexual mysteries in 396 A.D., but the site remained holy to the Goddess's votaries, and the ceremonies were carried on there and elsewhere.

Rustics never ceased believing that Demeter's spirit was manifest in the final sheaf of the harvest, often called the Demeter, the Corn Mother, the Old Woman, etc. At harvest festivals it was often dressed it woman's clothing and laid in a manger to make the cattle thrived Secret anti-Christian doctrines of medieval Freemasonry also drew some symbolism from the cults of the ancient Mistress of Earth and Sea, particularly the masonic sacred image of Plenty: "an ear of corn neat a fall of water." The ultimate Mystery was revealed at Eleusis in "an ear of corn reaped in silence"—a sacred fetish that the Jews called shibboleth (Walker, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, pp. 218-220).

The Greeks were well aware that Demeter was not indigenous (Diodorus Siculus, V, 69). The Homeric Hymn to Demeter reveals her foreign origin: for, upon arriving at Eleusis, she declares: "hither have I come in my wandering, nor know I what land this is."

Plutarch tells us that Persephone was called the autumnal air which causes the dissolution of the crops (Isis and Osiris, 66), that the grains cut by the reapers are "the limbs of Demeter"; and that "among the Greeks also many things are done which are similar to the Egyptian ceremonies in the shrines of Isis, and . . . at about the same time" (Ibid., 69). Diodorus Siculus declares that "Demeter was the discoverer of corn," who "also taught mankind how to prepare it for food"; and that she was known as Thesmophorus, because she taught men laws, which accustomed them "to the practice of justice" (Strabo, Geography, IX, i, 12).

ISIS-DEMETER AT ELEUSIS

We do not know just when the worship of Demeter was established at Eleusis; but we do know that she was venerated there during the Mycenaean period, probably as early as 1400 B.C.E. We know that the cult survived the edicts of Theodosius and continued without interruption until 396 A.D., when the Christian monks accompanying the Arian Alaric destroyed the shrine. Thus there was a continuous celebration of the Eleusinia for nearly two thousand years.

On a promontory at Eleusis facing the Gulf of Aegina some ten or twelve miles from Athens stood the courtyard and the magnificent temple of Demeter, which was built by the same Ictinus who also constructed the Parthenon at Athens. The road between the two cities was known as the Sacred Way (Pausanias, Description of Greece, I, xxxvi), because it was trodden by thousands of pilgrims and initiates every autumn when they journeyed to Eleusis to celebrate the Greater Mysteries.

DEMETER....THE UPPER -CLASS SAVIOR/SOTER

The cult never aroused such hysterical ecstasy among its devotees as did Dionysus, the savior of the illiterate; Demeter was the refined soter-substitute of the cultured classes. It was therefore inevitable that she should pass away and that Dionysus should survive; because, as Frazer remarks, "while the higher forms of religious faith pass away like clouds, the lower stand firm and indestructible like rocks" (Golden Bough, IV: I, iv, 8).

That the Eleusinian mystery was held in the highest veneration by the ancients is amply witnessed. Hesiod tells us: "But do thou . . . work . . . that . . . worshipful Demeter of the fair crown love thee and fill thy barn with livelihood" (Works and Days). Diodorus relates that Hercules was initiated into the Eleusinian mystery at the time when Musaeus, son of Orpheus, was said to have been in charge of the temple (History, IV, 25); and it was believed that potency so acquired enabled the hero to drag the three-headed Cerberus into the light of day. Pausanias declares: "the Eleusinian mysteries and the Olympian Games seem to exhibit more than anything else the divine purpose'' (Description of Greece, V:I, x). A legend told by the same author (Ibid., VIII, xlii) concerning the people of Phigalia in Arcadia illustrates the power attributed to Demeter. Her statue there had been destroyed and her festivals neglected. A great dearth came over the land and the people were in danger of reverting to cannibalism and a diet of acorns. But when her statue was replaced and her mysteries reinstated, all was well again.

PROMISED IMMORTALITY

The mysteries of Demeter promised blissful immortality. The Hymn to Demeter declares: "Happy is he among mortals who has beheld these things and he that is uninitiate, and hath no lot in them, hath never equal lot in death beneath the murky gloom." Pindar, writing in the fifth century, declared that the happy survival of the soul is possible only for those who have "by good fortune, culled the fruit of the rite that releaseth from toil'' (The Dirges), that is, the Eleusinian, concerning which he continues: "Blessed is he who hath seen these things before he goeth beneath the hollow earth; for he understandeth the end of mortal life, and the beginning of a new life given of god'' (Fragments, p. 137). Isocrates, 436-338 B.C.E., declared that Demeter enabled mankind to rise above the status of beasts by conferring "the fruits of the earth;" and that she instituted "the holy rite which inspires in those who partake of it sweeter hopes regarding both the end of life and all eternity'' (Panegyrics, p. 27).

AGAIN THE EGYPTIAN INFLUENCE UPON THE GREEKS

The Isis-Demeter cult reached Crete from Egypt late in the Minoan period and from there spread to Sicily and Athens. It is true that various locales claimed to be the scene of the Rape of Persephone and proudly exhibited the cave from which Hades emerged and back through which he bore the terrified maiden. Pausanias describes the spot (Description of Greece, I, xxxviii) where the Athenians said he abducted her; but Diodorus relates the myth as told by the Sicilians, which was the generally accepted version.!

THE ISIS-DEMETER MYTH

The myth, according to The Hymn to Diameter and other sources, is briefly as follows:

Persephone, the daughter of Zeus and Demeter, was picking flowers with Athena, Artemis, and other virgin goddesses: according to the very ancient Hymn, this was in the Nysian plain but, according to the Sicilians, it was in the Vale of Enna, near Syracuse. Thus we see that primitive tradition placed both Dionysus and Demeter at Nysa, a province near the Ethiopian border of Egypt, and therefore congenitally related to Isis and Osiris. At all events, Zeus had promised his brother Hades that Kore, or Persephone, should be his bride; and so he suddenly emerged in his chariot drawn by his fiery steeds, snatched the beautiful maiden, and bore her away, wailing from the depths of the sea.

From this incident grew a tale of mother-grief which embodies and surpasses the lament of Isis for Osiris, of Astarte for Adonis, of Cybele for Attis, of Orpheus for Eurydice, of Dionysus for Semele: all of these, of course, being variants of the same theme, symbolizing the grief and fear which crushed the heart of primitive humanity when the sun declined and winter killed the vegetation.

When her beloved daughter was nowhere to be found, Demeter, seeking her, sped like a bird over land and sea "for nine days . . . with torches burning in her hands," which according to the Sicilian version, had been kindled from the fires of Etna. From land to land she went inquiring of all. Arriving at Eleusis in the form of an old woman seeking humble servitude, she was met by the handmaidens of Metaneira, wife of Celeus, and became the nurse of her son. While the fragrant deity was transforming the infant Demophoon into immortality by the application of fire, Metaneira surprised her in the act; the goddess thereupon angrily let the child fall, denounced the stupid intrusion, revealed herself as the goddess of the law, the seasons, and the grain, and stood before the trembling woman in all the terrors of her divine majesty. The fact that in all those details the Demeter-story coincides with that of Isis in Syria as told by Plutarch proves that the Greek myth derives from the Egyptian. Demeter then commanded the people of Eleusis to build for her a "great temple and an altar thereby" on the jutting rock below the town; "the rites I myself will prescribe, that in time to come ye may pay them duly and appease my power."

The temple was forthwith built; but she sat apart "wasting away with desire for her deep-bosomed daughter." And, since she would not permit the grain to grow, famine ensued; and "now would the whole race of mortal men have perished utterly . . . if Zeus had not conceived a counsel within his heart."

That Demeter was not of the Olympian convocation is established by the myth that Zeus sent several gods one after another to her with precious gifts and with the offer of untold honors if she would permit the corn to grow again and accept her position among the gods. But she, brooding and sorrowing in her grief and wrath, sat still in stony silence. Now desperate, Zeus sent Hermes to the underworld to persuade Hades to release his bride so that mankind might not perish; and to this Aidoneus apparently gave willing consent. But as Persephone left, he gave her a pomegranate seed, which she, not suspecting his treachery, took and ate. Hermes placed Persephone in his flashing chariot and conveyed her to her mother's temple at Eleusis, where she revealed the fact that she had eaten the fatal seed; at this, the heart of Demeter was riven, for she knew that her daughter would therefore be compelled forever to spend four or six months annually in the underworld.

By this stratagem, Hades obtained a part-time bride, and Demeter finally agreed to a compromise in which she permitted the grain to grow again in return for her daughter's companionship during the summer months; and she took her place reluctantly among the Olympians. For it seems that Zeus could take Persephone away from her mother, but could neither compel the latter to obey his will nor cause the plants to grow. And thus, while the Demeter-mystery was incorporated into the official religion of Greece, and particularly at Athens, it remained always separate and distinct.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE CULT

The Sicilians celebrated two festivals to the Great Goddesses:

- The first was in honor of Demeter, when the seed was laid in the ground
- The second to Kore, when the grain was harvested.

This was the reverse of the Athenian order, in which the Thesmophoria, or the festival of Demeter, was celebrated at harvest-time. In both, however, the goddesses symbolize the grain in its successive phases as buried seed, waving stalks, and harvested cereal.

NOTICE THE INFLUENCE OF EGYPT AND BABYLON

It is obvious that the Demeter-concept combines the salient features of Isis with the Astarte-Tammuz myth. The Egyptian Earth Mother who forbids the practice of cannibalism, who prevents the relapse of mankind into savagery, who is and gives the grain, who imparts the knowledge by which it can be made into civilized food, who teaches mankind to live in communities under just law, and who heals with magical drugs and confers immortality, here coalesces with the Great Mother of Semitic lands mourning for her lost lover-son, who symbolizes the vegetation withered by autumnal frost. Demeter herself, however, remains always the beneficent Isis and never becomes the lascivious Ishtar seeking to instill life by the mystery of sexual communion. Demeter remains the pure and tender mother; she is chaste and noble, determined and inflexible, but always loving and protective.

NOTICE THE INFLUENCE OF THE ORPHEAN DIONYSUS

Sometime around 1000 B.C.E. the Orphean Dionysus penetrated the Demeter-Persephone mystery; and in the sixth century, this new element was completely reconstructed and retained thereafter the central soteriological feature of the cult. This, however, belongs rather to Orphismthan to the Eleusinia.

THE DEMETER-PERSEPHONE RITUAL

By the time of Pausanias, 120 A.D., all Greece was filled with the statues, altars, and temples of Demeter; her festivals were celebrated everywhere; yet Eleusis remained always the center of her cult. Since it had been accepted since prehistoric times, there was no conflict between Demeter and Olympus; initiation into her ritual was, as it were, an extension of the prevailing religion. However, it was a complete and independent worship, and, once initiated into it, the votary required no other faith for time or eternity. Countless men and women, craving something more than the Olympians could offer, turned to Eleusis in their search for moral elevation as well as assurance of a better life beyond the grave. Come, said the hierophants of Demeter, as did those of Osiris in Egypt, all those clean of hand and pure in heart, and receive the better life in this world and the hope of eternal happiness hereafter.

Regarding salvation, the immortality expected through the Eleusinia was similar to the Homeric Elysium, which was formerly reserved for the greatest heroes or demigods or was conferred as a special boon of the gods; for example, we read that at death both Helen and Menelaus were rewarded with this supernal gift. But this was something totally beyond the reach of ordinary mortals: not even Achilles or Agamemnon was so rewarded, nor could anyone achieve such blessedness by any striving of his own. The Eleusinia, however, by initiation into the Greater Mysteries conferred upon many Athenians this ultimate Homeric hope. But this initiation and receival of salvation involved no special discipline or cataclysmic regeneration, and no organization of the initiates into separate communions or churches. There was no hint of Buddhist ethics, Brahmanic hell-torture, Zoroastrian eschatology, or an Osirian Judgment. It was only necessary to witness the holy spectacles, partake of certain rites and sacraments, and undergo a mystic initiation, possessing a magical efficacy; the mystagogue could then return to his usual pursuits, live his life as before, and yet hope for blessed immortality, in contradistinction to the hopeless and bloodless shadow-existence which was the common lot of the Homeric dead. There was no creed to embrace, no theology to master, no special discipline to accept. Perhaps it was this ease of salvation which made the masses skeptical of its efficacy; and Diogenes the Cynic was reported to have jeered that, according to the Eleusinians, the initiated liar and hypocrite would go into Elysium before the hero Epaminondas. We can only say that the Eleusinian Mystery constituted Greek soteriology at an early stage of its development.

THE LESSER MYSTERIES OF DEMETER-PERSEPHONE

We know that the Demeter-Persephone Mysteries were divided into the Lesser and the Greater (Schaff-Herzog, "Tribal Mysteries", II, 5-7) and that the former were open even to strangers and were performed at Athens in honor of Persephone about the middle of March to coincide with the vernal equinox; but to the Greater, which were performed at Eleusis, only Athenians were eligible and only after becoming initiated into the Lesser Mysteries.

Hippolytus discusses (Refutation, V, iii) the manner in which the Naasenes had absorbed various elements from the Eleusinian mystery. And from this we learn that the Lesser Mysteries, those of Kore or Persephone, were of an ethical nature, the sole purpose of which was to make the initiate just, noble, happy, and successful in the present

THE GREATER MYSTERIES OF DEMETER-PERSEPHONE

The Greater Mysteries, however, had a higher objective. Hippolytus says that the hierophant conducting the rite is not a eunuch like the priest of Cybele, but nevertheless a strict celibate "despising all carnal generation." This indicates that with the advent of the Orphic Neo-Dionysus at Eleusis, the cult had absorbed definite celibate characteristics previously unknown. And he says that at the height of the ceremony, the initiates are shown "an ear of corn in silence reaped," which was the mystic eucharist.

This indicates that those who had achieved the good life in this world through the Lesser Mysteries might look heavenward to the ritual of Demeter. Still summarizing the doctrines of the Naasenes, Hippolytus declares that after initiation into the "inferior mysteries," the neophytes were "admitted into the great and heavenly ones . . . where no unclean person shall enter, nor one that is natural or carnal; but it is reserved for the spiritual only. And those who come hither . . . become all of them bridegrooms, emasculated through the virginal spirit."

Through the Greater Mysteries, the initiates were to live forever in heaven with the good deity, by becoming the bridegroom of the savior-goddess. This was the second spiritual birth, which probably involved a vow of perpetual chastity and a mystery-ritual in which the mystae were wedded to the beneficent Isis-Demeter. The Christian Church was centuries later to call itself the Bride of Christ; and to this day the nuns in the Catholic communion wear wedding rings and consider themselves the virginal brides of Jesus.

THE ESOTERIC RITUAL

Fortunately, in the Villa of the Mysteries at Pompeii was found a series of seven frescoes describing the Orphic liturgy of initiation; and these establish the substantial accuracy of Hippolytus. The steps of the ritual were:

- First scene, we see the female initiate taking the veil and preparing to become a mystic bride
- Second, a priest reads the ritual
- Third, a priestess celebrates the lustral meal or sacrament at the altar table
- Fourth, the communion is celebrated, in which the kid, one of the symbols of Dionysus receives milk, the eucharist of Isis, from a virgin satyr
- Fifth, we have the annunciation, in which the death of the initiate to this world is proclaimed
- Sixth, she views the phallus, the symbol of the mystical marriage, and, in the presence of Dionysus and Kore, she suffers flagellation in order to repress or destroy her lower and Titanic elements
- Seventh, the initiate, now reborn into the second and immortal life, is shown as a dancing Bacchante filled with Dionysiac ecstasy. It is obvious that in this ceremony, we have a synthesis of various ancient cultic elements.

When we realize that this was the rite celebrated by untold thousands of Greeks and Romans over a millennium beginning with the sixth century B.C.E., we see how closely Christianity resembled the mysteries out of which it grew. In these Pompeian frescoes, the bride is a woman being married to Dionysus (similar to the bride of Christ) and we know that the mystery celebrated is the Orphic-Eleusinian because of the prominence of Kore and because of the flagellation which had its inception in the Zagreus-Titan myth. There were certainly similar wedding ceremonies in which male initiates became the mystical bridegrooms of Kore or Demeter. By the first century, their ritual had become thoroughly intertwined with the Orphic-Dionysiac.

That the secret and mysterious baskets, containing the Eleusinian sacrament, were well known to the ancient world, we learn from various sources. In The Golden Ass of Apuleius, Psyche invokes "the secrets of thy baskets" in her prayer to Demeter. Because early Christian writers converted from paganism sought to discredit the pagan mysteries, we sometimes learn more from them than from the reticent classical authors. "These mysteries are, in short," declares Clement of Alexandria contemptuously, "murders and funerals" (Exhortation, II), little realizing that the Passion of Christ was also a murder and a funeral. "Do you wish," demands Arnobius, "that we should reveal the mysteries and those ceremonies which are named by the Greeks Thesmophoria?" (Adversus Gentes, V, 24). He states pursuantly that the "cyceon" is a "wine thickened with spelt" (Ibid., 25), or barley. Thus we know that the sacred drink of the Eleusinians was a combination of the Osirian and the Dionysiac eucharist: which indicates that at Eleusis certain elements of the two cults had met and coalesced. Again we are met with a synthesis of religiious ideas; nothing new. Arnobius reproduces the sacred formula by which the mystae became full initiates: "I have fasted, and drunk the draught; I have taken out of the mystic cist, and put into the wicker basket; I have received again, and transferred to the little chest" (Ibid., 26). Clement of Alexandria, who lived about a century before Arnobius, describes the same ceremony with almost the same words (Exhortation, II).

Quite possibly Clement had himself been an Eleusinian. There is no doubt that he was describing the ritual depicted in the Pompeian frescoes by which the initiate believed himself transformed into the nature of divinity.

THE GREATER MYSTERIES....IN DETAIL

We know that every autumn the Greater Mysteries were celebrated at Athens and Eleusis; and, as nearly as we can now determine, the following agenda was observed:

- 13TH On the thirteenth of Boedromium (September), the priestesses proceeded from Athens to Eleusis
- 14TH On the fourteenth, they conveyed the sacra, or the holy symbols, from the great temple back to Athens
- 15TH ON the fifteenth, the mystae, who had previously been, or were for the first time about to be, initiated into the Greater Mysteries, gathered at Athens, while the herald warned that no one defiled or impure, no murderer, traitor, or non-Greek, must approach

- 16TH On the sixteenth, the mystae purified themselves by sacerdotal lustrations, or baptisms, in the sea
- 17TH On the seventeenth the great soteriological sacrifice took place, in which a holy bull or heifer was ceremonially slain (similar to the Taurobolium of Attis).
- 18th On the eighteenth there were further but individual purifications, which concluded the preparations for the esoteric rituals at Eleusis.
- 19TH Early on the morning of the nineteenth, with the statue of Iacchus (Bacchus or Dionysus) at the front, the great procession set forth along the Sacred Way. The mystagogues, carrying torches and crowned with myrtle wreaths, made many stops at shrines and altars which commemorated the various incidents in the passion of Demeter. When the journey was completed, the Great Eleusinia began: these were the secret rituals from which all but the initiates of the inner circle were strictly barred. The first night was devoted to the presentation of the sacred drama, in which the events of the Demeter-Persephone Passion were re-enacted. The final ceremony consisted in the celebration of the Great Sacrament: initiates not only repeated the acts once performed by the goddess herself, but they united themselves with her and with Dionysus in chaste and mystical wedlock.

After this rite, the mystae, filled with joyous exhilaration, purified by a moral catharsis, born again into eternal blessedness, and transfigured into divinity by these holy ceremonies, returned to Athens along the Sacra Fia.

The extent to which the cult of Demeter had become an integral element of Athenian life is witnessed by the fact that as soon as the annual Mysteries were concluded, the senate always met in extraordinary session to determine whether any one had been guilty of profanation in connection with the celebration. We learn from Thucydides and from Plutarch that Alcibiades (Parallel Lives) was tried in absentia and condemned to death for such impiety; and we know that Aeschylus was convicted of revealing the secrets of the mystery and acquitted only when it was established that he was not an initiate in the cult.

The influence of the Eleusinia upon Catholic Christianity was great indeed; and to this we shall call further attention in the proper place.

ORPHEUS AND THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE DIONYSIAC MYTH

The available material concerning Orpheus bulks perhaps as large as that dealing with Dionysus himself; and again we are confronted with a difficult and composite personality. He and his even more elusive "son" Musaeus are the only names to whom the Greeks attributed sacred, authoritarian literature; to them were accredited the lost poems setting forth the history and ritual not only of Dionysus but of Demeter -Persephone as well. Successive layers of Orphic literature were ascribed to the legendary prophet, each expressing the theology of its own age.

Classical literature knows Orpheus as a Thracian; yet Pausanias relates that in a huge mural by Polygnotus "Orpheus' dress is Greek, no part of his attire being Thracian" (Description of Greece, X, xxx). This indicates that although the cult of Dionysus was Thracian, its Orphean reform was certainly Greek

We shall examine and attempt to reconstruct the Orpheus development of the Dionysiac myth, subsequent to it's original Thracian-Hellenic form, through two stages of the Eleusinia. Its final phase as an integral portion of Pythagoreanism which I will address later.

THE ORIGINAL ORPHEAN MYTH

Orpheus was a legendary poet and musician, son of the Muse Calliope by Apollo or by Oeagrus, a king of Thrace. He was given the lyre by Apollo and became such an excellent musician that he had no rival among mortals. He is said to have played the lyre so beautifully that he charmed everything animate and inanimate. His music enchanted the trees and rocks and tamed wild beasts, and even the rivers turned in their course to follow him. He married the lovely nymph Eurydice. Soon after the wedding the bride was stung by a viper and died. Orpheus determined to go to the underworld and try to bring her back (again the repeat of the descent to Hades as we have seen so many times before), something no mortal had ever done. Hades, the ruler of the underworld, was so moved by his playing that he gave Eurydice back to Orpheus on the one condition that he not look back until they reached the upperworld, but Orpheus could not control his eagerness and as he gained the light of day he looked back a moment too soon, and Eurydice vanished. Grief-stricken, Orpheus forsook human company and wandered in the wilds, playing for the rocks and trees and rivers. Finally a fierce band of Thracian women, who were followers of the god Dionysus, came upon the gentle musician and killed him (again torn to pieces as Osiris had been as well as others). When they threw his severed head in the river Hebrus, it continued to call for Eurydice, and was finally carried to the shore of Lesbos, where the Muses buried it. After Orpheus's death his lyre became the constellation Lyra.

The tragic tale of Orpheus was celebrated in song and story by many classical authors. The religious meaning of the legend, however, seems to have escaped them: and it is with this that we are concerned.

We have already seen that, according to Diodorus, Dionysus was said to have given Charops the rule over the Thracians and instructed him in secret rites; that Oeagrus, son of Charops, inherited both the kingdom and the mysteries; and that, finally, Orpheus, son of Oeagrus, learned these from his father, but made so many changes in them that they were thereafter called Orphic. Diodorus continues: "He journeyed to Egypt, where he further increased his knowledge and so became the greatest among the Greeks both for his knowledge of the gods and of their rites" (History, IV, 35). Pausanias declared that "Orpheus . . . attained to great influence as being thought to have invented the mysteries of the gods, and purification from unholy deeds, and cures for diseases and means of turning away the wrath of the gods. And they say the Thracian women laid plots against his life, because he persuaded their husbands to accompany him on his wanderings;" and "when they had primed themselves with wine, they carried out the atrocious deed.... But some say that Orpheus died from being struck by lightning by the god because he taught men in the mysteries things they had not before heard of" (Description of Greece, IX, xxx).

THE HISTORICAL ORPHEUS

With Orpheus we leave the realm of pure myth and deal at last with a kernel of historical fact. We are told in the Argonautica (by Apollonius Rhodius) that Orpheus accompanied Jason in his quest for the Golden Fleece; and, as we have noted, Polygnotus placed him at the siege of Troy. Accordingly, Orpheus flourished about 1150 B.C.E. However, the oldest poems attributed to him and to Musaeus were probably composed in the tenth or the ninth century, and may have been written in a Mycenaean script which has not survived.

Diodorus, Pausanias, and other writers of the first century could not distinguish between the original elements of the Orphean myth and theology and those which were engrafted upon them in subsequent ages. They speak, therefore, as if the sixth-century Hymns of Orpheus, which were used in the Eleusinia and which are extant, belonged to the original Thracian prophet.

We conclude that Orpheus went to Thrace and there attempted to reform the cult of Dionysus. It is clear that the infuriated Bacchantes wreaked vengeance upon the innovator Orpheus, either because he took their husbands from them or because he attempted to introduce doctrines considered subversive or impious. It is further obvious that Orpheus wished to transform the mystery from an orgiastic ritual practicing omophagia (devouring of flesh), especially of infants, into a more civilized religion, which would reject the Maenadic worship and seek instead its devotees among celibate men. We can easily see why the Thracian priests and their Maenads (priestesses) would rend and tear-apart and this innovator: not only advocating celibacy following the death of this beloved, but he wished to deprive the Thracian priests of their power and the Maenad priestesses of their beloved instrument of rebellion.

CHARACTERISTICS OF ORIGINAL ORPHISM

CELIBACY

The Orpheans, embracing celibacy, rejected the rebellious women who wished to possess husbands while continuing as Bacchantes. To account for this bizarre repudiation of masculine duty, the touching myth of Eurydice was devised, which also incorporated elements of the age-old story of Ishtar and Tammuz in reverse, and which reflects the development of monogamy and private property (let us not forget the Essenes later would adopt both of these philosophies). According to the tale, Orpheus loved his beautiful wife surpassingly; when she died, therefore, he was distraught and disconsolate, and, to regain her, descended into Hades where he persuaded Persephone to permit her to follow him into the upper world on condition that he would not look back. When their escape was almost accomplished, however, he cast a fleeting glance; and Eurydice, mingling with the bloodless shades, faded forever from his sight. Having loved Eurydice so passionately, Orpheus now forswore womankind forever, which brought upon him the wrath of the Bacchantes. Bacchus, in Greek and Roman mythology, was the god of wine, identified with Dionysus, the Greek god of wine, and Liber, the Roman god of wine. The son of Zeus (Jupiter), Bacchus is usually characterized in two ways. The first is that of the god of vegetation, specifically of the fruit of the trees, who is often represented on Attic vases with a drinking horn and vine branches. As Bacchus came to be the popular national Greek god of wine and cheer, wine miracles were reputedly performed at certain of his festivals and weddings (the miracle of Jesus turning the water into wine is a typical Bacchus miracle). The second characterization of the god, that of a deity whose mysteries inspired ecstatic, orgiastic devotion, is exemplified by the Maenads, or Bacchantes. This group of female devotees left their homes to roam the wilderness in ecstatic devotion to the god. You can easily understand how Orpheus' introduction of celibacy was the motive of his later dismemberment by the licentious Maenad priestesses. The name Bacchus came into use in ancient Greece during the 5th century BC. It refers to the loud cries with which he was worshiped at the Bacchanalia, frenetic celebrations in his honor. These frenetic celebrations, which supposedly originated in spring nature festivals, became occasions for licentiousness and intoxication, at which the celebrants danced, drank, and generally debauched themselves. Orpheus was determined to stop this following the loss of the love of his life. The Bacchanalia became more and more extreme and were prohibited by the Roman Senate in 186 BC. In the first century AD, however, the Dionysiac mysteries were still popular, as evidenced by representations of them found on Greek sarcophagi.

Ovid describes in detail the lynching of Orpheus (Stromata, VI, ii).

Its great age of this myth is obvious, since it bears all the earmarks of the ancient Dionysia, and since its eschatology is that of Homer; it includes none of those doctrinal or mythological elements introduced after 1100 B.C.E.

In the Hippolytus of Euripides we find the cult of Aphrodite in conflict with that of Orpheus. The Greek goddess of love, reconstructed from the Semitic Ishtar, is furious because the son of Theseus has forsworn the connubial rite; because he is, in short, a confirmed celibate. To avenge herself for this injury, she inspires his stepmother, Phaedra, with an irresistible passion for the young man; when he rebuffs her with scorn and contumely, she hangs herself, but leaves a note addressed to her husband in which she accuses his son of improper advances to her. This drives Theseus to condemn Hippolytus to exile and to call down upon him the wrath of Poseidon, who causes the young man's death in a chariot-accident. Although the Orphean religion is not endorsed by Euripides, the tone of the tragedy makes it plain that the doings of Aphrodite are considered highly reprehensible by the audience. As the Mycenaean period was drawing toward its close, private property and monogamy had won the victory in Greece over communal property and other forms of sex-relationship.

ORPHEUS COULD NEVER REPLACE THE EARLIER DIONYSUS

Orpheus was a prophet with vast pretensions who arrived too late. Although he was credited with every experience and suffering usually prerequisite for Deification, he never achieved divinity. He was assigned a goddess-mother, Calliope: but this maternity was rejected (Pausanias, Description, IX, xxx), Orpheus was torn into bloody remnants by the ferocious Maenads (similar to the dismemberment of Osiris and the Attis ritual): but this never made him a successor to Osiris, Dionysus, or Attis; he went into the underworld seeking his wife: but this did not make him a savior-god capable of conferring a similar immortality and apotheosis upon his devotees. Dionysus was too well entrenched as his predecessor. Orpheus arrived among the Hellenes after they had attained sophistication: he remained therefore only the great poet, musician, theologian, and prophet, while Dionysus continued to grow as the universal savior-god.

TWO INVASIONS BY THE THRACIAN DIONYSUS INTO GREECE

THE THRACIAN GOD

We noted that the primitive cult of Dionysus had invaded Greece both from Egypt and from Thrace before the Orphean reformation, which did not invent, but simply adopted, the version according to which the god was born in Thebes of Semele.

THE ORPHEAN DIONYSUS

There were, therefore, two Dionysiac invasions of Greece from Thrace: first, that which made Semele his mother in order to Hellenize the god but left him otherwise substantially unchanged; and, second, the Orphean, which established a new ritual, penetrated the Eleusinia and the mysteries, became the soteriological center of that mystery by means of a new myth, and was finally absorbed by the Pythagoreans. We will encounter the again when we get to the Essenes.

ORPHEAN INNOVATIONS

THE TRANSFORMATION OF THE SACRAMENT...THE INTRODUCTION OF THE BLOODLESS EUCHARIST FOR SALVATION

The first Orphean innovation was the transformation of the Dionysus sacrament. It repudiated the eating of the raw flesh of bovines, human enemies, or infants, and replaced it with a symbolic Eucharist. Since wine was the gift and the blood of Dionysus even as the grain was his body, the red juice of the grape and the bread which is baked from flour became the bloodless sacrifice of the new dispensation, which, by means of mystical ceremonies, conferred immortality upon the initiates.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF DOGMATIC THEOLOGY

In another basic innovation, Orphism based itself upon a dogmatic theology and upon a formal and elaborate set of doctrines, all of which were set forth in the oldest stratum of Orphic poetry and which was well known to Clement of Alexander and other early church fathers; there were, however, no revolutionary ethics; and certainly no concepts of dualism, a last judgment, hell fire, metempsychosis (the passing of the soul of a man after death into some other animal body), or universal immortality. These poems, which were probably a century or so older than the Homeric, were composed by the priests of Eleusis, and were probably transmitted orally from one generation to the next, until they could be committed to classic writing late in the seventh century B.C.E. Like the scriptures of the Brahmanas, the Zoroastrians, and the Jews, they purported to be divine revelations and this contributed to their dogmatism.

This ancient Orphism was not basically ascetic: its was of a nature quite different from that which we find among the Buddhists or the Pythagoreans. Clement of Alexander quotes Orpheus as saying "nothing else is more shameless and wretched than woman" (Stromata, VI, ii), which we may accept simply as a reprimand for Bacchante excesses.

ORPHEAN PENETRATION OF THE ELEUSINIA

Orpheus wrote poems concerning the generation and descent of the gods. The subject matter of the original Orphic poems was similar to that of Hesiod and Homer, except that it made certain significant additions and alterations, concerned primarily with the creation. We find that Dionysus becomes here a god similar to the Egyptian Tem or Ra, who, in a series of incarnations, was the creator, the father, and the savior of mankind. At the beginning, there was only Night; and from this, as in the Egyptian cosmogony, sprang the primeval egg, which contained ErosPhanes, which was simply another name for Dionysus. When the egg burst, it separated into two elements, which became Heaven (Uranos) and Earth (Ge). These copulated, as in the Hesiodic system, and gave birth to Cronos or Time, and to the other Titans; Cronos became the father of Rhea, Demeter, Mnemosyne, Hades, Poseidon and Zeus, who, by eating his own father, encompassed all creation. Zeus now copulated with Persephone, who gave birth to Zagreus, the incarnation of Phanes, or Dionysus reborn, who was the father-creator in the sixth generation; and to him he gave the scepter and universal dominion. Father Phanes thus became Father Dionysus, or, as he was better known, Father Liber or Bacchus.

Exactly what existence the Orphic-Dionysus cult had independently of the Eleusinia we can only guess. Nor can we describe in detail the soteriological ritual of Dionysus within the Demeter-cult before 600 B.C.E. That such rites were well developed is certain; their exact forms we cannot know. There must have been at least a sacrament of bread and wine, which the communicants ate to be transformed into the essence of the god.

The foregoing was apparently the Orphean-Dionysiac theology prevailing within the Eleusinia until the sixth century. But around 500, another far-reaching alteration consisting in the addition of the Zagreus-Titan myth took place. According to this, the reincarnated god, while still a boy known as Zagreus, was killed, cooked, and eaten by the Titans (we see omophagia again), who, in turn, were thereupon, by the thunderbolts of Zeus, burned to ashes, from which the human race was generated. The whole tale is never told in its entirety by any single extant author; but it is possible to reconstruct it from passages in Firmicus Maternus, Clement of Alexandria, the voluminous writings of the Neo-Platonists, and a number of other sources.

We learn from Herodotus of a certain Onomacritus, "an oraclemonger, and the same who set forth the prophecies of Musaeus in their order," and who was "banished from Athens by Hipparchus," because he was caught in the act of corrupting the older writings attributed to Musaeus. Pausanias declares that "Onomacritus borrowed the name of the Titans from Homer when he wrote his poem about the orgies of Dionysus and represented the Titans as contributing to the sufferings of Dionysus" (Description of Greece, VIII, xxxvii).

Together with the Zagreus-Titan element, introduced by Onomacritus late in the sixth or early in the fifth century, additional elements of Egyptian myth and ritual were incorporated with the Greek Dionysus. Plutarch declares that "the tales regarding the Titans and the rites celebrated by night agree with the accounts of the dismemberment of Osiris and his revivification and regenesis . . . and the Holy Ones offer a secret sacrifice in the shrine of Apollo whenever the devotees of Dionysus awaken the god of the Mystic Basket" (Isis and Osiris, 35). Thus the Titans finally took the place of Set and his coconspirators; and the sacrament of Dionysus was eaten from a mystic basket, exactly as in the Osirian ritual.

Diodorus thus summarizes this sixth-century innovation, according to which "the Sons of Gaia tore to pieces the god (really the son of god), who was the son of Zeus and Demeter and boiled him, but his members were brought together again (remember Osiris?) by Demeter and he experienced a new birth as if for the first time.... And with these stories, the teachings agree which are set forth in the Orphic poems and are introduced into their rites, but it is not lawful to recount them in detail to the uninitiated" (History, III, 62).

Diodorus also recounts the version of those Eleusinians who, having first adopted the Phanes-theology, expanded this by means of the Zagreus-Titan myth and finally incorporated with it the older tale of Dionysus' virgin birth from Semele, his descent into Hades to recover her, and his subsequent Deification with her in heaven. In this fully-developed form, Dionysus appears as the creator of the world; reborn from Persephone as Zagreus, he suffered dismemberment and death; resurrected from his heart, he lived as a god in the celestial realms; his body, eaten by the Titans, from whose ashes mankind was created, became the divine spark in humanity; descending from the celestial mansions, he was reborn from the pure virgin Semele, whom he later rescued from the nether realm, and now sits forever at the right hand of God. And so being twice-born, Dionysus was called Dimetor (The Mystical Hums of Orpheus, "To the Titans").

And so we know that about 500 B.C.E., there lived in Athens a clever priest by the name of Onomacritus, a notorious forger of oracles, who either composed or rewrote certain Orphic poems, and in this manner made the Zagreus-Titan myth an integral portion of the Dionysiac theology. It probably was he, who described the Titans in the Orphic hymn addressed to them as the "Fountains and principles from which began, The afflicted,

The English Platonist, Thomas Taylor, has composed an inimitable summary of the Zagreus-Titan myth which runs briefly as follows: Phanes-Eros-Dionysus was reborn from Zeus and Persephone as Zagreus, upon whom, even as a boy, his father conferred the might and the glory of his kingdom. At this the wicked and materialistic Titans became jealous, and they killed, cooked, and ate the boy in a grisly but conventional, ancient Egyptian-type sacrament. Athena, however (or Demeter or Persephone), retrieved the heart, the seat of life, as in the Osirian system, and returned it to Zeus, who therefrom effected the regenesis of the God into his second birth. Zeus, blasting the Titans with his thunderbolts, reduced them to ashes, from which the human race was generated. At a much later date, this savior-Christ left the glory of his heavenly home, and was to be reborn of the virgin Semele (the incarnation), whom he raised from Hades as a token of his power. Humanity, therefore, generated from Titanic fragments, is prone to evil. However, since elements of Dionysus were also present in the Titanic ashes, there is a divine spark in all mankind, which makes it possible for us to escape our lower and achieve our higher destiny. In order to do this, we must mortify the body to set free the soul. There is, therefore, in this reformed Eleusinian Orphism a definite dualism, an enmity between the spiritual and the material, which could easily produce a completely celibate movement.

CONCLUSION

DIONYSUS....A SOTER/SAVIOR ONLY

When Onomacritus invented the Zagreus-Dionysus-Titan myth and combined this with the virgin birth from Semele, Orphism became a systematic soteriology designed to effect the salvation of a race otherwise irretrievably lost in sin and requiring regeneration because their souls are debased and imprisoned in sinful bodies. Throughout all those centuries, however, Dionysus remained a soter only. His worship embraced no distinctive economic, ethical, or eschatological doctrine; all such innovations were to be introduced by later Pythagoreans.

THE ORIGINAL ELEUSINIA WITHOUT A SOTER/SAVIOR

Although the original Eleusinian ritual was both stately and exhilarating, it nevertheless was wanting in the most dynamic single element constituting the ancient mystery: the soter/savior. For at its center was Demeter-Persephone, not Osiris-Dionysus, the god whose body and blood we must eat and drink in the form of an Eucharist in order to assume the incorruption of divinity.

DIONYSUS AT THE CENTER OF THE ELEUSINIA

That Dionysus was an inseparable element in the Demeter-Persephone cult long before the first century B.C.E. is confirmed by overwhelming evidence. Strabo sums up this development succinctly: "They call also Bacchus, Dionysus; and he is the chief Daemon of the mysteries of Ceres." That Demeter (Latin, Ceres), Persephone (Proserpina), and Dionysus (Bacchus) were not only universal but also inseparably intertwined, we discover over and over. Pausanias declares, in a statement that could apply to almost any Greek city, that in the temple of Eleusinian Demeter at Thelpusa were large statues of Demeter, Proserpina, and Dionysus. And so it was everywhere. The same author states: "and inside the grove are statues of Demeter, Prosymne, and Dionysus . . . but in another temple there is a wooden one of Dionysus the Savior." This was a common situation: by the first century, Dionysus had become central in the Demeter-Persephone worship, but he had also a separate cult of his own in every community. And he was called the Savior.

ONLY ONE SOTER/SAVIOR

And so we see that although Osiris could not penetrate Greece under his own name, he did so repeatedly in the guise of Dionysus. History proves over and over that nothing is easier for mankind than to copy and imitate; but, by the same token, nothing is more difficult than to invent or originate. Certain concepts, like that of a god, or the virgin birth, or the belief that theft and murder are wrong, were almost universal and are therefore indigenous to many people. But civilization itself, as well as various primitive specialized concepts, like that of a savior-god and his Eucharist, of hell and heaven, of metempsychosis and Nirvana, of the Messiah and his Parousia—these originated only once and were either adopted by others or never found among them at all.

There has never been more than one Osiris

There has never more than one basic soteriological concept

However, the same concepts have been much and often translated and transfigured. The Dionysus who, in the end, became the chief demon in the Ceres-Proserpina ritual was substantially the same god to whom Unas and Pepi, Ani and Nebseni, and the wild mountaineers of Thrace and Phrygia had offered sacrifice in bygone ages and by whom they hoped for victory over death and the grave. In the end, the nurturing Demeter and her dread daughter Persephone proved insufficient: in order to survive, their cult was forced to incorporate their greatest competitor. By the first century, then, the Demeter-and the independent Dionysus-cult were both universal; and we suppose that the difference consisted chiefly in emphasis and appeal: the Eleusinian remained to the end more dignified, more suitable to the refined and educated; but in both the same deity was predominant. Possessing an aspect to suit every communicant, Dionysus became the universal savior-god of the ancient world. And there has never been another like unto him: the first to whom his attributes were accredited, we call Osiris; with the death of paganism, his central characteristics were assumed by the Christ of faith...the Jesus Christ as recorded in the New Testament.

BRAHMANISM & THE FINAL DEVELOPMENT OF HINDUISM

Again we must start with some background information for our current study. We must understand the conquest of India some four thousand years ago by a group of Aryans belonging to the same stock as those who later made Zoroastrianism their national creed. This group of ancient Aryans burst into India, established themselves as the dominant race, and instituted the intricate system of Priestly and sacerdotal law and discipline known as Brahmanism. Since the political problems of India were quite different from those of Egypt or Iran, the religion of India developed along entirely different lines than we have seen before. These changes will be important when we look later at how the Essenes adopted many of the tenants of Brahmanism. India already possessed a teeming population, which had learned to wring subsistence from the soil by agriculture: the Aryans could, therefore, perpetuate their position, privileges, and sovereignty only by divine sanctions. Revelation, as determined by the Priesthood became an instrument, not of national, but of class and race policy. As the conquerors swept eastward across the land, they established various codes, such as The Laws of Mann, who was said to have been the second progenitor of the human race after the flood; the Institutes of Vishnu, delivered, it was said, personally by the god; and many others, of which the Apastamba, the Baudhayana, and the Vasishtha Darmasastra are representative.

Nowhere else, except perhaps in Egypt, has a single religion controlled a national population so long. The oldest sacred book in the world is the Rig-Veda. Other canonical Vedas, also very ancient, are the Yagur-Veda and the Sama-Veda. There is also the later and uncanonical Atharva-Veda, consisting of magical spells and incantations. A theology, which made Brahman the creator of the universe and the father of mankind, gradually evolved; and along with it a priesthood, known as the Brahmanas. This was reinforced by various codes of civil and ecclesiastical law devised by the hierarchy, as noted above. Finally came the Upanishads, the Bhagavad Gita, the Anugita, and other documents expounding the metaphysical doctrines of mature Brahmanism.

The most ancient scared literature of Hinduism is called the Vedas. This collection of hymns, poems, and ceremonial formulas represent the beliefs of several Aryan tribes. Initially the Vedas were considered so sacred that they were only transmitted orally from one generation of Brahmans to the next. The passages of the Vedas were eventually written in Sanskrit, we believe, near the end of the third century B.C.E., and primarily consist of four collections called the Rig-Veda, the Sama-Veda, the Yajur-Veda, and the Atharva-Veda. Collectively, these are referred to as the Samhitas. The Rig-Veda contains elements congenital with Zoroastrianism; we are reminded throughout of the fervid Gathas. The Rig consists of hymns or invocations written by ancient Aryan poets and filled with a lust for life; they know nothing of caste, purgatory, hell, heaven, eschatology, metempsychosis, introspection, metaphysics, monotheism, or renunciation.

THE INFLUENCE OF ZOROASTRIANISM ON BRAHMANISM

The primitive Mazdeism of Iran was the parent of Zoroastrianism and of Brahmanism, both of which developed their own idealogies in Persia and India: but, as they did so, they carried with them certain common and congenital characteristics. Both had a similar sacred plant and drink: the Zoroastrian, the haoma, the Brahmana, the some. The Indo-Aryans worshipped Mitra, the sun-god; Agni, the fire; and Vayu, the wind just as did the Iranians; and with both, the sky, water, plants, and trees were holy. In both, the cow was sacred; but since the people of India were not sheepherders, the dog became to them a worthless and unclean beast. The lovable Anahita, goddess of the waters and of domestic happiness, bears a close resemblance to Varuna in the Rig. By a curious inversion, the evil daevas of the Persians became the angels and inferior gods of India. In Persia, fire and water were so holy that no corpse could be brought near them; but in India, by another strange convolution, the dead body was consigned to them because they were holy. And this difference in practice stemmed naturally from the opposing metaphysics which developed with the passing centuries: whereas the Persians became absolute dualists, the Brahmanas became monists and pantheists; with the latter the world and everything in it were made by and were literally the one Supreme God.

The late Vedanta-Sutra declares: "the entire world forms the body of Brahman" (Institutes of Gautama, I, 1). In such a metaphysical system, no cosmic evil could exist.

It is possible that the Brahmanas were the first to develop the concept of hell; and that the Zoroastrians elaborated their intricate eschatology independently or appropriated this one element of it from India. In any event, despite the common ancient source of the two religions, that of the Brahmanas and the Buddhists never had any dualism, cosmic warfare, prophecy, apocalypse, Messiah, resurrection, last judgment, final tribulation, universal holocaust, renewed earth and heaven, or personal immortality for every human soul.

LATER RELIGIOUS DOCTRINES THAT WERE NOT BASED ON THE VEDAS

Brahmanism claimed authority from the Vedas and declared them to contain the ultimate revelations; but it established a theology and a social system unknown to the ancient rishis, or prophets.

Besides a new social order, the simple nature gods of the Rig were replaced by a trinity:

- The abstract Brahman, the Father, and creator of the world
- Vishnu, the Preserver
- Siva, the Destroyer

This process of incorporation was similar to what happened in Egypt under the Sumerian conquerors. There were also some thirty other important deities, of whom the old Iranian gods Indra, Agni, Vayu, and Mitra ranked among the more important.

The Brahmanic creation-theory is similar to the Egyptian (Laws of Manu, I, 5-31). In the beginning, the universe existed only as darkness, immersed, as it were, in a deep sleep. Then he, the divine Self-Existent, placed a golden egg in the waters, from which he was himself reborn as Brahman, or Pragapati, the progenitor of the world, who produced all creatures from his own body (Ibid., I, 5-11).

A NEW SOCIAL SYSTEM....WHERE THE PRIESTS RULED

The fundamental feature of Brahmanism, however, is the social system it developed, and. enforced with such diabolical success that even Gandhi could never attack directly its basic and grotesque injustice. For centuries, the Brahmanas and the Kshatriyas, or nobles (kings, warriors), carried on a bitter struggle for supremacy, in which the former were finally victorious and were thus able to establish a priest-state.

They Brahman priests were successful in this objective because they monopolized learning, made all moral, religious, and civil decisions, issued all codes of law, appropriated nearly all social privileges, and gradually gathered most of the national wealth into their own coffers. The Brahmanic codes were designed to consolidate the supremacy of the priesthood and to maintain the racial purity of the upper castes.

THE CASTE SYSTEM

We are told that Brahman created the four castes for the eternal security and prosperity of the world:

- That he produced the Brahmanas from his head
- The Kshatriyas from his arms
- The Vaisyas from his thighs
- The Sudras from his feet (Manu, I, 31; Inst. of Vishnu, II, 1-14; Varishtha, II, 1-20)

The duties of the Brahmanas are to conduct religious rituals, teach the Vedas, and accept gifts; of the Kshatriyas, to study the Vedas, bestow gifts on the Brahmanas, sacrifice to the gods, defend the nation in time of war, and administer the codes prepared by the Brahmanas; of the Vaisyas, to make gifts to Brahmanas and work at agriculture, trade, cattle-raising, etc.; of the Sudras, to serve the three other castes, especially the Brahmanas (Apastamba, II, i, 10:4-8). The Brahmanas and Kshatriyas, who are Aryans, maintain the world (Inst. of Gautama, VIII, 1-3); but of these, the former are superior (Manu, IX, 320). The importance of the productive classes, who were the indigenous natives, was, however, not overlooked, for we read that should "these two castes swerve from their duties, they would throw this whole world into confusion" (Ibid., VIII, 418). They would indeed!

The three upper castes are "twice-born"; that is, in addition to their human origin, each experiences a second birth, after a prescribed course of study under a Guru, who is called a "father because he gives instruction in the Veda" (Vasishtha, II, 1-4). Sudras were of course excluded from the sacraments; and from all Vedic knowledge, as were women (Manu, IV, 81).

Brahman, as the creator of mankind, was the Great Father; and the Brahmanas, as his primary creatures, his direct representatives, and the microcosmic replicas of God, were themselves actually gods or lesser Brahmans, that is, Fathers, in their own persons. It was this concept which inspired the clergy of the Catholic Church to designate themselves as the Holy Fathers.

SOCIAL STRUCTURE IN THIS CASTE SYSTEM WAS VERY RIGID

This caste system froze the social fabric into a rigid structure. The conquered natives and their descendants were thus divinely ordained to everlasting inferiority, ignorance, and servitude. The greatest possible sin was to cause confusion or blending among the castes. A twice-born man became ceremonially unclean merely by reciting a Vedic text in the hearing of a Sudra (Vasishtha, XVIII, 12); the child of a Brahmana and a Sudra woman was a Parasava, "as impure as a corpse" (Ibid., 10); and "a twice-born man who has eaten the food of a Sudra during impurity caused by death or a birth, will suffer dreadful punishment in hell and be born again as an animal" (Ibid., IV, 30).

MARRIAGE LAWS WERE COMPLICATED

To maintain the caste system, it became necessary to classify all marriages according to quality; eight forms of wedlock were declared legitimate (Inst. of Vishnu, XXIV, 10-27). Of these, four were acceptable for Brahmanas: "the quality of the offspring depends on the quality of the marriage rite" (Baudhayana, I, xi, 21:1). A Brahmana could have four wives, a Kshatriya three, a Vaisya two, a Sudra one only (Inst. of Vishnu, XXIV, 1-4). The law of the gods was that "Men of the three first castes, who through folly marry a woman of the lowest caste, quickly degrade their families and progeny to the state of Sudras" (Ibid., XXVI, 6).

SOCIAL OUTCASTS...BELOW THE SUDRAS

There was a class of what you might call "untouchables" below the Sudras. Degraded as were the Sudras, however, they nevertheless had caste, and with it certain elementary rights. Below them were the unfortunates who had lost their social status entirely, i. e. had become outcastes. These were the untouchables, and especially the Parasavas and Khandalas, the offspring of Brahmanas or Brahmanis with Sudras. They were excommunicated from birth and compelled irrevocably to gain their livelihood through the most degrading servitude no matter what their virtues or natural capacities might be.

THE BRAHMANS TAUGHT THE DOCTRINE OF KHARMA TO JUSTIFY METEMPSYCHOSIS

The concept of Kharma was invented to account for and to justify the caste system. Naturally, those artificially excluded from social privilege or economic opportunity would point out that they were not inferior, either morally or mentally. To crush such sedition, the Brahmanas devised the doctrine of metempsychosis, or soul-transmigration, according to which all living creatures had an eternal generation, have already been born over and over, and will be born again and again. A soul inhabits every insect, fish, bird, animal, and human being; according to the Gainas, lichens, plants, trees, and particles of air or fire also possessed souls. The condition under which each soul re-enters the world is predetermined by its Kharma, that is, by the quantity of virtue or wickedness, merit or demerit, which it has accumulated during former incarnations. Sudras are simply being punished for sins so perpetrated and Brahmanas rewarded for merits so earned; each may enjoy his privileges, or must endure his punishment in patience and resignation, for it is the decree of Brahman.

REBIRTH IN LOWER OR HIGHER FORMS

Those who earn a higher place in the next birth are, upon death, rewarded with a temporary sojourn in heaven, after which they are reborn in a higher caste; those guilty of sins and crimes, go to hell, where they are tortured for an appropriate period, after which they become reincarnated in the form and condition they deserve: a lower caste, a beast of burden, a rat, an insect, or a plant. In addition to a miserable status, they will also often be marked by various diseases and deformities, the criminal will have leprosy; the drunkard, black teeth; the violator of a Guru's bed, skin disease; the malignant informer, stinking breath; the food thief, dyspepsia; the incendiary, madness (Inst. of Vishnu, XLV, 2-17). Thus, metempsychosis and the caste-system complemented each other. Not only did they account for evil and suffering in the world: they perfumed all human misery and injustice with the odor of sanctity.

CHARACTERISTICS OF BRAHMANIC SOCIETY

The main characteristic of Brahmanic society is the absolute authority of Brahman Priests. We read that all authority is vested in the Vedas as interpreted by tradition and by the Brahmanas (Varishtha, I, 4), a claim identical to that advanced later by the Catholic hierarchy; that the gods, who exist by the favor of the Brahmanas, will execute every curse or benediction uttered by them on earth (Inst. of Vishnu, XIX, 22-23), which was the very power the Roman See arrogated to itself because Jesus gave Peter the power to loose and to bind. Even as the gods are the invisible, so are the Brahmanas the visible deities, who sustain the world (Ibid., 20-21). We are overwhelmed by such modesty.

The absolute authority of the Brahman priests made any direct revolt impossible. As the laws and traditions of the Brahmanas became sanctified in hoary antiquity, the difficulty of removing or even relieving the straightjacket of caste became more and more insuperable. All questioning or heresy was forbidden on pain of the most ferocious punishment. There was no learning or teaching except that of the Gurus, the teaching Brahmanas. There was no historical record or chronology: in short, any direct revolt by the lower classes was no more possible than among the American slaves.

SPECIAL FEATURES OF THE SOCIAL STRUCTURE

Women were especially oppressed: like Sudras, they were excluded from all sacred learning (Baudhayana, I, i, 11:7). "In childhood, a female must be subject to her father, in youth to her husband; and when her lord is dead, to her sons; a woman must never be independent" (Manu, V, 148). "No matter how destitute of virtue . . . a husband must be constantly worshiped as a god by the faithful wife" (Ibid., 156). If he dies, she must never take a second. So fearful was this crime of remarriage by a woman that even her son became an abhisasta outcast (Inst. of Gautama, XIV, 18). When the husband died, the good wife ascended the funeral pyre after him (Inst. of Vishnu, XXV, 14).

Every student took the vow of poverty, chastity, and obedience. He must never touch a woman, "nor," as Jesus was to reiterate, "shall he desire her in his heart" (Apastamba, I, i, 7:8-9). He must dwell at the Guru's house; must be his diligent, humble, and unpaid servant; must beg food and other necessities from virtuous and twice-born persons; must bring everything so obtained to his master; may eat a portion only of the food so collected after receiving permission from the Guru; and must avoid all frivolity during his years of studentship. If he is himself a Brahmana and continues as a student until death, he passes at once into Nirvana (Inst. of Vishnu, XXVIII, 1-47).

In the Brahmanic system, there were four orders, any of which a twice-born man might choose after his Vedic studies were completed. He could continue as a student, or might become a householder, an ascetic, or a hermit (Apastamba, I, ii, 21:1-3). But we are told that "the venerable teacher prescribes only . . . the order of householders (Inst. of Gautama, III, 36), because these alone produce wealth or children (Ibid., III, 3), and because "all mendicants subsist through the protection afforded by householders" (Vasishtha, VIII, 16).

THEOLOGY AND RELIGIOUS PRACTICE UNDER MATURE BRAHMANISM

NIRVANA

Thus we see that in addition to the four castes as well as the hordes of untouchables, two new religious orders sprang up within mature Brahmanic society. Just when ascetics and hermits became numerous, we cannot now know, but we may assume that it was at least six centuries before Christ. Why they arose is not difficult to comprehend; for in that heavily populated land, priest-ridden and ignorant, full of misery and frustration, countless human hearts must have been bursting with pent-up despair. The joy of living reflected in the ancient Rig had long since departed, there was no hope or solace for the fettered millions, hemmed in on every side by rigid caste, denied all hope and pleasure in this world of frustration and despair. This life was a morass of slavery and starvation: and that beyond the grave was even more terrifying. Even if one were fortunate enough to achieve a brief stay in heaven, one would soon be born again into this vale of tears and suffering, repeat the same useless struggle, perhaps be plunged into hell, and be reborn a louse or a worm.

And so it was that someone in ancient India devised the doctrine of Nirvana, which was ultimate extinction for the personal entity, the end of conscious soul-existence, and its final union with the Self, the Universal Soul, the Brahman, the Atman, even as the river loses itself in the boundless ocean. To escape forever the Wheel of Life, the endless round of birth and death, became the fervent yearning of countless millions. Through the practice of yoga, the concentration upon the Self, in which the syllable Ohm was endlessly repeated, men hoped to enter the Universal Soul (Apastamba, I, i, 22:3-6). This desire was a complete negation of the primitive Rig-Veda; and the concept itself certainly did not exist in earlier Brahmanism. But, as it was an irresistible popular reaction to prevailing conditions, it became necessary for the reigning priesthood to incorporate asceticism into their system as a social safety valve, and to offer the achievement of Nirvana to those plunged into ultimate despair.

RENUNCIATION

among them that celibacy would be rewarded eschatologically (Ibid., II, i, 23:5). But before they could become hermits living alone in the forest, or ascetics begging their way from door to door, they must first undergo a long period of Vedic study and then remain always under the authority of the Brahmanas. That great numbers embraced even these stringent terms we know: for all the Brahmanic codes detail the regulations governing the lives and the duties of both these religious orders. This is reminiscent of the Manual of Discipline and the Community rule we find among the Essenes later. And so Mother India spawned the monster Renunciation, which has played so vast and spectacular a role in European and world history.

The ascetic hoped to attain Nirvana by rejecting all human relationships; by eliminating fear and desire from his soul; by complete indifference to pain, pleasure, hell, heaven, past, present, and future. He must seek the Universal Soul by fixing his gaze upon the eternal and becoming impervious to the evanescent (Apastamba, II, i, 21:7-13); he must realize that his body is a filthy, stinking sink of iniquity, the stay of carnal desire, wrath, greed, folly, pride, and selfishness (Inst. of Vishnu, XCVI, 26-85; Vasishtha, X, 1-19; Manu, VI, 37-65).

Such was the ancient ascetic of India, the prototypes of Sts. Antony and Simeon Stylites.

And so while the ruling Brahmanas and the privileged Kshatriyas took the cash and let the credit go, preferring money, power, women, and pleasure, millions of their less fortunate brethren found surcease from slavery and exploitation in renunciation. When the human spirit has undergone indescribable torture for centuries, it seeks refuge at last in irrevocable extinction.

Thus we see that the basic ideal of the ascetic was an utter individualism by which he sought his own salvation only. He was the first Existentialist. Even as the world had given him nothing, so would he give nothing to the world. He would undertake no project, do no work, contribute nothing to the support or welfare of any one else: Nay more: he would not even lift a finger to provide his own most elementary necessities, but would live by begging, utterly indifferent alike to abuse or charity, to cold or heat, to life or death. He was the end-product of the Brahmanic system of degradation and suppression.

WORKS OF HOLINESS

In the Brahmanic system, works of holiness played a large role. These were not, however, as one might surmise, labors of charity but rather ceremonial performances, such as saving the life of a cow or a Brahmana, bestowing gifts upon a priest, reciting the Vedas, bathing in holy water, journeying to sacred places, or eating the five products of the cow (urine, dung, milk, sour milk, and clarified butter). All such activities were believed highly efficacious for removing guilt.

We read that "all mountains, all rivers, holy lakes, places of pilgrimage, the dwellings of rishis, cowpens, and temples of the gods are places which destroy sin" (Vasishtha, XXII, 12). At such sacred spots penances were extremely effective, and required only periods ranging from a single day to a year to obliterate a variety of sins, including the most revolting (Ibid., 13). Most sacrosanct were various altars and shrines to which pilgrimages were made. Hundreds of thousands of pious persons journeyed long distances, particularly to the Ganges at Benares, so that their souls might attain heaven and a more fortunate incarnation in the next birth.

PENANCE

Under the priestly codes, elaborate formularies were devised by which sinners might free themselves from guilt. They must "always perform a penance, by the advice of a Brahmana" (Inst. of Vishnu, XLII, 2). Scarcely by accident, these penances were often very profitable to the Brahmanas: and they ranged anywhere from giving them a bundle of straw to committing suicide by fire or starvation. Although there is not the smallest vestige of all this in Buddhism, in pristine Christianity, it became one of the characteristics of the Catholic Church in the fourth century and remains so to this day.

HEAVEN AND HELL

The Brahmanic concepts of hell were used to reinforce the caste system and metempsychosis. In Brahmanic eschatology hell and heaven are places, of reward for the obedient and further punishment for the wicked or heretical. While heaven remained vague and indefinite, hell became an elaborately developed concept with a multitude of graphic tortures appropriate for every type of miscreant.

We are told that there are twenty-three hells which are characterized by darkness, howling, burning, parching, stench, iron spikes, frying pans, a flaming river, sword-leaved trees, iron fetters, etc., in all of which the worst criminals are tortured successively (Ibid., XLIII). Those who have committed a crime effecting loss of caste are tortured for a thousand years: they are dragged hither and yon upon rough roads, devoured by dogs and jackals, hawks and cranes, serpents and scorpions. They are scorched by blazing fire, pierced by thorns, divided by saws into parts, and tormented by thirst. They are agitated by hunger and fearful troops of tigers, and faint away because of foul stenches. They are boiled in oil, pounded with pestles, and ground in iron or stone vessels. They are compelled to eat vomit, pus, blood, and excrement. They are tormented by frost, suspended from trees, shot full of arrows and cut into pieces (Ibid., 1-45). "After having suffered the torments inflicted in the hells, the evil-doers pass into animal bodies." Several centuries later, concepts comparable to these reappeared in various Christian apocalypses.

EXCOMMUNICATION

As we have already noted, the Brahmanas insisted on controlling each and every member of society: no one could escape their rule and they made some kind of provision for every one. This, of course, is the fundamental characteristic of the priest-state: a hierarchy may or may not seek moral improvement, but it always insists on universal sway, heavy tribute from all, and the extirpation of every ideology except its own. It proclaims its prerogative to legislate for every phase of human activity, social, political, moral, domestic, civil, and religious, all by revealed and sacred authority. In such a society, no human being is permitted to live his own life, follow his own reason, or earn a living in his own way, asking merely to live at peace with his fellowmen. Anyone desiring such independence will be regarded as a dangerous subversive.

The fearful weapon always ready for use in the hands of the Brahmanas was excommunication. This was the punishment by which the heretic, the unbeliever, the independent individual, or anyone who did not adequately perform his religious obligations would be deprived of caste and degraded to the rank of Sudra or Khandala. Brahmanic law provided specifically that anyone "who does not worship standing in the morning, nor sitting in the evening, shall be excluded, just like a Sudra, from all the duties and rights of an Aryan" (Manu, II, 103). And again: "He who divulges the Veda to persons not authorized to study it, he who sacrifices for Sudras, and all those who have fallen from the highest caste shall be excommunicated" (Vasishtha, XXII, 12). We must never "honor, even by a greeting, heretics . . . or logicians, arguing against the Veda" And so we find that the principal thunderbolt of the Catholic clergy had been fully developed many centuries before in India. The fearful thing about excommunication was not that it cut the victim off from all religious associations, but that it sealed him away from all human contacts and made it impossible for him to earn a living. And where the priesthood had sufficient power, excommunication included also exile or death.

EXCLUSIVE SALVATION

The Brahmanic codes were declared unalterable and everlasting, because they were ancient and based upon irrefragable authority: "All those doctrines differing from the Veda, which spring up and soon perish, are worthless and false, because they are of modern date" (Manu, XII, 95-95). This, of course, was aimed at such heretical innovations as Buddhism, which, because of recent origin, must soon perish.

PANTHEISM

The Vedanta-Sutra, the Bhagavad Gita, and the Upanishads, contain the most complete exposition of mature Brahmanic metaphysics. Brahmanism moved finally into a thorough-going pantheism, and prepared the way for Buddhism by developing a philosophy which denied that the Vedas were in themselves sufficient for salvation.

In the Bhagavad-Gita, the instructor is Krishna, one of the various terrestrial incarnations of Vishnu. He declares that "in this world there is a two-fold path" (Bhagavad-Gita, III); just as we shall find the Essenes and the primitive Christians declaring. The first is pursued by those who overcome passion and desire, a doctrine elaborated in the Anugita (Vasishtha, IV, 30); who repudiate family, sex, property, wealth, and all material things; who are indifferent to all things good or bad, here or hereafter; and who seek only the Self, that is, the union of the finite with the infinite Soul of the Universe, which is Brahman, Atman, Vishnu, Pragapati the Over-Soul, as Emerson calls it. Thus, they will be freed forever from the circle of birth and death, from the endless Wheel of Life. The second pathway is that of those who, deceived by their senses and driven hither and yon by their passions, crave property, family, and wealth. They are slaves of delusion, who must descend in the scale of life, be tortured in hell, and be reborn again and again only to repeat their pointless sufferings through endless eons.

According to the Upanishads, the universe is Brahman; he is also the Atman, the living, permeating life, which is the Infinite Soul. This divine power is called the Self. Every soul that is manifest in plant, tree, fish, insect, bird, beast, or man is a portion of this omnipresent spirit, and every such microcosm, as it were, may choose to undergo continued misery as an independent existence or rejoin the Universal Self, the macrocosm, become one with the infinite, lose consciousness and identity, and so escape forever the Wheel of Life.

CONCLUSION

Let us summarize the final development of Hinduism. The Vedas were the original scriptures of the Aryan conquerors of India but in time their descendants developed legal and ecclesiastical codes to establish their authority and give divine sanction to the caste system and the doctrine of transmigration. A vast hierarchy proliferated, which clamped its iron rule upon every human being and every phase of life. The despair and frustration which resulted among the masses made it necessary to devise the doctrine of renunciation and to provide for hermits and ascetics within the framework of that society. And lastly, the pantheistic doctrines of the Upanishads were developed (Katha-Upanishad, I, i, 2:23), which rejected the sufficiency of the Vedas, promulgated the concept of the Self and the Wheel of Life, and prepared the way for Buddhism.

In the seventh and eighth centuries of our era, Islam swept into India and conquered large territories; but their converts were taken rather from the Buddhists than from the Brahmanas. There are in India today some 80,000,000 Mohammedans and 260,000,000 Hindus; the Buddhists were long since driven from India and have never regained a foothold there.

THE INFLUENCE UPON THE ESSENES AND CHRISTIANITY

The influence of Brahmanism upon the Essenes and Christianity was very slight, except insofar as its asceticism carried over into Buddhism; but upon the priesthood of the Catholic Church, especially after its political triumph, it became paramount. We may list the following practices, which were certainly derived from Brahmanism:

- Trial by ordeal
- Use of excommunication
- The prohibition against any conversation with heretics
- Encouragement of such religious "works" as pilgrimages to altars and shrine
- Severe sanctions against remarried women
- The recognition of degrees of legality in marriages
- The bestowal of unprecedented honors upon ascetics who tortured their bodies and lived a life of bizarre or fantastic physical hardship

- The requirement that an ascetic, upon joining a religious order, bestow all his wealth upon the official priesthood
- The acceptance of certain precise and vivid descriptions of torments in hell
- The interpretation of the revealed scriptures by the official hierarchy alone
- The ultimate authority of tradition
- The vows of obedience, poverty, and chastity
- The immunity of the priesthood from taxation or civil duties
- The claim on the part of the hierarchy to establish all juridical codes
- The doctrine that it is the function of kings to administer and enforce such codes
- The use of confession and penance to expiate an intricate system of venal and mortal sins
- The priestly monopoly over the training and education of youth
- The denial of the sacred scriptures to the lower orders or the laity
- The use of spells and incantations (white magic) to defeat enemies, to be successful in love, business, etc., exactly as in the Atharva-Veda.

All these characteristics, unknown both to the New Testament and to the Apostolic Church, became standard after 350 A.D. The priestly prerogative to legislate for every one in all fields of human conduct was common to Judaism, Zoroastrianism, and Brahmanism; and for their own parallel pretensions, the Catholics were probably indebted equally to Jews and Brahmanas. Finally, we may be certain that Catholic reverence for and worship of sacred images (so horrifying to Jews, Zoroastrians, and early Christians alike) came at least as much from India as from Greek and Roman paganism.

THE ENDURANCE OF BRAHMANISM

The success of Brahmanism is attested by its permanence: the Greeks of Alexander could not conquer it; after several centuries, it expelled Buddhism from India, and, after certain alterations, reappeared as Hinduism; it withstood the fiercest assaults of the Mohammedans, and neither Christianity nor modern enlightenment have been able to make any serious inroads into its domains. Brahmanism or Hinduism is a religion, a social system, a way of life: and it still holds the destiny of some 300,000,000 communicants in its iron grip, frustrating every effort intended to emancipate its victims. It remains to be seen what such men as the Marxist Nehru and his British-educated colleagues can do to alter or transform this ancient ideology and social structure. The modern Hindu has shown that he can elect socialists to operate his government, but he has not shown that he can conquer his ancient superstitions or adopt a secularist or progressive way of life.

We have noted why the Brahmanas called themselves Fathers (Vasishtha, II, 4). We know, furthermore, that the Buddhist heresy repudiated the Vedas, the Brahmanas, and their title of father-gods. In Matt. 23:9, Jesus says, "And call no man your Father upon the earth: for one is your Father, which is in heaven." We suggest that this text can have only a single meaning: it reflected Buddhist influence and was a repudiation of all such priestly authority as the Brahmanas arrogated to themselves. The Catholic hierarchy, however, found Brahmanic ideology far more to its liking than it did the teachings of Jesus; and therefore it patterned itself in the image of the former. The Catholic Church re-established the very system which Buddhism and the Jesus repudiated.The Church became the counter-revolution which rejected the religion of Jesus. From Brahmanism, through Buddhism, apostolic Christianity and the Catholic Church, the wheel turned full circle. It was therefore no accident that the new clergy, in the fourth and fifth centuries, began to call themselves by the very name which their nominal Founder had so stringently forbidden. And it was also no accident that under their authority a social structure was erected in Europe which substantially reproduced that of India: they themselves became the Brahmanas; the feudal aristocracy, the Kshatriyas; the tradesmen and peasants, the Vaisyas; serfs and the slaves, the Sudras. And the heretics became the outcastes.

BUDDHISM & THE REVOLUTION AGAINST BRAHMANISM

In the previous article on Brahmanism we saw the repressive domination of the Indian Prieshood and their enforcement of a caste system upon the entire population where they, the Priesthood, had the privledged positions and benefits of such a structiure. Revolt to this Brahmanic doctrine was inevitable. It was scarcely possible that a large mass of humanity should submit forever to galling and artificial restraints, to irremediable inferiority and frustration. However, since the ruling classes were so thoroughly intrenched, no revolt could be successful unless based upon established doctrine. As it happened, the desired foundation existed in the Upanishads and in the asceticism already tolerated. Powerful movements, therefore, took shape in the sixth century B.C.E. to emancipate the disinherited. Both Gainaism and Buddhism grew out of Brahmanism and derived from it such concepts as:

- Transmigration of the soul
- Kharma
- Heaven and hell
- The Wheel of Life
- Nirvana
- Renunciation

Mahavira, the founder of Gainaism, and Gautama, of Buddhism, were contemporaries; but the break of Mahavira with Brahmanism was less complete. We find, for example that Gaina ascetics, like the Brahmanic, were strict individualists, practicing self-mortification; they regarded filth as almost synonymous with holiness; among them, we hear nothing of Samghas, monasteries, or brotherhoods. Gaina teachers were even called Gurus.

THE BELIEFS AND DOCTRINES BEHIND THE REVOLT AGAINST BRAHMANISM

The revolt of the Gainas and the Buddhists centered upon revolutionary ideas which were everywhere rampant:

- That the Brahmanas were worldly, hypocritical, exploitive, and hopelessly enmeshed in passion, injustice, and greed for material wealth
- That the caste system should be abolished
- That position in society should be based, not upon the accident of birth, but on moral excellence
- The Vedas should be discarded summarily
- That men and women should be encouraged to become saints and renunciators while still in the prime of youth
- That pacifism and non-violence should be established as the holiest of all principles

- That religious teachers should not seek to control society-at-large, but should initiate only their own converts into a way of life calculated to achieve Nirvana
- That religious and civil codes should be entirely separate from the state; in short, they demanded the separation of church and state

Here was something new; for here were religious teachers who did not aspire to control anyone except their own voluntary disciples. They had no interest in worldly affairs, which they simply abandoned and repudiated. This was the great difference between Buddhism and Brahmanism: Brahmanism insisted on totalitarian dominion over all; Buddhism accepted only those who would submit to its code; the punishment for violation of discipline was expulsion only, with the consequent return to civil society.

THE DOCTRINE OF UNIVERSAL EQUALITY

Throughout the Buddhist scriptures as well as the teachings of Jesus, we find this ideal of universal human brotherhood, which expresses the profound yearning of the oppressed and the despised, the poor, and the ignorant for equality with their more successful brethren. Since the Sudras and the outcasts of India could not hope for priority, they sought first of all to escape the bitter exploitation under which they groaned. Through holy beggary, they might even achieve a humble parasitism of their own. But man cannot live by bread alone; he must have food also for his spirit, that is, he must have inspiration for his ego: he must believe that he is significant. The disinherited of India, therefore, seized eagerly upon a doctrine by which they might escape unrequited toil and social degradation and at the same time attain stature as elect saints.

THE SUBSEQUENT REPUDIATION OF LABOR

Because it enabled the toiling masses to strike a blow against frustration and exploitation, Buddhism grew into a great and mighty force: less than three hundred years after its origin, it probably numbered more adherents than any other religious discipline in the world. The new preachers proclaimed the gospel: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." All were welcome: slaves, Sudras, outcasts, women, harlots, thieves, murderers, on the same terms, all to be emancipated from the control of the Brahmanas. The way was revealed by which men might escape work: even if subjected to unlimited abuse, nakedness, and starvation, they would, whatever the cost, withhold their labor. They would renounce life, but they would not submit to involuntary servitude. Even if they should be beaten to death or compelled to subsist like beasts of the jungle, they would perform no service under the old conditions. This was the world's first great organized strike.

UNIVERSALISM OF BUDDHIMS....THE OPPORTUNITY FOR INCLUSION WAS MADE FOR EVERYONE TO ENTER

The revolutionaries capitalized upon Brahmanic teachings and so made it impossible for the authorities to abolish them. They extended to everyone the privileges which the Brahmanas had already conferred upon aged, twice-born ascetics. The nub of the heresy consisted in its demand for independence from Brahmanic authority and in its declaration of universal equality by which it invited the poor, the downtrodden, the criminals, the outcasts, from the byways and the hedges to come and receive salvation freely and without price. Other cults chose their saints with the most meticulous care; Buddhism and Christianity opened their arms in welcome to all the disinherited miscreants of the earth.

REPUDIATION OF HOME AND FAMILY

The American I.W.W., which flourished at the turn of this century, believed that workers could never free themselves from exploitation as long as they were involved in family relationships; it was a fervent portion of their faith that they must never marry or accept any social responsibility. This very doctrine (the repudiation of family and home) was the foundation of the heresies of India. Unless we understand this simple fact, we can never comprehend such movements as Buddhism and Christianity: wife, children, home, all these, they believed, are the instruments by which the exploiters fasten slavery forever upon the necks of the poor; and thus the bondage is gilded over with a veneer of moral sanctity. For in every conservative society, such as in ours and in the Brahmanic, a man who abandons wife, children, parents, and home is regarded as the most despicable of all moral monsters. The Buddhists and the I. W. W. agreed that men are born into slavery, destined and condemned to a treadmill of useless and meaningless toil, not only to keep their economic lords in luxury, but also to feed, clothe, and house a domestic brood who give them nothing of value in return.

THE SUBSEQUENT GLORIFICATION OF CELIBACY

With such an attitude toward family, along with such ideas conected with it such as procreation and sex, it was only a short step to the the promotion of celibacy. In addition to this, India was heavily overpopulated and workers exceedingly numerous. For this, there was only one practical remedy: a sharp reduction in the available labor force. The poor must withdraw from the labor market and must cease to multiply. The core of the new religion (Buddhism) which was a reaction against the oppressiveness of the Brahmains therefore consisted in the repudiation of work and marriage and in the glorification of celibacy and idleness. Sex and sexconsummation became therefore the greatest and the most shameful evils which afflict mankind. Anything even distantly related to human generation became repulsive, unclean, and degrading in the sight of Buddhism; and even the most furtive reference to the organs of life was viewed with extreme abhorrence and disgust. Brahmanism had degraded women to the level of beasts, but it never belittled or rejected motherhood; these Buddhist revolutionaries, on the contrary, honored women as human beings, but repudiated them as wives, sweethearts, or mothers. Women could become Arhats (saints); but if one of them aroused the smallest erotic disturbance in a man, she was a creature of Mara. Women were dreadfully dangerous, because they seduced men into a relationship which made endless labor inescapable.

THE SUBSEQUENT RENUNCATION OF WOMEN

Erotic desire became, therefore, the most fearful of all sins: it was not so much the sexual act itself that must be avoided as the wish to commit it: whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her bath committed adultery with her already in his heart. This became the basic article of the Buddhist faith.

Even a cursory examination of Gaina and Buddhist scripture reveals that Woman was the grand renunciation which Man must achieve: "So long as the love of man toward woman, even the smallest, is not destroyed, so long is he in bondage" (Dhammapada, XX, 18). The Buddhist monks imagined themselves constantly tempted by seductive females, ready to smother them with affection and gifts; the pathway to Nirvana was forever beset by fragrant and voluptuous maidens who wished only to enjoy their masculinity; even the gods, forever jealous of the Arhat's superiority, appeared to them in the form of transcendently beautiful women to arouse in them that fatal desire. We are not to "desire women, those female demons . . . who continually change their mind, who entice men, and then make sport of them as slaves" (Uttaradhyana, II:VIII, 18). It is better to "fall into the' fierce tiger's mouth, or under the sharp knife of the executioner, than to . . . dwell with a woman . . . Better far with red-hot pins bore out both your eyes, than look upon a woman's form with desire" (Fo-Sho-Hing-Tsan-King, 1754-1765).

Jesus proclaimed the same philosophy as we find in the sermon on the mount:

Matt. 5:27-28

You have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultrey; But I say to you, That whosoever looked on a woman to lust after her halt already committed adultery with her in his heart

THE SUBSEQUENT REJECTION OF PARENTS AND CHILDREN

But it was not sufficient for the Buddhist to renounce sex and marriage. He must also abhor and summarily reject all those things which accompany family life and require labor for their acquisition. He must thrust aside gold, money, clothing, comforts, land, cattle, houses. Since such impedimenta cannot be obtained without toil or wickedness, they must be renounced and all desire for them must be eradicated from the soul. Only those who abandoned father, mother, sister, brother, wife, children, lands, and house without regret could be disciples of Buddha or Mahavira.

Again, we find Jesus teaching the same things:

Mark 10:29 29

And Jesus answered and said, Verily I say unto you, There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my sake, and the gospel's, (KJV) In return for such renunciation, they would gain knowledge, peace of mind, cessation of desire, many brethren and sisters in the faith, the kingdom of righteousness, and, beyond all this, eternal salvation. This is precisely the reward promised also in Mark 10:29-30.

We are told that all the Bodhisattvas abandoned their wives and gave away their children, or sold them into slavery (Questions of Melinda, IV, 8:1). The devout wept at the heartrending tale of King Vessantara, who consigned his beloved children into slavery under an ogre-like Brahmana: "It is because what he did . . . was so difficult that the fame of this Bohisat was spread abroad among gods and men . . and that the gods exalt him in heaven" (Ibid., IV, 8:6). Such was the Buddhist reward for acts which, under our social-economy, bring infamy and imprisonment.

And so we see that the revolutionary religions of India actually began as a strike by poor and weary men against the economic burdens imposed by masters, parents, sisters, wives, and children.

THE WEAPONS OF THE BUDDHIST REVOLT

THE BRAHMANS DENOUNCED BY THE BUDDHISTS

These Buddhist revolutionaries denounced the Brahmanas as hypocrites and deceivers. Not by forms, ceremonies, or the accident of birth does one become a Brahmana or an outcast, but by deeds which bring their own reward or punishments We can well imagine the denunciations which the new ascetic heaped upon the corrupt and pleasure-loving Brahmanas, who, in their Upanishads, had taught an ethical system which they ignored, but which the Gainas and the Buddhists appropriated.

The Brahmanas, like the Pharisees, were painted sepulchres "within whom there is ravening desire" although "the outside they make clean."

Answer for yourself: Where have you heard this before? Well before you say Jesus understand it was said hundreds of years earlier about represive religous authorities as found in Dhammapada, XXVI, 394.

"These ignorant priests pretend to know the sacrifice.... they shroud themselves in study and penances, being like fire covered with ashes" (Uttaradhyana, II:XXV, 18). Their sacrifices of animals and their recitations of the Vedas can never remove their evil kharma (Ibid., 32). They possess wealth and wives, lands and houses, are full of anger, malice, depravity, and passion; therefore, they will not escape the wrath to come (Tevigga-Sutta, I: 33-36).

Contrast the above statements with these:

Luke 3:7 7 Then said he to the multitude that came forth to be baptized of him, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? (KJV)

Matt 3:7 7 But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees come to his baptism, he said unto them, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? (KJV)

They are vile creatures wallowing, like swine, in the filthy delights of the senses. Among all criminals, they are the worst: for they are hypocrites as well as exploiters. To robbers, harlots, and thieves, Gainas and Buddhists extended an easy forgiveness; for the impecunious are rarely injured by such as these.

We are told that since not even one of the ancient rishis had ever seen Brahman (the Creator)face to face (Ibid., 14), all this talk of Vedas composed by the god was nothing but nonsense; and to intone these verses precisely as handed down was sheer folly.

THE REVERSION OF HELL

The Brahmanas had threatened all who violated their codes with torture after death. But the Buddhist revolutionaries turned the tables, and made hell the inevitable portion of the rich, the comfortable, the powerful —in short, of all those who enjoyed the good things which the underprivileged could not obtain. Thus, for the first time, hell became the means of compensating for social injustice. The Buddhist told the Brahmana: "Verily, ye have had your reward"; and hereafter for them there would "be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

Again contrast with these passages from the teachings of Jesus:

Matt 6:2 2 Therefore when thou doest thine alms, do not sound a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets [referring to some of the Pharisee religious leaders], that they may have glory of men. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward. (KJV)

Matt 6:5 5 And when thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are: [referring to some of the Pharisee religious leaders]for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward. (KJV)

Matt 6:16 16 Moreover when ye fast, be not, as the hypocrites [referring to some of the Pharisee religious leaders], of a sad countenance: for they disfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to fast. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward. (KJV)

ALLEGIENCES BETWEEN THE POOR AND CIVIL AUTHORITIES OVER RELIGIOUS AUTHORITIES

`It is significant that the founders of the heretical communions were reported to be Kshatriyas or Kings, who were considered far less tyrannical than the priests. The Gainas and the Buddhists sought to make allies of the secular rulers by offering to transfer the civil authority to them. These Buddhists desired, in effect, to separate religion from politics, to remove the priesthood from control over temporal life, and to abolish the Brahmanic codes together with the caste system. They demanded the right to worship as they pleased. Buddhism was an attempt to establish a free conscience.

THE EMPHASIS OF THE RIGHTS AND VIRTUES OF THE POOR

Buddhism emphasized the rights and the virtues of the poor. Buddhism also considered poverty and sainthood synonymous; and proclaimed that, since wealth is wicked, the rich must give all they have to the indigent on pain of excruciating torture in hell. The Buddhists taught that one is not to bestow gifts on those who will reciprocate! We must give only to those who can return nothing, and such must we entertain at our tables. This was also the ethic of Jesus, as declared in Luke 6:32-35:

Luke 6:32-35

32 For if ye love them which love you, what thank have ye? for sinners also love those that love them. 33 And if ye do good to them which do good to you, what thank have ye? for sinners also do even the same. 34 And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again. 35 But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest: for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil. (KJV)

This is a moral system dear to the hearts of all the penniless. Neither Buddhism nor the Jesus has one word of commendation for industry, thrift, self-reliance, domestic responsibility, or the hard-working man who produces the food, clothing, and shelter by which the world subsists. For religions are, like political creeds, instruments to attain the social and economic objectives of those who embrace them. It would indeed be unnatural for grossly underpaid toilers to glorify labor.

MAHAVIRA

The following sketch of Mahavira (Kalpa-Sutra) indicates that the tradition concerning Mahavira mingled fact with myth, as is the case with so many outstanding personalities. Like all the Gainas who inherited his authority, he was said to have been conceived in an extraordinary virgin birth. He was a pre-existing god who at the proper moment assumed a human form for the purpose of saving humanity. First, he entered the body of Devananda, wife of a Brahmana; but, while still in embryonic state, he was transferred to that of Trisala, wife of a Kshatriya. The prophet was thus a member of both upper castes.

Many wonderful portents accompanied his birth: the whole universe was resplendent with gods and goddesses descending from and ascending to heaven; the king increased all weights and measures; customs, taxes, and confiscations were remitted; police officers were prohibited fom entering and searching houses; fines and debts were canceled. We are reminded of the American Bill of Rights.

At the usual age of thirty, Mahavira began his active ministry; and when he entered upon his great work, the gods sang a song in which they hailed him as the savior of mankind.

Of Mahavira, we read that he "gave up forever his claims in any property, just as a snake casts off its slough. His power and wealth, his friends, wives, sons, and relations, he gave up as he shook the dust from his feet. More than four months many sorts of living beings gathered on his body, crawled about it, and caused pain there. For a time, the Venerable One, giving up his robe, was a naked, world-relinquishing, houseless sage. Renouncing the female sex, ... he meditated Giving up the company of all householders whomsoever, he meditated . . . he, to whom women were known as the causes of all sinful acts, saw the true state of the world" (Uttaradhyana, II:XIX, 86-87; Akaranga-Sutra, I, viii, 1:2-16).

Like a Brahmana ascetic, but repudiating Brahmana control, he wandered from village to village, houseless and homeless, renouncing all human fellowship, naked and forlorn, indifferent to every hardship and misery, making converts, and teaching the pathway to Nirvana (Kalpa-Sutra, 119) which he declared could be attained by any individual, regardless of age, caste, or Vedic knowledge, provided only he embraced the Gaina discipline.

THE CENTRAL BELIEF

The core of the Gaina teaching, as in the Bhagavad-Gita, was that men are divided into two classes, the wise and the fools. The doctrine was extreme renuncation of property and any form of materialism. The wise renounce everything, but the fools heap up an evil kharma, which will plague them into hell, and which compels them to believe that they must "provide for a mother, for a father, for a sister, for a wife, for sons, for daughters" and must possess "different kinds of property . . . Longing for these objects, people work day and night . . . commit injuries and violent acts'' (Akaranga-Sutra, I, ii, 1:1-4).

While the wise ascetic who begged at his door goes to heaven, the rich fool goes to the torments of hell; "thus a fool doing evil deeds which benefit another will ignorantly thereby come to grief'' (Ibid., I, ii, 3-5). Again and again we are told that only fools lay by stores, where fire destroys and where thieves break in and steal.

Again we find in the mouth of Jesus the same teachings:

Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: 20 But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: (KJV)

The Buddhists taught than no one was to hoard anything, not even so much as a speck of grease in a begging bowl (Uttaradhyana, II:VI, 15). We are to take no thought for the morrow, where we shall lodge, what we shall eat, or wherewithal we shall be clothed.

Again we find the same things in the mouth of Jesus:

Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment? (KJV)

In short, gifts to the official priesthood (Brahamanas) would never reduce the giver's evil kharma; but alms to Gaina saints would bear fruit an hundredfold. Those who cast their bread upon the waters would receive it again after many days.

GAUTAMA

Among Max Muller's Sacred Books of the East are the Fo-Sho-Hing-Tsan-King and the BuddhaKarita, which are purported biographies of Gautama and in which we find, as we might expect, a skeleton of fact heavily encrusted with myth. The fabulous founder of Buddhism was known by a variety of names: the Tathagata, the Bodhisattva, the Master, Lord, or Teacher, the Eye or the Light of the World, the Blessed or the Awakened One.

PRE-EXISTENCE AND MIRACULOUS BIRTH

The Bodhisattva had for ages been a heavenly spirit until in the fullness of time he entered the womb of Queen Maya, wife of the great King Sakya of the Gotama family in northern India. At his birth, the Devas, or angels, as in Luke 2:14, raised their voices in heavenly song (Fo-Sho-Hing, 21). But the Queen, his mother, overcome by the supernatural birth she had given, departed this life and ascended to heaven in a miraculous assumption very much like that later accorded to Mary. A venerable rishi came to the palace and foretold the destiny of the newborn savior. The prophet declared that this child "will rule the world," and that he "shall give up his royal estate from the domain of the five senses, with resolution and with diligence practice austerities, and, thus awakening, grasp the truth" (Fo-Sho-Hing, 95-96).

Notice the parallel with Luke 2:25-26:

Luke 2:25-26 25

And, behold, there was a man in Jerusalem, whose name was Simeon; and the same man was just and devout, waiting for the consolation of Israel: and the Holy Ghost was upon him. 26 And it was revealed unto him by the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death, before he had seen the Lord's Christ. (KJV)

We are told that the child's foot was marked with the Wheel of the Law (Buddha-Karita, I, 65). The prophet-seer declares that "having forsaken his kingdom . . . He will proclaim the way of deliverance to those afflicted with sorrow . . . now overcome by misery, destitute of every refuge" (Ibid., 74, 77, 80). The fond father, revolving in his mind these disturbing prophecies, sealed his heir away from the world, surrounded him with every luxury, and in due time married him to the unblemished princess Yasodhara, who bore him a splendid son Rahula (Ibid., II, 26, 46). As you can see he was not celibate.

Gautama, however, yearned to observe life outside the royal gardens; and the king was at last constrained to give consent. In spite of every precaution, the young man witnessed old age, disease, and death; and learned that these are inevitable for all. Upon his return, the saddened prince was not beguiled by the bevies of beautiful women with whom the king had surrounded him. All he could think of was that "youthful beauty soon fades, destroyed by old age, disease, and death . . . This is the great distress" (Fo-Sho-Hing, 95-96).

YET HE WOULD LATER ABANDON HIS FAMILY AND HOME & BECOMES AN ASCETIC

When approaching the well-established thirtieth year, the prince decided he must become a ascetic to seek escape from the Wheel of Life. And so he abandoned father, foster-mother, wife, son, relatives, houses, lands, and riches to seek the Kingdom of Righteousness.

First, he came to the Wood of Austerities, the Painful Forest, in which six Brahmana ascetics practiced rigorous self-mortification. Gautama, however, found that all this hardship could, at best, lead only to a temporary sojourn in heaven; it could never lead to Nirvana, because it did not guarantee any radical transformation of the moral nature. Turning his back, therefore, upon these men, he declared that he sought a higher law. All the religious teachers he had so far met were, he said, "like the man born blind, leading the blind man as a guide (Fo-Sho-Hing, 765) as in Matthew 15:14.

14 Let them alone: they be blind leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch. 15 Then answered Peter and said unto him, Declare unto us this parable. (KJV)

Arriving at the hermitage of the great Gaina sage Arada, Gautama listened intently while the renowned ascetic expounded his system, which, of course, rejected Brahmanism, here described as the way "of ignorance and doubt" (Fo-Sho-Hing, 947-948). We must achieve that "inward rest and peace" by which "the idea of 'I' departs, and the objects of 'I'; clearly comprehending the non-existence of matter is the condition of immaterial life" (Ibid., 975-977).

But the metaphysical idealism, as well as the Upanishad theory of the universal soul, which lay at the base of the Gaina philosophy, left Gautama unconvinced. For he never believed that finite souls are mere particles of the Supreme Self which can subsist as isolated atoms. He sought instead a doctrine which would remold and reweld the bond of human fellowship shattered by Brahmanic divisiveness; and he sought, not the mastery over desire, but the complete emancipation from it, and from all objects of sense. And so the young saint rejected Arada's doctrines with respect, but with finality (Fo-Sho-Hing, 997).

THE REJECTION OF ASCETICISM

With the celebrated, independent sage Gaya, Gautama then practiced abstinence for six years until his body was emaciated into skin and bones. He perceived, however, at last that ultimate happiness can never be attained by mortification, by isolation, or by self denial. He concluded that true sinlessness has meaning only when it exists in one enjoying his full strength and in complete possession of his organs and his faculties (Buddha-Karita, XII, 87-101). The real saint would renounce only the duties and the obligations of the world, but none of its comforts or security. And so the great sage bathed, took food, and, thus refreshed, seated himself under the celebrated Bodhi tree; he resolved never to go thence until he comprehended fully the pathway to salvations.

Later, when the ascetics of other breeds, like the disciples of the Baptist beholding Jesus, saw how the Tathagate conducted himself, "They said to one another, 'This is Gautama who has come hither, the ascetic who has abandoned self-control,' " who " ' wanders about now, greedy, of impure will and unstable.' ' 4a

THE GREAT TEMPTATION OF BUDDHA

And now, in his still weakened condition, he was compelled to endure his great temptation. Mara, the god of this world and the Lord of desire, rebuked the Tathagata for rejecting the religion of his fathers; offered empire and wordly power; told the sage that he should perform his political duties when young, and become saintly in his old age. Mara's three daughters, Lust, Thirst, and Delight, lavished their wiles upon him in vain. They upbraided him for abandoning his duties toward parents, wife, children, home, as only the Evil One would do; they painted the life of the prosperous householder and virtuous king in the most glowing colors (Ibid., XV, 17-18). , But the saint saw through all the stratagems of Mara, who, cowering in fear (Ibid., XIV, 70-71), slunk at last ignominiously away, and left the Bodhisatva in triumphal peace (Fo-Sho-Hing, 1106-1108).

And now a great light burst upon Gautama: for he comprehended the Four Noble Truths and the Eight-Fold Path which lead to salvation. Sitting under the Bodhitree in ecstatic contemplation, Gautama, the sage, became the Buddha, the Enlightened One, "the Bhagavat, the Arhat, the King of the Law, the Tathagata . . . the Lord of all science" (Buddha-Karita, XIV, 67-68).

The six Brahmanic Bhikkshus whom Gautama had met in the Painful Forest became his first convert-disciples. Next, he converted fifty-four Yasas, noble companions of his former days. He gave these sixty perfect Arhats their charge, exactly as another religious teacher was to do some six centuries later in Palestine. We read: "Go ye then through every country, convert those not yet converted (Fo-Sho-Hing, 1299).

King Bimbasara, the first royal disciple, was followed by many others, who, renouncing everything, and equipped with orange robe and begging bowl, assumed the houseless state. It must have been a great inspiration to Sudras and Parasavas to know that, in becoming ascetics, they were members of so glorious a fellowship.

THE HOLY BROTHERHOOD

And now the Buddha made a revolutionary innovation at about the same time that a parallel development was taking place in southern Italy under Pythagoras. Rejecting the Existentialism of the Gainas, Gautama founded holy brotherhoods and sisterhoods; and he provided communal homes, donated by wealthy converts, for their comfort and protection. Thus he restored the bond of human fellowship: men and women were no longer to be isolated atoms, living unto themselves alone. They became organized societies, sharing their property as well as their ministrations and aspirations. They forsook the world, but they no longer forsook each other; they rejected marriage, family, home, and labor, but they did not reject humanity. These Bhikkhus and Bhikkhunis were the prototypes of the monks and nuns who appeared some eight centuries later in Catholic Europe, Egypt, and Asia Minor.

The Buddha returned to his home, where his father was anguished to see his royal son begging for food. The Tathagata, like Jesus, was "moved with pity for the multitude" (Ibid., 1551, 1553), and performed miracles, which prompted the conversion of the king, together with all his household, including Yasodhara and Rahula: "the people all were filled with faith" (Ibid., 1671). His aunt and foster-mother Gopiti became the head of a convent.

And so for forty-five years Gautama trod the highways and the byways of India, making "millions of ascetics, disciples, Arhats, sages, mendicants, and festers—and delivering from their ills the blind, the humpbacked, the lame, the insane, the maimed, as well as the destitute—and establishing many persons of the fourth caste in the true inactivity and inaction" (Buddha-Karita, XVII, 25, 30).

And so the great prophet converted harlots, robbers, and other criminals; he called unto himself the poor and the ignorant, women, children, slaves, Sudras, and outcastes. And in this religion all were glorified.

The Buddha declared: "I shall not die until this pure religion of mine shall have . . . been well proclaimed among all men!" At the age of eighty, he decided to leave this world, and enter his well-earned rest. When his soul passed, "the great earth quaked throughout" and "up to the heavenly mansions flames burst forth; the crash of thunder shook the heavens and earth, rolling along the mountains and valleys . . . The sun and moon withdrew their shining" (Fo-Sho-Hing, 2104-2108). After all, an incarnate god, the savior of the world, could scarcely depart without some strange disturbances of nature. The example from the Gospel of Matthew is especially striking:

51 And, behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom; and the earth did quake, and the rocks rent; 52 And the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, 53 And came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many. (KJV)

BUDDHISM AS AN ESTABLISHED RELIGION

Scholars believe that Gautama was born in or about 557 and died in 477 B.C.E. There is no doubt that the principal features of his religion—such as the Four Noble Truths, the Eight-Fold Path, and the organization of celibate orders—were established by the founder himself. Buddhism in time produced a large number of sacred books and, as is the case with all ancient religions, no one knows by whom or just when these were written. As there was no writing in India in the fifth century, B.C., such scriptures must have been transmitted orally from one Tathagata to another. We know that by the end of Gautama's life, his teaching had spread far and wide and he had a multitude of followers. In the year of his death, the First Council was held at Ragagriha under the leadership of Buddha's most important disciples, Kasyapa, Ananda, and Upali. Just a century later, the Second Council was held at Vesali.

KING ASOKA

During the subsequent period, Buddhism made enormous progress; and in 256 B. C. occurred the greatest single external event in its history, when King Asoka, ruler of the territory which now approximately comprises modern India, Afghanistan, and Baluchistan, was converted; he made Buddhism the state religion; he erected temples, shrines, altars, and monuments throughout his realm; and he issued many edicts to establish the faith. In Ale, he presided at the great Third Council held at Pataliputra, his capital, at which the Buddhist canon—thereafter accepted as divinely revealed—was established and closed; and various questions dealing with doctrine and discipline were resolved. The basic documents of Buddhism, therefore, derive from the third century, B. C.

Immediately after the great council at Pataliputra, an immense proselyting campaign was undertaken. Buddhist missionaries penetrated every portion of the then known world, including Greece, Egypt, Baktria, Asia Minor, and the Second Persian Empire. Palestine must have been permeated by Buddhist ideology during the first century. It would have been impossible for anyone to remain unaffected by its doctrine. However, the new faith won its most signal victories in the Far East. In ,4~, Mahendra went to Ceylon, and converted its political leaders. That country remains Buddhist to this day, and the faith is still widespread in Burma, Siam, Bangkok, Japan, China, and Tibet.

The golden age of Buddhism, therefore, came in the third century, B. C. But its strength was also its weakness; it won adherents by revolutionary renunciation, but by the same token it cut off the source of wealth and, even worse, threatened the continuity of the race. Slowly, gradually, Brahmanism won back India; for, even though it was an onerous system, it demanded labor, and encouraged human propagation. It absorbed a good deal of the Buddhist philosophy, including toleration, and became Hinduism. Buddhism itself, however, expelled from India, was constrained to modify its pristine doctrines in order to survive.

The Four Noble Truths of Buddhism are those about sorrow; the cause of sorrow; the cessation of sorrow; and the path which leads to its cessation:

"When these noble truths are grasped and known, the craving for existence is rooted out . . . and there is no more birth" (Great Decease, II, 7). The Eight-Fold Path consists of "Right Views; Right Aspirations; Right Speech; Right Conduct; Right Livelihood; Right Effort; Right Mindfulness; and Right Contemplation" (Foundation of the Kingdom of Righteousness, 4). Buddha declared that these Noble Truths and this Eight-Fold Path constitute the Middle Way to salvation, avoiding alike the worldliness of the Brahmanas and the harsh asceticism of the Gainas. "I, then," he said, "reject both these extremes; my heart keeps in the middle way" (Fo-Sho-Hing, 1243). The victorious 13hikkhu could even wear fine clothing, enjoy comfortable living quarters, and eat nourishing food without sin, so long as he did not crave these material things or perform any labor to obtain them (Dhammapada, X, 141-142). His body must never be subjected to abuse, torture, or starvation. And so Buddhism became, in its maturity, the creed of idle and indigent voluptuaries.

The six-spoked Wheel of the Law remains to this day the symbol of Buddhism, as the Cross is that of Christianty; and it represents the victory of the Arhat over the six deadly sins, all of which originate in the body; any craving arising from sight, taste, smell, touch, hearing, or in the mind itself can only lead to pain, torture, and misery. The Wheel of the Law must therefore be implanted in the heart of man to stop forever the motion of the Wheel of Life.

Buddhism made salvation an internal, not an external, process. Again and again in history similar developments have taken place: any religion which, like Brahmanism, long enjoys exclusive power, creates a privileged priesthood and establishes forms, rituals, and ceremonies which have nothing to do with man's moral regeneration or the ethical inter-relationships of society. Buddhism declared: as man thinketh in his heart, so is he. "All that we are is the result of what we have thought: it is founded on our thoughts, it is made up of our thoughts" (Ibid., I, 1). Hatred and anger, resentment and hostility, must be replaced by tranquil love. A true conversion is the sine qua non: that is, the whole of life must be directed by new aspirations into new channels. In this, outward acts or religious rituals are without efficacy: "Neither the flesh of fish, nor fasting, nor nakedness, nor tonsure, nor matted hair, nor dirt, nor rough skins, nor the worshiping of the fire, nor the many immortal penances in the world, nor hymns, nor oblations, nor sacrifices, nor observances of the seasons, purify a mortal" (Kullavagga, 248). Thus the sacraments and ceremonials so dear to every priesthood were repudialed. The great battle must be fought out within the mind; the victory must be over the self: "If one man conquers only himself, he is the greatest of conquerors" (Dhammapada, VIII, 103).

The gospel of Buddha, like that of Jesus (Matt. 28:19) was offered to every one: "As the rays of the sun and moon descend alike on all men, good and bad . . . so the wisdom of the Tathagata shines like the sun . . . upon all" (Saddharma-Pundarika, V, 45-46). Jesus repeated the very same idea in Matt. 5:45.

THE SAMGHA: THE HOLY BROTHERHOOD

SOCIAL RECONSTITUTION

As we have noted, Gautama organized his disciples into a new kind of community, intended at a single stroke to dissolve the bonds of tribe, clan, nation, city, village, and family, replace all these by voluntary associations of male and female celibates, dwelling together solely for meditation and spiritual edification.

BARRIERS AGAINS ADMISSION

Instead of using persuasion to recruit membership, the Samgha erected barriers against admission; it established a rigorous discipline; and it expelled those who proved indocile. One can easily see why members would fear expulsion: for in addition to shipwreck in the life to come, this involved no small deprivation in the present. For many of the monks and nuns—often former Sudras, slaves, outcastes, and harlots—lived comfortably and with little or no effort in monasteries and convents which had formerly been the palaces of nobles, kings, or wealthy courtesans. Such gifts were a reasonable price from Kshatriyas to pay for political victory over the Brahmanas. The only exertion on the part of monks, we read, consisted in walking—a very healthy and, we take it, necessary exercise for these quiescent saints. No wonder that the poor, the despised, the downtrodden, the disinherited of the earth came flocking to the Buddhist order by the thousands, where they could live, not only in comfort, but also in security and idleness.

Those considered worthy were admitted to the sacred circle. Taking the vow of poverty, chastity, and obedience, as Brahmana students had done since time immemorial, they assumed the yellow robe, and, turning their backs upon the world, entered the holy life of communist celibacy and equality (Great Decrease, I, 11).

EXPULSION

We read that any "Bhikkhu who is angry, and who bears enmity in his heart . . . remains without reverence for, and without delight in, the Teacher, the Dhamma [Doctrine], and the Samgha [Brotherhood], and does not fulfill the duties of the disciple." Such an evil person must be put away, removed, expelled. The same peremptory treatment must be applied to any one who is hypocritical, envious, jealous, crafty, treacherous, or who has "sinful desires and false beliefs; who is tarnished by love of worldly gain, devoted to getting and taking, for whom to renounce a thing is hard" (Kullavagga, IV, xiv, 3).

ELABORATE RULES OF CONDUCT

As time went on, codes almost as elaborate as the Brahmanic, accredited to Gautama himself, were developed to regulate offenses for which a Bhikkhu must be expelled: first, for having carnal knowledge of woman or beast; second, for committing theft; third, for inciting to suicide; and, fourth, for claiming knowledge which he does not possess" (Patimokkha, Paragika Dhamma 1-4).

THE ETHICS OF BUDDHISM

PERSONAL RELATIONSHIPS

The ethical system of Buddhism is its most important feature; and especially so to us, since it reappears substantially unaltered in the Gospel Jesus. We must never be proud, nor harbor anger or resentment against any one. Whosoever exalts himself shall be degraded (Sutra-Nipata, I, 7:131); harsh language must never be used to anyone (Dhammapada, X, 133). Let a man overcome anger by love ...evil by good . . .; the greedy by liberality, the liar by truthl'' (Ibid., XVII, 223). "Let us live happily, then, not hating those who hate us . . . among men who are greedy, let us dwell free from greed" (Ibid., XV, 197, 199). We must not scrutinize the mote in another's eye, and fail to see the beam in our own.73 No matter how unjustly one is attacked or abused, one must never strike back at an aggressor (Ibid., XXVI, 389). This was the Buddhist commandment to turn the other cheek.

COMMUNIST PRACTICE

We are to live happily, calling nothing our own (Ibid., XV, 200); if we possess two garments, we must give one to a needy Bhikkhu who is less fortunate (Makavagga, VIII, 13:7). This was the same ideal which Jesus expressed when He said that if any one demands our coats, we should surrender our cloaks also.

THE WICKEDNESS AND FOOLISHNESS OF WEALTH

The Wickedness and Foolishness of Wealth. The story of the rich man who goes to hell occurs in Buddhist as well as in Gaina literature. The man who is enslaved by wife, children, lands, and stores declares: "'Here shall I dwell . . . in winter and summer,' . . . and does not think of his death. Death comes and carries off that man praised for his children, and flocks . . . as a flood carries off a sleeping village" (Dhammapada, XX, 286-287). The cravings of ignorant and sensual men are insatiable; no quantity of wealth is ever sufficient. We read: "If the whole world and all treasures were yours, you would still not be satisfied, nor would all this be able to save you" (Uttaradhyana, II:XIV, 39); which is also the message of Jesus (Matt. 16:26; Mark 8:36).

ALMS AND GIFTS

Although the Buddhist Arhat despised the world, he was in no hurry to depart, nor did he scorn the good things therein. Alms or gifts to the saints are, therefore, always represented as of incomparable virtue (Mahavagga, 490). The greatest virtue of laymen consisted in supplying Arhats with their every need (Saddharma-Pundarika, XVI, 17-22). And, inost of all, they should provide them with monasteries or rest homes, complete with pleasant walks and gardens. It seems that the idle saints wished to live like royalty. We are told that anyone who gives a monastery to the Arhats will himself at death attain Nirvana (Questions of Melinda, IV, 5:3); and again, that even though the Blessed One could be attacked with impunity, had Mara attempted to prevent the giving of alms to Arhats, his head would instantly have been split into a thousand pieces (Ibid., IV, 2:26). One of the principal objectives of Gautama was to divert the gifts of householders and Kshatriyas from the Brahmanas to his own disciples. And so he made asceticism comfortable and attractive.

INTERNAL CONTRADICTIONS

And now we come upon the same contradiction which is implicit throughout the New Testament. For in this Buddha-teaching, which purports to radiate so much gentleness, mercy, non-violence, forgiveness, brotherhood, humanity, non-aggression, universal love, and benignity toward enemies, there blazes up suddenly a fierce and implacable hatred toward all those who abuse the brethren or reject the doctrines of the Master. For all these, the fires of hell blaze hot and long, and its tortures are elaborated with excruciating refinement (Saddharma-Pundarika, III, 113-130).

The step between condemning an opponent to hell and laying violent hands upon him in the here and now has, unfortunately, proved very short in the bloody history of religious persecution. If every heretic is possessed by the devil and must, at all events, burn in hell, why not give him a slight foretaste without delay? Buddha and Jesus inculcated love among the brethren and non-resistance to superior force; but there was little love or toleration for skeptics, Brahmanas, or Pharisees; that is, for religious opponents or for anyone who doubted the truth of their revelations.

MONKS DEMAND PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES

In time, the Buddhist monks—although they never sought to control civil society as such—began to claim almost as many privileges and immunities as had once been the lot of the Brahmanas: "Those who scoff and hoot at monks . . . shall have their teeth broken and separated . . . disgusting lips, a flat nose, contorted hands and feet, squinting eyes, a putrid body covered with stinking boils, eruptions, scabs, and itch. If anyone speaks an unkind word concerning them, true or not true, . . . it must be considered a most heinous sin" (Ibid., XXVI). Even the most wicked monks must therefore be immune from criticism.

SUPERSTITIONS

Buddhism borrowed generously from Brahmanic supernaturalism and elaborated upon it. Various charms and spells were to be used by Buddhist missionaries; and when these were hurled against the creatures of darkness, "No one shall overpower or hurt such preachers: no goblin, giant, ghost, devil, imp, sorcerer, spectre, gnome" (Ibid., XXI). If a person is bound in fetters, he has but to think of these mighty spells, "and the bonds shall be speedily loosened" (Ibid., XXIV, 11). The pious monk was assured that "his body can never be hurt by weapons, fire, poison, sticks, or clods" (Ibid., XIII, 58). Buddhist propagandists were provided with ample protection: "I shall rouse, excite, and stimulate them, and give them spells whereby those preachers shall become inviolable, so that no being, either human or not human, shall be able to surprise them, and no woman able to beguile them. I will protect them . . . avert blows, and destroy poison" (Ibid., XXVI). This is also the promise of Mark 16: 17-18.

THE KINGDOM OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

There is a twofold meaning to the Buddhist teaching on the Kingdom of Righeteousness. The Kingdom of Righteousness runs like a red thread through all the Buddhist scriptures, as does the Kingdom of Heaven in the Gospel Jesus; and in both evangels, it has a two-fold meaning: first, it is a moral entity, to be set up in the heart and the mind of the saint; and, second, a physical reality to be established one day on earth. In that glorious kingdom, in which the saints shall have achieved final victory, the renovated earth "will be filled with high edifices . . . monks will be exempt from . . . punishment and from womankind; . . . they will lead a spiritual life, have ideal bodies, be self-lighting, magical, moving in the firmament, strenuous, of good memory, wise, and possessed of gold-colored bodies" (Saddharma-Pundarika, VIII).

RENUNCIATION ABANDONED

As the Buddhists became socially and politically dominant, they cast off even the mild renunciation of their founder, and were no longer content with the prospect of Nirvana. Instead, they anticipated personal immortality after death and residence in a great city of sensuous delight which was to have seven ramparts, made of gold, silver, crystal, beryl, agate, coral, and "one of all kinds of gems."ge And in this wondrous city, the Great King of Glory will maintain the faithful in perpetual luxury (Maha-Sadassana Gotaka).

THE ESSENTIAL CONTRADICTION

And so once again the essential contradiction of Buddhism lies starkly revealed: in heaven, the righteous will luxuriate precisely in those very things which it is the greatest infamy to possess in this life. As the rulers were rich and idle, and as the laborers were poor and weary, the mere possession of wealth and ease was the ineradicable badge of iniquity. In heaven, however, by a divine poetic justice, all things will be reversed: the Great King will give every material blessing to the poor of the earth, who become righteous because they renounce what they cannot obtain. And in heaven there need be no injustice or exploitation, because food, clothing, gold, palaces, jewels, etc., will all be produced by divine fiat, and there all will live eternally in blissful repose.

BUDDHISM TRIUMPHANT

We have already cited The Questions of Melinda, written in Ceylon about l00 B.C.E., where Buddhism had become the dominant faith. The hero of the piece is the sage Nagasena, who, like so many other religious teachers, came into the world through a virgin birthed As a child, we are told, he learned the three canonical Fedas in one moment "by heart, could intone them correctly, understood their meaning . . . and grasped their mysteries;" but "he found no value in them;" they were worthless, "empty as chaff" (Ibid., 23).

We find in The Questions certain accretions to doctrine and practice, absent from the original Buddhist canon: for example, purgatory has now become an established eschatological feature, and bathing to purify from sin an essential ritual (Ibid., IV, 6:24).

The most significant portions of the work deal with the problems which arose with the triumph of Buddhism. Since it was devised to escape the oppression of a ruthless and impregnably intrenched ruling class, its strength lay in its power to withdraw the labor on which the whole social superstructure rested; its weakness lay in the fact that, should its ideals be victorious, these must be remade or ignored, since they called for the extinction of the race. Many contradictions, therefore, had arisen which critics were quick to emphasize; and when King Melinda of Ceylon (called Menandrasa by Plutarch) was converted to Buddhism, no one but Nagasena could resolve his doubts, which he struggled valiantly to do, in a series of mythical conversations. For example, the king notes that "the Blessed One said: 'Doing no injury to anyone, dwell full of love and kindness in this world.' And on the other hand he said: 'Punish him who deserves punishment' . . . if the first injunction is right . . . the second must be wrong'' (Ibid., IV, 3:55).

To which the Venerable Nagasena replies: "The Blessed One . . . gave both commands you quote . . . But as to the second command . . . that is a special use of terms . . . The proud heart, great king, is to be subdued, and the lowly heart cultivated" (Ibid., IV, 3:36).

In due course, the king inquires whether Nirvana can be attained otherwise than by living as a recluse and a celibate (Ibid., VI). At great length, Nagasena explains that many millions of laymen who do not renounce the world are nevertheless Arhats; the puzzled king wonders "what purpose . . . these extra vows serve . . . if laymen, living at home and enjoying the pleasures of sense, can see Nirvana (Ibid., VI, 5).

There was a good question! And the prolixity of the reply indicates the incompatibility of Buddhism with life itself. The sage, however, finally devises a solution: anyone who, in his last incarnation, has rigidly observed the thirteen vows, achieves Arhatship in the present life (Ibid., VI, 22). No longer do the saints pass immediately into Nirvana upon death; for they "will be reborn only once more on earth''(Ibid., V, 8). And so the celibate of a former incarnation receives a double reward; for he appears once again on earth as a Vaisya- or Kshatriya-Arhat, enjoying once more the pleasure of sensel07 before eternal oblivion.

ORIGINAL BUDDHISM SWEPT AWAY

This novel doctrine opened the door wide to almost everything that the founder of Buddhism had condemned so virulently. Now there could be millions of comfortable or wealthy laymen who, merely by giving verbal assent to the Buddhist philosophy and by persuading themselves that they had been ascetics in their previous existence, could marry, rear children, produce goods, own houses and stores, engage in business, manufacture, or agriculture, employ laborers at small wages, and still imagine themselves to be Arhats because of virtue acquired in a former incarnation. And so, in spite of all doctrine and discipline, men and women went on with their immemorial task of reproduction and of earning their livelihood. An almost precisely parallel development took place in Christianity once it took root. As it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be, world without end. Amen! Amen!

INFLUENCE UPON CHRISTIANITY

The Brahmanas became the models for the official Catholic clergy and that the Buddhist movement was incorporated into Christianity in the fourth century as monachism; and thus the Church took to its bosom both of the great and antagonistic religions of India.

Buddhism, however, exercised another and even greater influence upon Christianity: for much of Buddhism and its ethical system passed almost intact into the New Testament and the Gospels, probably as an independent influence upon Jesus himself, although much of this philosophy was almost identical to that held by the Pythagorean Essenes.

In this Buddhist/Pythagorean/Essene morality, the following principles are dominant:

- One must practice brotherhood, charity, and communism among the Elect
- Before God, all humanity is equal
- It is wicked to possess wealth
- All property constitutes a moral contamination of which we can be purged only by giving it to the poor
- Only the indigent can be righteous
- One must divest ourselves of the world and all its works
- One must renounce sex, family, father, mother, sister, brother, child, and relations
- One must give all that we possess to those poor who have renounced the world, who have not where to lay their heads
- One must return love for hate, kindness for abuse
- One must never retaliate against those who injure us
- Above all, one must rid the heart and mind utterly of all anger and resentment
- Sin consists not so much in outward acts, as in the desire to perpetrate them

There must be a cataclysmic moral transformation called conversion, by which we conquer the evil indwelling self, and create the kingdom of righteousness within ourselves.

Jesus also agreed with Buddha that religion should be separate from the civil government and that religious men should obey the established secular laws which, in turn, should never dictate to the conscience. Buddhism made this ideology the common possession of the ancient world.

We said at the beginning that four basic elements constitute the basic teachings of the New Testament:

- Soteriology
- Ethics
- Eschatology
- Messianic concept

The first, as we have seen, came from the mystery-cults, and the second from Zoroastrianism. And now we find that its ethics were derived, at least in part, from Buddhism. The Messianic concpet as recorded in the New Testament is a mixture of the Jewish Davidic Messiah and the Angel-Messiah of the Essenes as taken from sun-myths

Arthur Lillie, in The Influence of Buddhism on Primitive Christianity, 1893, says:

"In the New Testament there are two Christs, an Essene and an anti-Essene Christ, and all modern biographers who have sought to combine the two have failed necessarily"

My research has shown him to be true. The "Jesus" of the Synoptics and the "Jesus" of the Gospel of John are diamterially opposite. As if this was not enough, we have observed also that the doctrines as taught in the New Testament are a synthesis of major tenants of world religions dating all the way back to Egypt and beyond. Again as if that was not enough, the doctrine of the Virgin Birth, without which no prophet or savior-god could be a divine incarnation, was so common among ancient cults that it was impossible for any religious founder to achieve acceptance without it. It was, indeed, unknown in Brahmanism or Judaism; but these exercised little or no influence on Jesus or his teachings. In the mystery-cult, in Zoroastrianism, and in Buddhism, all saviors, past, present, and future, were incarnate gods, born of human virgins; this was an idea which came so easily and so naturally to primitive priests in order to establish their own authority that it sprang up independently in many places; Jesus was simply accorded the same honor by universal demand after his cult began making converts in the pagan world.

ISIS AND SERAPIS (GREEK FOR OSIRIS)

Isis, in Egyptian mythology, is the goddess of fertility and motherhood. According to the Egyptian belief, she was the daughter of the god Keb ("Earth") and the goddess Nut ("Sky"), the sister-wife of Osiris, judge of the dead, and mother of Horus, god of day. After the end of the New Kingdom in the 4th century B.C.E. the center of Isis worship, which was then reaching its greatest peak, was on Philae, an island in the Nile, where a great temple was built to her during the 30th Dynasty. Ancient stories described Isis as having great magical skill, and she was represented as human in form though she was frequently described as wearing the horns of a cow. Her personality was believed to resemble that of Athor, or Hathor, the goddess of love and gaiety. The cult of Isis spread from Alexandria throughout the Hellenistic world after the 4th century B.C.E. It appeared in Greece in combination with the cults of Horus, her son, and Serapis, the Greek name for Osiris. The Greek historian Herodotus identified Isis with Demeter, the Greek goddess of earth, agriculture, and fertility. The tripartite cult (Trinity) of Isis, Horus, and Serapis was later introduced around 86 B.C.E. into Rome in the consulship of Lucius Cornelius Sulla and became one of the most popular branches of Roman religion. It later received a bad reputation through the licentiousness of some of its priestly rites, and subsequent consuls suppressed or limited Isis worship. The cult died out in Rome after the institution of Christianity, and the last Egyptian temples to Isis were closed in the mid-6th century AD.

The worship of Isis became an independent Egyptian cult near the close of the Middle Kingdom, which was concluded by the XVIIth Dynasty in 1580 B.C.E. And during the succeeding millennium under the New Kingdom, her shrines and temples spread into every corner of the land. Statues of Isis suckling her infant son were familiar to all; in this characteristic pose, Isis became the venerated madonna of the pre-Christian world. For centuries, Catholics mistook these images for Mary-Jesus. Sometimes, Osiris was depicted with his wife and child; and the three became the type of the Holy Family. The depiction of the seated holding or suckling the child Horus is reminiscent of the iconography of Mary and Jesus.

The cult of Isis appeared in Syria about the 7th century B.C.E. It was not, however, until the Hellenistic period beginning in 333 B.C.E. that it began spreading rapidly; in that year, a temple was erected for the goddess at Piraeus. During the reign of Ptolomy I Soter, 325-285 B.C.E., Isis became so popular in Greece that a great temple was built for her at the foot of the Acropolis; and in the ensuing centuries, as we learn from Pausanias, almost every Greek city and village had its Isis-temple.

Her cult, introduced into Italy in the second century B.C., was even more successful in the West. By 58 B.C.E. it had altars on the Capitoline and fifty-three chapels in Rome alone. In spite of sporadic persecution, in 43 the triumvirs ordered the erection of a temple to Isis and Serapis. In the first century of our era, the cult possessed several fine temples in Rome.

THE MAGIC OF ISIS

From a number of passages in the texts of various periods we learn that Isis possessed great skill in the working of magic, and several examples of the manner in which she employed it are well known. Thus when she wished to make Ra reveal to her his greatest and most secret name, she made a venomous reptile out of dust mixed with the spittle of the god, and by uttering over it certain words of power she made it to bite Ra as he passed. When she had succeeded in obtaining from the god his most hidden name, which he only revealed because he was on the point of death, she uttered words which had the effect of driving the poison out of his limbs, and Ra recovered.

"Renowned for her skillful use of witchcraft and magic, Isis was particularly remembered by the Ancient Egyptians as 'strong of tongue', that is being in command of words of power 'which she knew with correct pronunciation, and halted not in her speech, and was perfect both in giving the command and in saying the word' 'Egyptian Magic'. In short she was believed, by means of her voice alone, to be capable of bending reality and overriding the laws of physics" (Graham Hancock, Fingerprints of the Gods).

Now Isis not only used the words of power, but she also had knowledge of the way in which to pronounce them so that the beings or things to which they were addressed would be compelled to listen to them and, having listened, would be obliged to fulfill her bequests. This sure sounds like some of the Kabbalah which will come later.

The Egyptians believed that if the best effect was to be produced by words of power they must be uttered in a certain tone of voice, and at a certain rate, and at a certain time of the day or night, with appropriate gestures or ceremonies. In the Hymn to Osiris it is said that Isis was well skilled in the use of words of power, and it was by means of these that she restored her husband to life, and obtained from him an heir. It is not known what the words were which she uttered on this occasion, but she appears to have obtained them from Thoth, the "lord of divine words," and it was to him that she appealed for help to restore Horus to life after he had been stung to death by a scorpion.

In the Theban Recension of the Book of the Dead is found a Chapter (No. clvi.) which was composed for the purpose of bestowing upon the deceased some of the magical power of the goddess. The Chapter was intended to be recited over an amulet called thet, made of carnelian, which had to be steeped in water of ankhami flowers, and set in a sycamore plinth, and if this were laid on the neck of a dead person it would place him under the protection of the words of power of Isis, and he would be able to go wheresoever he pleased in the Underworld. The words of the Chapter were: -- "Let the blood of isis, and the magical powers (or spirits) of Isis, and the words of power of Isis, be mighty to protect and keep safely this great god (i.e., the deceased), and to guard him from him that would do unto him anything which he abominateth."

The symbol of Isis in the heavens was the star Sept (Sirius), which was greatly beloved because its appearance marked not only the beginning of a new year, but also announced the advance of the Inundation of the Nile, which betokened renewed wealth and prosperity of the country. As such Isis was regarded as the companion of Osiris, whose soul dwelt in the star Sah, i.e., Orion, and she was held to have brought about the destruction of the fiend Apep, and of his hosts of darkness by means of the might of her words of power. As the light-giver at this season of the year she was called Khut, as the mighty earth-goddess her name was Usert, as the Great Goddess of the Underworld she was Thenenet, as the power which shot forth the Nile flood she was Sati, and sept, as the embracer of the land and producer of fertility by her waters she was Anqet, as the producer and giver of life she was Ankhet, as the goddess of cultivated lands and fields she was Sekhet, as the goddess of the harvest she was Renenet, as the goddess of food which was offered to the gods she was Tcheft, and lived int he Temple of Tchefau, and as the great lady of the Underworld, who assisted in transforming the bodies of the blessed dead into those whrein they were to live in the realm of Osiris, her name was Ament, i.e., the "hidden" goddess. In this last capacity she shared with Osiris the attribute of "giver of life," and she provided food for the dead as well as for the living; as Ament also she was declared to be the mother of Ra. In fact, at a comparatively early period in Egyptian history Isis had absorbed the attributes of all the great primitive goddesses, and of all the local goddesses such as Nekhebet, Uatchet, Net, Bast, Hathor, etc., and she was even identified as the female counterpart of the primeval abyss of water from which sprang all life. From what has been said above it is manifestly impossible to limit the attributes of Isis, for we have seen that she possesses the powers of a water goddess, an earth goddess, a corn goddess, a star goddess, a queen of the Underworld, and a woman, and that she united in herself one or more of the attributes of all the goddesses of Egypt known to us.

THE INVOCATION OF ISIS

As you read the following "invocation of Isis" you should ask yourself if you have ever read anything familiar to this; say the book of Revelation?

Rev 12:1 1 And there appeared a great wonder in heaven; a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars: (KJV)

I beheld a great wonder in heaven, a woman clothed with the Sun, with the Moon at her feet. And on her head was a diadem of the twelve stars. Hear me, O Lady Isis, hear and save. O thou queen of love and mercy, thou crowned with the throne, thou hauled as with the Moon. Thou whose countenance is mild and glowing, even as grass refreshed by rain. Hear me, our Lady Isis, hear and save. O thou who art in matter manifest. Thou bride and queen as thou art mother and daughter of the Slain One. O thou who art the Lady of the Earth. Hear me, O Lady Isis, hear and save. O thou Lady of the amber skin. Lady of love and of victory, bright gate of glory through the darkening skies. O crowned with the Light and life and love. Hear me, our Lady, hear and save by thy sacred flower, the Lotus of eternal life and beauty; by thy love and mercy; by thy wrath and vengeance; by my desire toward thee, by all the magical names of old hear me, O Lady, hear and save. Open thy bosom to thy child, stretch forth thy arms and strain me to thy breasts. Let my lips touch thy lips ineffable. Hear me, O Lady Isis, hear and save. Lift up thy voice to aid me in this critical hour. Lift up thy voice most musical. Cry aloud, O queen and mother, to save me from that I fear most. I invoke thee to initiate my soul. The whirling of my dance, may it be a spell and a link with thy great light, so that in the darkest hour, the Light may arise in me and bring me to thine own glory and incorruptibility. Isis am I, and from my life are fed all showers and suns, all moons that wax and wane, all stars and streams, the living and the dead, the mystery of pleasure and of pain. I am the Mother. I the speaking sea. I am the Earth in its fertility. Life, death, love, hatred, light, darkness, return to me, to me. Isis am I, and to my beauty draw. All glories of the Universe bow down, the blossom and the mountain and the dawn. Fruits blush and women are creations crowned. I am the priest, the sacrifice, the shrine. I am the love and life of the Divine. Life, death, love, hatred, light, darkness, are surely mine, are mine. Isis am I, the love and light of Earth, the wealth of kisses, the delight of tears, the bowel and pleasure never come to birth, the endless infinite desire of years. I am the shrine at which thy long desire devoured thee with intolerable fire. I was sung music, passion, death upon thy lyre, thy lyre. I am the grail and I the glory now. I am the flame and fueler of thy breath. I am the star of God upon thy brow. I am thy queen enraptured and possessed. High do these sweet rivers welcome to the sea, ocean of love that shall encompass thee. Life, death, love, hatred, light, darkness, return to me, to me. Hear, Lady Isis, and receive my prayer. Thee, thee I worship and invoke. Hail to thee, sole mother of my life. I am Isis, mistress of the whole land. I was instructed by Hermes, and with Hermes I invented the writings of the nations in order that not all should write with the same letters. I gave mankind their laws, and ordained what no one can alter. I am the eldest daughter of Kronos. I am the wife and sister of the king Osiris. I am she who rises in the dog star. I am she who is called the goddess if women. I am she who separated the heaven from the earth. I have pointed out their paths to the star. I have invented seamanship. I have brought together men and women. I have ordained that the elders shall be beloved by the children. With my brother Osiris I made an end of cannibalism. I have instructed mankind in the mysteries. I have taught reverence of the divine statues. I have established the Temple precincts. I have overthrown the dominion of the tyrants. I have caused men to love women. I have made justice more powerful than silver and gold. I have caused truth to be considered beautiful. Come unto me and pledge unto me your loyalties as I pledge mine unto you. Oh mother Isis, great art thou in thy splendor, mighty is thy name and thy love has no bounds. Thou art Isis, who art all that ever was, and all that there is to be, for no mortal man hath ever unveiled thee. In all thy grace thou has brought forth the sun, the fruit that was born forth for the redemption of man. Oh Isis, Isis, Isis, graciously hear our cry unto thee, we mourn for thy blessings on us this day, every day, to nourish, to aid and to fill the emptiness within, that only you our beloved mother can satiate. Unto thee do we pledge our solemn oath of dedication, and for the power and glory of him the Unknowable One to witness our devotion to thee. For as we now receive thee into our hearts, we ask that you never leave us, in times of trial and joy, and even unto death."

Answer for yourself: Does this remind you of the worship of Mary in the Catholic Church, let alone prayers to Mary?

THE ALEXANDRIAN INFLUENCE

Her cult spread from Alexandria, Egypt, to all the Mediterranean countries, especially Greece and Rome, after the fourth century B.C.,E. and reached a peak in the third century B.C.E. This is of major importance for our study as the Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt, adopted much of this Egyptian synthesis of religious ideas and incorporated many of them, not only into their own theological mix, but even went so far as to incorporate such religious ideas into their translation of the Jewish Scriptures into Greek which is today called the Septuagint.

The cult died out in Rome after the institution of Christianity, and the last Egyptian temples to Isis were closed around 550 AD.

CONFLICT WITH CHRISTIANITY

In the second century A.D., the Isis-cult became a bitter and effective antagonist of Christianity and numbered among its initiates many outstanding Romans. With the accession of Constantine; the shrines and temples of Isis were everywhere razed. It was not, however, until the time of Justinian, about 560 that the last remnants of her worship at Philae were extirpated. The independent cult of Isis, therefore, enjoyed a continuous existence exceeding two thousand years.

The cult of Isis possessed such vigor and longevity because she encompassed within herself the virtues and attractions of all her competitors; her ceremonials were elaborate and solemn; her dramatic presentations convincing and fascinating; her promises scarcely to be outdone; and her discipline delightful to souls burdened with sin and guilt.

SACRAMENTS AND FESTIVALS

The Eucharist of Isis consisted of the bread which she had given mankind and the milk which flowed from her bosom; the chalice from which the initiate drank this sacred potion was a cup formed in the shape of a woman's breast.

Ore know also that Isis, like Demeter, had two great festivals, one in the spring and another in the fall: the former coincided with the Egyptian harvest, and was celebrated at the vernal equinox, March 20. The autumnal celebration, however, was the greater, and consisted of a passion play which continued for four days; although the date varied in different places, it usually began on October 31, and ended on November 3. On the first day, actors impersonating Isis, Nephthys, Anubis, Horus, etc., searched for the body of Osiris; weeping and wailing, they manifested all the signs of grief. On the two days following, the portions of Osiris were found, reconstituted, and resurrected. This was the central element in the myth, for if Osiris could regain life and become immortal through the power of Isis, then all her devotees could do the same. The fourth day of the festival was called the Hilaria and was given over to the most unrestrained rejoicing since the god, now risen into immortality, would the kindly judge of all who had become divine by drinking the milk of Isis. And there could be little doubt concerning the future felicity of those who put their trust in her; for assuredly, Osiris would not deny mercy to those for whom Isis made intercession when they appeared before his awful throne.

VENERATION OF THE CHASTE MOTHER GODDESS

There was one important element in the Isis-cult which made it unique: the veneration of the chaste and beneficent Mother Goddess. Fortunately, a classic called The Golden Ass written in the second century A.D. by Lucius Apuleius gives us a great deal of information concerning the cult. In this celebrated tale, the author, drinking the potion of a witch, was turned into an ass, and could regain his normal shape only by eating roses At last, the glorious Isis appears to him In a dream, Informing him how to find the necessary flowers; and he addresses her as the "blessed Queen of Heaven . . . the Dame Ceres . . . motherly nurse of all fruitful things on earth." In reply, Isis declares herself "nature's mother, mistress of all the elements, the first-begotten offspring of all the ages, of deities mightiest, queen of the dead.... The Phrygians, first-born of men, call me the mother of the gods that dwell at Pessinus; the Athenians, sprung from the soil they till, know me as Cecropian Minerva; the wave-beaten Cyprians style me Venus of Paphos; the Archer-Cretans, Diana of the hunter's net; the Sicilians, with their threefold speech, Stygian Proserpine; the Eleusinians, the ancient goddess Ceres. Others call me . . . by my true name, Isis the Queen."

Isis had become the symbol and the synthesis of all the great goddesses of love, protection, creative life, and maternal nourishment which the world had ever known.

Apuleius is at last initiated into the order and becomes a priest; he dares not reveal the secrets of the mystery, but the experience itself he preserves in the following dithyramb: "I drew nigh to the confines of death . . . I approached the gods above, the gods below, and worshiped them face to face."

In the author's hallucinations, the deity appeared as the "Holy and eternal protectress of the human race" who "tendest the mischances of miserable men with a sweet mother's love . . . givest the light to the sun, guidest the universe, and tramples" under foot the powers of hell . . . At thy word, the winds blow, the clouds give increase, the seeds spring to birth, and the buds burgeon . . . My voice is too poor in utterance to tell what I feel concerning thy majesty. Nay, had I a thousand tongues, and everlasting continuance of unwearied speech, it would be all too little."

"Isis, represented in the Song of Solomon by the dark maid of Jerusalem, is symbolic of receptive nature - the watery, maternal principle which creates all things out of herself after impregnation has been achieved by the virility of the sun" (Manly P. Hall, Masonic, Hermetic, Quabbalistic & Rosicrucian Symbolical Philosophy).

Isis' magic was allied to the wisdom of Thoth and given to mankind as a skill in Healing; she was also responsible, as the counterpart of Osiris, for teaching the household arts to women. She taught them weaving and spinning, and how to grind the corn. Her strongest appeal was to the sorrowing wife and devoted mother - every woman could identify with her and she has been seen by some commentators as the archetype of a cult that continues in the Christian churches to the present day" (Richard Patrick, Egyptian Mythology).

ISIS....THE PATTERN FOR MARY, THE MOTHER OF JESUS

"Cyril, the Bishop of Alexandria, had openly embraced the cause of Isis, the Egyptian goddess, and had anthropomorphized her into Mary, the mother of God" (H. P. Blavatsky, Isis Unveiled).

"Immaculate is our Lady Isis...the very terms applied afterwards to that personage (the Virgin Mary) who succeeded to her form, titles, symbols, rites, and ceremonies....Thus, her devotees carried into the new priesthood the former badges of their profession, the obligation to celibacy, the tonsure, and the surplice, omitting, unfortunately, the frequent ablutions prescribed by the ancient creed." "The 'Black Virgins' , so highly reverenced in certain French cathedrals - proved, when at last critically examined - basalt figures of Isis!'" (King, The Gnostics and their Remains).

When the earliest teachings of Jesus and the church first emerged, it was devoid of a mother-goddess. However, since the ancient world was permeated with the cults of Demeter, Cybele, and Isis, it was impossible for Christianity to conquer without filling the void created by their departure. And in this, as in everything else, the Catholic Church demonstrated the accuracy of its name: it was indeed all-inclusive. As the need for the protective and beneficent goddess of chaste, maternal love was imperative, the Virgin Mary gradually grew from the woman to whom Jesus would not even speak into the magnificent replica of Isis, Queen of Heaven.

THE CULT OF SERAPIS

The Ptolemies were powerful supporters of the native Egyptian religious foundations, the economic and political power of which was, however, carefully controlled. A great deal of the building and restoration work in many of the most important Egyptian temples is Ptolemaic, particularly from the period of about 150-50 B.CE., and the monarchs appear on temple reliefs in the traditional forms of the Egyptian kings. The native traditions persisted in village temples and local cults, many having particular associations with species of sacred animals or birds. At the same time, the Greeks created their own identifications of Egyptian deities, identifying Amon with Zeus, Horus with Apollo, Ptah with Hephaestus, and so on. They also gave some deities, such as Isis, a more universal significance that ultimately resulted in the spread of her mystery cult throughout the Mediterranean world.

The impact of the Greeks is most obvious in two phenomena:

- One is the formalized royal cult of Alexander and the Ptolemies, which evidently served both a political and a religious purpose
- The other is the creation of the cult of Sarapis, which at first was confined to Alexandria but soon became universal. The god was represented as a Hellenized deity and the form of cult is Greek; but its essence is the old Egyptian notion that the sacred Apis bull merged its divinity in some way with the god Osiris when it died.

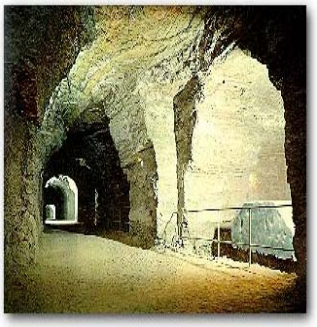
In ancient Egyptian religion, sacred bull deity worshiped at Memphis. The cult of Apis originated at least as early as the 1st dynasty (c. 2925-c. 2775 B.C.E.). Like other bull deities, Apis was probably at first a fertility god concerned with the propagation of grain and herds; but he became associated with Ptah, the paramount deity of the Memphite area, and also with Osiris (as User-Hapi) and Sokaris, gods of the dead and of the underworld. As Apis-Atum he was associated with the solar cult and was often represented with the sun-disk between his horns. Much of what is known about Apis comes from Greco-Roman writers. He was black and white and distinguished by special markings. Some ancient writers said that he was begotten by a ray of light from heaven, and others that he was sired by an Apis bull. When a sacred bull died, the calf that was to be his successor was sought and installed in the Apieion at Memphis. His priests drew omens from his behaviour, and his oracle had a wide reputation. When an Apis bull died, it was buried with great pomp at Saqqarah, in underground galleries known in the classical world as the Sarapeum. It was probably in Memphis that the worship of Sarapis (after the Greek form Osorapis, a combination of Osiris and Apis in the image of an eastern Greek god) arose under Ptolemy I Soter (305-282 BC). From Alexandria, it spread to become one of the most widespread oriental cults in the Roman Empire.

The name Serapis was formed by combining Osiris with Apis, the bull; and this god was the Hellenized version of his Egyptian prototype, in which his functions were combined with those of the somewhat parallel Greek deity, Hades or Aidoneus. It is certain that the ithyphallic aspects of Osiris were heavily emphasized and that Serapis was related to Priapus, son of Dionysus and Aphrodite, who symbolized the generative principle. The worship of Serapis came into wide vogue after the conquests of Alexander, first in Egypt and then throughout the Graeco Roman world; although he certainly retained some of the characteristics of the ancient Osiris as well as some congenital relationship with Isis, his cult seems to have become independent in the third century B.C.E. We read in Socrates Scholasticus that even in the fourth century A.D. the Egyptians believed that if Serapis were offended, the Nile would not overflow (Eusebius, Eccl. History, I, viii). Again notice the center of Alexandria, Egypt, for the worship of Serapis. The center of the worship was in Alexandria, where a Serapeum was built during the Ptolemaic dynasty; like all the other mysteries, its esoteric doctrines and practices were jealously guarded secrets, known only to its mystics.

THE WORSHIP OF SERAPIS



The chief center of the worship of Serapis in Ptolemaic times was Alexandria, where it was established, according to tradition, by Ptolemy Soter. This great ruler of Egypt appears to have wished to find some god who could be worshipped both by Greeks and Egyptians at a common shrine, and one whom he could cause to be regarded as the characteristic god of his dynasty in Egypt. The most important Egyptian god at the time was Osiris, that is to say Osiris-Apis, the great god of the Egyptian Underworld, but it was impossible for him to remove the great sanctuary of this god, and he therefore determined either to rebuild some ruined Serapeum at Alexandria, or to found a new one wherein he might set up a statue which should be worshipped both as the god of the Egytian Underworld and the Greek Hades, and in which would be united the attributes of Osiris Khent Amenti, and of Dis. Whilst Ptolemy was meditating upon these or similar things he had a dream, wherein a colosssal statue of some god appeared to him, and told him to remove it from where it was to Alexandria; according to Plutarch (De Iside et Osiride, 28), he had never seen a similar statue, and he knew neither the place where it stood, nor to whom it belonged. One day he happened to mention his dream to Sosibius, and described the statue which he had seen, whereon this man declared that he had seen a statue like it at Sinope. Tradition says that this was Sinope on the Pontus, and adds that as the inhabitants of the city were extremely unwilling to part with their statue, it, of its own accord, after waiting for three years, entered into a ship and arrived at Alexandria safely after a voyage of only three days. When the Greeks came to see the statue it was introduced to them as the god Hades, and the Egyptian priets were ready to bestow upon him the name Asar-Hapi, or Serapis, by which name the Greeks were, apparently, quite contented to call him. Thus both the Greeks and Egyptians in Alexandria acquired a god whom they willingly worshipped as the god of the Underworld. As soon as the god who was now called Serapis had been established in his new home, his fomer worship and rites were greatly modified, and his services and processions were made to resemble those of the Egyptians, who naturally expected their main features to be brought into harmony with those of the cult of Osiris, their national god. It appears to have been to the interest of all parties to welcome Serapis, and all must admire the astute action of Ptolemy, who succeeded in making the Greeks think that in worshipping this god they were adoring one of their own native deities, and who persuaded the Egyptians that they were maintaining the supremacy of Osiris-Apis in spite of the fact that the Macedonians were the rulers and masters of the country. Some doubt has been cast upon the identification of the Sinope mentioned by Plutarch with the Sinope of Pontus, but with insufficient reason. The Serapeum which Ptolemy repaired, or founded, was probably near Raqetit, and was a very remarkable building; its main plan seems to have resembled that of the famous Serapeum at Memphis, but parts of it were richly painted and gilded, and it possessed a fine library which was said to contain some 300,000 volumes.

THE INFLUENCE OF ALEXANDRIA ON RELIGIOUS IDEAS AND BELIEFS

Alexandria occupied a unique place in the history of literature, ideas, scholarship, and science for almost a millennium after the death of its founder. Under the royal patronage of the Ptolemies, and in an environment almost oblivious to its Egyptian surroundings, Greek culture was preserved and developed. Early in the Ptolemaic period, probably in the reign of Ptolemy I Soter, the Museum ("Shrine of the Muses") was established within the palace complex. Strabo, who saw it early in the Roman period, described it as having a covered walk, an arcade with recesses and seats, and a large house containing the dining hall of the members of the Museum, who lived a communal existence. The Great Library of Alexandria (together with its offshoot in the Sarapeum) was indispensable to the functioning of the scholarly community in the Museum. Books were collected voraciously under the Ptolemies, and at its height the library's collection probably numbered close to 500,000 papyrus rolls, most of them containing more than one work. The major poets of the Hellenistic period, Theocritus, Callimachus, and Apollonius of Rhodes, all took up residence and wrote there. Scholarship flourished, preserving and ordering the manuscript traditions of much of the classical literature from Homer onward. Librarian-scholars such as Aristophanes of Byzantium and his pupil Aristarchus made critical editions and wrote commentaries and works on grammar. Also notable was the cultural influence of Alexandria's Jewish community, which is inferred from the fact that the Pentateuch was first translated into Greek at Alexandria during the Ptolemaic period. One by-product of this kind of activity was that Alexandria became the centre of the book trade, and the works of the classical authors were copied there and diffused among a literate Greek readership scattered in the towns and villages of the Nile Valley.

THE SERAPEUM

The legendary Serapeum is where the sacred bulls of Apis are buried. Worship of the Apis bull was a late development. The bull was thought to have been an incarnation of Ptah.

DESTRUCTION BY THE CHRISTIANS

In 390 A.D., Bishop Theophilus, with the aid of Emperor Theodosius, razed the Serapeum of Alexandria. "And he had the phalli of Priapus carried through the midst of the Forum . . . the governor of Alexandria and the commander-in-chief of the troops of Egypt assisted Theophilus in demolishing the heathen temples . . . All the images were accordingly broken in pieces, except one statue of the god before mentioned, which Theophilus preserved and set up in a public place; 'Lest,' said he, 'at a future time the heathen should deny that they ever worshipped such gods'" (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist., I, xviii).

And so in that pagan world of freedom and diversity, each could choose whatever religion he liked best; but analysis reveals that mankind was plunging headlong into a general disaster for which no solution could be found and as a result of which some international and intolerant religion was inevitable to administer a fantastic soporific, to offer the masses hope and consolation, and to expunge by universal ruin the ineradicable frustration created by the Roman Empire.

MITHRA...LAYING THE FOUNDATION FOR CHRISTIANITY

Theology begins with the stars. Of course if you have been a reader of Bet Emet Ministries for any length of time you have seen that and there is no greater example besides the Osiris Myth than the Myth of Mithra. You will see, as depicted in the above picture, a bull being slain. In reality this "bull" represented the Constellation Taurus which had been the center of world religions for thousands of years. Egypt is a prime example. We will come to see as our studies progress that Mithra presided over changing of seasons and the movement of heavens themselves. Thus the scene of Mithra slaying a bull represents, "the precession of the equinoxes; Mithra was in effect moving the entire universe"(Prof. David Ulansey, The Origins Of Mithraic Mysteries). Mr Ulansey's book is quite phenomenal and I recommend reading it to everyone as he brings the correct perspective to this study along with a much needed correction of prior understandings from distinguished men like F. Cumont. Much of the information in this article is taken from The Origins Of Mithraic Mysteries. Thus, we see that Mithras represented by constellation Persus which was thought to change the position of the celestial sphere by slaying constellation Taurus and moving it out of the way thus allowing for its replacement by the constellation Aries (Ram) at spring equinox. With that as a small background let us begin our study and this will become more clearly momentarily.

Mithraism entered the Roman Empire from Persia spread by slaves in the middle of the first century BC. But it took until the first century of this era before it began to take off in popularity and was not officially recognized in the Empire until the end of the second century AD. It was one of the last of the Eastern Mystery cults to reach the West and one of the most vigorous. For a long time it was the chief rival to Christianity.

In the original Persian pantheon Mithras was a very minor god, too unimportant for Zoroaster to include in the Gathas. He was ranked lower than Ormuzd, the Supreme Being, but higher than the Sun. Later Mithra became more important than his creator, Ormuzd, because he acted as mediator between men and those on the divine level. Eventually Strabo could write:

[The Persians] honor the Sun, whom they call Mithras, and the Moon and Aphrodite, and Fire and Earth, and Winds and Water.

Mithras became omniscient, the god of light, the Heavenly Light, a spiritual Sun, the enemy of darkness and therefore of evil and hence the god of battles and of military victory. Mithras was the god of contracts and oaths, he embodied the seven divine spirits of goodness, he protected the righteous in this world and helped them into the next. He sent rain from Heaven and light from the sun and helped mankind by slaying the primeval bull fertilizing the earth. He is the Logos (the Word). His enemy was the Demiurge, Ahriman, a minor god with power over mankind's level of the cosmos, and therefore over men. The Magi identified Ahriman with the Evil Spirit, yielding a trinity of Mithras, Ormuzd and Ahriman, comparable to the Vedic trinity of Varuna, Mitra and Aryaman. Ormuzd and Ahriman seem to be mirror images of some complex power and Mithras is the link. Mithras only takes the side of Ormuzd at the earthly level, otherwise he is neutral between the two principles.

The Mithraism that entered the Roman Empire was a combination of Persian Mithraic belief, Babylonian astrology and Greek Mysteries. Like other Oriental religions, Mithraism had a long history and a reputation for wisdom. Mithras was a redeemer but also offered a role model as an epitome of morality. Mithraism began to spread because it appealed to three main groups of people; the merchant classes who valued its demand for high moral standards and therefore honesty, to the lowly and humble such as the slaves and particularly to the military. Adherents were all male and were sworn to secrecy. It had strong elements akin to Freemasonry in its organization. Females worshipped Cybele, Isis and later, Jesus. Mithraism had no extensive priestly caste. Each small group of worshippers had a "father". Major centres of worship had a "father of fathers", equivalent to a Christian bishop. It always remained a private religion, never receiving huge state patronage, so the shrines and churches of Mithras remained humble and the worshippers pious and egalitarian. In Mithraic churches noble, freedman and slave met as equals. Mithraism had its male celibates and expected its initiates to repudiate worldly offerings expecting instead heavenly wealth.

The story of Mithras begins with the Demiurge oppressing mankind. Mithras is incarnated from a rock on 25 December, the old date of the midwinter solstice. He enters the world, observed by lowly shepherds, on the darkest day of the year - he is the Light of the World. During his incarnation he carries out miracles just as Jesus did. And just as Jesus did he dies for the good of mankind. He kills the sacred bull, but the bull is an aspect of himself so he kills himself, just as God, the Father, kills himself by offering himself as a victim in his aspect as God, the Son, and is resurrected. His mission done he holds a last supper with his disciples and returns to Heaven in the solar chariot. He will be victorious over evil at the last battle and will sit in judgement on mankind. He finally leads the Chosen Ones over a river of fire to immortality.

Mithras worship took place in churches called "grottoes" which often actually were caves or catacombs. Devotees sought communion with Mithras to prepare for the final judgement. They knelt along a narrow aisle at the end of which was a symbolic mural or tapestry of Mithras slaying a bull. Though Mithras was often depicted as Sol, (Sun), he was more commonly shown as slaying the cosmic bull created by Ormuzd, the God of Light, to prevent Ahriman from slaying it. The bull is the Sun's gift of fertility to the crops and animals, the grotto mural showing the bull's blood re-entering the earth representing vitality, peace and plenty, symbolized by ears of corn. Since the bull is an aspect of the god himself as the source of life in the original fertility myth, in its developed form it represents the self-sacrifice of the god for the redemption of believers.

The Sun and the Moon observe the sacrifice. Two torch bearers are in attendance, one with an upturned torch and one with a downturned torch, signifying light and dark, summer and winter, life and death, spirit and matter, the extinction of the soul's light in the material body and its rekindling after death. A serpent drinks the bull's blood. The setting is a cave encircled by the chariot of the sun and the signs of the zodiac. Other symbolic objects present include a tree.

A lion headed figure in the coils of a snake represents Ahriman, the "Prince of Darkness" and therefore evil.The Christian expression for the devil, "Prince of Darkness", used for example by Milton, matches Mithraic as well as Essene use - Mithras was Light and Darkness was Evil. The force of Good necessarily was opposed by a force of Evil in the old religions. Ormuzd was opposed by Ahriman in the Persian religion; Osiris was opposed by Set in the Egyptian religion. Other names for Satan trace him to earlier pastoral gods Pan and Zeus Myiagros, respectively Mephistopheles and Beelzebub, the Protector of Flocks, the Lord of the Flies as the Jews mockingly called him, Baal of the Philistines.

Initiates of the Mysteries of Mithras had to be ritually pure and were purified by baptism. There were seven levels of initiation, one for each of the seven levels of the planets, the highest level being that of the Father, Pater. On achieving the level of initiation called Miles or soldier, the mystae of Mithras were symbolically branded, the priest making the sign of the cross upon their foreheads to redeem their sins and to mark them as soldiers of Mithras ready to "fight the Good Fight".

Tertullian, a third century Christian from North Africa, complains that the Devil was imitating the Christians' "divine mysteries" because initiates of the Mithraic religion were baptized in this way. Christians use the expressions "soldiers of Christ" and "put on the armor of light", somewhat inappropriate metaphors for a religion of love, one might think, but entirely appropriate to their Mithraic origins.

Above the rank of Leo votaries were called participants because they participated in a sacred meal; below the rank of Leo they were called servants and served the higher levels - the similarity with Essenism is striking. The Mithraic sacred meal was essentially identical to the Christian Eucharist. Justin Martyr complained that Satan had copied the Christian Eucharist because the adherents of Mithras also partook of consecrated bread and water symbolic of the incarnate god's body. The bread consisted of wafers - each marked with a cross!

Mithraic language and symbolism are widespread in the New Testament. The Dayspring from on High, the Light, and the Sun of Righteousness are all Mithraic (or Essene) expressions used of Jesus. Mithras was born out of a rock - Theos ek Petras - and so caves were sacred to Mithras. Christian imagery shows the stable, in which Jesus was born, as a cave. (The infant Mithras was adored by shepherds who brought him gifts.) It was not originally oppression that led the early Christians to use catacombs for worship but simply a desire to copy the practice of the worshippers of Mithras. They decorated their catacombs with paintings, one of the most popular ones being of Moses striking the rock. Mithras, struck a rock to produce water for his followers to drink! The most popular picture of all however was Christ as the Good Shepherd. Mithras too was the Good Shepherd.

The Cilicians introduced Mithraism to Rome. The chief city of the Cilicians and one of the main centres of Mithraism was Tarsus, home of St Paul. When Paul writes (1 Cor 1O:4):

They drank of that spiritual rock... and the rock was Christ, he leans significantly toward the Mithraic idea of the God from the Rock, as does Jesus when he says (Mt 16:18):

Upon this rock I will build my church, referring to Peter. Mithraic remains have been found beneath the Vatican Hill at Rome now sacred to Peter but formerly evidently sacred to Mithras. The throne of St Peter at Rome is older than the Church. From the carved motifs decorating it, it was probably Mithraic.

Both Mithraism and Christianity introduced symbolic sacrifice:

- Mithraists by depicting the sacrifice of the bull prominently in their churches
- Christians by images of the crucifixion of Jesus and the symbolic drinking of his blood in the communion.

The shedding of animal blood was originally a substitute for the shedding of human blood. The bull is interchangeable with a ram - the Ram in the Persian Zodiac is a lamb. So Mithras can also be sacrificed as a lamb just as Jesus is the Paschal Lamb. Remember Mithras is also the seven spirits of goodness just as the Book of Revelation has a slain lamb with seven horns and seven eyes representing the "seven spirits of God". Easter when the Paschal Lamb was eaten was the Mithraic festival. In the seventh century the church tried to suppress pictures of Jesus as a lamb precisely because of its pagan associations.

Mithras was referred to as "Dominus", the Lord, and his sacred day was Sunday. So Sunday was "The Lord's day" long before the Christians took it as their sacred day. The head of the Mithraic faith was the Pater Patrum, the Father of Fathers, who sat in Rome, just as the head of the Christian faith was the Papa or Father - the Pope - who also sat in Rome.

Answer for yourself: Why is the Pope's crown called a tiara, a Persian headdress? A link with Mithraism?

Ernest Renan, a scholar who wrote a famous Life of Jesus, believed that if it were not for Christianity we should all today be worshippers of Mithras. The two religions had almost everything in common:

- A divine Lord who offered men salvation;
- A sacramental meal;
- Baptism;
- The idea of the believers being crusaders against evil;
- An ultimate judgement of the soul;
- Ideas of Heaven and Hell;
- A high moral code.

The reasons for the success of Christianity were its overwhelmingly syncretic nature, the admission of women, the expropriation of the Jewish Scriptures, and the claim that the Christian incarnate god was a historic figure.

And there were none better at this syncretism that the Essenes of Egypt and Qumran

Mithraism eventually died out after its suppression by the Christians in 376-377 AD. By then its doctrines and ceremonies had been merged into Christianity so it had little basis for an independent existence. Mithras and the religious ideas that surrounded him were re-written in many of the accounts of Jesus' life in the New Testament as you can easily see from this short summary!

ROMAN RELIGION

The Roman Empire comprised an agglomeration of disparate peoples bound by the cement of Romano-Hellenic culture and this was reflected in the religions of the Empire. Rome, like the modem USA, wanted to be a melting pot. Conquered people became provinces of the Empire and their religions melted into the Hellenic matrix.

The first religions in the culture that was to dominate the Mediterranean began as separate urban religions of the Greek city states. These Greek myths as we now call them became more family and individually oriented as the city states declined. Though we sophisticates find them amusing and little more than a source of fantasy, they constituted a serious religion practised for over 1000 years which was creedless, flexible, non-dogmatic and this worldly. It was a religion of everyday life, to seek blessings, good crops, health, peace, and so on - comfort in facing the problems of day to day living. The various gods each had their principle attributes and would be sought out by devotees wanting to enhance the quality of their lives in that respect just like the Christian saints. Athena was the goddess of wisdom; Apollo was the "pure one" concerned with morality and became the "divine physician"; Artemis evolved from being a Mother Goddess to being the embodiment of chastity; Tyche was the goddess of chance or fortune, and so on.

Like the Christian communion, worship was an orderly ritual, a procession involving hymns and short prayers often composed by famous poets, the revealing of sacred objects, and sacrifices of different types of animals often then eaten in a ritual banquet.

Proper ritual was essential if the worshipper wanted to receive divine favor and this carried over to the Romans - and thence to Christians.

Roman nature was not to build extensive mythologies like the Greeks. They had a simpler basic idea - spirits - everything had its spirit or numen, a power for good or ill. Particularly important ones were those of the home and the hearth. The Genius of a man or the Juno of a woman was a divine spirit, an intuitive essence of the person which translated into the Christian Guardian Angel. On a birthday the Romans would celebrate the Genius of the person whose anniversary it was. The spirits of real men or women of power and influence became strongly favored by Greeks and later by Romans in the cult of heroes. They believed Hercules to have been a real man, and he might indeed have been, but a complex of myths and legends grew and were attributed to his spirit after he died and ultimately he became a fully fledged god.

Though the Romans themselves did not build mythologies, they were great copiers, and were open minded about religion in a way which we cannot understand. They adopted first the Greek gods then later on Oriental ones. These foreign gods interested the Romans because their spirits were powerful - more powerful than those of everyday things. The worshipper's object was to get the gods to use them for his benefit. This could only be achieved by addressing the gods with their proper names and titles, and practising meticulously correct rites and liturgy. Indeed Roman religion evolved - degenerated might be a better word - into courses of complicated liturgical formulae, meticulously followed, in services for different purposes. This was all good business for the priests, the pontiffs. They elaborated the ritual further by introducing many lesser gods or "di minuti" akin to angels and demons who could be called upon to help - provided that the ritual was correct! A complex priestly hierarchy evolved, the head of which was the Roman temples were all built on the pattern of an enclosure with a raised structure containing the alter and statue or image of the god. Some religions preferred simpler shrines. The highlight of their ritual was an animal sacrifice, though gifts were also acceptable. Priests had to be skilled butchers like Jewish priests, and for the same reason - the animal had to be sacrificed "willingly". Its dispatch had to be quick and unexpected. The best parts of the animal were then eaten while the rest was burnt for the god.

Pontifex Maximus, the model for The Pope.

The Roman administration was usually tolerant of the religions of foreign immigrants but, for long under the republic, Roman citizens were forbidden to adopt them. As a consequence cults introduced into Republican Rome were not absorbed without struggle. But from the first century BC religious tolerance for all improved. Suppression did occur spasmodically but usually not for religious reasons but because some scandal outraged the Romans.

Under the Emperors, religious tolerance became policy. To effect greater political stability and to unite a disparate people, the Emperors of Rome attempted to reduce the potential for discord by a policy of syncretism - encouraging the merging of religions - and a policy of religious tolerance. In the tolerant atmosphere syncretism occurred quite naturally amongst the cults proliferating in the Empire through the adoption of rites and doctrine by one religion from another. It was also actively pursued to cement and unite the Empire.

It began when Rome became the dominant city in Italy and allowance had to be made for the absorption of the gods of neighboring tribes and cities as the Roman sphere of influence spread. Later it benefited from the tendency towards monotheism. One god would subsume a lesser god. The lesser god became an aspect of the superior god but could still initially be worshipped independently by his followers. In later generations the hope was that allegiance would be transferred to the superior god and one god would replace two, uniting two sects who might have been, or become, rivals.

One way in which the policy was put into effect was by deification of the Emperor. Everyone had their Genius or Juno but kings and emperors were special because theirs were gods! This led to the Emperors being regarded themselves as gods. Initially it was not the mortal Emperor who was the object of worship, it was his Genius, the god residing within him. Even Nero did not call himself a god but, tongue in cheek, merely a universal Genius. But gods are immortal. When a king is the home of a divinity, what happens to the god when the king dies? The answer had to be that the king did not die - he must also be a god. And so the Emperors eventually claimed to be gods incarnate. But it was not until Domitian (81-96 AD) that an Emperor claimed the title - "Lord and God" while he was still alive, and not until Aurelian (270-275 AD) that the title "Lord and God" was adopted officially.

Even today the followers of the Dalai Lamas of Tibet consider them to be gods as well as temporal leaders. The Japanese also considered their Emperor to be a god. Christians are happy to concur: they claim Jesus to be a god.

The Roman Emperors' purpose in declaring themselves gods was secular rather than some sort of religious egomania (though in some cases egomania played a part). Just as the sun was Lord of the Heavens so the Roman Emperor was Lord of the Earth. As long as everyone could accept this, imperial temporal authority was strengthened, but everyone could continue to revere their own celestial or spiritual god. Most did! The notable exceptions were Jews and Christians.

The Romans were tolerant of religious differences partly because they were indifferent to blasphemy. To a Roman it was absurd for a mortal to take up cudgels to defend a god. Romans sincerely believed that the gods were sensitive, petulant, and ready to intervene in the lives of mortals. If a god were offended by a mortal then the poor fellow had better watch out - at the very least he'd find his luck was out. Romans thought Christians courted disaster by deriding pagan gods as devils but they did not take personal offence. What did worry them was that vengeful gods might not be too discriminating, and innocent bystanders might suffer. It was this generalized fear of divine anger rather than intolerance of blasphemy that invited Roman displeasure.

So Imperial policy was that, subject to the requirement to honor the Genius of the emperor, Romans could worship whoever or whatever they liked and how they liked as long as they respected and did not interfere with others and the ceremonies were respectable. However clandestine meetings were not allowed since they could be a cover for subversive plots. The priests and priestesses of the gods of the Empire were generally celibate and even Bacchanialian "orgies", by the intertestamental period, were merely drunken, not licentious.

Native Roman religion was worthy and pious but totally this worldly. It paid no attention to an after life. Romans originally had no thoughts of survival of the person in any way. On death a Roman simply joined the "Good People" (no singular). As the power of Rome grew and the population became more cosmopolitan, the religion became less attuned to the needs of the worshippers. By the end of the republic Roman religion had ceased to be a religion. Its festivals had become occasions of state ceremony. From the reign of Augustus, astrology became increasingly popular but ultimately failed because knowledge of the stars could not change destinies, particularly death. Only the gods could do that, but they lived beyond the stars and were not therefore subject to their influence. If only there were ways of compelling the gods to help. Theurgy, a type of magic aimed at forcing the gods to do the will of the practitioner, briefly became fashionable but also proved spiritually unsatisfactory.

Before Jesus became deified Roman religion had ceased to provide any way of satisfying individual spiritual needs. Towards the beginning of Empire Romans began to seek a personal religion which would guarantee them immortality. Worshippers sought direct communion with a suitable god to procure his help in changing their personal destinies. The desire for individual rather than state gods led first the Greeks then the Romans to look to the East and import oriental religions. They filled their spiritual void via the mystery religions, whereby the initiate aimed to join with the god to share his immortality. This laid the foundation for the successful absorption of the religion propagated later in Jesus' name!

Eastern religions began to be introduced into the Roman sphere during the first Punic war (264 - 241 BC) when the cult of Astarte-Atargatis from Phoenicia became popular. From 204 BC, when Cybele was introduced, a succession of eastern religions arrived. In 186 BC the cult of Dionysus, then Isis worship (about 100 BC), Judaism, Mithraism and finally Christianity followed. Most ideas of the destiny of the soul existed in the Empire amongst this plethora of religions - damnation, oblivion, transmigration, reincarnation and divinity. In the early centuries of this era each of the various mystery religions of Rome were favored first by one Emperor then by another, until all religions except Christianity were banned at the end of the fourth century AD. Syncretism had triumphed!

THE SAVIOR-CONCEPT COMES FROM EGYPT

The Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt, as well as Palestine, adapted the "soter" or "savior" of Egypt. The original savior-god was the Great Osiris, the Egyptian deity who plays such a preponderant role in the religious history, not only of the Nile Valley, but also of the entire area which finally became the Graeco-Roman Empire. The facts, the legend, the myth, and the soteriology (doctrine of salvation) surrounding this majestic but also pathetic figure stretch back into the very roots of western culture and civilization.

A powerful force of Aryans, from Mesopotamia, conquered the much less developed Nilotics, about 4,000 or 3,500 B.C. The Sumerians superimposed their own economy, jurisprudence, architecture, agriculture, and general way of life upon the conquered, first, by intertwining their own religious concepts with those of the natives; and, second, by making their own the active and preponderant force. This was a long and complicated process, in the course of which cannibalism and other primitive poultices were outlawed and the flood waters of the Nile brought under control; and roads, temples, and cities were constructed. Scientific agriculture was instituted, an elaborate code of law established an elevated morality adopted, and a popular and powerful religious system perfected. The result was the greatest civilization yet known, which continued substantially intact for nearly forty centuries.

It is at least probable that Osiris was an historical person who had married his sister, became king of Egypt, and conquered many nations; that he was murdered by a group of conspirators headed by his brother, Set; and that he was finally transformed into the god-man savior by the priests of a great cult which became dominant in Egypt and later proliferated into all adjacent lands.

According to the Osirian myth, the sun-god Ra detected his wife Nut in the embrace of Seb, the earth-god. He therefore decreed that her offspring could not be born on any day of the year, which then consisted of 360 days. Nut, however, appealed for help to Thoth, the God of Wisdom; and, by playing at draughts with the moon, he won from her a seventy-second portion of each day. Thus, five intercalated days were added to the year, on none of which the curse of Ra was effective. Successively on these, Nut bore quintuplets: Osiris, Horus, Set, Isis, and Nephthys. Osiris, born on the 25th of December, symbolized the rebirth of the sun; in due course, he married Isis, who bore the Younger Horus, who, with his parents, made up the Egyptian Holy Family. Set married Nephthys, who became the mother of Anubis. The Elder Horus remained the celibate and intellectual Scribe. These five personalities, born of earth and heaven, were equally human and divine, mortals with a capacity for immortality. Osiris became the supreme god-man and Isis the ultimate mother-goddess, whose role and importance expanded over the centuries in the Osirian cult and who finally emerged as a supreme divinity in her own right.

After conferring a superior culture upon the Egyptians, Osiris set out at the head of his beneficent armies to do the same for other nations; he marched all the way to India and later in Europe to the Straits of Gibraltar. Finally, according to the legend, laden with the gifts of many grateful peoples, he returned home in triumph. This helps explain the spread of such religious ideas and myths as spread throughout the world.

In his absence, however, the evil Set conspired with the seventy-two displaced reactionary priests to seize the throne for himself. Having constructed a coffin, he induced his brother to lie down in it: whereupon the conspirators welded the lid shut with molten lead, so that Osiris died of suffocation. Thrown into the Nile, the coffin floated across the Mediterranean to Byblus (modern Jebeil), in Syria, where the body became encased in a tree.

Escaping the rage of Set, Isis took refuge in the Delta Swamps, where Horus was born. Leaving her child to be reared in Buto, she set out in search of her husband; finding almost all of his body except his penis, she returned with it to Egypt. The implacable Set, however, hacked this into fourteen pieces, and buried one in each of the names or provinces of the country.

Now began the incomparable passion of Isis, which ultimately made of her the supreme mother-goddess of the ancient world. Up and down Egypt she went, seeking and searching, until she found all the dismembered portions of the body and reconstituted them into its previous semblance; then, with the help of Thoth and Horus, Isis resurrected Osiris into a second and immortal life. Risen from death, he could never again be subject to its power. In due course, he entered his solar ship which transported him to the Elysian Fields, the realm of Khenti-Amenti, where he became and forever remains the judge of all who die and the ruler of the blessed.

Osiris, then, symbolized the reborn sun; as Apis, the Bull, he was the emblem of sexual virility; but, most of all, he was the god of agriculture. This, more than anything else, elevated the Egyptians from savagery and barbarism into actual civilization. Isis, meanwhile, who was identified with the moon and the cow, was the great and nurturing Mother; it would be Isis who taught mankind to transform the wheat into the bread of life, the barley into the joyous and invigorating ale as a forerunner of the Eucharist! Osiris gave men virility; Isis made motherhood possible and even delightful. Osiris gave mankind agriculture and Isis gave them civilized food. These two divinities gave humanity the more abundant life.

The sexual, astronomical, and agricultural symbolism woven into the Isis-Osiris myth reflects the deepest needs and desires of mankind. The offspring of Nut and Seb were conceived at the time when Sirius the Dog-star appeared in the East, as it did then on the first of June, when also the waters of the Nile began to rise, augmented, so the people believed, by the tears of Isis, weeping for Osiris, who was called the Morning Star who brings the waters, as well as the Great Bull, and the Reborn Sun. Deeply significant is the fact that the dismembered god was buried throughout Egypt on the very day when the grain was planted; and his resurrection occurred when the green shoots first emerged from the soil. The great rituals and festivals of Osiris were celebrated with the planting and the sprouting of the grains. In countless images of the god found in Egyptian tombs, his body lies on is bier with the tendrils of wheat growing from his body.

The ritual of Osiris consisted primarily in the celebration of a Eucharistic meal, in which the communicants ate the flesh of the god in the form of wheat-cakes and drank his blood in the form of barley-ale.

By so doing, his divinity became their own which was diffused through their members: and they became portions of him in body and spirit as well as heirs with him in his eternal kingdom. Osiris gave mankind immortality with his heavenly bread; he died that men might have life and have it more abundantly; he gave his body to eat and his blood to drink that men and women might, like himself. rise from the grave, divine into everlasting life.

This brief was the central core of the Osirian mystery and since, for millennia, the Egyptian was the principal culture of the ancient world, a reconstituted Osiris penetrated many nations and countries, especially throughout Asia Minor and the eastern Mediterranean. Perhaps as early as 2,500 B.C., the Egyptian god-man was united with the Semitic Astarte to constitute the Adonis-Aphrodite cult; later, as Attis, he became the dying and annually resurrected god of the cult of Cybele; in the 13th century, B.C., he appeared in Thrace as Dionysus or Orpheus, the savior-god of Orphism. After he migrated into Greece, he finally became the center of the great Eleusinian mystery itself, which was dedicated to the worship of Demeter, who was herself the Greek reconstitution of Isis.

In the Roman world, he was known as Father Baccus and Demeter as Ceres.

And finally, about 520 B.C., he was incorporated into the Phythagorean cult as the central element in the first great religious synthesis of the western world.

Various mysteries spread throughout the Graeco-Roman world, especially after the Trojan War; but the cult of Isis at last outstripped all others in popularity, magnificence, power, and influence, wherein Osiris, while continuing as the sacrificial savior-god, became the secondary to his sister-wife in importance. These pagan savior-cults were wonderful for their number and diversity; and by the first century A.D., they had achieved almost complete dominion over the masses. All had one element in common: the worship of the atoning, sacrificial, and immortalizing savior god, substantially the replica of the great Osiris.

This very same concept, of an Angel-Messiah as a reborn Sun, or Son of the Sun-god, was the concept of the Essenes which grafted it onto the already existing Davidic Messiah of the Jewish Scriptures when these Essenes falsely translated the Hebrew Scriptures to include their own religious dogmas.

COMMUNAL EQUALITY: FROM INDIA & THE BRAHMANISM & BUDDHISM

About 2000 B.C.E., another army of Aryans invaded India and conquered the culturally backward inhabitants. The newcomers revolutionized the social, political, and economic structure of the nation, first by commingling their own religious concepts with those of the natives; and, second, by making their own ideology predominant. A system of caste was established, in which the Brahmans (father-priests or divinities) occupied the highest rank; the Kshatriyas, or kings, nobles, and warriors, stood second; the Vaisyas, or artisans, tradesmen, peasants, etc., were third; and the Sudras, who were propertyless servants, constituted the lowest order. Only Aryans could belong to the two upper casts. However, every member of a caste occupied a definite and permanent hereditary position, and possessed certain rights in varying degrees. Below all this were multitudes who, for one reason or another, had lost their inherited social position: these were the outcasts, known as parasavas and khandalas, doomed to a life of misery in the most repulsive employments, while existing at a starvation level. Brahmans could have four wives Kshatriyas three, Vaisyas two, Sudras one, outcasts none at all. Elaborate codes were devised, which exacted the most fearful punishment for offenses against members of the higher castes, but little or no penance for the same acts when perpetrated against an outcast or a prostitute.

The hierarchy enjoyed complete control over education, morals, marriage, and the canonical codes. Theirs was a total way of life, which left nothing to any other discipline: like communist or Roman Catholic polities, it embraced every aspect of existence. The civil government existed only to enforce the decrees of the priests. The Brahmans were immune from all taxation, social obligations, or criminal prosecution. A more privileged or powerful bureaucracy, secular or religious, has never existed. The Brahmans made laws for all others, but were themselves exempt from punishment. They received tribute from everyone, but gave nothing tangible in return. They were the lords of life; and their regimen resented perhaps the most complete union of church and state ever known.

Since no one could rise in the social scale, the doctrines of karma and renunciation were devised to provide moral sanctions for caste. During this earthly life, every human being enters his good and evil deeds, as it were, in a book of credits and debits; and for these he is rewarded or punished, not in this life, but in the next. At death, each person who has lived good, or, rather, an obedient and subservient life, goes to paradise for a certain period, and will in due course be reborn in a higher caste; but if he had done evil, he will be unsigned to the twenty-three hells for a millennium, and then be reborn in a lower caste, or in the form of an animal, a reptile, a fish, a bird, or even an insect. Since every living feature is animated by a once-human soul, no one may kill even a louse, since it might be his own mother. Human misery, therefore, continues through endless aeons on a do dolorous Wheel of Life. Only through sainthood may Nirvana at last be attained; and this state of total unconsciousness or personal extinction was the Brahmanic substitute for the Egyptian Elysium and the Zoroastrian heavens.

In this system, there was no relief for outcasts and Sudras. It continued substantially unchanged for centuries; however, since the spirit of man will not endure such indignities forever without bitter resentment, certain safety-valves for social unrest were provided. Under the Brahmanic system, men were permitted to become students: but, when so doing, were required to take the vows of chastity, obedience, and poverty. Others, more advanced in years, were permitted to seek Nirvana by becoming hermits or ascetics, (just like the Essenes later) begging their food; however, all had to undergo a course in Vedic study and submit forever to the authority of the Brahmans. Even under these restrictions, vast numbers chose renunciation to escape the Wheel of Life and thus commingle at last with the Universal Soul—the Brahma or the Atman.

By the 6th century, B. C., various movements had arisen in opposition to the Brahmanic authority. The most important of these were Gainaism, or Jainism, founded by Mahavira, and Buddhism, established by Prince Gautama, said to have been a pre-existing divinity, who entered his mother's body at conception and was, therefore, born of a true virgin birth. Not to be outdone, Mahavira had a double virgin birth; for during gestation, he transferred himself from a Brahmani to Kshatriya mother so that, in addition to be being divine, he partook also of the nature of both upper castes. Actually, both movements, but particularly the Buddhist, represented a coalition of the nobles and the middle classes against the entrenched power of the priesthood. These new religions absorbed from Brahmanism such elements as transmigration, karma, heaven and hell, the Wheel of Life, renunciation, and Nirvana. Nevertheless, Buddhism was one of the most profoundly revolutionary movements in all history. It sought, not only freedom from upper-class tyranny, but also permanent release for its communicants from all labor and every kind of social obligation. Perhaps the most far-reaching of all Buddhist objectives was the substantial separation of the religious from the civil authority (church from state). No man was ever again to be called Brahmana, or Father, which signified priest-god (Matt. 23:9).

Buddhism denounced and outlawed a society based on caste, and proclaimed the utter wickedness of employing labor or accumulating private wealth. Persuaded that the duty to support parents, wife, and children is not only an integral element in the whole system of social exploitation but also a burden under which most toilers die unrequited, Buddhism declared that the family, based on sex and procreation, is an infamous evil; that the sexual relationship is the crime and corruption for which there can be no forgiveness; and that the highest conceivable virtue consists in renouncing and abandoning father, mother, sister, brother, wife, children, lands, and houses. Dressed in their yellow robes and with begging bowls in hand, the Buddhist saints sallied forth to obtain their food from the children of Mara And since Vedic study was the chief means by which the Brahmans consolidated their authority, the new ascetics declared knowledge so obtained to be utterly worthless or actually harmful.

The Buddhists made good use of several Brahmanic doctrines: hell was transformed into a place of torture for all who, in this world, had contracted matrimony, reared families, cared for their parents, and taught, or submitted to Brahmanic doctrines. Nirvana became the reward for a life of renunciation; a good karma was now to be attained by the children of this world only by giving generous alms to the Buddhist saints, who were by no means intent upon suffering material hardship: the greatest rewards in paradise were therefore reserved for the wealthy who donated their palaces as rest homes for the delectation of the holy ones. Communal orders of male and female celibates sprang up everywhere, into which the indigent thronged, where they could live idly in security, although under the strictest discipline. It was Buddhist dogma that, while personal property contaminates and destroys the character of the owner, the same wealth, when owned collectively and shared equally by the redeemed, is righteous and holy. You should immediately see the similarity in the communism of the early church as depicted in the Book of Acts as well as the Essenic celibacy; this is no coincidence but rather an example of strong influence that was exerted on the Essenes. I find this rather amazing that these Essene, knowing full-well that the first commandment in the Torah is to be fruitful and multiply, would violate this by enforcing celibacy on their adherents.

Under King Asoka, Buddhism became the national religion of India in 256 B. C. In his and subsequent generations, it proselytized throughout the whole known world; and its principal elements penetrated the stream of culture almost everywhere. Since western religion has its roots in oriental sources, Buddhist influence upon it has been immense.

In fact, long before Buddhism became the national religion of India, its basic concepts had appeared in the Graeco-Roman world. As early as the sixth century, B. C., it had already become a central element in the synthesis of Pythagoras.

The concept of the truly religious life as one of renunciation, celibacy, and communism was therefore deeply embedded in human consciousness; it became a major element in most important subsequent religious movements; and one phase of this philosophy emerged in the 19th century as Marxism. In this secular form, it has achieved its greatest conquests; and approximately one-third of the human race is now attempting to achieve a better life through communal organization and discipline, not in private communities, but through the control of great nations by the machinery of the state.

It should, however, be noted that after several centuries, Buddhism was expelled from India, which was reconquered by a reconstituted form of Brahmanism, known as Hinduism, which retains most of the central speculative doctrines of its ancient progenitor, such as the caste system, karma, and transmigration. The overwhelming force of religious ideology is apparent to any westerner who travels in India: useless cows and monkeys have been sacred, eating the scarce food, for want of which untold thousands of infants died of malnutrition. The killing of a vulture could cause a greater public disturbance than the sight of millions of starving indigents lying unhoused in the streets.

The religion of Gautama has undergone many revisions and divisions during the last thousand years; it exists today principally on the fringes of the greater cultures or as important minorities in Japan and elsewhere; however, it still commands the adherence of about 225 million communicants find exercises no small influence, not only in the Orient, but in the western world as well. Modern existentialism is in reality an offshoot of Buddhism, as are the doctrines of Zen. Various spin-offs like the Hare Krishna cult are today virulent in the United States; and it should be noted that since there are more than 515 million Hindus in the world-in 1979-80, these two cults originating in India, almost rival in numbers the 975 million credited to all existing divisions of Christianity. If you have any familiarity with the Essenes the parallels are striking as well with the communism and equality of good as stressed by the Book of Acts and the later celibacy as well which was later enforced upon the priesthood in the Catholic Church.

DOCTRINES OF THE AFTER-LIFE: FROM PERSIA & ZOROASTRIANISM

Although there are many elements in the religions of India and Egypt dealing with the afterlife, the concepts of heaven, hell, and purgatory were developed to the highest degree by the Persians. The Jews were introduced to this in the Babylonian and Persian captivity and some of the Jews brought these religious concepts home to Israel with them. We find most of them expressed with the Essenes.

In the 6th century, B.C., the prophet Zoroaster, by reconstructing the Mazdean Persian-Aryan religion, made it into a powerful nationalist instrument by which to unite his people as masters of a great empire. Three basic elements characterize this creed:

- Dualism
- Doctrines concerning the afterlife
- Messianic expectations

Zoroastrian dualism predicated two cosmic, untreated powers or forces, of which the first, known as Ahura-Mazda or Ormazd, was the Lord of Spirits, the God of Warmth, Light, and Order, the source of life and immortality, the ruler of the celestial spheres, the creator of all things good or spiritual; and the second was Ahriman, known also as Angra Mainyu, the Evil One, the source of cold, darkness, matter, and chaos, the power of death and destruction, and the Prince of the Air in this world. These two powers were seen as essentially equal; but, since Ahura-Mazda possessed prescience, of which his cosmic foe was devoid, he was, from the beginning, able to devise a long-term strategy which would ultimately result in the triumph of Good and Light. These antagonists were said to be engaged in a universal conflict, which extended to every living creature, especially all humanity, who are therefore pilloried throughout life on the horns of this dreadful dilemma and enmity. The spirit or soul is from the God of Light, the King of Heaven; but the body is of Ahriman, the Lord of Darkness. In the heart of every human being a fierce battle therefore rages between the spirit and the flesh: those who are redeemed are the Elect, the Children Light and Heaven; those who reject the pure religion of Zoroaster are reprobates, the Children of Hell and Darkness. This concept is reflected in Shakespeare's 146th sonnet, which begins: "Poor soul, the center of my sinful earth . . ." and constitutes the basis of the Pauline anthropology set forth in our New Testament. It is also the basis of the Augustinian, Lutheran. and Calvinist doctrines of predestination and moral depravity.

The second great element in the Zoroastrian system was its a eschatology, according to which every human being has an immortal soul; and, since this appears only once on earth, its eternal destiny is determined by its activities here. The human race was divided into three general categories:

- first, those whose deeds are preponderantly good and who, therefore, emerge as Children of Light—at death, these go directly to one of the seven heavens (reproduced in the Divina Commedia of Dante);

- second, those whose careers have been dedicated to wickedness—these must be plunged into hell, there to suffer terrible and long drawn-out tortures; and,
- third, those in whom good and evil so nearly balance as to render them unfit for immediate entry into the celestial kingdoms, yet not deserving of hell-fire—these are consigned to purgatory, whence, after a Period of discipline purification, they are permitted to enter one of the lower celestial spheres.

In case you did not notice it this last "three" classifications" of people find expression in the Rosh Ha Shannah services found in Judaism today along with Christianity. The influence of Persia lives and we never notice it.

THE SECOND COMING: AN ESSENE CONTRIBUTION

Every important new religious system draws heavily upon its predecessors as the basis for its novel synthesis; and almost always it adds at least one or two significant origins elements of its own.

During their maturity and a later evolution of Essene theology, we find that the Essenes eliminated from their system the doctrine of purgatory (which they had previously embraced) as well as the possibility of post-mortem redemption. In Essene-Christian doctrine there is no second chance.

However, the most important specific ideological creation of the Essenes was the promulgation of the Second Conning known among Christian theologians as the Parousia. Paul teaches this doctrine along with Jesus in the New Testament. The Essene's last Teacher of Righteousness was expected, before the conclusion of the then-existing generation, to send a representative who would be endowed with power to conduct the Last Judgment and to set up the kingdom of the saints on earth. With the formulation of this doctrine, all the principal elements comprising the Synoptic synthesis had been incorporated into the Essene canonical system. The religion of the western world was thereby substantially completed and today Jesus is the one most look toward for the fulfillment of this religious synthesis.

THE ESSENE ANGEL-MESSIAH...ITS ORIGIN COMES FROM ZOROASTRIAN-INDIA SUN-WORSHIP

The third basic Zoroastrian doctrine was that, following 660 B.C., would appear a great virgin-born savior, prophet, or Angel-Messiah, at the close of three consecutive millenniums. These concepts were taken directly from astrology and astronomy and later personified as if were a real person. Every Aryan nation had their own adaptation from the stars but Zoraster's influence made his the most prolific. On this web-site I have documented countless examples with more than sufficient bibliographies and references to prove the point beyond any reasonable doubt.

According to such Zoroastrian eschatology in 341 A.D., the great Hushedar was due; in 1341, the greater Hushedar-Mah would come; and in 2341, the greatest of all, the Soshans, would, after defeating all enemies at the final Armageddon, conduct the Last Judgment, and inaugurate the Kingdom of Saints, which would consist of a New Heaven and a New Earth, after the old had passed away in a cosmic holocaust.

We should note that Zoroastrianism was a universalist religion; for even the most wicked of men, after fearful refinement in a river of molten metal, would finally emerge as saints into an eternity of peace and glory.

Zoroastrianism included other important tenets; but these constitute its basic contributions to world-religion. By 510 B.C., Darius the Great Hystaspes, the son-in-law of Cyrus, ruled which stretched from Libya and Greece to the center of India, a territory comprising two million square miles and twenty-three nations. Throughout this vast complex, theology of Zoroaster exercised a potent and pervasive influence, and some of its elements became integral in Grecian Stoicism, in the creeds of the mystery cults, the tenets of the Jewish Chasids, and the speculative synthesis of the Orphic-Pythagorean brotherhoods. As you can see both the Pharisees as well as the Essenes were influenced by such a system and "borrowed" extensively from it in their writings. In the trappings of noisy and pagan solemnity, it is set forth in splendor in the Sixth Book of Virgil's Aeneid, composed in the first century, B.C., and in Dante's Purgatorio and Paradiso, composed in the fourteenth century, A.D. These concepts became the common heritage of the western world.

THE HUMAN MESSIAH OF PRE-EXILIC JUDAISM

We should not discount entirely the influence upon Essene ideology of the Messiah-concept as found in orthodox Judaism, which may or may not have been directly altered by Zoroastrian influence. The belief that a powerful personality, a human agent, would one day emerge who, either by force of Jewish arms or by supernatural intervention by God and with God's support, would defeat all enemies and establish at least an independent nation, or, more probably, a great empire, had been a basic element in Jewish expectations for centuries before the time of Alexander. This Messiah, however, was quite different from the Angel-Messiah of Zoroastrian-Essene theology: his purposes were entirely temporal and terrestrial and were restricted to the ethnic interests of the Jews. He was not a moral judge; there was no Last Judgment; and his projected kingdom was not one of saints or of' righteousness. The Essene Angel- Messiah, in contrast, was the overwhelming Zoroastrian Soshans engrafted upon the age-old political and economic protagonists of Judaic visions.

"Hebrew for "House of Truth"

Pastor Craig M. Lyons M.Div.

THE STORY OF CHRISTIAN ORIGINS

"All Indo-Germanic nations have worshipped crucified Saviors and overwhelming proof was obtained that the sun-myths of the ancient Aryans were the origin of the religion in all of the countries which were peopled by the Aryans" ...Charles Morris 1899

"AND THERE IS NO NEW THING UNDER THE SUN"...Eccl 1:9 (b)

BEFORE WE BEGIN.....CAN YOU AGREE WITH THE FOLLOWING STATEMENT???

"A Christian's religious belief system, when tested and exposed to contradictory facts and evidence from Biblical languages, Biblical history, Biblical culture, and archeology, must in the Spirit of Truth and Repentance, be flexible enough to change..."...Craig M. Lyons M.Div.

GETTING READY FOR THE MOST SERIOUS BIBLE STUDY YOU

HAVE EVER DONE

FIRST...A Personal Word From Pastor Craig

Second.....After 15 years of dedicated investigation into religious matters....my conclusions on Yeshua and the Messiah

Answer for yourself: Do you want to know the truth before you die?

If you don't then this web site is not for you. You might not know this but the early Christians were charged with being a sect of sun-worshippers! "Impossible," you say. Well you better hold on for just a minute because it is easily provable that the same "religious beliefs" defended by the pagans in their debates against and with many early Gentile Church Fathers are yet today the very backbone of Gentile Christianity and their doctrines! What still amazes me and what escapes most Christians today is that historical investigation of many of these "debates" provides the multiple evidence that testifies to the fact that the early Christians and Church Fathers acknowledged that they had in fact copied the pagans and their beliefs and merged such beliefs into the "Christian faith." Astounding! More than likely your Christian Church teaches the same doctrines and they don't know it! Your New Testament is full of the dogmas and doctrines originating in Sun Worship and without such knowledge you read them as if it were "Divine Revelations." Many of them are recorded and absorbed into the life of Jesus as portrayed on the pages of your New Testament. If one was acquainted with such "pagan beliefs" as derived from nature and Sun worship, then one could quickly see that Yeshua, the Jew, would have been opposed to every one of them.

Was Jesus a Sun worshipper? Where is "Jesus the Jew" to be found in any of this? Where is the Messiah of Israel to be found in any of this?

Answer for yourself: Is Gentile Christianity, as seen today, a Divine Revelation or is it just a synthesis of the many variations of sun-worship as found around the globe in the many Gentile nations which find the origin of their religions in the oldest religion known to man....Sun worship!

This is a most serious charge against Christianity! If such a charge can be shown to have validity then a Christian must be honest enough before God to begin a serious investigation into his religious beliefs system in order to separate truth from fiction. God would want you to have the truth and not a lie!

Well it is for certain that most who read our articles don't wish to be in “sin;” either purposefully or in ignorance. One article cannot possibly do justice to such a complex and verbose subject as we have at hand but I hope to “break the egg” so to speak to help our readers begin to scrutinize the subject matter at hand in more detail through their personal study. Let's closely examine the reproducible facts and evidence concerning the original conceptual foundations of the Christian faith, and THEN decide what to do with the serious “charge” made at the beginning of the article; that the Christian faith today is nothing more but an evolution of “Sun” worship which over time was transfigured into “Son” worship. If you follow this study, then you will quickly come to realize that if you truly desire to be a follower of Yeshua, the man from Nazareth, and most likely the Messiah of Israel, then it is impossible for you to be a "true" follower of him if you continue to accept, believe, and follow many of the Christian dogmas and doctrines that exist today. You will see that you have been enmeshed in Idolatry and were not aware. Again I wish to reiterate the seriousness of such a charge if it can be proven. The sad fact of the matter is that the charge is not hard to prove as you will see if you have the courage to continue a do a little study. The only thing that will be required of you is that you read the materials for yourself and think for yourself. It really will not be that hard; only your time will be necessary to learn the truth in these areas.

LET US BEGIN OUR STUDY BY BECOMING FAMILIAR WITH MANY DISTURBING QUOTES THROUGH HISTORY ABOUT THE CHRISTIAN FAITH BY PEOPLE WHO KNEW IT WAS NOTHING MORE THAN SUN WORSHIP IN DISGUISE.... see the disturbing quotes of the early Church Fathers

IF YOU READ THE ABOVE QUOTES....THEN YOU HAVE NOW SEEN YOUR NEED TO INVESTIGATE THE CHRISTIAN FAITH FOR "TRUTH" AND "FALSEHOODS"

If you are a Christian, then the information contained in the web pages that follow will require a decision on your part. God will be watching. Your integrity as a child of God will require you respond to this information. If you are not aware of this information then as a honest follower of Yeshua you need to read & verify that this material that Bet Emet Ministries has presented you is factual and true. That will be your responsibility before God. After reading these articles, after personal study on you part (to verify this information to be true), and after prayerful consideration of these facts and information presented for you...then understand fully that extreme changes in your "religious belief system as well as your life-style" will be in order. It is called repentance. In any case, you are responsible for the information that you receive or don't....

P.S. PLEASE DON'T BELIEVE ME...YOU MUST SEE THE FACTS AND EVIDENCE FOR YOURSELF AS YOU STUDY THE WEB PAGES....CHECK OUT THE EXTENSIVE BIBLIOGRAPHY FOR THIS MATERIAL...order some or all of these books for your own investigation...recover the truth before it is too late...

Shalom and blessings as your hunger for God and truth aids in your recovering spiritual truths long lost to mankind

A PERSONAL WORD FROM PASTOR CRAIG CONCERNING THE NEW TESTAMENT AND THE HISTORICAL JESUS

As an ordained Pastor, as well as a follower of Yeshua, my years of in-depth study has convinced me that I, as well as multitudes of other Christians, have relied upon a document, the New Testament, for our faith and practice which is, unfortunately, less than reliable in hundreds of aspects….and most are not aware of this fact. Such knowledge escapes the uninformed believer, but I assure you, if you will continue your study of the materials presented in this web site by Bet Emet Ministries, as well as others, you will quickly come to see what the Jewish people have always known and why the Jewish scholars and people have not accepted which seems, on the surface, so simple to the New Testament believer. The problems of which I speak concern the unreliability of the New Testament for one's faith and practice. Since most of the followers of Yeshua are New Testament believers, and not Old Testament believers (that is one of the major problems...our unfamiliarity with the Bible Yeshua used), their knowledge and comprehension of the Old Testament is severely lacking. This makes it all the more easy when reading the New Testament to overlook the hundreds and hundreds of purposeful misquotations from the Old Testament, the many purposeful mistranslations from the Old Testament by the writers of the New Testament, and the hundreds of verses quoted out of context by the New Testament writers on purpose.

Some will say: "but the quotes in my New Testament are just like the ones in my Old Testament for the most part. "Well, that might be, but you have failed to be told is that the Jewish Scriptures were terribly mistranslated on purpose over two thousand years ago by anti-Semitic Gentiles who wished "to have nothing in common with those despicable Jews." What my years of study have convinced me beyond any doubt, and what led to my resignation from my Pastorate, is that the Bible I was using was a "forged" translation. The Jewish people have know this since the beginning, and their scholars are quick to point this out to those who will listen. I spent years comparing what my KJV, for instance, said in the OT with the readings from the Jewish Tanakh. They were not the same to say the least in crucial points of theological diversity.

I, as a Christian, thought I had a faithful translation. I found I did not and you will too if you find the courage to look. Many discount this outright to their ultimate sorrow, but honest evaluation will prove otherwise.

This problem alone does not even address yet the multiple copying of pagan mystery religions and their religious beliefs which are put into the mouth of a Jewish Rabbi named Yeshua by the early Gentile Church which wished to give validity to their paganism. Repentance for them was out of the question. It can be said that the early Gentile Church "wanted their cake and eat it to".

The agenda of such literary deceptions by the New Testament writers and those who put the New Testament canon together, let alone altered it over hundreds of years, escapes the masses who are unfamiliar with the history of the Gentile Christian Church along with their unfamiliarity with the only Bible Yeshua ever knew… the Jewish Scriptures; unfortunately called the Old Testament today.

IS THE NEW TESTAMENT REALLY THE WORD OF GOD? DON'T ANSWER TOO QUICKLY.....

As Christians and sincere individuals who, seeking to know and do the will of the Almighty, come to such knowledge concerning the tampering of the New Testament and the anti-Semitic agenda of its writers, you are quickly confronted with the most significant question you'll every have to answer in this life: is the New Testament really the Word of God?

I as well as you, most likely since childhood, have been assured by our spiritual leaders that the answer is "yes;" perhaps you have even had some emotional experiences which seem to validate your leaders' assurances while in church. I did. Don't mistake the love of God for His children as an approval for one's disobedience. As you know, though, true faith is based neither upon trust in men (Ps, 146:3), nor even upon occurrences of the supernatural (Deut. 13); nor can we trust our emotions as a barometer for truth.

And so, the question remains:

After having seen the misquotations, mistranslations, and the hundreds of Old Testament passages taken and used out of context on purpose by the New Testament writers...the question is even more alarming.....How can this perversion of the Old Testament be considered as coming from God and how can we in all honesty trust it unquestioningly; let alone believe it and accept it as reliable for faith and practice in many places?

What is of even more importance is that your eternal salvation is contingent upon the answer. Without your personal knowledge about such misquotations, mistranslations, and verses used out of context as contained in the New Testament, you cannot give an intelligent answer, only an emotional one. You might be sincere, but at the same time sincerely wrong and never know it until you die. Bet Emet Ministries makes available to you in this site valuable data, research, and information about such matters; offered in an attempt to help you find the truth about these issues in hopes such knowledge will allow you to make necessary changes in your beliefs and spiritual walk; thus a life more pleasing to God. We ask that you complete these studies in a spirit of earnestness and prayer, asking God to reveal to you His truth in the quietness of your own heart. As you do so, remember that you are a member of a kingdom of priests and a holy nation (Ex.19:6), described in the Scriptures as the "apple of God's eye" (Zech.2:8) and participants in an "everlasting covenant" (Gen. 17:7). As such, rest assured that God will indeed heed your request as you sincerely seek to discover His truth.

DON'T MISUNDERSTAND OUR MOTIVES FOR SHARING THESE TRUTHS WITH YOU...WE SEEK ONLY THE TRUTH

Occasionally we at Bet Emet are not understood when being critical of much of what the New Testament teaches. We are not trying to say "Gentile Christianity" is wrong, but rather trying to get to the truth concerning Yeshua and "the faith once given the saints" after centuries of repression of such truths along with alterations in supposedly "infallible" documents we inherited as the "New Testament". The result of our study and research dictates that we be truthful to what we have found in our research because God is watching. God desires we have faith in the truth and not in error. We understand such misunderstanding because most of our readers have not had the opportunity to read and study to the level we have over the last 15 years where we discovered much that forced us to bow our knee to truth and repent and make changes in our "religious belief system" in order that our live be more pleasing to God. Simply we found, based upon our studies, that much of the New Testament, especially in doctrinal positions, was a replacement of the actual beliefs of a Rabbi named Yeshua who lived in the first century. This should break your heart when you first see it and realize that you have been deceived by men who, over two thousand years ago, had such dislike for the Jews that their anti-Semitism was to impel them to alter the existing beliefs about Yeshua and write into his life events that paralleled their pagan Sun-gods. Today we read such accounts in the New Testament and believe that this a faithful reproduction of the truth as handed down by the faithful followers of Yeshua. Nothing could be further from the truth!

There is no way you can be a follower of Yeshua and contradict what he both believed and practiced as his faith; no matter what Paul and the New Testament writings say. The sad fact is alarming: there is no way you can practice contemporary Christianity and be a true follower of real historical Yeshua.

A cursory reading of the New Testament does not always provide such an understanding, for most people approach and read it as if it is "inspired, infallible, and inerrant", and because of their unfamiliarity with the Old Testament as it exists in the Jewish Scriptures as opposed to the English corruption, never spot such textual problems contained within it as I have delineated above. Thus when reading the New Testament it reads like their Old Testament. They match. The problem still remains to which they have not been made aware; namely, the Jewish Scriptures from the Masoretic text (Palestinian Text) differ in hundreds of critical places which has caused many of their "beliefs and actions" to be opposite of what the real historical Yeshua believed. Without such knowledge you never know to question anything about the New Testament. Such I found is not wise, and you will be amazed once you see it for yourself. Nothing could be farther from the truth than the "infallibility and inerrancy" of the New Testament, and this fact will become evident upon initial serious study of the New Testament. Understand such a false trust and belief in the New Testament by most Christians today is not based upon the reader's personal and individual study of the New Testament, but rather upon the hearsay he has picked up by listening to others express such trust in the New Testament through preaching Sunday after Sunday. There should be less preaching and more teaching. The sad fact of the matter is that those who say such things have never done their homework to the depth necessary in these areas to see the problems inherent in accepting the New Testament as authoritative for faith and practice. What they miss is that in many ways the New Testament is a repudiation of what the real historical Yeshua both believed and lived. The New Testament was never meant to be a replacement book for the Jewish Scriptures, the Torah, but sadly has become just that today for the vast majority of non-Jewish believers in God….the Christians. This is our legacy from the anti-Semitic Gentile Church of the earliest centuries of the Yeshua Movement within Biblical Judaism.

A Christian's religious belief system, when tested and exposed to contradictory facts from Biblical languages, Biblical history, Biblical culture, and archeology, must in the Spirit of Truth and Repentance, be flexible enough to change.

Doctrine, when found in the New Testament, to be true, must conform to the Word of God.....THE OLD TESTAMENT THAT JESUS USED...AND NOT THE ONE WE HAVE TODAY! WE FIND SUCH AN OLD TESTAMENT IN THE JEWISH TANAKH AND NOT THE KJV OR OTHER ENGLISH TRANSLATIONS!

"To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." (Isaiah 8:20)

Listen to what Isaiah said! Thus, if we find doctrines in the New Testament which contradict the Jewish Scriptures in the Hebrew (and not the mistranslated ones we inherited in English)...such doctrines are to be understood as fables and lies. To fail to acknowledge such contradictions when shown them means that you stand in opposition to the Prophets and that you contradict not only Isaiah the Prophet who is quoted above, but Moses, as well as Yeshua.

Answer for yourself: Can we trust the early anti-Semitic Gentile Catholics to have been led into all truth by the Holy SpiriT (just look at their doctrines and you know God did not give them such lies), and should we trust these same people and their collection of writings called the New Testament Canon when their writings, in many places, contradict Moses and Yeshua?

We at Bet Emet cannot, and we offer no man apologies. Just understand that when you read the New Testament, with all its additions, purposeful misquotes and mistranslations of the Jewish Scriptures, changes, additions, deletions and various doctrinal creationism over the early centuries of the Gentile Church, that the doctrines behind the men who did it are expressed in Roman Catholicism today!!!!!!!!!!!!!! If you read this and are not Catholic, then you have need to be very concerned about what I say. My friends, I hope to stimulate your interest and study as a thinking believer in hopes that you begin to give serious attention to studying the document you have trusted your whole life as "infallible, inerrant, and inspired"….the New Testament. We must realize that one's behavior and conduct before God or one's fellow man is determined by what he believes. If we have a forged document, and we do, then our conduct, behavior, and beliefs are often wrong and much of what we do is considered "sin" by God and we never know it.

Answer for yourself: What will you do when you discover that much of what you have been taught from the New Testament, which has influenced your conduct and behavior, is in error and opposed by Moses and Yeshua; and in reality has even led you into sin because of your ignorance of the Old Testament and what it teaches?

Answer for yourself: What of other errors in the New Testament which can be shown to be false teachings created by the non-Jewish Gentile Church which have caused you to depart from what Yeshua would have you do; thus having a conduct, belief, or attitude contrary to what God and Yeshua originally desired you have?

Answer for yourself: Are you aware of the glaring mistakes and untruths recorded in the New Testament passed off as truth, which can upon examination and comparison with the Jewish Scriptures, history, Archeology, Biblical culture, and Biblical Language, be shown to be outright errors and deceptions?

Answer for yourself: What will you do after having allowed yourself to be shown that many cherished doctrines of the Christian faith are in reality sin when compared with the Jewish Scriptures and the faith of Yeshua? "I hope you said repent".

Answer for yourself: Would you want to know of these which I speak before you die?

I hope you would and this web page is decided to the defense of God and enlightenment of His people.

HOW IT WAS DONE….A BRIEF SYNOPSIS

The New Testament writers are guilty of mishandling and abuse of the Jewish Scripture in order to create a new religion which opposes the faith of Yeshua. Let me give you the mechanics involved in textual manipulation whereby we end up with something different in meaning that the original author intended and what the earliest church both believed and practiced.

1. Jewish texts and phrases are lifted out of their places in the Hebrew Scriptures and given meanings in the New Testament which, at best, are forced.

2. Preceding many of the prophetic verses which are misquoted, mistranslated, and taken out of context in the New Testament is the assertion, "What was said through the prophet was thus fulfilled." In this way the writers of the Christian Scriptures endeavored to show that the Tanakh anticipated and predicted the events recorded in the New Testament. Such is not the case the the vast majority of cases!

3. Those happenings, then, are presented as the fulfillment of the Hebrew Scriptures and are considered proof texts. Such is not the case! You will come to see this when we study them.

4. The techniques employed to establish proof include citation of verses out of context, mistranslation, and misquotation. These abound in the New Testament and are overlooked by the vast majority of Christians today due to their unfamiliarity with the Old Testament.

5. Sometimes a figurative or poetic phrase is mistaken for a straightforward statement and vice versa.

6. Sometimes sayings of different writers, living in different places, and in different centuries are run together in such a way to destroy the intended meanings of the original writers.

7. Often two or more of these methods are used in a single quotation.

SO..... DOES KNOWING THIS MATTER TO YOU?

Besides the quest for truth and an obedient life before God, there are numerous verses contained within the New Testament, which in and of themselves are not anti-Semitic but are used to substantiate certain beliefs held by the early Gentile Church which have anti-Jewish implications. Carried out to the end-result these verses influence one's beliefs and conduct. We beg of you: Don't throw away the opportunity God has placed before you to study His Word in such a way whereby you can see the discrepancies for yourself. What you do then is up to you, but you need to see them in order to make an intelligent decision. Remember God has instructed us to be "holy, for He is holy." Let that be the impetus for your quest for God and truth. It has been mine. Shalom.

Are you ready for the most important study of your life?

BUT BEFORE WE PROCEED...MY CONCLUSIONS ABOUT JESUS AND THE MESSIAH OF ISRAEL

I find it necessary, both as a former Pastor and as an intense Bible student throughout the years, to bring a summary of what this Web Site contains. Too often one will read the research I've collected and scrutinize the facts presented and jump to conclusions which are not warranted; incorrect conclusions which will tend to negate the facts presented in these articles. Understandable this is not my desire nor my purpose in making such information available to you. It is my hope that these pages of information and research will benefit both my Jewish friends as well as my Christian friends in their search to draw closer to God. But one thing must be said right up front. The study of "Jesus" and the "Jesus Story" is very complex and must be done on several levels if one is to come to the truth of the matter. At least that is what I discovered for it encompasses the necessity of obtaining competent knowledge in several areas if we ever hope to understand correctly just whom this "Jesus" really is and what lays behind this "Jesus Story". By "several fields" I mean such areas such as:

- Judaism and the truth about the Jewish Messiah
- Competent knowledge of the religious texts of both Judaism and the later Greek Old Testament "alterations" with this subsequent carry-over into the New Testament
- Competent knowledge of Comparative Religions and the hundreds of parallels to the "Jesus Story" we find in the New Testament
- Competent knowledge of Gnosticism and how the "Descent of the Soul", or the "Christ Within" was later changed by Rome when they "literalized" this previous understanding of mankind as to their Divine origins
- Competent knowledge of Lunar and Solar Mythology, or should I say Astronomy and how this became, when personified, the story of the "godman" and all later similar "Jesus Stories" from beginning to end. Along with that comes the understanding how Matthew 1 through Matthew 28 is the "personification" of the path of the Sun through the Zodiac and the Heavens which the Ancients understood as the Creator speaking to them of the Descent of the Soul and its intended maturation in this physical plane of existence.
- Understanding of how the Ancients used "myths" to tell the story of the Soul and its descent into matter and the flesh of mankind and how these were the foundations for the later stories of godmen who were but allegories depicting the growth of the Divine Soul in mankind from incarnation to its release at the death of the body. In reality the stories of these allegorical "godmen" are the story of "you and me" and our intended Spiritual development while in this physical plane of existence.

Wow! That is a lot and it will take several years to master this information to see the truth behind this "Jesus Story" that has existed for some 10,000 years or more but told in "many names" (like the first "Jesus Story" found in Ancient Egypt with Osiris and Horus).

But our correct understanding of the "Jesus Story" and what actually encompasses it on these various levels must begin with our study of Judaism for the Old Testament is the first introduction for most Christians to the Creator and His "Divine Revelation" that was handed down through history, beginning first with Sumer and Egypt and later given to the "Jewish people" though association with the Biblical Moses (the Pharaoh Akhenaten of the 18th Dynasty). Too often many of my readers who lack such necessary knowledge of the history and "religious beliefs" of Judaism, as well as early Gentile Christianity and their forgery of the Hebrew Scriptures that comprise our Christian Old Testaments, will react out of fear when first encountering this information instead of "repentance" and "faith" in these "facts and evidences" which are uncovered to their very sight and understanding or when reading truths long hidden exposed. Seeing this deception for the first time is a hard thing to stomach let alone believe is even possible in light of the constant false assurances we have heard our whole lives that only Christianity "has the truth" that again we were told is necessary for the salvation of the whole world. Presentation of further "hidden truths" when exposed and uncovered to their eyes will not be evaluated by them objectively either because it hurts too band or because of snap decisions on their part made in the initial confrontations with such facts and evidence which opposes long cherished Christian religious beliefs that come from the documents of Christianity and their Bibles. Having never studied Judaism let alone know intimately the Hebrew Scriptures they are at that time in their life unaware of this abject purposeful mistranslation, misquotation, and pure "invention" of religious texts by the early Gentile Church in their creation of this New Testament which was finally "canonized" in the early 4th century. Let me say up front that one can have belief in "truth and facts" or a belief in "untruths". The choice is yours. God gives mankind free choice but understand that the presentation of the "Jewish Christ", seen as this "Jesus" in the New Testament today is a far cry from the "Jewish Christ (anointed of God) of Israel as both known and taught in the first century. This statement is not debateable when one possess adequate knowledge of Judaism and its cherished Hebrew Scriptures and what they teach of the Jewish Messiah as taken from the true Masoretic Hebrew texts which have not been altered and when one compares "line upon line" and "precept upon precept" these Hebrew Texts with the later Greek purposeful mistranslations and all later Christian Old Testaments and New Testaments built upon it. Error and falsehood is subsequently taught instead of truth and few if any know it in Christianity because they have failed to study or see these facts for themselves. And I mean your teachers and Pastors and even Seminary professors whom I found accept all to easily the "tradition" without serious comparison of such texts. But the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls only 50 years ago changed all of this but again you have to know what was discovered there and its startling implications to Christian theology which has been taught unchallenged for the last 1,700 years. But that can be no more once you see that two different Hebrew texts were found at Qumran among the ruins of the Essenes; one is forged Greek translation and which stands today as witness to this "theological" forgery that is passed down through history in the early Gentile Church. It is this discovery at Qumran, as well the discovery of the Nag Hammadi Library a year earlier in Egypt which gives the world its first glimpse in over 2000 years of the "Kodak Moment" as to what the religious milieu actually was and what the religious belief actually were in these earliest "Christian communities" long before the rise of the Roman Gentile Church which will further perpetuate this theological forgery. In so doing the truth behind this "Jesus" is further clouded and without significant study these facts will never be known by the vast majority of Christians today. Thank God that we live in a time which these documents were discovered corrects these later forged "Greek" Old Testaments and all later English Bibles "theologically". But we have to know about this and as late as 1988 Southwestern Theological Seminary taught me nothing about this let alone mentioned this momentous event. I had to find this out on my own though my serious study into the "Jewish Roots" of Christianity where I ran across it in later studies. This changed my life and my relationship with God and gave me ample reason for major repentance in my life concerning much of my inherited Christian religious belief system. I firmly believe that God never intended we place our faith in "fairy tales" and "untruths". Faith that is grounded only in truth will bring forth the fruits of repentance which is acceptable to God and allow the seeker to draw closer to God than ever before as he removes from his life idolatry and disobedience which is so often masked by "religion" and many of the doctrine accepted by Christianity today!

SCRUTINY OF THE DOCUMENTS BEHIND THE CHRISTIAN FAITH.....THE ONLY WAY TO FIND THE TRUTH

With such a motive for this web site, as well as many others by Bet Emet Ministries, I wish to bring a short synopsis of what you will encounter on this web site. My intended goal for you, both Jewish believers as well as "non-Jewish" Christians, is that you become aware of the religious documents and the writers of such documents which underlie the Christian Faith and in so doing equip the reader to understand their reliability pertaining to "Divine Truth" and what value they should hold in one's life today. Only when you come to terms with the credibility of the religious documents that are the foundation for the Christian Church when seen in their historical setting and origin, and when compared with the earlier Hebrew religious texts, will one be better able to evaluate the importance such religious documents that are the foundation for all later Christian religious beliefs, many that surround this "Jesus", and the reliability that I should put into them and the impact, if any, that they should have in one's religious belief system. Once you see for yourself that many such religious documents were created and collected at the whim of Rome, let alone "altered" and "fixed" in their struggle with Biblical Judaism can one truly understand the scope of what I speak. Only when your personal study can show you these hundreds of "alterations" made to these Hebrew texts and prior religious doctrines of Judaism and one assess the scope of such alterations by Rome chronologically and successively from Church Council to Church Council as they "hammered out" the religious beliefs that they wanted connected to this "Jesus" can one fully understand the degree of deception to which we have fallen today. Understanding the scope to which these earlier Hebrew texts which were cherished and protected by Jewish sages were constantly altered and amended following each successive Church Council, then and only then can you make an accurate determination regarding their infallibility and inerrancy and the role they should play in your religious belief system. As if that is not enough one can find that this "error" of alteration of the Jewish Scriptures actually began long before Rome got their hands on the documents and can be traced to the initial corruption of the Jewish texts by the Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt, when they purposefully altered the Jewish Scriptures when they translated them into Greek. Rome will only pick up where they left off. As stated before the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls found one too many Bibles at Qumran, the "real" and the "fake". This knowledge should wake the dead! This is a very difficult and lengthy study but one that I think is paramount for a Christian to understand since the facts of the matter at hand reveal the insidious alteration of the Torah and the Prophets in order to "create" a religion of convenience and this ultimate lies at the very core of our inherited "Jesus Story" where he is presented to the world by Rome as the final atonement for sins and the Jewish Messiah.

Understand such "altered" and "created" documents play a significant role in one's concepts and religious beliefs concerning this Christian Jesus. Idolatry and blasphemy before God is the result of our failure to do such scrutiny our the origins for our Christian faith and this is the guilt that we carry not knowing the truth of what we are taught to believe since children in the Christian Church. Coupled not only with that, once you come to see how hundreds of passages and theological errors are contained in such tampered religious documents which include multiple purposeful mistranslations, misquotations, and the lifting of Jewish Scriptures completely out of context, then will you again be better equipped to determine for yourself if such a document should be categorized as "God breathed", "inspired", "inerrant", and what role it should play in your religious belief system. Please understand that I wish not to denigrate the New Testament because Divine Truths are contained within it in many places, but to approach this New Testament and accepting everything written within it as "Divine" is unwise and foolish as I found having done so never studying how this book given us by Rome was collected and altered let alone how it compares in its many quotes with these earlier Hebrew texts. It is my desire to exalt the God of the Jewish Scriptures who called Israel to be a light unto all nations and this includes the Christian as well and in so doing help in some small regard to the restoration of these Hebrew Scriptures to their place of authority that God intended since Sinai.

Isa 42:6 I the LORD have called thee (Israel) in righteousness, and will hold thine hand, and will keep thee, and give thee for a covenant of the people, for a light of the Gentiles.

Israel was given the revelation of HaShem (God) for the whole of mankind, and I personally take offense as should you when you discover that much in the New Testament which is passed off as "revelation" is in reality a perversion of these Jewish and Hebrew Scriptures and violates the commands of God:

Deut 4:2 2 Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish ought from it, that ye may keep the commandments of the LORD your God which I command you.

Deut 12:32 32 What thing soever I command you, observe to do it: thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it.

God did not bring a "new" revelation to the "non-Jew"; it was Israel which was to take to the "non-Jew" the revelation of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. It was Israel who was to take to the world the Messiah. It was Israel who was to take to the world the Covenants of God with mankind. It was Israel who was called of God to take His Laws to the whole of mankind along with the "Pattern of Worship" of God; a "Pattern" by the way which can be traced as far back as Ancient Egypt but sadly which was destroyed almost beyond recognition in the 3rd through the 5th century by Rome.

Rom 9:4 4 Who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; (KJV)

Only when you see for yourself that both the Christian's Old & New Testament is a perversion of the real Masoretic Text, the Holy Word of God, can you then intelligently make a decision before God to "cast out the leaven". The conspiracy is great and done long ago. We unfortunately accept as Christians the documents of the early Gentile Church unquestioningly. Such I will show you is unwise. It is my hopes that once you see this for yourself that you will grow to love the Jewish Scriptures as found in the Stone Edition Tanakh or the JPS Tanakh; for in reality, unless you have either of these translations, you have never read the true Word of God yet in your life because you will come to see, as I and numerous others have seen who have done these types of studies, that the Old Testament translations in the Christians Bibles are "fixed" and the theological and political agenda of men in power are carried out in the religions presented by them. In the pages which follow I will lay out for you these more serious errors which are passed off as "truths" by the Christian Bible.

BUT....WHAT ARE WE TO DO WITH YESHUA (JESUS)?

Lastly we must deal honestly and truthfully with the Jesus of the New Testament. Much is claimed in Christianity and its documents for this Jesus (called Yeshu in Hebrew). Again once understanding the lack of integrity within the Christian documents you will quickly come to see that such deceptions are not limited to doctrines in reaction to Judaism and the Laws and Covenants of God as taught by Gentile Christianity for the last 1,700 years, but extend to the identity of the "key" person behind the whole of the Christian Faith. By that I mean this "Jesus". This identity and truth behind this "Jesus" and the "Jesus Story" can only come once you have equipped yourself with competent knowledge concerning Judaism and the truth about the Jewish Messiah, knowledge of the religious texts of both Judaism and the later Greek Old Testament "alterations" with this subsequent carry-over into the New Testament, knowledge of Comparative Religions and the hundreds of parallels to the "Jesus Story" we find in the New Testament, knowledge of Gnosticism and how the "Descent of the Soul", or the "Christ Within" was later changed by Rome when they "literalized" this previous understanding of mankind as to their Divine origins, knowledge of Lunar and Solar Mythology, or should I say Astronomy and how this became, when personified, the story of the "godman" and all later similar "Jesus Stories" from beginning to end. Along with that comes the understanding how Matthew 1 through Matthew 28 is the "personification" of the path of the Sun through the Zodiac and the Heavens which the Ancients understood as the Creator speaking to them of the Descent of the Soul and its intended maturation in this physical plane of existence. Also it is necessary to understand how the Ancients used "myths" to tell the story of the Soul and its descent into matter and the flesh of mankind and how these were the foundations for the later stories of godmen who were but allegories depicting the growth of the Divine Soul in mankind from incarnation to its release at the death of the body. In reality the stories of these allegorical "godmen" are the story of "you and me" and our intended Spiritual development while in this physical plane of existence. When this is done then you will have the truth about this Jesus and "this Jewish Christ" and then no man can ever deceive you about God and His "Word" to you any longer.

THE MOST IMPORTANT QUESTIONS YOU WILL EVER HAVE TO ANSWER

- Who was this Jesus, this Yeshua?
- Was he God, man, both?
- Was he a historical figure or an allegory of earlier "Divine Truths" as had been these "godmen" and "avatars" before him as found since the beginning of recorded time?
- Is he demonstratively the Jewish Messiah, or a false Messiah, or will he yet be Messiah?
- Did this Jesus (Yeshua) fulfill the necessary Jewish and Hebrew Scriptures to be Messiah?
- Or did this Jesus only fulfull these "purposefully mistranslated, misquoted, invented texts along with other Hebrew texts lifted out of there context" in order to make it appear that he is the Jewish Messiah in spite of 2000 years of the denial of Judaism who reads a different Hebrew Bible than our Greek forged Old Testaments?
- Or is Jesus (Yeshua) made to look as if he fulfilled necessary Messianic passages to the "non-Jews" by the Gentile Roman Church by the twisting of the Old Testament Jewish Scriptures as portrayed in the New Testament?
- Was he not able to fulfill them because of Israel's failure to merit the Kingdom of Heaven for the world?
- Can we, or should we continue to believe "in Jesus" once we come to see these textual irregularities and purposeful forgeries in our Christian Bibles?
- Is there an understanding of "this Jesus" which is correct and valid for the Christian today and can it draw us closer in our walk with God if we know it and follow it in our lives? Could this be the "Christ Within" as taught by the early Gnostic Christians before Rome which resides in all mankind instead of just "one Christ" of Rome's invention?

These are hard questions to read let alone answer. Sadly I must tell you that the answers to them are not nearly so easy to obtain as you might think. It take serious study in the "areas" mentioned in the beginning of this article in order for you the reader and student to come to the truth of the matter. God has called me to study these theological issues out both before, during, and after my Pastorate and Bet Emet Ministries has various websites detailing the answers to these most important questions that lay before Christianity today.

WHERE I STAND....AFTER TWENTY YEARS OF RESEARCH INTO THE MAN FROM GALILEE

Understand my allegiance to God is undergirded by "rightly dividing" the Word of God. In other words, we should translate the Jewish Bible according to existing Laws of Hermeneutics. There are laws which govern how a passage is to be understood and only by adhering to such laws of hermeneutics can we be assured of arriving at the truths intended in such a passage. Emotionalism and agreement to your Church's dogmas and doctrines is a poor substitute for truth and facts when they contradict your "tradition". Again God desires our emotions be attached to truths and not lies. So having stated that let me say that when one becomes familiar with the Jewish and Hebrew Scriptures and not the altered, misquoted, and mistranslated ones as found in both the Christian's Old & New Testament and Christian Bibles today, then and only then can one accurately determine if this Jesus truly fulfilled the necessary Hebrew Scriptures to be recognized as Messiah.

Judaism has said "No" to this for the last 2,000 years and are unwavering in their denial of our Christian Jesus as the expected Jewish Messiah.

Answer for yourself: What do they know which we in Western Christianity has not been taught? It all comes down to the reliability of the religious texts that we accept and give authority to for our religious beliefs. The "correct" ones and how to discern this fact is the quest for every Christian and this cannot be done without some competent knowledge regarding the religious texts given us by Rome.

Along with this is the very important matter concerning atonement and if any form of atonement can be connected to the death of this Jesus as depicted in this Roman New Testament. As you can see the "integrity" of the documents that we as Christians and followers of this Jesus and "the Christ" are paramount for our religious belief system; either we have believed the truth about this Christian Jesus because our Christian documents can stand the test of scrutiny or else we have believed lies about this Jesus because our Christian documents can be exposed as frauds.

Answer for yourself: What is the truth in this matter? We will come to see the answer very clearly if you have the courage and the tenacity to study and read through this website and others that this ministry has provided.

History records that the Kingdom of God did not materialize with Israel in the first century. We today await the arrival of Messiah and the Messianic Kingdom. But knowing these glaring errors, misquotations, and misapplication of Jewish Scriptures and lies contained in the New Testament, many of which pertain to this Jesus (Yeshua), I cannot before God nor mankind allow such sacrilege of the Holy Text to go without challenge. Realizing the failure of the true Messianic Prophecies to be fulfilled it is impossible today, without question, to say that "so and so" is the Messiah. This will come as news to most Christians but what you read in the New Testament as "fulfilled" Messianic Prophecies is far from that the true Messianic prophecies were in the Jewish Texts before they were altered. I firmly believe that God desires we both rightly interpret His Word as well as accurately understand the events surrounding the Roman depiction of this Jesus in their New Testament. I like many of you have hope and faith that one day the Hebrew Messiah will appear but time will tell if such faith is warranted. But to insist against all contrary evidences that this New Testament Jesus, created by Rome by Hebrew Scriptural manipulation and misrepresentation of the Hebrew Scriptures as has been done in our Christian Bibles, is the Hebrew Messiah, is folly. It is one thing to "believe in this Jesus" and pattern your life after his example and I strongly recommend that this be done but it is entirely a different matter all together to definitely say or teach that he is the Jewish Messiah when the unforged Hebrew texts discount it. This will become certain the more you study and compare the Hebrew Scriptures with the later forged Greek texts as well as the English of our Bibles.

So when you read the following articles which expose the crafty misuse of the Jewish Scriptures by the non-Jewish Church of the early centuries, please, please understand that I am not trying to denigrate this Jesus or the "Jewish Christ"; but rather to uphold the sanctity and holiness of the Word of God as given to Holy men of old and point out how it has been twisted by the anti-Semitic Gentile Church in its creation of a religion about Yeshua instead of following the faith of Yeshua.

SO WHERE DOES THIS LEAVE US?

Basically the Western Christian Faith of today is a replacement religion that opposes what the "Jewish Christ" both believed and practiced as his faith before God.

If you truly look to Jesus (Yeshua) as God's example of a life pleasing to God, a life so lived that assured judgment for life and not death, a life that will be rewarded in redemption, and resurrection, then you like I need to understand the true faith of Yeshua and repent and return to the faith once given to the saints. We find that best expressed today in Judaism which just so happens to have a place for the "non-Jew" along side the Jew. This task is impossible if our religious documents that concern God and His "Divine Revelation" to all mankind are in error. Let us honor this "Jewish Christ", an allegory for the "Christ Within" and return to the faith of this Jewish Jesus as we, "non-Jewish believer" are grafted into the Israel of God as Godfearers and no longer stand apart from God's people as a competing and conflicting faith. This can only be done by serious study where we return to the Bible that Israel used and it's truths concerning the Jewish Messiah along with the correct understanding of atonement and how to obtain it in our lives.

So in the pages which follow you will be shown things that will challenge your present faith in many regards. It is not my intention to hurt anyone by exposing the lies and deceptions contained in the Christian's New Testament. However, I must be truthful to God who called me by recognizing my calling in a similar light as to the calling of Jeremiah the prophet:

Jeremiah: 1:9-10: Then the LORD put forth his hand, and touched my mouth. And the LORD said unto me, Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth. 10 See, I have this day set thee over the nations and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to build, and to plant.

It is in the Spirit of Jeremiah I dedicate this web site, as all my websites, to the God of truth and it is my hopes that my pilgrimage and study is edifying to you and yours as we both try to make our calling and election certain.

DO YOU WANT TO KNOW THE TRUTH BEFORE YOU DIE?

If you are a Christian you know the "drill." We have heard our whole lives that Jesus Christ had a supernatural and divine origin; that he had a human being for a mother, and a God for his father; that, although he was conceived by a woman, a virgin no less, he was Deity-begotten, and molded in the human form. We have heard it put different ways, but it is understood by most that Jesus is the "essence" and the fullness of the infinite Godhead in human form; thus making him half human and half divine in origin. It is claimed by the vast majority of Christians that he was full and perfect God, and perfect man; and while he was God, he was also the son of God, and as such was sent down by his father to save a fallen and guilty world; and that thus his mission pertained to the whole human race. Lastly, we have heard it said and preached that his inspired followers purposed to declare that ultimately every nation, tongue, kindred, and people under heaven will acknowledge allegiance to his government, and concede his right to reign and rule the world; that "every knee must bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. That's it in a nutshell.

BUT IS THE PICTURE OF JESUS "UNIQUE" OR IS IT A "COPY-CAT" OF OTHER "SAVIORS" OF OTHER NATIONS?

On the contrary, it is found that by a portion, and a large portion of the people of even those nations now called Christian, this claim has been steadily and unswervingly controverted, through the whole line of history, stretching through the nearly two thousand years which have elapsed since his advent to earth. The books revealing such information exist; you only have to read them to see the picture very clearly; namely, there was a "pattern" of beliefs attributed to every nations's heroes. These "heroes" were with "allegorical" or "real" in some fashion. But understand the "motif" expressed above is not "unique at all," and this is very troubling from the standpoint that Christianity considers itself a "unique and Divine revelation." Such rival claims, when shown to existed thousands of years before Jesus Christ, is a "death-knoll" to the inerrancy of Christian doctrine. And when we extend our researches to other countries, we find the claim for the uniqueness of Christ and Christian doctrine far from being conceded; in fact it is denied and contested by whole nations upon other grounds. It is met, contested, and confronted by rival claims.

AS IF YOU DIDN'T KNOW THIS...

Upon this ground hundreds of millions of the established believers in divine revelation -- hundreds of millions of believers in the divine character and origin of religion -- reject the pretentious set up for Jesus Christ. They admit both a God and a Savior, but do not accept Jesus of Nazareth as being either. They admit a Messiah, but not the Messiah; these nations contend that the title is misplaced which makes "the man Christ Jesus" the Savior of the world. These nations, in contradiction to the Christian's claim of the uniqueness and Divine revelation in Jesus Christ, claim just the opposite. These Gentile nations believed themselves to have been honored with the birth of the true Savior among them and defend this claim upon the ground of priority of date. These Gentile nations affirm that the advent of their Messiahs were long prior to that of the Christians', and that this circumstance adjudicates for them a superiority of claim as to having had the true Messiah born upon their soil.

Well this is a major problem for Christianity, but I can count on one hand how many Christians I have met in my life that know of such things. Let's face it, comparative religion is not taught in our schools and basically as Christians and followers of Jesus we are basically ignorant of such knowledge let alone the rival claims of these nations for their god-men.

HOW DO CHRISTIANS ANSWER SUCH CLAIMS OF THE PRIORITY OF RIVAL SAVIORS?

It is argued that, as the story of the incarnation of the Christians' Savior is of more recent date than that of these oriental and ancient religions (as is conceded by Christians themselves), the Christian maintains the "his faith" is foreshadowed by these "pagan Sun myths." They maintain that the Christian faith is but an outgrowth from a "seed" of truth held by the Gentile nations for millennia. They deny the charge of "plagarism" and the charge of the "non-believers" that Christianity is but a - a borrowed copy of pagaism, of which the pagan stories furnish the original. This is nothing new; for the early Church Fathers, when cornered by the Pagans in debates and discourses, were hard-pressed to advance their "claims of 'Divineness' for the Christian faith in light of such contradicting facts of "plagiarism."

Here, then, we observe rivalries of claims, as to which of the remarkable personages who have figured in the world as Saviors, Messiahs, and Sons of God, in different ages and different countries, can be considered the true Savior and "sent of God;" or whether all should be, or the claims of all rejected.

EXAMINING ORIENTAL RELIGIOUS HISTORY ...FOR THE ORIGIN OF "SAVIORS" & "GOD-MEN"

Researches into oriental religious history reveal the remarkable fact that stories of incarnate Gods answering to and resembling the miraculous character of Jesus Christ have been prevalent in most if not all the principal religions heathen nations of antiquity; and the accounts and narrations of some of these deific incarnations bear such a striking resemblance to that of the Christian Savior -- not only in their general features, but in some cases in the most minute details, from the legend of the immaculate conception to that of the crucifixion, and subsequent ascension into heaven -- that one might almost be mistaken for the other.

What this brings to mind immediately is the "truthfulness" of the New Testament; not only in these particular instances, but across the board. Gone immediately is any belief in the "infallibility, inerrant, and inspiration" for such a document

I personally have read over forty books in these areas alone and let me tell you it is not "a pretty picture" for the Christian, let alone an ordained Pastor. I discovered more than twenty claims of this kind -- claims of beings invested with divine honor (deified) made for these Gentile "Messiahs" and god-men. Each one of these "claims" are backed by irrefutable evidence and archeology which, if presented in any court of this land, would immediately bring the conviction of Christianity for "plagiarism." Such evidence, when seen for yourself, leaves you with only one avenue to consider; namely, that Christendom is anything but a Divine and unique revelation from God. Christianity, in having proclaimed Jesus Christ, "the only son, and sent of God" forgot to include the other twenty or so Messiahs, Saviors, and Sons of God, according to history or tradition, which, in past times, descended from heaven, and taken upon themselves the form of men, clothing themselves with human flesh, and furnishing incontestable evidence of a divine origin, by various miracles, marvelous works, and superlative virtues. Finally these twenty varieties of Jesus Christs, have in their own way, laid the foundation for the salvation of the world, and ascended back to heaven. Sound familiar?

In reading the history of these "myths" I never ceased to be amazed that all these have all received divine honors, have nearly all been worshiped as Gods, or sons of God; were mostly incarnated as Christs, Saviors, Messiahs, or Mediators. The majority of them were reputedly born of virgins; some of them filling a character almost identical with that ascribed by the Christian's bible to Jesus Christ. Many of these, like Jesus, are reported to have been crucified; and all of them, taken together, furnish a prototype and parallel for nearly every important incident and wonder-inciting miracle, doctrine and precept recorded in the New Testament, of the Christian's Savior.

WHERE IS THE "JEWISH JESUS" TO BE FOUND IN ANY OF THIS?

WHAT IS THE REAL MESSAGE OF THIS MAN FROM GALILEE.....HOW CAN WE FIND IT...AND THEN WHAT ARE WE GOING TO DO WITH IT....?

BUT FIRST YOU NEED TO KNOW THAT YOU, AS A CHRISTIAN, HAVE NOT YET BEEN TOLD THE TRUTH.....NOT YET ANYWAY UNTIL NOW

NOW I BELIEVE JESUS IS A "SAVIOR".... BUT NOT THE WAY HE IS DEPICTED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT...

The evidence is overwhelming. To continue to believe "in Jesus" in the traditional Christian way, either impugnes one's intelligence or I guess we can blame such blindness on the Devil as the Christians have used him in such manners of over two thousand years at present. There are valid grounds, as you have seen, for doubting and disputing the claims put forth by the Christian world in behalf of "Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." But don't let that take away anything from Yeshua the Jewish Rabbi and Messiah to be (most likely....to understand that comment you need to study: http://www.geocities.com/bennoah1messiah).

Yeshua is "savior" to all who will learn from his example...A righteous "anointed" who left us a life filled with teachings to love God and to love our fellow-man through concrete acts and "deeds" which are the results of the Commandments of God "obeyed". Yeshua "saves" as his example leads one to honor God with his life; a life lived in repentance and faith and obedience to the Commandments of God.Such is the ONLY true salvation anyway.

WHAT IS TO FOLLOW....IN THESE ARTICLES

In the articles which follow I will prove my points beyond any contention. I shall present an array of facts and historical proofs, drawn from numerous histories and the Holy Scriptures and bibles appertaining to these various Saviors, and which include a history of their lives and doctrines, that will go to show that in nearly all their leading features, and mostly even in their details, they are strikingly similar.

This web-site will provide for the reader a comparison, or a parallel view of such similarities between the Jesus of the New Testament and these pagan god-men. Such an examination will extend through the sacred histories of many nations, so as to include an exhibition presented in parallels of the teachings of their respective bibles. Such a study will make it clearly manifest that, with respect to nearly every important thought, deed, word, action, doctrine, principle, receipt, tenet, ritual, ordinance or and ceremony as contained in the New Testament can be found in the religions of the Gentiles long before Jesus ever lived.

Such a study will make it clearly manifest that almost every important character or personage, who figure in the religious drama of Jesus as depicted in the New Testament can be found to exit prior to the time of Jesus in almost every foreign nation. Such Saviors, prophets, apostles, angels, devils, demons, exalted or fallen geni (found somewhere in the sacred records or bibles of the oriental heathen nations) are to be found existing as an antitype for the "Christ story" in your New Testament.

It broke my heart to see these things over the years. Imagine for a second, a young Christian Pastor, fresh out of Seminary, using the skills he learned there only to find (accidentally through covering much materials) that the very foundation of his faith, when examined critically, can be shown to be a pious lie.

In summary, nearly every event in the life of the "Christ of faith" in the New Testament, excluding the Jewish parables, is highly suspect. Such "Divine" revelations are anything but that. The proofs are hereby provided in hopes that as a follower of Jesus, that you will see that in your case the "very elect" have been deceived.

Christianity has been the borrower of pagan Sun Myths and these are cleverly woven into the life of the man from Galilee in the New Testament.

And as nearly the whole outline and constituent parts of the Christian system are found scattered through these older systems, the query is at once sprung as to whether Christianity did not derive its materials from these sources -- that is from heathenism, instead of from high heaven -- as it claims.

THE ONLY QUESTION YOU NEED TO ANSWER FOR NOW

Answer for yourself: If you are a Christian, do you want to know the truth before you die?

If you do, then you will have to read a lot and examine the evidence for yourself in order that you might be certain about such a claim against the faith you grew up in. It is time to find the "truth" about Yeshua. And as a non-Jew, it is way past time you learn of how you are to relate to God and His people; the Israel of God. Such a position is called becoming a Godfearer in Biblical Judaism. Let me finish by restating: Israel was called to be a Holy Nation and a Royal Priesthood for one purpose and one purpose only....to lead the pagan nations out of gross idolatry and Sun worship...which today the Christian finds himself immersed in again.....whether he knows it or not.....Nothing new under the Sun.

CHRISTIANITY: DIVINE REVELATION OR A FRAUD?

Over the years I have at times written what I and many others have considered to be critical articles that brought their readers to crossroad decisions in their lives once knowledge was made available to them. These articles are possibly the most important ones I have ever written.

This paragraph as I write it is one of the most important statements I have ever made. On the surface it seems so simple but I assure you that the dynamics involved in its contemplation are explosive. I ask that you give serious attention and thought to what I will say and share with you in these articles. It has the ability to change your life and deliver you from the most darkest and vilest idolatry of which most of your are not yet aware.

In these articles I will disclose the substantial identity of Gentile Christianity as known and practiced today with the most popular and widespread "Pagan" religions of all time; that being a mixture of Sun worship, Nature worship, and Phallic worship.

You may be more familiar with such sun-worship by the term "Mithraism" or "Zoroastrianism." You might not be aware, and I find that the vast majority of Christians are not, but Mithraism was the closest and all but successful rival of Christianity in the Roman world, and which might indeed have been successful, but that, soon after Constantine prostituted the Empire to the Church,—"with the triumph of Christianity Mithraism came to a sudden end. The laws of Theodosius signed its death warrant." (Catholic Encyclopedia. x, 402.) That there may be no suspicion that the recital of these remarkable identities of Christian "revelation" with Pagan inventions is fanciful or exaggerated, the tale shall be told in later articles in the quoted words of the famous Catholic Encyclopedia, which naively makes so many extraordinary admissions without seeming to be aware of their fatal implications.

BUT FIRST…WHAT IS REVELATION…AND IS CHRISTIANITY BUILT UPON DIVINE, UNIQUE, AND GODLY REVELATION?

"The essence of Revelation lies in the fact that it is the direct speech of God to man," says the Holy Ghost speaking through the Vatican 18 (1870). Now for a simple truth that I believe every reader can accept. I want you to read the following statement several times. Let it sink in. Understand the depth of what is being said and implied for if you cannot agree with the following statement then there is no reason to continue the articles or the web pages.

"When Pagan myths already current and long known to everyone for hundreds and thousands of years can be later found to be foundational to many dogmas and doctrines held sacred in Christianity because they are held and believed to be unique revelations from God, then Divine revelation and inspiration cannot be appealed to for the origin of the Christian Faith and its teaching and such incriminating evidence must bring serious doubt to such doctrines and dogmas within Christianity as stemming from God… sadly these once held "sacred" doctrines must now understood as pagan copies."

DEFINING "REVELATION"

"Revelation may be defined as the communication of some truth by God to a rational creature through means which are beyond the ordinary course of nature. The truths thus revealed may be such as are otherwise inaccessible to the human mind—mysteries, which even when revealed, the intellect of man is incapable of fully penetrating". That is a pretty good definition of the process in my opinion.

Now it has also been said in the Decree 'Lamentabili' (3 July, 1907) by the Catholic Church:

- "that the dogmas which the Christian Church proposes as revealed are 'truths which have come down to us from heaven' and not 'an interpretation of religious facts which the human mind has acquired by its own strenuous efforts'" (Vatican Decrees, 1870; Catholic Encyclopedia, xiii, 1.)
- And, asserts the same Catholic Encyclopedia: "The existence of revelation (as in the New Testament) is as reasonably established as any historical fact"! (C.E. xiii, 607.)

These above two statements are the most incredible lies ever uttered in the history of mankind. And I will quickly prove them so.

Lets get back to truth, shall we. "Divine Revelation is thus of things not previously known and which the revelationless mind of man is incapable of acquiring or inventing by its own efforts." Now I accept this statement as true for it is reasonable and makes sense. Divine Revelation rests thus upon the same principle as the Law of Patents and Copyright. A book published, that is made known and given to the world cannot be the subject of subsequent copyright even by its author. When an application for a patent is presented, the first act is to search the records to ascertain whether a similar art or article (truth) has ever previously been known and in use: if so, no patent can be obtained: the thing lacks novelty. I think you should agree with this.

The exact same principle applies to "revelation". So exactly with "revelation": if some impostor or deluded person (e.g. Mohammed or Joseph Smith) claims that he has received a personal—and therefore necessarily private—"revelation" from some god, the only way whereby he can get a valid patent of authenticity and credibility for his "revelation," is to prove that its subject-matter has never before been known and in credulous circulation; the moment that from the search of the records—of other, or comparative religions,—it is shown that the same proposition has been previously known and current, in use and practice among some other priestcraft and its devotees—the thing is no revelation at all: the claim is a fraud!!!

PUTTING GENTILE CHRISTIANITY AND ITS DOCTRINES UNDER THE MICROSCOPE OF COMPARATIVE RELIGION

Let us see how this indisputable rule works when applied to Gentile Christianity.

- In doing so we will either prove beyond any doubt that the Christian Faith is Divine unique revelation to mankind and worthy of trust and faith for the world to come or else is but the reiteration of prior pagan beliefs and is not to be trusted for truth or preparation for the world to come.
- The answer to such inquiry will either prove Christianity uniquely Divine and God breathed as is attested for it; or expose it as anything but Divine but rather pagan whereby then you would be better served to return to the faith once given the Saints; Biblical Judaism where the Gentile believer, as a Godfearer, has a place both within Biblical Judaism and the Israel of God and not apart from it.

After all you will be the judge of Christianity as to it's "Divineness" or it's "Fraudulence" once the all the evidence is presented to you for your consideration. Let us see what we can find, shall we?

ANCIENT PAGANISM AND THE DANGERS OF COMPROMISE

I know that it will be startling to come to this knowledge, but most of the practices of today's "Christianity" as well as most of it's beliefs were only introduced into the religion as a regrettable outcome of an excessive undue willingness to compromise with the surrounding pagans in order to attain their support and conversion. This will be proven, by the will of God, through the writings of Christians themselves. In this article I will endeavor to demonstrate how all of these practices and beliefs were well established among many other pagan cults centuries before the arrival of Paul and his "visions. Remember as you read through this article that there is a major difference between the New Testament when it teaches upon ethics and morality and other concepts which can also taught be found to be taught by others from many nations throughout history, as well as the Prophets, Jesus and the Apostles, and concepts also existing in the New Testament borrowed from other Gentile nations which can be shown to be outright idolatry originating from sun-worship.

The following information has been obtained from the books Bible Myths and their Parallels in Other Religions by T. W. Doane and Islam and Christianity in the modern world, by Dr. Muhammad Ansari.

THE NATIONS' INFLUENCE UPON THE JUDEO-CHRISTIAN TRADITION...IT GOES UNNOTICED BY MOST

The expanse of land between the river Nile and the river Euphrates was home to the Jews for centuries before the coming of Jesus. During this period, this land fell under the rule of many empires, including the Babylonians, the Persians, and the Romans, all of whom had extensive contact with many other cultures and beliefs.

The general impression among Christians today is that the difference between today's "Christianity" and Paganism is so great that any similarity between them is scarcely recognizable. This, however, is far from the truth. The more knowledgeable a Christian becomes with today's "Christianity," the more they realize that it is the end result of a continuous effort to appease the pagan Romans in order to gain their support. This has regrettably resulted in the Gentile Church foisting upon Jesus and his apostles the pre-existent beliefs of ancient paganism which they never accepted nor taught. The established religious beliefs of these pagans and neo-pagans were "inserted" into the word of God during the translation of the Jewish Scriptures into Greek, as well as in the writing of the New Testament, and many pagan religious practices found their way into the Bible through the agency of many centuries of divine "inspiration" to the Greek Jews of Alexandria, Egypt, as well as the Gentile Church. In other words, the oral traditions were altered along with the written records we have come to call today the "Old &New Testaments in our Christian Bibles." The knowledgeable Christian scholars are the most well-acquainted with this fact. It is the lay believer who is not!

YOU WANT PROOF THAT THIS WAS DONE?

If one takes the time to do the reading necessary to uncover this tragic adulteration of spiritual truth, then one is not aware that such tampering with Divine oracles ever occurred. But the scholars and archeologists know for they have spent their lives in first-hand observation of the artifacts and documents when reveal such "borrowing" and "tampering." Here are two examples of quotes that should make anyone rise up and take notice:

- Disturbing quotes regarding how Christianity is nothing but a make-over of sun-worship
- What the scholars have said about the terrible translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek

Lastly, I have posted a website revealing in detail the hundreds of examples of what these previous scholars report:

http://faithofyeshua.faithweb.com

Also posted is a website dealing with the chronological canonization of the New Testament which shows the great disagreement and absolute unbelievable facts regarding how this document was put together which millions today trust for their Eternal Life:

http://geocities.com/faithofyeshua

This will not come easy to anyone as a lot of reading and soul-searching will be necessary if you wish to come to the truth when your whole life you have been compromised by untruths passed off as Divine Truth by those who failed to know the difference themselves.

The great luminary of the Church, Saint Augustine (354-430 C.E.), is quoted to have said

"The same thing which is now called CHRISTIAN RELIGION existed among the ancients. They have begun to call Christian the true religion which existed before."

"Our love for what is old, our reverence for what our fathers used, makes us keep still in the church, and on the very altar cloths, symbols which would excite the smile of an Oriental, and lead him to wonder why we send missionaries to his land, while cherishing his faith in ours" James Bonwick in Egyptian Religion

Let us start with the very symbol of Christianity itself, the "cross."

THE CROSS

Even the cross, long a symbol of the Christian faith, has origins in Pagan history. Assyrians used the cross to represent the four directions in which the sun shone. The Egyptian ankh, a cross with a tear shape as the upper leg, was a strong symbol of Truth and is associated with the God Osiris, and the Goddesses Isis and Maat. And in ancient Europe "The use of a human effigy on a cross in the form of a scarecrow has been used from ancient times. In prehistoric times, a human would be sacrificed and hung on a cross. The sacrifice would later be chopped to pieces; his blood and pieces of flesh were widely distributed and buried to encourage the crop fertility."

The Sign of the Cross in Pagan Cultures That which some use now as the Christian cross was not originally a Christian symbol. It was used by Chaldeans, Egyptians, Coptics, and others many years before Christ. The form of the cross used among early Christians was "X" (abbreviation for "Christos"). There are people who wear an "X" on their caps in our country, however, this is a modern symbol of an assassinated militant black leader of a few years ago named Malcolm. When multitudes of heathens joined the standard of Constantine, they brought with them their well-known symbol T (representing the god "Tammuz") which soon supplanted the so called Christian "X". To identify Tammuz with the sun, the pagan cross was sometimes joined to a circle of the sun - and inserted in the circle. It looks like the "Maltese Cross" we mentioned above. The Vestal Virgins of pagan Rome wore a cross suspended from their necklaces just as do the Roman Catholic nuns of our day. The Egyptians did the same, as well as many other barbarous nations. The cross was in use as early as 1500 years before the birth of Jesus. The heathen Celts wore crosses. The Druids, long before Jesus' birth, formed living trees into huge crosses by trimming them into the symbol "T". The "T" was also found carved into the bark of trees in that time. When the Spaniards arrived in the Western Hemisphere they found the cross already well known as a symbol by the Mexican and Peruvian Indians. The cross was widely worshiped as the unequivocal symbol of Bacchus, the Babylonian Messiah. Later the Romans used Bacchus and his symbol to worship drunkenness. Buddhist worship in Asia used the cross of the Babylonian Messiah and called it the "divine tree of life." The Roman crucifix came into use in the 10th century. It became one of the items of the Romish bag of charms and fetishes. In the Papal system the sign of the cross and the image of the cross are all-in-all. No prayer can be said, no worship engaged in, almost no step taken (even the batting of a ball) without the use of the sign of the cross. The cross is looked upon as a grand charm, a refuge in danger, a guardian against temptation and a sign of good luck. They adore the cross with the honor that is due only to God Himself. To Papists, if anyone would use the term "the cursed tree" (Galatians 3:13); Acts 5:30; 10:39) it would be a mortal offense.

The sign of the cross, represented in its simplest form by a crossing of two lines at right angles, greatly antedates, in both the East and the West, the introduction of Christianity. It goes back to a very remote period of human civilization. In fact, some have sought to attach to the widespread use of this sign, a real ethnographic importance. It is true that in the sign of the cross the decorative and geometrical concept, obtained by a juxtaposition of lines pleasing to the sight, is remarkably prominent; nevertheless, the cross was originally not a mere means or object of ornament, and from the earliest times had certainly another -- i.e. symbolic-religious -- significance. The primitive form of the cross seems to have been that of the so-called "gamma" cross (crux gammata), better known to Orientalists and students of prehistoric archeology by its Sanskrit name, swastika. At successive periods this was modified, becoming curved at the extremities, or adding to them more complex lines or ornamental points, which latter also meet at the central intersection. The swastika is a sacred sign in India, and is very ancient and widespread throughout the East. It has a solemn meaning among both Brahmins and Buddhists. It seems to have represented the apparatus used at one time by the fathers of the human race in kindling fire - and for this reason it was the symbol of living flame, or sacred fire. It is a symbol of the sun and seems to denote its daily rotation. Others have seen in it the mystic representation of lightning or of the god of the tempest, and even the emblem of the Aryan pantheon and the primitive Aryan civilization. Therefore, the cruciform signs were very widespread throughout the Orient, the seat of the oldest civilizations.

The cross was not adopted until long after the departure of Jesus. One of the main reasons for this was the fact that he who dies on the cross is considered cursed by God (Galatians 3:13). Current historical knowledge recognizes the fact that the cross was well recognized as a religious symbol long before the advent of Jesus. It was adored in India as the symbol of the Hindu god Agni, the "light of the world." It was placed in the hands of Siva, Brahma, Vishnu, Krishna, Tvashtri, and Jama. The cross was also well known among the Buddhists from ancient times and the followers of Lama of Thibet.

The ancient Egyptians also adopted the cross as a religious symbol of their pagan gods. Countless Egyptian drawings depict themselves holding crosses in their hands. Among them, the Egyptian savior Horus is depicted holding a cross in his hand. He is also depicted as an infant sitting on his mother's knee with a cross on the seat they occupy. The most common of the crosses used by these pagan Egyptians, the CRUX ANSATA, was later adopted by the Christians.

The Egyptian savior, Osiris, the Egyptian god of the dead and the underworld, is sometimes represented holding out this cross to mortals signifying that this person has discarded mortality for the life to come.

Another cross has been unearthed in Ireland. It belongs to the cult of the Persian god of the sun "Mithra" and bears a crucified effigy. The Greeks and Romans too adopted the cross as their religious symbol many centuries before Christianity did the same. An ancient inscription in Tessaly is accompanied by a Calvary cross. More crosses can be found to adorn the tomb of king Midas in Phrygia. The above references may be referred to for many more examples.

The crucifixion of living persons was not practiced among the Hebrews; capital punishment among them consisted in being stoned to death. But when Palestine became Roman territory the cross was introduced as a form of punishment, more particularly for those who could not prove their Roman citizenship; later on it was reserved for thieves and malefactors. Though not infrequent in the East, it was but rarely that the Greeks made use of it. It is mentioned by Demosthenes and by Plato. The stake and the gibbet were more common, the criminal being suspended on them or bound to them, but not nailed. Certain Greeks who had befriended the Carthaginians were crucified near Motya by order of Dionysius of Syracuse. Both in Greece and in the East the cross was a customary punishment of brigands. It was at Rome, however, that from early republican times the cross was most frequently used as an instrument of punishment, and amid circumstances of great severity and cruelty. It was particularly the punishment for slaves found guilty of any serious crime. Hence in two places, Cicero calls it simply "servile supplicium" the punishment of slaves; more explicitly, "servitutis extremum summumque supplicium", the final and most terrible punishment of slaves. The punishment of the cross was also regularly inflicted for such grave crimes as highway robbery and piracy, for public accusation of his master by a slave, for a vow made against his masters prosperity, and for sedition and tumult. According to Roman custom, the penalty of crucifixion was always preceded by scourging; after this preliminary punishment, the condemned person had to carry the cross, or at least the transverse beam of it, to the place of execution, exposed to the jibes and insults of the people. On arrival at the place of execution the cross was uplifted. Soon the sufferer, entirely naked, was bound to it with cords. He was then fastened with four nails to the wood of the cross. Finally, a placard called the titulus bearing the name of the condemned man and his sentence, was placed at the top of the cross. Slaves were crucified outside of Rome in a place called Sessorium, beyond the Esquiline Gate. Eventually this wretched locality became a forest of crosses, while the bodies of the victims were the prey of vultures and other rapacious birds. It often happened that the condemned man did not die of hunger or thirst, but lingered on the cross for several days. To shorten his punishment therefore, and lessen his terrible sufferings, his legs were were sometimes broken. This custom exceptional among the Romans, was common with the Jews. In this way it was possible to take down the corpse on the very evening of the execution. Among the Romans, on the contrary, the corpse could not be taken down, unless such removal had been specially authorized in the sentence of death. The corpse might also be buried if the sentence permitted. The punishment of the cross remained in force throughout the Roman Empire until the first half of the fourth century. In the early part of his reign Constantine continued to inflict the penalty of the cross on slaves guilty of denouncing their masters. Later on he abolished this infamous punishment, in memory and in honor of the Passion of Jesus Christ. Thereafter, this punishment was very rarely inflicted.

The swastika, for example, was a universal sign of good luck and harmony before the Nazi party adopted it in the 1930's as the symbol of their movement. It was used by American Indians, Hindus, Buddhists, Vikings, Greeks, Romans, Celts, Anglo-Saxons, Mayans, Aztecs, Persians, Christians, and neolithic tribes, and is still a sacred symbol to many Hindus and Buddhists.

FISH: THE SYMBOL OF THE LAST SUPPER OR A WOMAN'S REPRODUCTIVE ORGAN?

It is well known that the first symbol of Christianity was that of a fish. On sacramental cups, seals, and lamps the Holy Spirit was symbolized by a dove and Christ by a fish (perhaps because at the time, fish was one of the elements of the sacred meal) or by a shepherd carrying a sheep on his shoulders (from Luke 15:3-7).

The 'Christian fish', or icthus, is used by many followers of Christ to signify their devotion. The symbol, however, is not originally of Christian origin. The symbol has been used for millennia as a representation of the Great Mother Goddess of the many pagan faiths. The outline of the 'fish' is, in some instances, seen as the outline of the Goddess' vulva. And we put that on our cars never knowing the licentiousness connected with such a symbol!

Some Christians believe that a second link between their religion and the fish symbol is seen in the Greek word for fish (ichthus, spelled: Iota Chi Theta Upsilon Sigma). That is an acrostic for "Jesus Christ, of God, the Son, the Savior" [Iesous (Jesus) Christos (Christ) Theou (of God) Uiou (the Son) Soter (the Savior)]. An acrostic is an "arrangement of words in which the first letter of each line ordinarily combines with others to form a word or words or the alphabet." For many pop-culture Christians, the "fish" decal on the back car bumper, or attached to a key chain or door is a symbol of their religion, and a feel-good statement about Jesus Christ. Early Christians used the fish as a recognition sign of their religion. The Oxford English Dictionary (C.E.) defines "Ichthyic" as "of, pertaining to, or characteristic of fishes; the fish world in all its orders." But contemporary Jesus worshippers might be surprised, even outraged, to learn that one of their preeminent religious symbols antedated the Christian religion, and has its roots in pagan fertility awareness and sexuality. Barbara G. Walker writes in The Woman's Dictionary of Symbols and Sacred Objects, that the acronym pertaining to Jesus Christ was a "rationale invented after the fact... Christians simply copied this pagan symbol along with many others." Ichthys was the offspring son of the ancient Sea goddess Atargatis, and was known in various mythic systems as Tirgata, Aphrodite, Pelagia or Delphine. The word also meant "womb" and "dolphin" in some tongues, and representations of this appeared in the depiction of mermaids. The fish also a central element in other stories, including the Goddess of Ephesus (who has a fish amulet covering her genital region), as well as the tale of the fish that swallowed the penis of Osiris, and was also considered a symbol of the vulva of Isis. Along with being a generative and reproductive spirit in mythology, the fish also has been identified in certain cultures with reincarnation and the life force. Sir James George Frazer noted in his work, "Adonis, Attis, Osiris: Studies in the History of Oriental Religion" (Part Four of his larger work, "The Golden Bough") that among one group in India, the fish was believed to house a deceased soul, and that as part of a fertility ritual specific fish is eaten in the belief that it will be reincarnated in a newborn child. Well before Christianity, the fish symbol was known as "the Great Mother," a pointed oval sign, the "vesica piscis" or Vessel of the Fish. "Fish" and "womb" were synonymous terms in ancient Greek,"delphos." Its link to fertility, birth, feminine sexuality and the natural force of women was acknowledged also by the Celts, as well as pagan cultures throughout northern Europe. Eleanor Gaddon traces a "Cult of the Fish Mother" as far back as the hunting and fishing people of the Danube River Basin in the sixth millennium B.C.E. Over fifty shrines have been found throughout the region which depict a fishlike deity, a female creature who "incorporates aspects of an egg, a fish and a woman which could have been a primeval creator or a mythical ancestress..." The "Great Goddess" was portrayed elsewhere with pendulous breasts, accentuated buttocks and a conspicuous vaginal orifice, the upright "vesica piscis" which Christians later adopted and rotated 90-degrees to serve as their symbol. Along with the fish used as a code sign for early Christian communities, the ichthys also found its way into the ritual and decor of church rites. One case in point is the church mitre worn by prelates. Where did this originate? Dr. Thomas Inman discussed this phenomenon in his two volume opus, "Ancient Faiths Embodied in Ancient Names," (1869). He included a representation of a sculpture from Mesopotamia, observing "It is the impression of an ancient gem, and represents a man clothed with a fish, the head being the mitre; priests thus clothed, often bearing in their hand the mystic bag..." "In almost every instance," added Inman, "it will be recognized that the fish's head is represented as of the same form as the modern bishop's mitre." The fish also appears in another sacred iconograph, the Avatars of Vishnu, where the deity "is represented as emerging from the mouth of a fish, and being a fish himself; the legend being that he was to be the Saviour of the world in a deluge which was to follow..." From its focus of worshipping a god-man born of a virgin to the selection of holidays and symbols, Christianity appropriated the metaphors of earlier pagan religions, grafting them into its own account of the creation and beyond. Few Jesus worshippers are aware of this. Even fewer know that when they flaunt the "Ichthus" or Ichthys on a tee-shirt, car bumper or even the door of a state legislative office as a representation which originated in Christianity, they are in fact, displaying a more ancient symbol indicative of female anatomy and reproductive potency -- the very sign of the Great Mother.

The Apostles were often referred to as "fishers of men". Followers of Christianity were called Pisciculi; the root of this Latin word is "fish". The symbols of "sacremental fish, with wine and a basket of bread represents the Eucharist and the Last Supper in Christian art." 2 The symbol was simple to draw and was often used among Christians as a type of password during times of persecution by the Roman government. If two strangers met and were unsure whether each other was a Christian, one would draw an arc in the earth like:). If the other were a Christian, they would complete the symbol with a reverse arc: (), forming the outline of a fish.

THE TRINITY

Now let us study the "Trinity" and it's roots in ancient pagan worship. The "Trinity" of Christendom, as defined in the creed of Nicea, is a merging of three distinct entities into one single entity, while remaining three distinct entities. We are told to speak of the three gods as one god, and never as three gods which would be considered heresy (Isaiah 43:10). They are considered to be co-eternal, co-substantial, and co-equal. However, only the first was self existent. The others preceded from the first. This Neo-Platonic philosophical doctrine has it's roots not in the inspiration of God, but in ancient paganism. Most ancient religions were built upon some sort of threefold distinction. Deities were always trinities of some kind or consisted of successive emanation in threes.

In India we find the doctrine of the divine trinity called "Tri-murti" (Three-forms) consisting of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva. It is an inseparable unity though three in form. Worshipers are told to worship them as one deity. Such concepts posed no problem to the logic of a Hindu worshipper since they were already used to worshipping gods with the body of a man and the head of an elephant (Ganesh), or monkey-faced gods (Hanuman), or gods with six arms, and so forth. Remember, classical Hinduism dates back to at least 500 BC, with roots extending as far back as 2000 BC. So the concept of the Trinity does not begin with Christianity by any means!

The Brahmas also have their trinity. In their trinity, Vajrapani, Manjusri, and Avalokitesvara form a divine union of three gods into one god called "Buddha." The citizens of China and Japan also worship Buddha, but they know him as "Fo." When they worship him they say "Fo, is one god but has three forms."

Sir William Jones says:

"Very respectable natives have assured me, that one or two missionaries have been absurd enough to in their zeal for the conversion of the Gentiles, to urge that the Hindoos were even now almost Christians; because their Brahma, Vishnu, and Mahesa (Siva), were no other than the Christian Trinity"* (T.W. Doane, Bible Myths and Their Parallels in Other Religions, p. 370).

The ancient Egyptians also worshipped a trinity. Their symbol of a wing, a globe, and a serpent is supposed to have stood for the different attributes of their god.

The Greeks also had their trinities. When making their sacrifices to their gods, they would sprinkle holy water on the altar three times, they would then sprinkle the people three times also. Frankincense was then taken with three fingers and strewed upon the alter three times. All of this was done because the oracle had proclaimed that all sacred things ought to be in threes. Remember that the philosophy of these people (The Greeks) is what was primarily responsible for defining the Christian "Trinitarian" nature of God. This was done through the writings of the Greek philosopher Plato regarding his "Logos" ("word"). Further, remember that the Gospels of the Bible were named the "Greek Gospels" for a reason: they were written in their language and based upon their philosophy.

As mentioned previously, T. W. Doane says:

"The works of Plato were extensively studied by the Church Fathers, one of whom joyfully recognizes in the great teacher, the schoolmaster who, in the fullness of time, was destined to educate the heathen for Christ, as Moses did the Jews. The celebrated passage : "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word Was God" is a fragment of some Pagan treatise on the Platonic philosophy, evidently written by Irenaeus. It is quoted by Amelius, a Pagan philosopher as strictly applicable to the Logos, or Mercury, the Word, apparently as an honorable testimony borne to the Pagan deity by a barbarian.....We see then that the title "Word" or "Logos," being applied to Jesus, is another piece of Pagan amalgamation with Christianity. It did not receive its authorized Christian form until the middle of the second century after Christ. The ancient pagan Romans worshipped a Trinity. An oracle is said to have declared that there was 'First God, then the Word, and with them the Spirit'. Here we see the distinctly enumerated, God, the Logos, and the Holy Spirit or Holy Ghost, in ancient Rome, where the most celebrated temple of this capital - that of Jupiter Capitolinus - was dedicated to three deities, which three deities were honored with joint worship." Bible Myths and Their Parallels in Other Religions, pp. 375-376.

Trinities were not confined to these groups alone, but the Persians, the Assyrians, the Phoenicians, the Scandinavians, the Druids, the inhabitants of Siberia, the ancient Mexicans, the Peruvians, and many others, all worshipped "Trinitarian" pagan deities (among a great multitude of other gods) long before the council of Nicea of 325 C.E. officially recognized this to be God's "true" nature.

CHRISTMAS....DECEMBER 25TH AND ITS IMPORTANCE

Let us now move on to the "birthday of Jesus," Christmas. Jesus is commonly considered to have been born on the 25th of December. However, it is common knowledge among Christian scholars that he was not born on this day. It is well known that the first Christian churches held their festival in May, April, or January. Scholars of the first two centuries C.E. even differ in which year he was born. Some believing that he was born fully twenty years before the current accepted date. So how was the 25th of December selected as the birthday of Jesus?

Grolier's encyclopedia says:

"Christmas is the feast of the birth of Jesus Christ, celebrated on December 25....Despite the beliefs about Christ that the birth stories expressed, the church did not observe a festival for the celebration of the event until the 4th century...since 274, under the emperor Aurelian, Rome had celebrated the feast of the "Invincible Sun" on December 25. In the Eastern Church, January 6, a day also associated with the winter solstice, was initially preferred. In course of time, however, the West added the Eastern date as the feast of the Epiphany, and the East added the Western date of Christmas."

So who else celebrated the 25th of December as the birth day of their gods before it was agreed upon as the birth day of Jesus? Well, there are the people of India who rejoice, decorate their houses with garlands, and give presents to their friends on this day. The people of China also celebrate this day and close their shops. The pagan god Buddha is believed to have been born on this day when the "Holy Ghost" descended on his virgin mother Maya. The great savior and god of the Persians, Mithras, is also believed to have been born on the 25th of December long before the coming of Jesus . The Egyptians celebrated this day as the birth day of their great savior Horus, the Egyptian god of light and the son of the "virgin mother" and "queen of the heavens" Isis. Osiris, god of the dead and the underworld in Egypt, the son of "the holy virgin," again was believed to have been born on the 25th of December.

The Greeks celebrated the 25th of December as the birthday of Hercules, the son of the supreme god of the Greeks, Zeus, through the mortal woman Alcmene. Bacchus, the god of wine and revelry among the Romans (known among the Greeks as Dionysus) was also born on this day.

Adonis, revered as a "dying-and-rising god" among the Greeks, miraculously was also born on the 25th of December. His worshipers held him a yearly festival representing his death and resurrection, in midsummer. The ceremonies of his birth day are recorded to have taken place in the same cave in Bethlehem which is claimed to have been the birth place of Jesus .

The Scandinavians celebrated the 25th of December as the birth day of their god Freyr, the son of their supreme god of the heavens, Odin.

The Romans observed this day as the birth day of the god of the sun, Natalis Solis Invicti ("Birthday of Sol the invincible"). There was great rejoicing and all shops were closed. There was illumination and public games. Presents were exchanged, and the slaves were indulged in great liberties. Remember, these are the same Romans who would later preside over the council of Nicea (325 C.E.) which lead to the official Christian recognition of the "Trinity" as the "true" nature of God, and the "fact" that Jesus was born on the 25th of December too. The pagan emperor Constantine, who presided over the council of Nicea, was popularly considered the "embodiment" or "incarnation" of the this supreme Roman "Sun" god. Neither was Constantine the first Roman emperor to be given this title, rather, many or his predecessors before him were also promoted to the status of the "incarnation" of the god of the sun.

Edward Gibbon says:

"The Roman Christians, ignorant of his (Christ's) birth, fixed the solemn festival to the 25th of December, the Brumalia, or Winter Solstice, when the Pagans annually celebrated the birth of Sol" Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, vol. ii, Gibbon, p. 383.

Christmas festivals today incorporate many other pagan customs, such as the use of holly, mistletoe, Yule logs, and wassail bowls. The Christmas tree itself is the most obvious aspect of ancient pagan celebrations which were later incorporated into church rites. Scholars believe that the Christian celebration was originally derived in part from rites held by pre-Christian Germanic and Celtic peoples to celebrate the winter solstice. The Christmas tree, an evergreen trimmed with lights and other decorations, because it keeps its green needles throughout the winter months, was believed by pre-Christian pagans to have special powers of protection against the forces of nature and evil spirits. The end of December marked the onset of a visible lengthening of daylight hours - the return of warmth and light and defeat of those evil forces of cold and darkness. The Christmas tree is derived from the so-called paradise tree, symbolizing Eden, of German mystery plays. The use of a Christmas tree began early in the 17th century, in Strasbourg, France, spreading from there through Germany, into northern Europe and Great Britain, and then on to the United States.

Christmas is not the only Christian festival which was borrowed from ancient paganism and foisted upon the religion of Jesus. There is also Easter, the Feast of St. John, the Holy communion, the Annunciation of the virgin, the assumption of the virgin, and many others have their roots in ancient pagan worship. Since we can not get into the details here, therefore, the interested reader is encouraged to consult the above books.

Many people object to people who advise them not to introduce new and innovative practices into their religion, even if they were only to be festivals and celebrations.

Answer for yourself: "What could it hurt if I were to worship God and thank Him for his blessings on the day when pagans performed their worship? They reason "I am not worshipping idols."

For this we only need to read the very explicit prohibition of God in this regard which He Himself emphatically declared in the Bible:

"Take heed to thyself that thou be not snared by following them (pagans), after that they be destroyed from before thee; and that thou inquire not after their gods, saying, How did these nations serve their gods? even so will I do likewise" Deut. 12:30

There is a good reason why God commands us to do things. Just because we do not know the wisdom behind a prohibition does not give us the freedom to disregard it. Indeed, it is exactly such willingness to "adapt" and "compromise" which eventually lead to the loss of the message of Jesus, as seen chapter one.

GENERAL SIMILARITIES WITH PAGANISM

As we have seen, the common thread among most of these pagan sects is their worship of the sun as their deity and their selection of the winter solstice (25th of December) as the time of the birth of their supreme god. The winter solstice is the time of year when the sun would reach it's last stage of decline and once again begin to rise and become "re-born." This rise would continue until day and night become equal in length. At this point, the god of the sun would appear to be at a stand off with the "prince of darkness." This would occur at the vernal equinox, or Easter. This situation, however, would not last for long, as the god of the sun would triumph after Easter, and days would become longer than nights.

We notice that the church too received divine "inspiration" that Jesus was born on the 25th of December, and also that he too "triumphed over the prince of darkness" on Easter day, just as the pagan gods of the Greeks and Romans had done centuries before. Let us have a brief look at the popular beliefs of the pagan Gentiles who would later take it upon themselves to spread "Jesus'" religion to the world:

ATTIS

The pagan god Attis was the son of the virgin Nana. He was the "savior" and "only begotten son." His blood was believed to have renewed the fertility of the earth. As such, he was a symbol of immortality. He was believed to have died on March 24th and been resurrected shortly thereafter. Sacramental meals and baptism of blood were features of his church.

ADONIS OR TAMMUZ

He was born of a virgin and was the "savior" of Syria. He died in redemption for mankind and was later resurrected in the spring.

DIONYSUS OR BACCHUS

He was the "only begotten son" of Jupiter, the king of the gods of the Romans and the lord of life and death (For the Greeks, his father was the almighty Zeus). He was named the god of wine and revelry. Dionysus died at the hands of the Titans, who tore him apart, roasted the pieces, and began to eat them. At that point Zeus intervened, saved some of the pieces, and had Apollo bury them at Delphi. There, it was believed, Dionysus arose from the dead He said to mankind "It is I who guide you; it is I who protect you, and who save you; I am Alpha and Omega." He was slain for redeeming humanity and was called "the slain one," "the sin bearer," and "the redeemer." In celebrating his festival, his worshippers would observe the sparagmos: the tearing apart of a live animal, the eating of its flesh, and the drinking of its blood; participants believed they were in fact partaking of the god's body and blood. Plays were also staged at these festivals. Wine had a central place at his festivals. Does any of this sound familiar?

BEL OR BAAL

He was the sun god of Babylon. The story of his life and his passion play bears a tremendous resemblance to that given to Jesus in our current Gospels. Called the lord of the universe, he was killed by monsters but restored to life. His death and resurrection were celebrated annually as a part of Canaanite fertility rituals.

OSIRIS

He was the Egyptian's god of the dead and the underworld, born of the "virgin of the world" on the 29th of December. He preached gentleness and peace. Wine and corn were both his discoveries. He was betrayed by Typhen, slain and dismembered. He remained in hell for two or three days and three nights. He would be the judge of mankind in a future life.

MITHRAS OR MITHRA

He was the sun god of the Persians and the son of a virgin. He was born on the 25th of December. Christmas and Easter were two of the most important festivals of his church. His worshipers observed baptism, confirmation, and Eucharist supper at which time they would partake of their "god" in the form of bread and wine.

KRISHNA

The Indian god Krishna too bears a tremendous resemblance to Jesus in the story of his mission and his divinity. He was the incarnation of the Indian's supreme god Vishnu (the preserver and protector of the world) in the womb of Devaki. Upon his birth, a great chorus of angles proclaimed "In the delivery of this favored woman, nature shall have cause to exalt." His birth was indicated by a star in heaven. Although of royal blood, he was born in a cave. He was presented with gifts of sandalwood and perfumes. His foster father was told to flee and hide him lest king Kansa might take his life. King Kansa had ordered all male infants born on that night to be slain. One of his first miracles was the healing of a leper. He was later slain and this resulted in an eclipse of the sun and a black circle forming around the moon. Spirits were seen on all sides and he descended into hell, rose again, and ascended into heaven with many people being witnesses to his bodily accent. He will have a "second coming" in the future which his followers continue await. There are countless other similarities with what is known today as "Christianity" even though his religion was well establish centuries before the birth of Jesus . The accounts of Krishna's childhood agree quite closely with the apocryphal accounts of Jesus' childhood. In the ancient epic poems, Krishna is simply regarded as a great hero, it was not until about the 4th century BC that he was elevated to the position of a god.

BUDDHA

Both books mentioned above have compiled a very detailed comparison of the legends of both Jesus and Buddha. The similarities are astounding. T. W. Doane has gone so far as to dedicate an entire chapter to this comparison, including a 48 point side-by-side narration from the time of their birth till the end of their lives on earth. Their conception, birth, mission, miracles, temptation, preaching, worship, prophesies, death, ascension, divinity, judgment of mankind, and many other matters are almost word-for-word exact copies of one another. Dr. Ansari records in his book the following words of the eminent Christian scholar S. M. Melamed:

"Yet the fact remains that Buddhist canons were already known to the Western world before the coming of Jesus. Today hardly any Indologist of note denies the organic connection between the two redemptive religions. So close is the connection between them that even the details of the miracles recorded between Buddhism and Christianity are the same. Of Buddha, too, it was told that he fed five hundred men with one loaf of bread, that he cured lepers and caused the blind to see."

As far back as 1884, a German historian of religion by the name of Rudolph Seydel published a very detailed study demonstrating that all of the tales, miracles, similes, and proverbs of the Christian Bible have their counterparts in the much more ancient Buddhastic gospel.

The author of Bible Myths observes that even though Buddha has been elevated today to the position of God, still, Mr. Doane observes that:

"There is no reason to believe that he ever arrogated to himself any higher authority than that of a teacher of religion, but as in modern factions, there were readily found among his followers those who carried his peculiar tenets much further than their founder. These, not content with lauding during his life-time the noble deeds of their teacher, exalted him, within a quarter of a century after his death to a place among their deities - worshipping as a god one they had known only as a simple hearted, earnest, truth-seeking philanthropist."

SOME CONCLUDING THOUGHTS

God is selecting prophets from every nation on earth to return them to the true worship of God alone. Bet Emet is one such ministry.

Christian scholars today readily recognize the fact that for the first three decades C.E., "Christianity" remained a sect within Judaism and that the first fifteen Bishops of Christianity were circumcised Jews who worshipped in the synagogues of the Jews. History verifies that it was only after the introduction of Christianity to the Romans and the official "guardianship" of the Roman empire of the religion of Jesus that it began to mix pagan doctrines with Biblical truth and teach these as part of the Great Commission, as if these truths were somehow hidden from the very first apostles of Jesus. What a joke! The sad fact of the matter is that doctrines like the "Trinity," the birth of Jesus on the 25th of December, the Easter festival and many other founding doctrines of Christianity were not recognized to be the "truth" until after the religion of Jesus was adopted by those people who for many centuries before that had been spoon fed such man-made doctrines like the "Trinity," "savior from sin," "incarnation of the Almighty," Christmas and Easter, "three days and three nights in hell," "killed by the Jews," and many other matters which were later taught as "inspired" to those gullible enough to believe it. I was once one of them until I began to study for myself, and I encourage you to do the same so your worship not be in vain.

Sadly enough, once all of this detailed evidence has been presented by Western scholars in support of the fact that all of these matters were acts of pagan worship and belief centuries before the coming of Jesus, even with all of this, the adamant orthodox will ever manage to find a way out. "It is quite simple really," they will explain, "All of these countless pagan cults from all over the earth must have had prior knowledge of the coming of Jesus and inserted the story of his life into pagan mythology centuries before his actual arrival." I am sorry, I am no longer gullible enough to believe such a tale. Are you?

Jesus is innocent of these pagan innovations which have been foisted upon him after his departure by those who did not fear God. He was a true messenger of God and would never dare to say otherwise. God is One. Period!. He is indivisible and inseparable. There is no God but He. He has no sons nor any equal. He does not hold mankind responsible for the sin of others, but only for their own worship. And God alone shall be the final judge of all of mankind on the Day of Judgment.

There are many other parallels that could be brought up in this comparison. However, we can not get into the details here, therefore, it shall be left up to the interested reader to read about as he studies to show himself approved. Shalom.

LET US BEGIN WITH FOOD FOR DEEP THOUGHT

Answer for yourself: Have you ever wondered how the Christian religion, with a Jew at the center of the faith, was so readily accepted by the Gentile nations which were to varying degrees anti-Semitic? Think on that for a while. Now I have the answer for you in a minute.

"It seems, at first glance, remarkable with what readiness the Teutonic and Celtic tribes dropped their ancestral faiths and accepted Christianity through the persuasions of a missionary" says Charles Morris, author of Aryan Sun-Myths - The Origin of Religion. I must concur; it really is.

Answer for yourself: Who are the Teutonic peoples?

The Teutonic peoples come from a term "Teutons," which is a Latinized form of the word meaning the people of Germanic origin in general. However, it also refers to the languages spoken by other peoples including the Gothic, Anglo-Saxon, English, Dutch, Icelandic, Norse, Danish, German, and Swedish. Don't look now but we are speaking of Eastern European people. What is important for our study is that a link can be found between these Teutonic peoples and their predecessors...the Indo-European people otherwise known as "Aryans." These "Aryan peoples" are that part of the human race that include the peoples of India, the Hindus, and Persians as well as most European. This is our link. Archeological evidence, as well as linguistical studies, will prove that the European race traces its roots back to the Aryan peoples. This is very important for our study as we trace the evolution and spread of Sun-worship and how it became the backbone of all Gentile pagan religions and finally culminating as the core of Christian doctrines. Just remember the importance of the Aryan people for now.

One should spend some time thinking deeply about such a comments.

Answer for yourself: What made Gentile Christianity so attractive that it became a world-religion almost over night?

Answer for yourself: What made it appealing on such a large scale so quickly?

THERE IS NOTHING NEW UNDER THE SUN....EVEN THE DOCTRINES OF SUN WORSHIP...KNOWN TO ALL NATIONS

But a fuller study of these questions and the subject at hand renders the unusual ease of this conversion much less surprising, by making it apparent that the ease by which Gentile nations accepted the "Jewish Gospel" was nothing more than the adding of the leading dogmas of Christianity to the nations' already existing religious beliefs. It was not so much the replacement of the former pagan religious belief system with a new and different "religion" but the assimilation of this "new religion" into the old.The secret was that this new (Christian) religion had so many doctrine in common with the "old religions originating from sun worship" that the missionary prospects were NOT asked to give up anything; they were only asked to "tack on" and receive a modification of what they already believed and had as a religious belief system.

Very clever! It was an overnight sensation. The irony of the whole matter is that the "new" was not in reality "new" at all, but rather the "old" with a new spin to it.

These Teutonic and Celtic peoples above ceased to worship Odin and the lesser deities, and began to worship Christ, the Virgin, and the saints. What escapes the modern contemporary Christian is that these Teutonic and Celtic peoples only invested their already existing religious myths with many of the attributes of the new faith presented. They in reality retained most of their old religious dogmas and ceremonies, and converted primitive Christianity quite as much as they were converted by it. The conversion was, indeed, as much a change of names as of beliefs. Though the ethics of Christianity slowly leavened this swarming mass of barbarism, the theology of the new faith became so closely interwoven with that of the old that it is not easy to this day to separate them.

THIS CHARGE CAN EASILY BE PROVEN...BUT IT CAN'T BE DONE UNLESS ONE STUDIES HARD IN THESE AREAS

"The nineteenth-century critical study of religious beliefs and the progress of the science of comparative mythology have gone far towards clearing up this mystery of the past, and are leading the way to a science of comparative mythology, as students break through the artificial barrier of sacredness which has been raised around this or that system of belief, and dare to question where older students deemed it their duty to adore. It is being more and more widely held that no belief can be sacred, that all faith must rest either upon evidence or blind acceptance, and that they who base their belief upon a study of facts are far superior intellectually, and certainly equal morally, to those who accept dogmas upon authority. Faith has been covered with a veil which it was declared impious to lift, and the very word exalted into a kind of magic formula, which was deemed powerful enough to move mountains.

“But what is faith, critically considered? It is either an unquestioning acceptance of the assertions of ancient books and modern teachers, which the reasoning powers of the individual are autocratically forbidden to deal with; or it is a belief reached through doubt and question, the persistent study of facts and the fullest exercise of the intellect. In the latter case it is the actual belief of the individual; in the former, the belief of somebody else, which has been instilled into the receptive mind of the disciple, and before whose sacredness every intrusive doubt and irreconcilable fact must bow the head in worship" (Morris, Aryan Sun Myths, intro.).

This dogma is a relic of the Dark Ages. It is based upon the general ignorance which prevailed in ancient communities and their restful dependence upon the superior learning of their teachers; it is utterly out of accordance with the general education of modern peoples, and the spirit of research which is now everywhere active, and which is far too vigorous to be repelled by the highest fence of theological interdict.

THE CHRISTIAN NEEDS SOME UNDERSTANDING ABOUT ANCIENT MYTHOLOGY

The study of the mythological systems of ancient nations has revealed many curious and unlooked-for facts and correspondences. It has been made apparent, in the first place, that those mythologies had their origin in primitive ideas about the movements of the heavenly bodies, the variations of day and night, summer and winter, and other natural phenomena, which were in time, through the modification of human ideas, transformed into the doings of a throng of deific beings. The worshippers did not know whence came their gods. We, who can approach the subject without prejudice and bigotry, and to whom mythology has ceased to be sacred, can easily trace their origin, and point out nearly every step of their evolution. It has become evident, in the second place, that a close affinity exists between the mythological ideas of different and often widely separated countries, the resemblance extending not only to their broader features, but in some cases to their minor details of dogma and belief. This correspondence in belief is undoubtedly due to two causes; primarily to the fact that the steps of progressing of the human intellect and the growth of ideas have been closely similar in all civilizing peoples; and secondly to the intercourse of tribes and nations, and the outflow of ideas over the earth, by the several methods of peaceful interchange of views, warlike conquest and forcible conversion, and propagandizing by missionary efforts. These various influences have tended to bring into some degree of conformity the religious systems not only of Europe, Asia, and Africa, but also those of the Old and the New World, between which some communication very probably existed in ancient times. This explains why we find in the Christian faith doctrines which are copies of these Gentile nations and their Sun-myths dating back for thousands of years.

NOTHING NEW UNDER THE SUN…PARDON THE PUN

The primary religious ideas of all peoples were undoubtedly much the same. The unquestioned supremacy of the sun among the heavenly bodies, the striking changes to which it was subjected in the variation from day to night, and from summer to winter; its life-giving beneficence, and its seeming struggle with the demons of storm and cold; not only everywhere exalted this heavenly body into the position of king of the gods in every system of nature-worship, but, gave rise to numerous myths, which necessarily in some measure corresponded, since they were everywhere based on the same phenomena of nature. It is true that nature-worship was not the sole primitive religious conception of mankind. Various other general ideas made their stay into and influenced systems of belief, prominent among these being the custom of ancestor worship, which widely, perhaps universally, prevailed in developing nations, and exerted a vigorous influence upon unfolding religions. Mythology, however, occupies the most prominent position in the growth of religious beliefs and can be shown to be the backbone of most of the sacred doctrines help dear by Christianity. Ancestral and other systems of worship have influenced religious practice and ceremony to a marked content, but have had much less to do with the growth of dogma than the intricate details of the history of the gods, to which the numerous phenomena of nature gave rise. Over religious belief the Sun has exercised a dominant influence, and still faintly yet distinguishably shines through the most opaquely obscure of modern theological dogmas.

IT SADDENS ME TO SAY THIS AS A FORMER CHRISTIAN PASTOR…BUT…

It saddens me to say that the vast majority of the dogmas and doctrines of Christianity must be included among mythological outgrowths from nature and sun worship. Understand, I did not know of this until after many years of dedicated study. Very few of these dogmas of Gentile Christianity are the direct fruit of Christ's teachings. Very many of them are the work of later theologians, who were influenced both by their own religious education and the demands of their congregations. Christianity arose among the Jews, a people whose religious system had NEVER been strongly mythological, and had become much less so in the course of time. But the new doctrine which would later by espoused by the Gentile Church was not to be accepted by the Jews. Little wonder. When you have been to Sinai then nothing can take its place in your heart or your head! This “new, but not new Gentile faith” found its chief converts among peoples of Aryan origin; remembering it began with the Indo-Europeans, the Hindus, the Persians, and then later spread to the Greeks, the Romans, the Teutons, the Celts, etc.,—peoples among whom mythology had become extraordinarily developed, and whom it was simply impossible to convert in a mass to radically new ideas. Literally these Aryan Gentile nations only re-accepted again what they already were familiar with; only the names and language kept changing from time to time and culture to culture. They accepted Christ and his moral teachings, with the skillfully organized church system of the primitive Christians; but their older mythological belief was not thrown off at will, but was rather a plant whose roots had penetrated to every fiber of their beings, and had become an intimate part of the texture of their minds and history. It strongly influenced the most learned among them. With the unlearned it continued the prevalent system of belief, and insinuated itself into the dogmas of the new church as it moved away from it's Jewish heritage to a mostly Gentile based population. This Gentile juggernaut proceeded world-wide with a power impossible to resist. It may be repeated that the Christian theology of today was not born with Yeshua and his apostles. Christian theology can be proven to be anything but a "unique Divine revelation" from God. This "new, but not new" Christian theology slowly "leavened" the nations. Traditions arose, partly based on old myths, partly on misconceptions by Gentile's of Christ's life and teachings, which affected even the writers of the several lives of Yeshua, and more strongly those who revere farther removed from Yeshua.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE ESSENES UPON EARLY CHRISTIANITY

From the very start legendary dogmas of mythological origin seem to leave arisen in the new church, to have become the firm beliefs of congregations, and to have affected the minds of theologians much more than they themselves were aware of. And as the new faith spread through the world, it became more and more imbued with old thought, until mythology took the center stage and the "message of Yeshua" was relegated to secondary importance among his followers. The theology of Sun-worship as re-interpreted in the life of Yeshua became doctrines necessary for one's salvation and the message of Yeshua was overlooked as to it's importance and as to it's connection to Eternal Life.

This explains why Christianity is a religion of "creeds" necessary to believed to be "saved" and Judaism as a religion of "deeds" which is the fruit of one's "salvation." No wider gulf could ever exist!

Answer for yourself: Who was responsible for sun-worship being re-interpreted in the life of Yeshua and later recorded in the New Testament?

Answer for yourself: Can it be proven that concepts in the New Testament concerning Yeshua are taken directly from the Aryan nations and their theology of sun-worship?

Answer for yourself: What was the role of the Essenes in this "re-interpretation" of the Jewish Messiah?

Patience! All of these questions will be answered as our foundations and background into this problem gets established through further instruction.

Christianity, properly considered, is not a system of belief based on creeds, but a system of ethics. Yeshua taught no creed. His life was spent in the inculcation of lofty ideas of morality. The few dogmas which he did assert are full of evidence of the influence of the preceding Hebrew faith, and were doubtless the outcome of his early religious education. Many of his utterances have been tortured into creeds, but few of them bear the interpretations that have been laid upon them. He was a moral teacher, pure and simple, and as an inculcator of moral ideas he stands at the summit of mankind. His teachings are the simplest and loftiest, his life was the noblest and most self-sacrificing, that literature and history present to our gaze. But for the dogmas of Christianity Yeshua is not responsible. These Gentile adaptations of sun-myths were grafted onto the life of the man from Galilee and grew after his death through the following years and centuries and were embellished under the influence of a host of more ancient ideas and mythological conceptions and the bulk of them have no more to do with the "Christianity" taught by Yeshua than has the mythology of the Aztecs. The true faith of Yeshua, originally destined to go into all the world, original "Christianity" if you wish to call it such, was simply thrown into a world seething with religious belief and fancies, and could not but be blended with some of these prevailing mythological ideas held dear by those to which this "original Christianity" was taken. The pure light of Yeshua's teachings lay within, but was long almost lost in the obscuring doctrine that belief is the essential of virtue, conduct a minor accessory; that lapse from virtue may be regally pardoned, lapse from faith is unpardonable. Such a doctrine has done infinite mischief to the cause of Christianity. Fortunately it is ceasing to prevail. The truth is burning through the clouds, and the example of Yeshua's life and the loftiness of his precepts are becoming of more value in religion than the creeds advanced by later theologians; and we may look forward with hope to the time in which conduct will become the essential feature of religion, and faith be relegated to its true position in the history of human thought.

In the many pages that follow ample evidence is presented to the reader in hopes his mind and heart will be awakened to the truths long overlooked by him and held from him by his spiritual authorities. These pages are the fruit of in-depth research by a young Pastor who loved God so much that he wanted to know Him as best possible. Many paths of study were traveled. by this lover of God. Many tears paved the way as truth led to his repentance as the leaven of the Christian Sun-worship he taught was cast aside. Eventually would come his resignation and he no loner would be an ordained Pastor of an apostate faith. That man was me.

Let us remember to hear truth and not rest assured that one's failure to accept it does not nullify it. We live in the present, we dream of the future, but we learn eternal truths from the past. Truth is incontrovertible. Panic may resent it; ignorance may deride it; malice may distort it; but there it is!

As we begin our study in earnest, I wish to leave you with a quote that has meant a lot to me in my search for truth my whole life. Horace Mann said:

"Keep one thing forever in view-the truth; and if you do this, though it may seem to lead you away from the opinions of men, it will assuredly conduct you to the throne of God."

This is the whole of my purpose in presenting this material for your evaluation. Once presented with the facts you will then be capable of making an "intelligent" decision and with every falsehood removed the distance from you to God is shortened! "Corban, corban....draw near to God." Shalom.

SO HOW AND WHERE IS THE ORIGIN OF THIS FALSE WORSHIP THAT IS AT THE HEART OF ALL GENTILE NATIONS AND CHRISTIANITY?

LET OUR STUDY CONTINUE

THE ARYAN PEOPLES AND THE ORIGIN OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINES

In ancient times there lived on the highest elevation of Central Asia a noble race of men called the "Aryan." ..the Indo-European people otherwise known as "Aryans." These "Aryans" are that part of the human race that include the peoples of India, the Hindus, and Persians as well as most European. Archeological evidence, as well as linguistical studies, will prove that the European race traces its roots back to the Aryan peoples. The Aryans will be the forerunners of the Teutonic peoples which comes from a term "Teutons," which is a Latinized form of the word meaning the people of Germanic origin in general. However, it also refers to the languages spoken by other peoples including the Gothic, Anglo-Saxon, English, Dutch, Icelandic, Norse, Danish, German, and Swedish. Don't look now but we are speaking of Eastern European people. What is important for our study is that a link can be found between these Teutonic peoples and their predecessors...the Indo-European people otherwise known as "Aryans." This is very important for our study as we trace the evolution and spread of Sun-worship and how it became the backbone of all Gentile pagan religions and finally culminating as the core of Christian doctrines. Just remember the importance of the Aryan people for now. These Aryan people spoke a language not yet Sanskrit (ancient language of the Hindus, Greek, or German, but containing dialects of all). We need to understand that the nations which we normally think are European, especially Eastern European, from which America would spring one day, was heavily influenced by these people and that applies to their religious ideas as well. This is very important to remember as our study progresses.

THE WORSHIP OF THE ARYANS

These Aryan people worshipped nature; the sun, moon, sky, and earth as a comparison of ancient religions and mythology in the land peopled by Aryans, demonstrates. Their chief object of adoration was the Sun. To this race, in the infancy of its civilization, the Sun was not a mere luminary, but a Creator, Ruler, Preserves, and Savior of their world as they knew it. Around the Sun these people would develop a religious doctrine which finds its origin in the Sun and its influence upon mankind. Such is called "Astro-Theology".

The major factor to consider when reading and studying these "Astro-theologican Sun-Myths" is how they are to be interpreted. There are two ways that they have been approached by scholars; one today is accepted the other rejected. The historical interpretation is today discounted and most understand them to be an allegorical relating of the attributes of the Sun and its influence upon man.

As there could be no life or vegetation without light, the Sun, as a light-bringer, became for these people their Creator. If Creator, it was logical that this same Sun was then Ruler of their world as they knew it. This Sun was in reality their "Father" of all things both seen and unseen. These people related in pictures as much as words. In driving away the darkness, likewise in fertilizing the earth, the Sun became for them the Preserver and kind Protector of all living things…..the Savior of mankind. As the Sun sometimes scorches and withers vegetation and dries up the rivers, this same Sun was conceived of as a Destroyer also. As Creator, Preserver, and Destroyer the Sun was three persons in one…the Trinity. This is the first time man imagined a Trinity within their Sun god. History proves such a concept would never pass away.

It is very hard for man at the present day to realize the feelings with which the first dwellers on earth looked upon the Sun. Put yourself in their shoes for just a minute. "Think of man," says Professor Muller, "at the dawn of time…Was not the sunrise to him the first wonder, all though, all philosophy? Was it not to him the first revelation, the first beginning of all trust, of all religion?"

The Aryans looked up to the sky and gave it the name Dyaus, from a root-word which means "to shine." This name was to stick. When, out of the forces and forms of nature, they would later fashion other gods, this name of Dyaus became "Dyaus Pitar", the "Heavenly Father," or "All-Father." The earth they worshipped as the Mother of all.

THE "SUN" BECOMES THE OFFSPRING OF THE SKY GOD THE "SUN" IS NOW THE "SON" OF GOD

Their reasoning led them to believe that the Sun was the product of the Sky god; the Heavenly Father. This "offspring of the Sky-god" was none other than "the Son of the Sky", or that the Sun was the "Son of the Heavenly Father", and that the immaculate virgin, the Earth (sometimes it was the dawn or the night), was the Mother of the Sun. Hence we have the Virgin, or Virgo, as one of the signs of the Zodiac.

As the Sun begins the apparent annual northward journey on the 25th of December, this was said to be the birthday of the Sun (all movement commences with birth). This special day, the birthday of the Sun, was observed with great rejoicings. On this day the sign of the Virgin is rising on the eastern horizon, the Sun having reached the winter solstice.

The division of the first decan of the Virgin represents a beautiful immaculate virgin with flowing hair, sitting in a chair, with two ears of corn in here hand, and suckling an infant called "Iesus" (Jesus in Latin), by some nations, and "Christos" (Christ in Greek) which means "an Anointed One, a Messiah. The infant denotes the Sun, which at the moment of the winter solstice, precisely when the Persian magi drew the horoscope of the new year, was placed on the bosom of the Virgin.

The zodiacal sign of Aires was anciently known as the Lamb; consequently, when the Sun made the transit of the equinox under this sign, the Sun was called the "Lamb of God." Later when the Sun was personified as "the Son" then the "Son was the Lamb of God."

The birth of the Sun was said to be heralded by a star…the Morning-star, which rises immediately before the Virgin and her Child. As the Sun appears to start from a dark abode, it was said that he was "born in a cave or manger,"or dungeon, and the splendor of the morning sky was said to be the halo around his cradle. As the Sun scatters the darkness, it was said that he would be the destroyer of the reigning monarch, Night. Warned of this peril by oracles, Night tries to prevent the birth of the Sun, and, failing in that, seeks to "take his life." For this reason it is said that the Sun is left on the bare hillside to perish, as he seemingly rests on the earth at his rising. The Sun meets with temptations on his course, is beset by foes, clouds of storm an darkness; but, in the struggle which ensues, he is conqueror, the gloomy army, broken and rent, is scattered. The daughters of his foes, the last light vapors which float in the heavens, try in vain to clasp and retain him, but he disengages himself from their embraces; and, as he repulses them, they writhe, lose their form and vanish. Temptations to sloth and luxury are offered him in vain; he has work to do, and nothing can stay him from doing it. He travels over many lands, and toils for the benefit of others; he does hard service for a mean and cruel generation. He is continually in company with his Twelve Apostles; the twelve signs of the zodiac.

As he approaches midsummer, he appears in all his splendor, he has reached the summit of his career; henceforth his power diminishes, and he meets with an early and a volent death, from which there is no escape. When the extreme southern limit his course is reached, his enemies (darkness and cold which have sought in vain to wound him) win the victory. The bright Sun of summer is slain, crucified in the heavens, and pierced by the spear (thorn, or arrow) of winter. He who has performed such marvellous miracles, healing the sick and raising the dead, cannot save himself; a stern fate decrees that he must die an ignominious death.

As the Sun wakens the earth to life after the long sleep of winter is passed, it was said that he raised the dead. The Sun is said to be "crucified", with outstretched arms in the heavens; outstretched to bless the world he is trying to save from the terror of darkness. His arms remain outstretched to the tree, or cross. It is an ancient custom to use trees as gibbets for crucifixion, or, if artificial, to call the cross a "tree," the tree being one of the symbols of nature-worship, which denoted the fructifying power of the Sun. The Sun crucified was the Sun in winter as it dies when it falls below the equator and the length of darkness of the days increase, when it is subjected to the evil power of darkness, the "D-evil" or the "Devil," when his fructifying power is gone. The Sun, in its death descends to hades for 3 days, then resurrects in its northward journey of re-birth on it way to spring as it is "resurrected."

Before the Sun dies he see all his disciples; his retinue of light, the twelve hours of the day or the twelve months of the year. These disappear into the clouds of evening; but the tender mother and the fair maidens he has loved; the beautiful lights which flush the eastern sky as the Sun sinks in the west. The tender lights of Sun-set remain with him till the very last. Their tears are the tears of dew. At the "death of the Sun" there is darkness over all the land. He descends into Hell, or Hades. In ancient times Hell, or Hades, was a place neither of reward nor punishment, but was simply the home of the dead, good and bad alike, the word primarily signifying nothing more than the hollow grave, hole, pit, cavern, or other receptacle which receives the dead. By the Aryans, Hades was supposed to be in the far west, which to them was always the region of darkness and death, as the east was of light and life. On the 22nd of December the Sun enters the sign of Capricornus, or the Goat, and appears to remain in the same place for 3 days and three nights, and then begins to ascend. This was said to be the resurrection of the Sun from Hades or the grave. At the vernal equinox, at Easter, the Sun has been below the equator and suddenly rises above it. It rises triumphant over the powers of darkness and cold. The resurrection of the Sun was generally celebrated on the 25th of March, when the return to spring may be said to be the result of the return of the Sun, from the lower or far-off regions to which it had departed.

What is important for the reader to understand is that each of these Aryan nations had their own Sun Story and this was later personified in the lives of each nation's heroes; either real or fictitious:

- Egypt gave us the myth of the original Savior God Osiris
- Adonis and Aphrodite
- The Greek Dionysus
- Attis and Cybele
- Demeter and Persephone
- Orpheus and the reconstruction of Dionysus
- Zoroaster and Zoroastrianism
- Brahmanism
- Buddhism as a revolt against Brahmanism
- Pythagoras and his religious synthesis
- Isis and Serapis
- Mithraism

What is important for our study is that it would be the Essenes of the first century A.D., who in repudiation of a Judaism they felt had apostasized since they had lost the priesthood to the Hasmoneans, turned from many Jewish beliefs and under the influence of their Teacher of Righteousness, adopted many of the above religious beliefs which can be shown to have had their origin in sun-worship. These Essenes would later attach themselves with the Jesus Movement in Palestine and this explains the infusion of their religious beliefs into the early church and the early faith which is today called Christianity.

SYMBOLISM AND SUN WORSHIP

There were numerous symbols which were held as sacred to the Sun, the most common being the fish, the lamb, the cross, and the serpent. The serpent was an emblem of the Sun, when represented with his tail in his mouth, thus forming a circle. The serpent was an emblem of eternity, when represented as casting off his skin; but when represented with his deadly sting, he was an emblem of evil. When represented as crucified on the tree (cross), the serpent denoted the Sun in winter, when it has lost its fructifying power.

RITES AND CEREMONIES ORIGINATING WITH SUN WORSHIP

The Aryans observed various rites and ceremonies, among them being Baptism and the sacrament of the Eucharist. If you read the individual accounts of these Sun-myths and their personification listed above, then you should have seen how each one of the personified sun-gods had a sacred meal and Eucharist. Each one in some manner obtained salvation either through "eating the essence of the god" or being "unified with the god" though sexual union with one who represented the god; either male or female. There is nothing new under the Sun as we find the same concept of the Eucharist involved in Christianity; both Catholic and Protestant. Indeed, the doctrine of Transubstantiation is one of the most ancient of doctrines. The whole Christian world practices this same rite Sunday after Sunday and never stops to think how the Passover was changed by the earlyGentile Church into the Eucharist; something they Gentiles always had done!

Baptism was held to be a regenerating rite; and rivers, as sources of fertility and purification, were at an early date invested with a sacred character. Every great river was supposed to be permeated with the divine essence, and its waters held to cleanse from moral guilt and contamination.

The doctrines of Original Sin and the Fallen Condition of Man were not unknown to the primitive Aryan, who, in order to propitiate his gods, atone for sins, or avert calamities, offered sacrifices to them. When men lived mostly on vegetables, they offered grain, salt, fruits, water, and flowers; but when they began to eat meat and spices, and drink wine, they offered these also. The Aryans naturally supposed that the gods would be pleased with whatever was useful or agreeable to them.

In the course of time it began to be imagined that the gods demanded something more sacred as offerings, or atonements, for sin. This led to the sacrifice of human beings, at first of slaves and those taken in war, and finally of their own children, even their most beloved and first-born. It came to be an idea that every sin must have its prescribed amount of punishment, and that the gods would accept the life of one person in atonement for the sins of others. From this arose a belief in the redemption from sin by the sufferings of a Divine Incarnation, by death on a tree or cross, or otherwise.

THE SPREAD OF THESE BELIEFS

Branches of the Aryan race migrated to the east and to the west. One of the offshoots, at the west, founded the Persian kingdom; another built Athens and Lacedaemon, and became the Greek nation; a third went to Italy, and reared the city on the seven hills, which grew into imperial Rome. A distant colony of the same race excavated the silver mines of prehistoric Spain; and the first glimpse at ancient England reveals Aryan descendents fishing in willow canoes. Germany was also peopled by the Aryans. Meanwhile other bands of Aryans had gone forth, from the primitive home in Central Asia to the seacoast. Powerful hands found their way through the passes of the Himalayas into the Punjab, and spread themselves, chiefly as Brahmans and Rajputs, over India.

Wherever the Aryans went, the Sun-myths went with them, and appeared in the course of time, after their origin was forgotten, as the groundwork of religions, epic-poems, folk-lore, and nursery tales. Out of these myths were shaped by degrees innumerable gods and demons of the Hindus; and devs and jins of the Persians; the great gods, the minor deities, and nymphs and fauns and satyrs, of Greek mythology and poetry; the stormy divinities, the giants and trolls, of the cold and rugged north; the dwarfs of German forests; the elves who dance merrily in the moonlight of an English summer; the "good people" who play mischievous tricks upon stray peasants among the Irish hills; fairies and gods and heroes.

Almost all we have of legend come to us from our Aryan forefathers. Often the stories are scarcely changed; sometimes so altered that the links between the old and the new have to be puzzled out; but all these myths and traditions, when we come know the meaning of them, take us back to the time when the Aryans dwelt together in the high lands of Central Asia. They all mean the same things; namely, the relation between the Sun and the earth, the succession of day and night, of summer and winter, of storm and calm, of cloud and tempest, of golden sunshine and bright blue sky.

ARCHEOLOGY, ANTHROPOLOGY, AND COMPARATIVE MYTHOLOGY....REVEAL THE ORIGIN OF MANY CHRISTIAN DOCTRINES AND DOGMAS

A few of the Aryan nations have preserved in their ancient poetry some remnants of the natural awe with which the earlier dwellers on the earth saw the brilliant sun "slowly rise from out the darkness of the night, raising itself by its own might higher and higher, till it stood triumphant on the arch of heaven, and then descended and sank down in its fiery glory, into the dark abyss of the heaving and hissing sea." It is to the stores and religions of these nations we now look to see if our premise is justified and provable: namely, that many or most of Christianity's doctrines and dogmas have their origin in Sun worship. What we are especially interested in as followers of Jesus/Yeshua, is if much of what we have been taught and read about him in the New Testament credible; and if not, then we need to look elsewhere to find such truths.

We need look no further than Astro-Theology and understand its implications for many of the doctrines of the Christian faith.

NOW...IF YOU HAVE READ EVERYTHING UP TO NOW...THEN YOU ARE READY TO BEGIN A SERIOUS STUDY AND COMPARISON OF THE "CHRISTIAN SAVIOR" AND THE VARIOUS SUN-MYTHS TO DETERMINE IF THE TEACHINGS BELIEVED TO BE INFALLIBLE, INERRANT, AND INSPIRED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT ARE REALLY A DIVINE AND UNIQUE REVELATION....OR PLAGIARIZED PAGANISM ORIGINATING FROM SUN WORSHIP

HOW ARE WE TO INTERPRET THESE ARYAN SUN-MYTHS WE FIND IN THE BIBLE?

Once the Sun and its movement and its effect on mankind had been personified into local stories reflecting the attributes of the Sun (Creator, Sustainer, Protector, Savior), it was natural that these Sun god-men would be glorified and later deified. This is exactly what has happened to Yeshua in the Christian faith. Little wonder as your study is revealing to you how this happened. After what you have seen concerning the numerous virgin born, crucified and resurrected Saviors (as the climax of Sun worship) believed on in the Pagan world for so many centuries before the time assigned for the birth of the Christian Saviour, the questions naturally arise: were these god-men real parsonages? Did they ever exist in the flesh? What was the origin of the stories concerning these virgin born, crucified, and resurrected Saviors? Do these stories have a foundation in truth, or are they simply creations of the imagination ?

SCHOLARS VIEW THE PROBLEM TWO DIFFERENT WAYS… HISTORICALLY OR ALLEGORICALLY

HISTORICAL?

The historical theory—according to which all the persons mentioned in mythology were once real human beings, and the legend, and fabulous traditions relating to them were merely the additions and embellishments of later times—which was so popular with scholars of the last century, has been altogether abandoned.

Under the historical point of view the gods are mere deified mortals, either heroes who have been deified after their death, or Pontiff-chieftains who have passed themselves off for gods, and who, it is gratuitously supposed, found people stupid enough to believe in their pretended divinity. This was the manner in which formerly, writers explained the mythology of nations of antiquity but a method that pre-supposed a historical Crishna, a historical Osiris, a historical Mithra, a historical Hercules, a histories Apollo, or a historical Thor, was found untenable, and therefore does not, at the present day, stand in need of a refutation. As a writer of the early part of the present century said: "We shall never have an ancient history worthy of the perusal of men of common sense, till we cease treating poems as history, and send back such personages as Hercules, Theseus, Bacchus, etc., to the heavens, whence their history is taken, and whence they never descended to the earth."

ALLEGORICAL?

The historical theory was succeeded by the allegorical theory, which supposes that all the myths of the ancients were allegorical and symbolical, and contain some moral, religious, or philosophical truth or historical fact under the form of an allegory, which came in process of time to be understood literally.

In the preceding articles we have spoken of the several virgin-born, crucified and resurrected Saviors, as real personages. We have attributed to these individuals words and acts, and have regarded the words and acts recorded in the several sacred books from which we have quoted, as said and done by them. But in doing this, we have simply used the language of others. These gods and heroes were not real personages; they are merrily personifications of the Sun. As Prof Max Muller observes in his Lectures on the Science of Religion:

"One of the earliest objects that would strike and stir the mind of man, and for which a sign or a name would soon be wanted, is surely the Sun." In the Vedas, the Sun has twenty different names, not pure equivalents, but each term descriptive of the Sun in one of its aspects. It is brilliant (Surya), the friend (Mitra), generous (Aryaman), beneficent (Bhaga), that which nourishes (Pushna), the Creator (Tvashtar), the master of the sky (Divaspati), and so on (Rev. S. Baring-Gould: Orig. Relig. Belief, vol. I, p. 150). Again Prof. Muller says: "It is very hard for us to realize the feelings with which the first dwellers on the earth looked upon the Sun, or to understand fully what they meant by a morning prayer or a morning sacrifice. Perhaps there are few people who have watched a sunrise more than once or twice in their life; few people who have ever known the meaning of a morning prayer, or a morning, sacrifice. But think of man at the very dawn of time.... think of the Sun awakening the eyes of man from sleep, and his mind from slumber! Was not the sunrise to him the first wonder, the first beginning of all redaction, all thought, all philosophy? Was it not to him the first revelation, the first beginning of all trust, of all religion?"

Prof. Muller goes on to say: "Few nations only have preserved in their ancient poetry some remnants of the natural awe with which the earlier dwellers on the earth saw that brilliant being slowly rising from out of the darkness of the night, raising itself by its own might higher and higher, till it stood triumphant on the arch of heaven, and then descended and sank down in its fiery glory into the dark abyss of the heaving and hissing sea. In the hymns of the Veda, the poet still wonders whether the Sun will rise again; he asks how he can climb the vault of heaven? Why he does not fall back ? And when the rays of the morning rouse him from sleep and call him back to new life, when he sees the Sun, as he says, stretching out his golden arms to bless the world and rescue it from the terror of darkness, he exclaims, 'Arise, our life, our spirit has come back... the light approaches."

THE PERSONIFICATION OF NATURE

Many years ago, the learned Sir William Jones said: "We must not be surprised at finding, on a close examination, that the characters of all the Pagan deities, male and female, melt into each other, and at last into one or two; for it seems as well founded opinion, that the whole crowd of gods and goddesses of ancient Rome, mean only the powers of nature, and principally those of the SUN, expressed in a variety of ways, and by a multitude of fanciful names" (Asiatic Researches, vol. i. p. 267).

So, as you can see the "allegorical" interpretation is the more correct of the two options.

PERSONIFICATION OF THE SUN/NATURE LED TO GLORIFICATION... WHICH LED TO DEIFICATION

If we wish to find the gods and goddesses of the ancestors of our race, we must look to the sun, the moon, the stars, and the sky, the earth, the sea, the dawn, the clouds, the wind, etc., which they personified and glorified. That these have been the gods and the goddesses of all nations of antiquity, is an established fact. They are better understood as being called "Solar Gods".

The words which had denoted the sun and the moon would denote not merely living things but living persons. From personification to deification the steps would be but few; and the process of disintegration would at once furnish the materials for a vast fabric of mythology. Every word would become an attribute, and all ideas, once grouped around a simple object, would branch off into distinct personifications. These attributes of nature and the Sun and stars would gradually be converted into incidents of their mystical careers. Later each would receive a local habitation with a corresponding name unique to each area. These would remain as genuine history, when the origin and meaning of the words had been either wholly or in part forgotten.

BUT HOW DO WE KNOW THE GENTILE NATIONS PERSONIFIED....GLORIFIED...AND DEIFIED THE SUN AND NATURE?

The Aryans are said to have entered India through the fabled Khyber pass, around 1500 BC. They intermingled with the local populace, and assimilated themselves into the social framework. They adopted the settled agricultural life-style of their predecessors, and established small agrarian communities across the state of Punjab. The Aryans are believed to have brought with them the horse, developed the Sanskrit language and made significant inroads in to the religion of the times. All three factors were to play a fundamental role in the shaping of Indian culture. Cavalry warfare facilitated the rapid spread of Aryan culture across North India, and allowed the emergence of large empires. Sanskrit is the basis and the unifying factor of the vast majority of Indian languages. The religion, that took root during the Vedic era, with its rich pantheon of Gods and Goddesses, and its storehouse of myths and legends, became the foundation of the Hindu religion, arguably the single most important common denominator of Indian culture. The Aryans did not have a script, but they developed a rich tradition. They composed the hymns of the four vedas, the great philosophic poems that are at the heart of Hindu thought. "Veda" means knowledge, vedic culture means the spiritually aware society. And "dharma", as the meaning of life, the way to live the existance on Earth.

For the proofs of these assertions, the Vedic poems furnish indisputable evidence, that such as this was the origin and growth of the Greek and Teutonic mythology. In these poems, the names of many, perhaps most, of the Greek gods, indicate natural objects which, if endued with life, took on human personality. Such mythologies haven been grouped around the sun; grounded on those expressions which describe the recurrence of day and night; on the great tragedy of nature, in the alteration of summer and winter. Simply said it was "nature religion" with the Sun at the center.

Of the vast mass of solar myths, some have emerged into independent legends, others have furnished the groundwork of whole epics, others have remained simply as floating tales (Aryan Myths., vol. ii. pp. 51-53).

The results obtained from the examination of languages in its several forms leaves no room for doubt that the general system of mythology can be traced to its fountain head. We can no longer shut our eyes to the fact. For the comparison of legends current in different countries it is not necessary to carry the search further back than the worship of nature along with the Sun. With the origin of earliest man we find a common language know by all; a language without words. I am speaking about a common language as man interpreted his environment as speaking to him. We have before us a stage of language corresponding to a stage in the history of the human mind in which all sensible objects were regarded as instinct with a conscious life. The varying phases of that life were therefore described as truthfully as they described their own feelings or sufferings; and therefore every phase became for them a picture. Early man described the things he saw, felt, or heard in his world from his point of view. Man's language was the result of an observation of what his senses perceived. In this way, man could not fail to note the changes of days and years, of growth and decay, of calm and storm; but the objects which so changed were to them living things, and the rising and setting of the sun, the return of winter and summer, became a drama in which the actors were their enemies and friends. These myths, from the personification of nature and the sun, exhibit in their germs the myths which afterwards became the legends of gods and heroes with human forms, and furnished the groundwork of the religious epics, poems, whether of the eastern or the western world. It was only a short step from this personification of the sun and nature to human epics in which such forces or nature became deified in every nations' myths and heroes.

The mythical or mythmaking language of mankind had no partialities; and the Sun occupies the largest extent of the myths of these nations. Mankind did not fail to put into words their thoughts and emotions roused in them by the varying phases of the Sun and nature of their world on which we, not less than they, feel that our life depends, although today we know a great something more than they about its nature.

Thus grew up a multitude of expressions which described the sun as the child of the night, as the destroyer of the darkness, as the lover of the dawn and the dew. Such phrases would go on to speak of the sun as killing the dew with his spears, and of forsaking the dawn as he rose in the heaven. The feeling that the fruits of the earth were called forth by his warmth would find utterance in words which spoke of him as the friend and the benefactor of man; which the constant recurrence of his work would lead them to describe him as a being constrained to toil for others, as doomed to travel over many lands, and as finding everywhere things on which he could bestow his love or which he might destroy by his power. His journey might be across cloudless skies, or amid alterations of storm and calm; his light might break fitfully through the clouds, or be hidden from many a weary hour, to burst forth at last with dazzling splendor as he sank down in the western sky. He would be described as facing many dangers and many enemies, none of whom, however, may arrest his course; as sullen, or capricious, or resentful; as grieving for the loss of the dawn whom he had loved, or as nursing his great wrath and vowing a pitiless vengeance. Then as the veil was rent at eventide, they would speak of the chief, who had long remained still, girding on his armor; or of the wanderer throwing off his disguise, and seizing his bow or spear to smite his enemies; of the invincible warrior whose face gleams with the flush of victory when the fight is over, as he greets the fair-haired Dawn who closes, as she had begun, the day. To the wealth of images thus lavished on the daily life and death of the Sun there would be no limit. He was the child of the morning, or her husband, or her destroyer; he forsook her and he returned to her, either in calm serenity or only to sink presently in deeper gloom.

So with other sights and sounds. The darkness of night brought with it a feeling of vague horror and dread; the return of daylight cheered them with a sense of unspeakable gladness; and thus the Sun who scattered the black shade of night would be the mighty champion doing battle with the biting snake which lurked in its dreary hiding-place. But as the Sun accomplished his journey day by day through the heaven, the character of the seasons is changed. The buds and blossoms of spring-time expand in flowers and fruits of summer, and the leaves fall and wither on the approach of winter. Thus the daughter of the earth would be spoken of as dying or as dead, as severed from her mother for five or six weary months, not to be restored to her again until the time for here return from the dark land should once more arrive. But as no other power than that of the Sun can recall vegetation to life, this child of the earth would be represented as buried in a sleep from which the touch of the Sun alone could arouse her, when he slays the frost and cold which lie like snakes around her motionless form.

That these phrases would furnish the germs of myths or legends teeming with human feeling, as soon as the meaning of the phrases were in part or wholly forgotten, was as inevitable as that in the infancy of our race men should attribute to all sensible objects the same kind of life which they were conscious of possessing themselves.

By now you understand how the forces of nature and the sun could be understood by early man. These impressions were woven into various tales reflecting the crude understanding of mother nature as well as the Sun.

Simply said, early man did not possess the knowledge to relate such events he encountered in scientific terms as we had today. Crude stories and myths based on his limited knowledge would have to do. Later such events were as stated personified, glorified, and finally deified. Such expressions have been handed down to us and many of them are carried over into the life of Jesus the Jew. The irony is that the Jewish people were called to be a light of knowledge and correction to such men and their myths. We have lost a lot in our attempt to be a follower of Yeshua; in fact the hard reality as I now plan to show you is that 2.5 billions good people who call themselves Christians are little better off than primitive man because they hold dear the same myths.

The only difference is that the historical Yeshua has become the Christ of faith; such an object of faith as expressed in the New Testament is almost a carbon copy of what the earliest Sun-worshippers believed and taught. Let me see if I can prove it to you as we make comparisons between the Christian Savior and the various Sun Myths. After we are through then you can make an intelligent decision once you see the evidence for yourself. It is to that quest we now turn.

INDIVIDUAL COMPARISONS OF THE LIFE OF THE SUN-GODS OF THE GENTILE NATIONS WITH THE LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST DEPICTED IN THE NT.....SHOULD WE BE CONCERNED?

It is not my intention to scare anyone or to destroy the faith of anyone. However, before God, it is my intention to reveal the truth to the Christian in hopes if there be opportunity to repent of false beliefs and idolatry, then one might be so equipped with the facts and truth that such an intelligent decision could be made by each individual; thereby increasing the merit for manifesting the Kingdom of Heaven and bringing Messiah the King.

In order for such a noble purpose to be realized in the life of our readers, it is often necessary to challenge long held beliefs held to be "sacred," but when the light of truth is shone upon them, often they are shown to be what they really were all along....pious lies and frauds.

This is not easy for a Christian Pastor to admit or teach, but over 15 years of consciousness and in-depth study, often 8 hours a day, year after year, has brought copious information across my mind and heart which has brought major repentance into my life whereby many of those "sacred" doctrines of Christianity were shown to be nothing more than what was stated above: "pious lies and frauds." It was time to cast out the leaven of sin and wickedness, even "religious" wickedness which went Sunday after Sunday unexposed for what they really were.

IF YOU HAVE KEPT UP?

If you have kept up with the reading of these web pages up to now, then you know the basic premise both stated and being revealed to the readership; namely, Gentile Christianity with it's host of religious dogmas and doctrines are little more than "refined" Sun Worship. Be careful to understand that this a charge which is, unfortunately, easy to prove and is levied against not only Catholics, but the offspring of such a revolting idolatrous faith...Protestantism as well.

It is my intention to examine the life of Christ as recorded in the New Testament in detail in hopes of ascertaining if what is accepted by faith by the vast majority of Christians today as "truth" is really that, of if it is nothing more than "Plagiarized Paganism originating with Sun worship and the various Sun Myths of the Gentile nations since time began." If I am able to prove my point, and I have up to now and will continue to do so, then understand the tragic and serious implications that it means for you..the traditional Christian. Basically, you are a member in good standing of an apostate faith and don't know it. And without such information made available to you, as most never read sufficiently to see such abominations for themselves which are dressed up and passes off by the Christian Church as "orthodoxy," then the only recourse for most is to die in their sin and never know it. I hope to help those who take the time to look to see "if they be in the faith of Yeshua."

Answer for yourself: Do you want to know the truth before you die? Do you really?

HERE IS THE OPPORTUNITY YOU SAID YOU WANTED

Up to now in this web site and its articles we have laid the foundation, and strengthened the foundation for what comes next. The concepts revealed in the previous pages are fundamental to understanding what comes next. In the accounts of Jesus' life as recorded in the New Testament I and other scholars maintain that the very core of the Life of Christ as depicted in the New Testament is little more than manifestations of Astro-Theology in the majority of such a document. Without a background in Biblical Judaism of the Second Temple Period it is literally impossible to read the New Testament and discern truth from error. We, as believers in the historical Jesus are handicapped by the absence of such information.

As if that was not bad enough, we read many of the accounts of Jesus' life, many accounts which translate into doctrines and dogmas, which if can be proven to be lies and pious frauds, would do each of us good to reconsider our religious belief systems.

LOOKING AT THE LIFE OF JESUS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT...IS IT LITTLE MORE THAN ADAPTATIONS OF SUN-MYTHS FOR THE MOST PART?

By now if you have been diligent to read and understand the materials up to this point then when you read the following then you should recognize that you have met the same "events" connected with the life of Jesus Christ as portrayed in the New Testament as in your prior studies of the personifications of the Sun as found in all Aryian nations at one time or another. The life of Jesus Christ, a Jewish Rabbi who taught repentance, has been altered by the writers of the New Testament to reflect many aspects of Gentile pagan gods and sun godmen that were taken by them from the path of the Sun and the personification of the Sun in the Heavens! The facts speak for themselves. This information is not meant to denigrate Jesus in anyway; rather it is to help you and I, believers in the "Christ," to factor out myth and fiction from truth that remains. After ascertaining what is in reality "untruths" then hopefully our study becomes easier in our search for the truth about a Jewish Rabbi named Yeshua. I wish I could say that this is the only errors taught about this man from Galilee in the New Testament but sadly it does not stop here. Many crucial theological doctrines have been altered besides those listed here. This is the sad fruit of anti-Semitism by the Early Church Fathers and the Roman Church. The bottom line that I hope you see is that by removing fables and idolatry we inherited as "lovers of God" as children when our knowledge was limited then today in benefit of acquiring such knowledge then our worship of the Creator, in light of this new knowledge, can be more pure and loving and based upon truth that replaces these fictions. This is the reason Bet Emet Ministries exists...to help you and I love our Creator in Spirit and in Truth; something Christianity failed to teach or give you. Shalom.

MITHRAISM, ASTRO-THEOLOGY AND ITS SIMILARITY TO CHRISTIANITY

Theology begins with the stars. Of course if you have been a reader of Bet Emet Ministries for any length of time you have seen that and there is no greater example besides the Osiris Myth than the Myth of Mithra. You will see, as depicted in the above picture, a bull being slain. In reality this "bull" represented the Constellation Taurus which had been the center of world religions for thousands of years. Egypt is a prime example. We will come to see, as our studies progress as we read this article, that Mithra presided over changing of seasons and the movement of heavens themselves. Thus the scene of Mithra slaying a bull represents, "the precession of the equinoxes; Mithra was in effect moving the entire universe"(Prof. David Ulansey,The Origins Of Mithraic Mysteries). Mr Ulansey's book is quite phenomenal and I recommend reading it to everyone as he brings the correct perspective to this study along with a much needed correction of prior understandings from distinguished men like F. Cumont. Much of the information in this article is taken from The Origins Of Mithraic Mysteries. Thus, we see that Mithras represented by constellation Persus which was thought to change the position of the celestial sphere by slaying constellation Taurus and moving it out of the way thus allowing for its replacement by the constellation Aries (Ram) at spring equinox. With that as a small background let us begin our study and this will become more clearly momentarily.

The ancient Roman religion known as the Mithraic mysteries has captivated the imaginations of scholars for generations. There are two reasons for this fascination.

- First, like the other ancient "mystery religions," such as the Eleusinian mysteries and the mysteries of Isis, the Mithraic cult maintained strict secrecy about its teachings and practices, revealing them only to initiates. As a result, reconstructing the beliefs of the Mithraic devotees has posed an enormously intriguing challenge to scholarly ingenuity.
- Second, the Mithraic mysteries arose in the Mediterranean world at exactly the same time as did Christianity, and thus the study of the cult holds the promise of shedding vital light on the cultural dynamics that led to the rise of Christianity.

Owing to the cult's secrecy, we possess almost no literary evidence about the beliefs of Mithraism. The few texts that do refer to the cult come not from Mithraic devotees themselves, but rather from outsiders such as early Church fathers, who mentioned Mithraism in order to attack it, and Platonic philosophers, who attempted to find support in Mithraic symbolism for their own philosophical ideas. However, although our literary sources for the Mithraic mysteries are extremely sparse, an abundance of material evidence for the cult exists in the many Mithraic temples and artifacts that archaeologists have found scattered throughout the Roman empire, from England in the north and west to Palestine in the south and east. The temples, called mithraea by scholars, were usually built underground in imitation of caves. These subterranean temples were filled with an extremely elaborate iconography: carved reliefs, statues, and paintings, depicting a variety of enigmatic figures and scenes. This iconography is our primary source of knowledge about Mithraic beliefs, but because we do not have any written accounts of its meaning the ideas that it expresses have proven extraordinarily difficult to decipher.

The typical mithraeum was a small rectangular subterranean chamber, on the order of 75 feet by 30 feet with a vaulted ceiling. An aisle usually ran lengthwise down the center of the temple, with a stone bench on either side two or three feet high on which the cult's members would recline during their meetings. On average a mithraeum could hold perhaps twenty to thirty people at a time. At the back of the mithraeum at the end of the aisle was always found a representation-- usually a carved relief but sometimes a statue or painting-- of the central icon of Mithraism: the so-called tauroctony or "bull-slaying scene" in which the god of the cult, Mithras, accompanied by a dog, a snake, a raven, and a scorpion, is shown in the act of killing a bull. Other parts of the temple were decorated with various scenes and figures. There were many hundreds-- perhaps thousands-- of Mithraic temples in the Roman empire. The greatest concentrations have been found in the city of Rome itself, and in those places in the empire (often in the most distant frontiers) where Roman soldiers-- who made up a major segment of the cult's membership-- were stationed. Our earliest evidence for the Mithraic mysteries places their appearance in the middle of the first century B.C.: the historian Plutarch says that in 67 B.C. a large band of pirates based in Cilicia (a province on the southeastern coast of Asia Minor) were practicing "secret rites" of Mithras. The earliest physical remains of the cult date from around the end of the first century A.D., and Mithraism reached its height of popularity in the third century. In addition to soldiers, the cult's membership included significant numbers of bureaucrats and merchants. Women were excluded. Mithraism declined with the rise to power of Christianity, until the beginning of the fifth century, when Christianity became strong enough to exterminate by force rival religions such as Mithraism.

SUPPOSED ORIGIN OF MITHRAISM...PROVED INCORRECT

For most of the twentieth century it has been assumed that Mithraism was imported from Iran, and that Mithraic iconography must therefore represent ideas drawn from ancient Iranian mythology. The reason for this is that the name of the god worshipped in the cult, Mithras, is a Greek and Latin form of the name of an ancient Iranian god, Mithra; in addition, Roman authors themselves expressed a belief that the cult was Iranian in origin. At the end of the nineteenth century Franz Cumont, the great Belgian historian of ancient religion, published a magisterial two-volume work on the Mithraic mysteries based on the assumption of the Iranian origins of the cult. Cumont's work immediately became accepted as the definitive study of the cult, and remained virtually unchallenged for over seventy years.

There were, however, a number of serious problems with Cumont's assumption that the Mithraic mysteries derived from ancient Iranian religion. Most significant among these is that there is no parallel in ancient Iran to the iconography which is the primary fact of the Roman Mithraic cult. For example, as already mentioned, by far the most important icon in the Roman cult was the tauroctony. This scene shows Mithras in the act of killing a bull, accompanied by a dog, a snake, a raven, and a scorpion; the scene is depicted as taking place inside a cave like the mithraeum itself. This icon was located in the most important place in every mithraeum, and therefore must have been an expression of the central myth of the Roman cult. Thus, if the god Mithras of the Roman religion was actually the Iranian god Mithra, we should expect to find in Iranian mythology a story in which Mithra kills a bull. However, the fact is that no such Iranian myth exists: in no known Iranian text does Mithra have anything to do with killing a bull.

Franz Cumont had responded to this problem by focusing on an ancient Iranian text in which a bull is indeed killed, but in which the bull-slayer is not Mithra but rather Ahriman, the force of cosmic evil in Iranian religion. Cumont argued that there must have existed a variant of this myth-- a variant for which there was, however, no actual evidence-- in which the bull-slayer had been transformed from Ahriman to Mithra. It was this purely hypothetical variant on the myth of Ahriman's killing of a bull that according to Cumont lay behind the tauroctony icon of the Roman cult of Mithras.

In the absence of any convincing alternative, Cumont's explanation satisfied scholars for more than seventy years. However, in 1971 the First International Congress of Mithraic Studies was held in Manchester England, and in the course of this Congress Cumont's theories came under concerted attack. Was it not possible, scholars at the Congress asked, that the Roman cult of Mithras was actually a new religion, and had simply borrowed the name of an Iranian god in order to give itself an exotic oriental flavor? If such a scenario seemed plausible, these scholars argued, one could no longer assume without question that the proper way to interpret Mithraism was to find parallels to its elements in ancient Iranian religion. In particular, Franz Cumont's interpretation of the tauroctony as representing an Iranian myth was now no longer unquestionable. Thus from 1971 on, the meaning of the Mithraic tauroctony suddenly became a mystery: if this bull-slaying icon did not represent an ancient Iranian myth, what did it represent?

NEW LIGHT SHED ON THE ORIGIN OF MITHRAISM ASTRO-THEOLOGY...THE FORERUNNER OF GENTILE CHRISTIANITY

Within a few years after the 1971 Congress, a radically different approach to explaining the tauroctony began to be pursued by a number of scholars. It is not an exaggeration to say that this approach has in just the past few years succeeded in completely revolutionizing the study of the Mithraic mysteries. According to the proponents of this interpretation, the tauroctony is not, as Cumont and his followers claimed, a pictorial representation of an Iranian myth, but is rather something utterly different: namely, an astronomical star map!

This remarkable explanation of the tauroctony is based on two facts:

- First, every figure found in the standard tauroctony has a parallel among a group of constellations located along a continuous band in the sky: the bull is paralleled by Taurus, the dog by Canis Minor, the snake by Hydra, the raven by Corvus, and the scorpion by Scorpio.
- Second, Mithraic iconography in general is pervaded by explicit astronomical imagery: the zodiac, planets, sun, moon, and stars are often portrayed in Mithraic art (note for example the stars around the head of Mithras in the carving of the tauroctony); in addition, numerous ancient authors speak about astronomical subjects in connection with Mithraism.

In the writings of the Neoplatonic philosopher Porphyry, for example, we find recorded a tradition that the cave which is depicted in the tauroctony and which the underground Mithraic temples were designed to imitate was intended to be "an image of the cosmos." Given the general presence of astronomical motifs in Mithraic art and ideology, the parallel noted above between the tauroctony-figures and constellations is unlikely to be coincidence. Let me recommend a good book on this issue: The Origins of The Mithraic Mysteries by David Ulansey.

BACKGROUND INFORMATION ON THE ZODIAC AND ASTRO-THEOLOGY

In order to understand the connection of Mithra with Christianity we must first have in mind a few facts about ancient cosmology. Today we know that the earth rotates on its axis once a day, and revolves around the sun once a year. However, Greco-Roman astronomy at the time of the Mithraic mysteries was based on a so-called "geocentric" cosmology, according to which the earth was fixed and immovable at the center of the universe and everything went around it. In this cosmology the universe itself was imagined as being bounded by a great sphere to which the stars, arranged in the various constellations, were attached. So, while we today understand that the earth rotates on its axis once every day, in antiquity it was believed instead that once a day the great sphere of the stars rotated around the earth, spinning on an axis that ran from the sphere's north pole to its south pole. As it spun, the cosmic sphere was believed to carry the sun along with it, resulting in the apparent moment of the sun around the earth once a day.

As necessary background we need to understand that there are 12 signs of the Zodiac and 36 associated constellations or decans. The sun, from our perspective on earth, pass through these 12 constellations as we view the sun as the earth rotates around it. It appears as if the sun is moving through these constellations when in reality we view the sun from different perspectives as it is seen against the backdrop of these constellations. Now these 12 signs or constellations are also known as the signs of the Zodiac. The word Zodiac comes from the old word "zoad" meaning the way or a step which gave rise to the word "zodiacus" which means a circuit which describes exactly what the sun is doing as it passes through these signs. The sun passes through one of these steps each month. The full 12 steps make up the course of one year. Thus we see that each constellation or sign must be about 30 degrees long. The season of the year can be noted by the constellation that the sun is passing through at any given moment or time.

The influence of the Zodiac is extensive. The Jewish historian Josephus, followed by Clement of Alexandria in A.D. 200 surmised that the 12 stones in the breastplate of Aaron which spoke of the twelve tribes of Israel also referred to the 12 zodiacal signs. Again we must take notice of the influence of Alexandria, Egypt, and astrology on the theology of the early Church Fathers.

Astrology had its beginning at the Tower of Babel with a man names Nimrod who the Scriptures describe as being a mighty rebel against God. Nimrod built a mighty tower with the heavenlies in its top used for the purpose of horoscope casting and instituted a powerful priesthood to bring the people under the direct influence of the powers of darkness. At the same time he tried to set up a one world government but God stepped in and confused the languages. Astrology has always been connected with witchcraft and the occult since its very beginning and as such is forbidden by God. Astrology assets that your character and future were fixed by the position of the sun, moon, and the planets at your birth. Modern astrology is further discredited by the fact that the horoscope charts used today were drawn up nearly two thousand years ago. This means that due to the law of precession of the equinoxes (which has to do with the "wobble" of the earth's axis-causing the westward movement at about 1 degree every 70 years) those charts are today inaccurate by about 28 days. The sun appearing to have moved back through the circuit of its movement through the zodiacal constellations. This means that if you believed your sign to be Scorpio, for example, it is really Libra. The sun being in the constellation of Libra is in reality in Scorpio. This totally discredits this false religion. What again is important for our understanding is that astrology became the basis of many world religions and this "astro-theology" became the very core of Christianity as well as the earliest believers had adopted and borrowed from their pagan neighbors astrological concepts which they personified in solar-myths about their respective heroes; Jesus was not an exception!

ASTRO-THEOLOGY AND MITHRAS AS THE KOSMOKRATOR

The celestial equator consists of the projection of the earth's equator onto the celestial sphere. This produces an imaginary circle in the sky which is inclined at an angle of twenty-three degrees to the other major celestial circle, namely, the ecliptic or zodiac, which is the circle in which the sun, moon, and planets appear to move against the background of the fixed stars. The celestial equator and the ecliptic intersect at two points, [forming a cross], and these two crosses or points are the equinoxes: the places where the sun, in its movement through the zodiac as seen from the earth, and is understood as the first days of spring and autumn. But understand this was understood to happen not on earth; the sun was submitted to these "crosses" in the heavens. The sun was crucified in the heavens. The ancients understood that the seasons were changed and determined by the travel of the sun; either above or below the equator. When the sun, which was though to be dead in winter with the longer days of darkness, rose above the equator, then the sun was subjected to this "cross" in its movement above the celestial equator in its elliptical orbit; the sun was though to be subjected to this "cross" or "crucified" and after 3 days, when the sun remained at the lowest point in the horizon and thought to be dead, it miraculously began it upward trajectory and with it the promise of spring and new life was now on its way. The ancients understood this as the "sun being crucified on the cross."

The celestial equator is not as obscure a concept as might first appear, and certainly was not obscure in antiquity. For in the ancient geocentric (earth-centered) vision of the cosmos, the universe was built upon a framework whose basic structure was provided by the two celestial circles of the ecliptic and the celestial equator. The picture shows a Renaissance diagram of the cosmic framework, the "skeleton of the universe," in which the celestial equator is the horizontal circle around the middle of the cosmic sphere, while the ecliptic or zodiac is the tilted circle. The other circles in the diagram, such as the tropics (the horizontal circles immediately above and below the celestial equator), provided a more detailed division of the cosmic sphere, but were always of secondary importance to the primary division of the sky according to the two circles of the ecliptic and the celestial equator. Thus, we often find in antiquity images of the cosmic sphere on which are placed just these two circles.

In fact, one of the earliest surviving examples of such representations is a Mithraic monument portraying the lion-headed god standing on a cosmic sphere on which are shown the two intersecting circles of the ecliptic and the celestial equator. Looking at the Renaissance picture and the Lion-headed god on the globe we can also see why these two circles were often seen as constituting a cross, with their intersection representing the equinoctial point where the circles meet. One of the most famous and important references to this cross formed by the ecliptic and the celestial equator is found in Plato's dialogue Timaeus, where Plato tells us how the Demiurge (the creator of the universe) constructed the universe out of two circles which he joined "in the form of the letter X (the X as understood as the symbol for the cross in the heavens). The sun was later personified in the various nations and became the heroes of mythology who were "crucified before the foundation of the world" (sound familiar)?

THE PROCESSION OF THE EQUINOXES

Before we can go on, we need to add one more crucial fact to the description of the celestial equator, namely, that the celestial equator is not completely stationary but actually possesses a very slow movement known as the precession of the equinoxes. This movement is caused by a wobble in the earth's rotation on its axis, which results in a slow, progressive change in the orientation of the earth in space. Thus, for example, the earth's North Pole does not always point to the same star. Although now it points in the direction of the star known as Polaris, a few thousand years ago a different star marked the pole, and a few thousand years in the future the pole will point to yet another star. Of course, if the orientation of the pole is changing, so is the orientation of the earth's equator, which is defined as a circle on the earth equidistant from the poles. The result of this change in orientation of the earth's equator is, naturally, a corresponding shift in the position of the celestial equator. This change in position of the celestial equator is most often described in terms of its effect on the position of the equinoxes (the points where the equator crosses the zodiac). Thus the phenomenon is known as the precession of the equinoxes. As a result of this wobble, the celestial equator appears to change its position over the course of thousands of years.

Put most simply, then, the precession of the equinoxes results in a slow movement of the equinoctial points backward through the zodiac, moving through one constellation every 2,160 years and thus through the entire zodiac in 12 times 2,160, or 25,920 years. Thus, at the present time the spring equinox occurs when the sun is in the constellation of Pisces but in a few hundred years the equinox will be in the constellation of Aquarius (the so-called dawning of the Age of Aquarius). And, more to our point here, in Graeco-Roman times the spring equinox was in the constellation of Aries, and the autumn equinox was in Libra. When one looks to Egypt and the times before the Graeco-Roman times we find the spring equinox was in the constellation of Taurus and the autumn equinox was in Scorpius for example. This explains why there was so much "bull" symbolism in Egypt. But that was to change with the Hyskos Shepherd Kings as these Pharaohs saw the change in the heaven and wars were fought over changing the religious emphasis of Egyptian worship from "Taurus" oriented to "Aries" or "lamb" oriented approaches to religious worship. We must not forget that these "changes" took 2,160 years.

The tauroctony symbolism clearly includes Taurus and Scorpius instead of Aries and Libra, which, as the equinoctial constellations in Graeco-Roman times, should have been pictured in any representation of the contemporary celestial equator.

However, the phenomenon of the precession of the equinoxes can also provide us with a possible solution to the problem of the unexpected presence of Taurus and Scorpius in the tauroctony in place of Aries and Libra. For although the equinoxes were in Aries and Libra in Graeco-Roman times, the equinoxes last positions before that were in Taurus and Scorpius, a situation which lasted from about 4000 B.C.E. to 2000 B.C.E. The tauroctony does indeed represent the celestial equator, but that it represents the celestial equator as it was when the equinoxes were in Taurus and Scorpius rather than in Aries and Libra (represented the equinoxes during the age two thousand years ago).

Starting with Taurus and moving west, the equator passes through the following—and only the followings—constellations on or below the ecliptic:

- Taurus the bull
- Canis Minor the dog
- Hydra the snake
- Crater the cup
- Corvus the raven
- Scorpius the scorpion

As will be seen immediately, these are precisely the constellations which are paralleled in the tauroctony, except that Leo the lion is missing. However, Leo also fits perfectly into our hypothesis that the tauroctony represents the astronomical situation which existed when the spring equinox was in Taurus. For although the celestial equator did not pass through Leo when the spring equinox was in Taurus, Leo was at that time the location of the summer solstice, which along with the equinoxes is shifted by the earth's precession. The solstices are, of course, inextricably linked with the equinoxes, since the solstices and equinoxes taken together divide the year into the four seasons. It is therefore easy to see how the constellation of Leo—the position of the summer solstice when the spring equinox was in Taurus—could have come to be incorporated into the tauroctony. To summarize, the tauroctony represents the astronomical situation which was obtained during the epoch in which the spring equinox was in Taurus, the fact that the summer solstice was in Leo during that epoch provides a convincing explanation for the occasional presence of the figure of a lion in the tauroctony.

With this as a background Mithras was viewed as a god whose essential quality was in his power over the entire cosmos as was know as a kosmokrator (cosmic ruler). Mithras is shown a number of times holding in his hand a globe representing the cosmic sphere having two intersecting circles of the zodiac and the celestial equator marked on it. Mithras in the role of Atlas, supports on his shoulder, as Atlas traditionally does, the great sphere of the universe. We also see Mithras holding the cosmic globe, his role of kosmokrator is certainly intended to be suggested by a number of tauroctonies which show the bull-slaying scene taking place within an arch or circle formed by the zodiac. Putting this all together, the cosmic power of Mithras was manifested in his ability to end the Age of Taurus and begin a new age by shifting the fundamental structure of the universe. The god Mithras demonstrated his ability to end one world age and begin another by killing the bull (ending the age of Taurus); thus indicating Mithras control over the fundamental structure of the universe. Mithras is responsible for the procession of the equinoxes and has the ability to control the position of the cosmic pole.

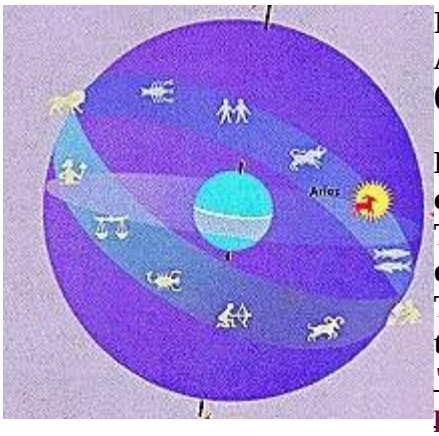
Mithraic iconography often portrays Mithras involved in various activities in conjugation with the sun god Helios or Sol. Many of the scenes represent Mithras as a power superior to Helios or Sol and we find these sun-gods kneeling before Mithras in a gesture of submission. Since Mithras controls the entire cosmic structure he therefore possesses a power greater than that of any other divinity, certainly greater than that of the sun who is part of the cosmic structure that Mithras controls. The sun has no choice but to kneel before Mithras in recognition of his superiority. We even find numerous inscriptions in which Mithras is himself called "the unconquered sun" (sol invictus). At times such iconography depicts Mithras and Sol as equals which means that Mithras and Sol have in common their shared role of kosmokrator, making them friendly allies and companions in various heroic deeds.

This diagram shows the daily rotation of the cosmic sphere around the earth according to the "geocentric" cosmology. As shown here, the sun is carried along by the cosmic sphere around the earth once a day. However, as explained above, in the "geocentric" cosmology the sun was also believed to possess a second movement beyond its daily rotation with the cosmic sphere: namely, its yearly revolution along the circle of the "zodiac."

In addition to this daily rotation of the cosmic sphere carrying the sun along with it, the ancients also attributed a second, slower motion to the sun. While today we know that the earth revolves around the sun once a year, in antiquity it was believed instead that once a year the sun-- which was understood as being closer to the earth than the sphere of the stars-- traveled around the earth, tracing a great circle in the sky against the background of the constellations. This circle traced by the sun during the course of the year was known as the "zodiac"-- a word meaning "living figures," which was a reference to the fact that as the sun moved along the circle of the zodiac it passed in front of twelve different constellations which were represented as having various animal and human forms.



In the "geocentric" cosmology the sun was believed to move along this circle around the earth once a year. The other cosmic circle shown here, parallel to the earth's equator, is called the "celestial equator."

Because the ancients believed in the real existence of the great sphere of the stars, its various parts-- such as its axis and poles-- played a central role in the cosmology, religion, and theology of the time. In particular, one important attribute of the sphere of the stars was much better known in antiquity than it is today: namely, its equator, known as the "celestial equator." Just as the earth's equator is defined as a circle around the earth equidistant from the north and south poles, so the celestial equator was understood as a circle around the sphere of the stars equidistant from the sphere's poles. The circle of the celestial equator was seen as having a particularly special importance because of the two points where it crosses the circle of the zodiac: for these two points are the equinoxes, that is, the places where the sun, in its movement along the zodiac, appears to be on the first day of spring and the first day of autumn. Thus the celestial equator was responsible for defining the seasons, and hence had a very concrete significance in addition to its abstract astronomical meaning.

It is this phenomenon of the precession of the equinoxes that provides the key to unlocking the secret of the astronomical symbolism of the Mithraic tauroctony. For the constellations pictured in the standard tauroctony have one thing in common: namely, they all lay on the celestial equator as it was positioned during the epoch immediately preceding the Greco-Roman "Age of Aries." During that earlier age, which we may call the "Age of Taurus," lasting from around 4,000 to 2,000 B.C., the celestial equator passed through Taurus the Bull (the spring equinox of that epoch), Canis Minor the Dog, Hydra the Snake, Corvus the Raven, and Scorpio the Scorpion (the autumn equinox): that is, precisely the constellations represented in the Mithraic tauroctony.

In the diagram to the left notice that the celestial equator intersects the zodiac in Aries. This was the situation during the "Age of Aries." The sun is here pictured (in Aries) as it was located on the day of the spring equinox in that age.

Here, to the right you can see how the cosmic axis has wobbled, so that the celestial equator intersects the zodiac in Taurus-- the situation during the |"Age of Taurus." The sun is here pictured (in Taurus) as it was located on the day of the spring equinox in that age. In this "Age of Taurus" the celestial equator passed through Taurus, Canis Minor, Hydra, Corvus, and Scorpio: precisely the constellations pictured in the Mithraic bull-slaying icon.

In fact, we may even go one step further. For during the Age of Taurus, when the equinoxes were in Taurus and Scorpio, the two solstices-- which are also shifted by the precession-- were in Leo the Lion and Aquarius the Waterbearer (In the above diagram of the "Age of Taurus," Leo and Aquarius are the northernmost and southernmost constellations of the zodiacal circle respectively-- these were the positions of the summer and winter solstices in that age). It is thus of great interest to note that in certain regions of the Roman empire a pair of symbols was sometimes added to the tauroctony: namely, a lion and a cup. These symbols must represent the constellations Leo and Aquarius, the locations of the solstices during the Age of Taurus. Thus all of the figures found in the tauroctony represent constellations that had a special position in the sky during the Age of Taurus.

The Mithraic tauroctony, then, was apparently designed as a symbolic representation of the astronomical situation that obtained during the Age of Taurus.

Answer for yourself: But what religious significance could this have had, so that the tauroctony could have come to form the central icon of a powerful cult?

The answer to this question lies in the fact that the phenomenon of the precession of the equinoxes was unknown throughout most of antiquity: it was discovered for the first time around 128 B.C. by the great Greek astronomer Hipparchus. Today we know that the precession is caused by a wobble in the earth's rotation on its axis. However, for Hipparchus-- because he held to the ancient geocentric cosmology in which the earth was believed to be immovable-- what we today know to be a movement of the earth could only be understood as a movement of the entire cosmic sphere. In other words, Hipparchus's discovery amounted to the discovery that the entire universe was moving in a way that no one had ever been aware of before! But this is not quite true because my research into Egyptian religion has proved beyond a shadow of any doubt that the Hyskos Pharoah

Kings, who are, by many, linked to the Patriarchs of the Old Testament, were well aware of this "precession of the equinoxes" and this was the prime reason for the existence of the two divisions of Egypt which were based more on religious differences (Taurus versus changing to Aries/Lamb). It can be shown, and is being show by archeology as well as Egyptologists today that the movement toward monotheism within Egypt by Moses and other Pharaohs is connected to the realization by them that the One God is responsible for not only the creation of the cosmos but the changing and moving of it as well. What is important for us to note is that BOTH Egypt and Asia Minor noticed the same things in the heavens; that Taurus was being replaced by Aires and this alteration of "Taurus" centered worship in Egypt was not easy to change. Thus the Exodus to separate from and purify a religions which saw that God was doing a new thing in the heavens. Good books like A. Osman's Out Of Egypt and Ralph Ellis' Jesus The Last Of The Pharoah's will show you in detail the real story behind our Old Testaments and how this secret knowledge is the background for many Old Testament events of which we read not fully understanding the dynamics behind what motivated them. Be not mistaken...once you read this then the implications the the religion presented in the New Testament is nothing less than a continuation of astro-worship.

At the time Hipparchus made his discovery, Mediterranean intellectual and religious life was pervaded by astrological beliefs. It was widely believed that the stars and planets were living gods, and that their movements controlled all aspects of human existence. In addition, at this time most people believed in what scholars call "astral immortality;" that is, the idea that after death the human soul ascends up through the heavenly spheres to an afterlife in the pure and eternal world of the stars. In time, the celestial ascent of the soul came to be seen as a difficult voyage, requiring secret passwords to be recited at each level of the journey. In such circumstances, Hipparchus's discovery would have had profound religious implications. A new force had been detected capable of shifting the cosmic sphere: was it not likely that this new force was a sign of the activity of a new god, a god so powerful that he was capable of moving the entire universe?

Hipparchus's discovery of the precession made it clear that before the Greco-Roman period, in which the spring equinox was in the constellation of Aries the Ram, the spring equinox had last been in Taurus the Bull. Thus, an obvious symbol for the phenomenon of the precession would have been the death of a bull, symbolizing the end of the "Age of Taurus" brought about by the precession. And if the precession was believed to be caused by a new god, then that god would naturally become the agent of the death of the bull: hence, the "bull-slayer."

This, is the origin and nature of Mithras the cosmic bull-slayer. His killing of the bull symbolizes his supreme power: namely, the power to move the entire universe, which he had demonstrated by shifting the cosmic sphere in such a way that the spring equinox had moved out of Taurus the Bull.

Given the pervasive influence in the Greco-Roman period of astrology and "astral immortality," a god possessing such a literally world-shaking power would clearly have been eminently worthy of worship: since he had control over the cosmos, he would automatically have power over the astrological forces determining life on earth, and would also possess the ability to guarantee the soul a safe journey through the celestial spheres after death.

That Mithras was believed to possess precisely such a cosmic power is in fact proven by a number of Mithraic artworks depicting Mithras in various ways as having control over the universe. For example, one scene shows a youthful Mithras holding the cosmic sphere in one hand while with his other hand he rotates the circle of the zodiac.

THE ORIGIN OF "THE CROSS"...AND THE CRUCIFIXION OF THE SUN IN THE HEAVENS ... THE LINK WITH CHRISTIANITY

Above we "hinted" as what we will now discuss in detail.

As a result, the celestial equator was often described in ancient popular literature about the stars. Plato, for example, in his dialogue Timaeus said that when the Creator of the universe first formed the cosmos, He shaped its substance in the form of the letter X (a cross), representing the intersection of the two celestial circles of the zodiac and the celestial equator. This cross-shaped symbol was often depicted in ancient art to indicate the cosmic sphere.

In fact, one of the most famous examples of this motif is a Mithraic stone carving showing the so-called "lion-headed god," whose image is often found in Mithraic temples, standing on a globe that is marked with the cross representing the two circles of the zodiac and the celestial equator and their intersection forming a "cross." Notice if you will this "Lion-headed god standing on globe with crossed circles."

The celestial equator and the ecliptic intersect at two points, [forming a cross], and these two crosses or points are the equinoxes: the places where the sun, in its movement through the zodiac as seen from the earth, and is understood as the first days of spring and autumn. But understand this was understood to happen not on earth; the sun was submitted to these "crosses" in the heavens. The sun was crucified in the heavens. The ancients understood that the seasons were changed and determined by the travel of the sun; either above or below the equator. When the sun, which was though to be dead in winter with the longer days of darkness, rose above the equator, then the sun was subjected to this "cross" in its movement above the celestial equator in its elliptical orbit; the sun was though to be subjected to this "cross" or "crucified" and after 3 days, when the sun remained at the lowest point in the horizon and thought to be dead, it miraculously began it upward trajectory and with it the promise of spring and new life was on its way. The ancients understood this as the "sun being crucified on the cross."

But it does not stop here.

As stated above Mithra was connected with the killing of winter, Taurus the bull. The rite of initiation into Mithraic cults involved the slaying of a bull over a naked body of the candidate in such a way that the blood of the bull poured over him. He was "washed in the blood of the bull." The baptism by the blood of a bull (taurobolium, for the rich) or the blood of a ram (criobolium, for the poor) was a means of attaining a second birth. The pits around Mithraic altars suggest that the worshippers were bathed ritually in hot blood. If no bull was available, other animals were used. If a lamb was used they were "washed in the blood of the lamb." In the course of this gruesome ceremony the initiate was to drink some of the blood, thereby gaining the courage and strength of the bull or whatever animal that was sacrificed. They believed in the eating of this representative of the God they obtained the very attributes of the God. This was followed by a Eucharistic meal of the bull or animal's flesh.

The divine meal is more frequently portrayed than any other scene except the bull slaying. Besides bull meat, other animals were used, or bread and fish were used as substitutes for meat, and wine for blood. This was their Eucharist! They believed that by eating the bull's flesh and drinking its blood they would be "born again" just as life itself had once been created from the bull's blood. It was believed that the partaking of the Eucharistic sacrament ensured Eternal Life, the immediate passing after death, to the bosom of Mithra, there to tarry in bliss until the judgment.

Mithras was born of the Sun God and a virgin mother, called "the Mother of God, on December 25th. Mithras was considered the savior of mankind, and stories abound of his healing the sick, raising the dead, and performing miracles. He was seen by his devotees as the "mediator between Heaven and earth and was associated with a "holy trinity." He remained celibate until the ripe old age of 64. The name "Mithras" comes from the Persian word for "contract;" being known as "the keeper of the covenant."

Here in the end we may sense a profound kinship between Mithraism and Christianity.

For early Christianity also contained at its core an ideology of cosmic transcendence. Nowhere is this better expressed than in the opening of the earliest gospel, Mark. There, at the beginning of the foundation story of Christianity, we find Jesus, at the moment of his baptism, having a vision of "the heavens torn open." Just as Mithras is revealed as a being from beyond the universe capable of altering the cosmic spheres, so here we find Jesus linked with a rupture of the heavens, an opening into the numerous realms beyond the furthest cosmic boundaries. Perhaps, then, the figures of Jesus and Mithras are to some extent both manifestations of a single deep longing in the human spirit for a sense of contact with the ultimate mystery.

As the final pagan religion of the Roman Empire, Mithraism paved a smooth path for Christianity by transferring the better elements of paganism to this new religion (Cumont, The Oriental Religions in Roman Paganism).

The absurdity with which Christianity enveloped Roman paganism was characterized by the early Church writer Tertullian (160-220 A.D.), who noticed that the pagan religion utilized baptism as well as bread and wine consecrated by priest. Tertullian wrote that Mithraism was inspired by the devil, who wished to mock the Christian sacraments in order to lead faithful Christians to hell.

Mithraism was similar to Christianity in:

- Its ideals of humility and brotherly love
- Believer's baptism
- Communion
- The use of holy water
- The adoration of shepherds at Mithra's birth
- The adoption of Sundays over the Sabbath
- The choice of December 25th as the birthday of the god and its holy days
- The belief in the immortality of the soul
- The last judgment
- The resurrection from the dead

These similarities make conversion of its followers to Christian doctrine very easy!

Traces of paganism still present in Christianity prove that Christians did borrow from paganism, and we know from the statements of the Church Fathers that they saw many of the same concepts in Christianity as in the pagan religions which already existed when Christianity was invented.

The doctrines of Christianity are an outgrowth from the older faiths, in many ways similar, religions, with similar doctrines and principles. Only priests and preachers who love their salary more than the cause of truth, historically a very large class, or who are deplorable ignorant of history, have the effrontery to continue the pretense that Christianity was uniquely revealed. But truth has a way of emerging in spite of efforts to evade, ignore, or invalidate it.

You will have to decide who is mocking whom?

COMPARISONS OF THE "CHRISTIAN SAVIOR" AND THE VARIOUS SUN-MYTHS OF THE GENTILE NATIONS

It is imperative that you do not forget what you have just read and studied out because such information is foundational to the proofs which follow.

We must again call to mind that..."Personification of nature and the Sun led to glorification of nature and the sun which eventually led to deification of the Sun?

Let us compare the history of the "Savior" which we have already seen, with that of the Sun, as it is found in the Vedas. Again, the Vedas is the general name for the body of ancient Sanskrit hymns (India/Hindu) with the accompanying comments, believed by the Hindus to have been received by Brahma, and on which the Brahmanical systerm is based (a Brahma is a member of the sacred or sacerdotal caste among the Hindus). We are beginning with the oldest recorded religious history known to man. One can follow in the Vedic hymns, step by step, the development which changes the Sun from a mere luminary into a " Creator," "Preserver," "Ruler" and "Rewarder of the World "—in fact, into a Divine or Supreme Being.

- The first step leads us from the mere light of the Sun to that light which in the morning wakes man from sleep, and seems to give new life, not only to man, but to the whole of nature. He who wakes us in the morning, who recalls all nature to new life, is soon called "The Giver of Daily Life."
- Secondly, by another and bolder step, the Giver of Daily Light and Life becomes the giver of light and life in general. He who brings light and life today, is the same who brought light and life on the first of days. As light is the beginning of the day, so light was the beginning of creation, and the Sun, from being a mere light-bringer or life-giver, becomes a Creator, and, if a Creator, then soon also a Ruler of the World.
- Thirdly, as driving away the dreaded darkness of the night, and likewise as fertilizing the earth, the Sun is conceived as a "Defender" and kind "Protector" of all living things. In reality the Sun becomes the Savior of mankind!
- Fourthly, the Sun sees everything, both that which is good and that which is evil; and how natural therefore that the evil-doer should be told that the Sun sees what no human eye may have seen, and that the innocent, when all other help fails him, should appeal to the sun to attest his guiltlessness!

Let us examine now, says Prof. Muller, from whose work we have quoted before, a few passages (from the Rig-Veda) illustrating every one of these perfectly natural transitions.

"In hymn vii. we and the Sun invoked as "The Protector of everything that mores or stands of all that exists."

"Frequent allusion is made to the Sun's power of seeing everything. The stars flee before the all-seeing Sun, like thieves (R. V. vii.). He sees the right and the wrong among men (Ibid.). He who looks upon the world, knows also all thoughts in men (Ibid.)."

"As the Sun sees everything and knows everything, he is asked to forget and forgive what he alone has seen and knows (R V. iv.)."

"The Sun is asked to drive away illness and bad dreams (R. V. x.)."

"Having once, and more than once, been invoked as the life-bringer, the Sun is also called the breath or life of all that moves and rests (R. V. i.); and lastly, he becomes the maker of all things, by whom all the worlds have been brought together (R. V. x.), and . . . Lord of man and of all living creatures."

"He is the God among gods (R. V. i.); he is the divine leader of all the gods (R. V. viii.)."

"He alone rules the whole world (R. V. v.)." "The laws which he has established are firm (R. V. iv.), and the other gods not only praise him (R. V. vii.), but have to follow him as their leader (R. V. v.)" (Muller, Origin of Religions, pp. 264-268).

PROVING THAT THE HISTORY OF JESUS CHRIST AS FOUND IN THE NEW TESTAMENT ..."THE CHRISTIAN SAVIOR", THE "TRUE LIGHT," WHICH LIGHTETH EVERY MAN THAT COMETH INTO THE WORLD (Jn. 1:9).....IS SIMPLY THE HISTORY OF THE SUN

In the articles and pages that follow I will address one aspect after another concerning the life of Yeshua as recorded in the New Testament and compare them with the more ancient Pagan Sun myths. Remember we are attempting to come to the answer for a very serious question:

IS GENTILE CHRISTIANITY A DIVINE AND UNIQUE REVELATION FROM GOD...OR IS IT A PIOUS FRAUD BASED UPON THE RETELLING OF SUN-MYTHS?

REMEMBER IN ALL OF THIS "NEGATIVE" INFORMATION AS WE EXPOSE UNTRUTHS....OUR PURPOSE IS TO FIND THE "TRUTH" ABOUT A JEWISH RABBI NAMED YESHUA WHOSE MESSAGE WAS REPENTANCE IN PREPARATION FOR THE KINGDOM OF GOD TO COME.....

PROCEED TO THE EXAMINATION OF THE DATA THE "COMPARISON ARTICLES" CONCERNING THE STORY OF JESUS AS FOUND IN THE NEW TESTAMENT AND THE SUN-MYTHS OF PAGAN NATIONS

THE TRANSFORMATION OF A JEWISH MESSIAH TO A CHRISTIAN CHRIST...THE PAGANIZATION OF THE JEWISH MESSIAH

Belief in the coming of the Messiah has always been a fundamental part of Judaism. Thus, for example, Maimonides counts the belief in the Messiah as one of the thirteen cardinal principles of Judaism. It is a concept that is repeated again and again throughout the length and breadth of Jewish literature.

There have been many people in Jewish history who have claimed to be this Messiah. The most famous, of course, was Jesus. His followers therefore gave him the title Christ. Mashiach — the Hebrew word for Messiah —literally means the "anointed." The Greek word for "anointed" is Christos, and thus, Christ is really just another word for Messiah.

Although Christians claim that Jesus was the Messiah of the Jews, there are a number of important differences between the way the Jew looks at the Messiah, and the way the Christian does. It is most important to know these differences.

THE JEWISH MESSIAH

The Jewish concept of the Messiah is that which is clearly developed by the prophets of the Bible. He is a leader of the Jews, strong in wisdom, power and spirit. It is he who will bring complete redemption to the Jewish people, both spiritually and physically. Along with this, he will bring eternal peace, love, prosperity, and moral perfection to the entire world.

The Jewish Messiah is truly human in origin. He is born of ordinary human parents, and is of flesh and blood like all mortals.

As described by the Prophet (Isaiah 11:2), the Messiah is "full of wisdom and understanding, counsel and might, knowledge and the fear of God." He has a special feeling for justice, or, as the Talmud put it (Sanhedrin 93b), he "smells and judges." He can virtually sense a man's innocence or guilt.

The Prophet (Isaiah 11:4*)* goes on to say that the Messiah will "smite the tyrant with the rod of his mouth, and slay the wicked with the breath of his lips." Evil and tyranny will not be able to stand up before the Messiah.

Still, the Messiah is primarily a king of peace. Jewish Sages therefore teach (Derech Eretz Zuta : 1): "When the Messiah is revealed to Israel, he will only open his mouth for peace. It is thus written (Isaiah 52:7), 'How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of the messenger who announces peace.' "

The first task of the Messiah is to redeem Israel from exile and servitude. In doing so, he will also redeem the entire world from evil. Oppression, suffering, war and all forms of godlessness will be abolished. Mankind will thus be perfected, and man's sins against God, as well as his transgression against fellow man, will be eliminated. All forms of warfare and strife between nations will also vanish in the Messianic age.

Most important, the Jewish Messiah will bring all peoples to God. This is expressed most clearly in the Alenu prayer, which concludes all three daily services:

> "May the world be perfected under the kingdom of the Almighty. Let all humans call upon Your Name and turn all the world's evildoers to You. Let everyone on earth know that every knee must bow to You . . . and let them all accept the yoke of Your kingdom."

We find a very similar thought in the High Holy Day Amidah, where we pray, "Let all creatures bow before You. May they form a single band and do Your will with a perfect heart."

The Jewish Messiah will thus have the task of perfecting the world. He will redeem man from servitude, oppression and his own evil. There will be great material prosperity in the world, and man will be restored to an Eden-like existence, where he can enjoy the fruits of the earth without toil.

In the Messianic age, the Jewish people will dwell freely in their land. There will be an "ingathering of the exiles," when all Jews return to Israel. This will eventually bring all nations to acknowledge the God of Israel and accept the truth of His teachings. The Messiah will thus not only be king over Israel, but, in a sense, ruler over all nations.

Ultimately, redemption comes from God alone, and the Messiah is only an instrument in His hands. He is a human being, consisting of flesh and blood like all mortals. He is, however, the finest of the human race, and as such, must be crowned with the highest virtues that mortal man can attain.

Although the Messiah may achieve the upper limit of human perfection, he is still human. The kingdom of the Jewish Messiah is definitely "of this world."

Judaism is a religion based on a people serving God. It is from the Jew that God's teachings emanate to all humanity. The redemption of Israel must therefore precede that of the rest of mankind. Before God redeems the world, He must redeem His oppressed, suffering, exiled and persecuted people, returning them to their own land and restoring their status.

The ultimate promise, however, is not limited to Israel alone. The redemption of the Jew is closely linked to the emancipation of all humanity as well as the destruction of evil and tyranny. It is the first step in man's return to God, where all mankind will be united into a "single band" to fulfill God's purpose. This is the "Kingdom of the Almighty" in the Messianic Age.

Although the Messiah may occupy a central place in this "Kingdom of Heaven," he is still not the primary figure. This position can only belong to God Himself.

This, in brief, is the concept of the Jewish Messiah.

THE CHRISTIAN CHRIST

The primary figure in Christianity is its Messiah. Its very name indicates that Christianity is completely based on the personality of the Messiah. As mentioned in earlier articles, the name "Christ" comes from Christos, the Greek word for Messiah. The Christians are thus those who make the person of the Messiah central to their teachings.

The first major difference between the Jews and the early Christians was that the Christians believed that the Messiah had already come, while the Jews believed that he was yet to come. At first, this was the main point of controversy.

The Jews had one minor objection to the Christian Messiah, and that was the fact that he had been unsuccessful. Judaism had always taught that the Messiah would redeem Israel in a political sense, and Yeshua had failed to accomplish this. Instead, he had been scourged and humiliated like a common rebel, and finally crucified along with two ordinary thieves.

Answer for yourself: How could the career of Yeshua be reconciled with the glorious picture of the Messiah as taught by the Prophets of Israel?

The early Christians faced this dilemma, and, in justifying Yeshua as the Messiah, readily altered the entire concept. These new Messianic ideas were developed in by the writer of the Gospel of John, and even more so in the Epistles of Paul.

THE TRANSFORMATION OF A JEWISH MESSIAH INTO A CHRISTIAN CHRIST

If we look in these sources, we find a gradual transition. The Messiah of the Jew progressively becomes transformed into the Christ of the Christian. This can be traced in a series of logical steps.

- Yeshua was totally unsuccessful in redeeming the Jews politically, and therefore the early Christians could no longer look upon this as the task of the Messiah. His redemption had to be given a new meaning. They therefore taught that his mission was not to redeem man from political oppression, but only to redeem him from spiritual evil.

- Once the Messiah's mission was redefined, it could also be expanded. Political oppression was a special problem of the Jews, but spiritual evil is worldwide. The early Christians therefore began to teach that Yeshua had come to redeem the whole world (universal perspective). They rejected the view that he would come to redeem the Jewish people and their land first, and only then redeem the rest of the world. The Messiah's reign is therefore universal, but only spiritual. The kingdom of Yeshua is thus "not of this world."

- Yeshua had been scourged and humiliated like a common rebel. His followers felt, however, that he had only preached repentance and good works, and therefore could not be a common rebel. They were then faced with an important and difficult question. If Yeshua was the true Messiah, then why did God allow him to undergo such frightful suffering? Why was he subjected to crucifixion, the most painful and shameful death of all? Why did God not save him from all this?

For his followers, there could only be one answer. The fact that Yeshua was scourged, humiliated and crucified had to be the will of God. But still, another question remained. If Yeshua did not sin, what purpose could there be in his suffering and death?

For this, the early Christians found a most ingenious solution. The only answer could be that he suffered and died because of the sins of mankind.

Answer for yourself: But the question was still not completely answered. Had there not been suffering and death before this? Why did Christ himself have to suffer and die? What sin was so great that it required his sacrifice?

- The early Christians answered that this was required to atone for the sin of Adam. All mankind is descended from Adam, and therefore, all inherit his sin. This "original sin" cannot be erased with good works, or even with ordinary human suffering. The only thing that could eliminate it was the death of Yeshua.

The Messiah of the Christians therefore willingly went to a disgraceful and painful death in order that humanity might be redeemed from this "original sin." Mankind is therefore redeemed from evil, sin, suffering, death and the powers of Satan only by the blood of Christ.

Support for this belief was found in the 53rd chapter of Isaiah, where the Prophet speaks of God's suffering servant, who "bore the sin of many." But take special note of what I say next. Such concepts cannot be found in the Jewish Tanakh but only in the altered Greek translations of it! Those who taught such concepts had to look outside the Jewish Bible to find such "twisted Scriptures" that would allow such a belief. Instead of interpreting it to refer to the persecuted people, Israel, the early Christians claimed that it referred to Yeshua (read our articles on Essene corruption of the Jewish Scriptures when they were translated as well as our series on Isaiah 53 for proof of what I say).

Answer for yourself: But still the question remained, how could the career of the Redeemer end in such a shameful death?

The story had to be given a sequel. Such an epilogue was found in another traditional Jewish belief, namely, that of the Resurrection of the Dead. The early Christians therefore taught that Yeshua had risen from the dead, and furthermore, that he was the first one to do so. Therefore Yeshua was not mortal like other men.

- Yeshua' followers could not bring themselves to say that God had forced this suffering and death upon His Messiah. Therefore, they had to say that the will of the Messiah was exactly the same as the will of God, even when it came to his crucifixion. But how could a mere mortal undertake such suffering? The early Christians replied that Yeshua was not a mere mortal. Since his will was so uniquely related to that of God, he had to be related to God in some special way.

- During his lifetime, Yeshua often spoke of God as "my Father in Heaven." For the Jews, this was a common poetic expression, and one that is still used in Jewish prayers. For the pagan gentiles, however, it had a much more literal connotation. The Greeks already had legends about men who had been fathered by gods who had visited mortal human women. Legends like these had even sprung up about such eminent men as Plato, Pythagoras, and Alexander the Great. Why should Yeshua be any less? They therefore interpreted his poetic expression quite literally, to mean that he had an actual genetic relationship with God. Yeshua therefore became the "son of God," conceived when the Holy Ghost visited Mary. As the "son of God," Yeshua was not susceptible to sin or even death.

The death of Yeshua was therefore only temporary. The only reason why it was needed at all was to atone for the sin of Adam. His followers taught that Yeshua was resurrected for eternity and ascended to heaven. There he sits at the "right hand of God," even higher that the angels.

This was the first step toward the deification of Yeshua, and it was not very difficult for the pagan world to take the second step. Yeshua was credited with such statements as (John 10:30), "I and the Father are one." He had also spoken of (Matthew 28:19), "The Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost." It was easy for the paganized Christians to identify Yeshua with the "Son."

Yeshua therefore became God-man—one person with two natures. He is God and man at the same time. This is the Essene's Messiah but not the Messiah of the traditional Jews! Christians therefore soon found themselves speaking of Mary as the "mother of God."

- Still, there were many Messianic prophecies that Yeshua had failed to fulfill. The early Christians therefore taught that he would return to the world again in a "second coming." The Day of Judgment will then occur, and Yeshua, having taken his seat at the "right hand of his Father," will judge every man who has ever lived. Those who believed in him will be delivered, while those who did not will be eternally damned to hell.

It is only after this judgment that Satan will be conquered. Evil will then end, sin will vanish, and death will pass away. The powers of darkness will thus be eliminated, and the kingdom of heaven established.

- In this world, meanwhile, all prayer must be addressed to Yeshua. The Christian therefore concludes every prayer "in the name of Yeshua Christ our Lord." In this sense, Yeshua is the mediator between God and man.

This, in essence, is what the early Christians did to the Jewish concept of the Messiah. The Messiah ceased to be a mere man, and passed beyond the limits of mortality. They taught that man cannot redeem himself from sin, and therefore God, clothed in the form of the Messiah, had to freely shed his own blood to redeem mankind. Since Yeshua did not fulfill the most important Messianic prophecies, they expected him to return to complete this task in a "second coming."

At first, Christians expected that this "second coming" would come very shortly, and prayed that they would see it in their lifetime. When their prayer was not answered, they began to hope that it would come a thousand years after Yeshua' death. This was the millennium or "thousand year kingdom." Finally, after a thousand years passed and Yeshua still had not returned, they postponed his "second coming" to an indefinite time.

We therefore see that the early Christians were forced to radically alter the Jewish concept of the Messiah in order to explain Yeshua' failure. This, compounded with the pagan influence in the early church, gave birth to a Messianic concept totally alien to Judaism.

NO WONDER THE JEWS REJECTED A PAGANIZED MESSIAH

Therefore it is not very difficult to understand why the Jews totally rejected the contentions of Christianity.

First of all, the Jews had a tradition, well supported in the teachings of the Prophets, that the Messiah would bring about major changes in the world. The "spiritual kingdom" did not in any way fulfill these prophecies. The Jews were furthermore unconvinced by the answer of the "second coming" since it was not even hinted at in Biblical literature, but was later written "backwards" into the Gentile Church's New Testament as an attempt to explain the failure of Yeshua to manifest himself as the Messiah of the Jewish Bible.

Thus, first of all, the Jew found absolutely no evidence to support Yeshua' claim to having been the Messiah. On the other hand, Yeshua's lack of success appeared to repudiate it.

Even more important, however, was the fact that the Christians had logically developed their belief in Yeshua in such a manner that they radically altered many of the most basic Jewish beliefs. Even such a basic concept as God's unity was threatened by their teachings. Even if the evidence of Yeshua's Messiahship was more concrete, its logical consequences would have to be rejected.

THE ALTERATION OF G-D'S WORD AS CONTAINED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT...AN ATTEMPT TO TRY TO SUBSTANTIATE CHRISTIAN BELIEFS THAT OPPOSED WHAT THE PROPHETS TAUGHT

The early Christians tried to justify their contention by finding hints of it in the Jewish scriptures. They went over the entire Bible with a fine tooth comb, looking for any evidence, however flimsy, to prove that Yeshua was the Messiah, and that their entire logical structure was in accord with ancient Jewish teachings. In many cases, they were not above using verses out of context, changing texts, and even purposely mistranslating them, in order to prove their point and their "unique" interpretation of the Scriptures. One today would call such actions by this group a "cult." One needs no further evidence than the fact that most modern Christian Bible scholars totally reject almost all the "proofs" of the early Christians. Indeed, some of the best refutations of these "proofs" may be found in contemporary Christian Bible commentaries.

Most important, Christianity tried to set itself up as the new "Israel," and looked upon the Jews as utterly rejected by God. It therefore taught that Judaism was a corrupt and dying religion, with little hope of growth or success.

The Jews, on the other hand, did much more than argue this point with words. They refuted it by embarking upon one of the most creative periods in their history. The entire scope of Talmudic literature was developed essentially during early post-Christian times.

Thus, to the Jews, the strongest refutation of Christianity was the fact that Judaism itself remained alive and vital. The Jew has found that he can both exist and flourish without accepting Christian beliefs. He believes that the Messiah is yet to come, and that at that time, the truth will become known and the Jew will be justified before all the world. To this I concur wholeheartedly. Shalom

"RECOMMENDED READING INTO THE ORIGINS OF GENTILE CHRISTIANITY... OR MODERN SUN WORSHIP"

In an never ending quest to recover the truths about Jesus of Nazareth 2000 years after the rejection of the historical Christ by the Gentile Christian Church in favor of the "Christ of Faith" as taken from their already existing pagan religions as based off their sun-myths and sun-godmen redeemers, one must study to see this tragic event for yourself in order to be convinced of the scope and depth of such a conspiracy to replace truth with lies. Below is a host of books that will absolutely blow you away by what you will both see and learn if you choose to read them. Listed at the beginning are my personal favorites which I highly recommend in hopes of you taking the challenge to investigate and see these "truths" for yourself. As God waits and watches His children stumble in the dark of ignorance, superstition, fable and myth, it is my hope that I can help as a former Pastor to be a good shepherd of His sheep and lead them to the truth and refreshment of His Word and His truth in repentance as we return in total dedication to the Faith Once Given To The Saints...the true Faith of Jesus as it existed 2000 years ago where non-Jews were a part of the Israel of God and not worshipping Jesus as just another in a long line of sun-gods. Only by exposing the sadness and untruths which we have grown up with in the Gentile Christian Church can we "cast out the leaven" and see the path of righteous and true worship clearly. My blessings to all who undertake such a recovery.

BACKGROUND...ESSENE DEVELOPMENT AND EVOLUTION

THEORIES AND DOCUMENTS

Judging by the publicity and discussion which followed the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls in 1947, the casual inquirer might conclude that the existence of the pre-Christian Essene cult was revealed for the first time when a Bedouin boy, in pursuit of a goat, stumbled into a cave and found a mass of documents there.

The truth is that many scholars and historians had dealt with this religious organization in articles, essays, and even in elaborate and scholarly works; that every competent student of western religion knew very well indeed the celebrated passages in Pliny, Philo, and Josephus describing them; and that there were entire schools of German writers during the 19th century who declared that Jesus was an Essene whose simulated death and resurrection had been carefully staged by members of the Order.

Of late many novel hypotheses have been advanced concerning the cult; but few are more intriguing than that set forth by Thomas De Quincey, about the year 1830. This brilliant scholar-critic maintained vehemently in a closely reasoned disquisition that there never was any Essene organization and that the people described by Pliny, Philo, and Josephus were simply the "proto-Christians" gone underground. After pinpointing the startling parallels, he concludes: "If the Essenes were not the early Christians in disguise, then was Christianity, as a knowledge, taught independently of Christ; nay, in opposition of Christ ... Suppose the Essenes a distinct body from the primitive Christians of Palestine.... and you have a deadlier wound offered to Christian faith than the whole army of infidels ever attempted. A parhelion—a double sun—.... would not be more shocking.... than a secondary Christianity not less spiritual, not less divine than the primary, pretending to a separate and even hostile origin" (Essenism and Christianity, Works, Bohn. Vol VIII. Cf. also The Essenes, Writings, 24 vole., Vol. 10, 115-16). With the Dead Sea Scrolls before him, what would De Quincey have written in l950 or at the present time?

Enough material to fill a small library has been produced concerning the Essenes; and yet, in spite of all the advantages available to modern scholarship, one of the most accurate and perspicuous analyses of them yet to see the light is embodied in a long-forgotten pamphlets (Who Is Ann Lee? Mt. Lebanon, N.Y., 1889, 13 pp.) published in 1889 and composed by Frederick William Evans, the last savant of the Shakers—an American cult which carried out the only significant and successful experiment ever made to re-establish Christianity in its pristine form. The author states that "Jesus was an Essene ..."; and that the members of the Order "…

- Were communists, holding property in common
- They were celibate, neither marrying nor giving in marriage

F. W. Evans states: "The Essenians were, many of them, converted on the day of Pentecost, and formed the body of the Jerusalem Church, with its spiritual origin." Allegro *(*The Dead Sea Scrolls, p. 161) accepts this thesis also. And he continues: "As above set forth," the members of the first Christian Church "were Essenes. They loved one another so that they sold their possessions and had all things in common. They forsook the generative life, with its wives and husbands, for Christ's sake and the Gospel's...." Jesus, then, taught celibacy and communism; and the first Jerusalem Church consisted largely of Essenes who came over to Christianity.

Strangely enough, another perspicacious American religious innovator had a remarkably similar name. Warren Felt Evans. who died in 1889, was the great theoretician and prophet of New Thought. Like his namesake, he too was a devout Swedenborgian; and he also made a unique analysis of Jesus and the Essenes. He discussed the "method of healing practiced by Jesus and perhaps also of the mystic Pythagorean sect of the Jews called Essenes . . . to which sect Jesus himself unquestionably belonged" (Primitive Mind-Cure, Boston, 1884, 157-8). Evans states that Luke also was an Essene (Esoteric Christianity, Boston, 1886, 100); and he adds: "Jesus came to do for the world at large, by revealing the sublime wisdom of the ancient mystical sects and brotherhoods, what had been done only for the chosen few in the sacred privacy of the inner recesses of the temples" (Esoteric Christianity, Boston, 1886, 79).

Jesus, then, according to this second Evans, was an Essene; the Essenes were Pythagoreans and the unique mission of Jesus was to reveal the esoteric doctrines of the Essene-Pythagoreans to the world at large.

The surprising thing is not that the Essenes have been well known, but that so very little has been understood concerning their esoteric nature and doctrines. Even more amazing is the fact that although several of their most important documents have long been extant and even widely circulated, not even the most acute scholars ever suspected the true origin of these before 1947; and that to this day a great deal of confusion concerning them continues to persist.

Among the basic Essene documents extant before 1947, The Book of Enoch was the most celebrated; lost for many centuries, a copy of it in Ethiopic was discovered by James Bruce in Abyssinia in 1775. Several other MSS. of the work have since been found. The Book of Jubilees, a drastic revision of the canonical Genesis, was lost in the 13th century but rediscovered in the 18th in various MSS. Both its importance and its Essene origin are now established. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs is another extremely important Essene scripture, which was never lost and which was used widely for two or three centuries by the early Christians as one of their own sacred documents.

In 1896, three MSS., perhaps a thousand years old, which were themselves copies of a far more ancient work, were discovered by Solomon Schechter in the genizah of a Karaite synagogue in Old Cairo. This was published in 1910 under the title Fragments of a Zadakite Work; but now more popularly known as The Damascus Document. The true origin of this remained a mystery until the Dead Sea caves gave up their treasures; since then there has been no doubt that this too is of Essene origin, and it is usually included in any corpus of Dead Sea Scrolls, although for little better apparent reason than would apply equally to the other three documents we have just described. The Damascus Document could have been revised by Karaites just as easily as the other could have been rewritten by Christians. The fact is that all four scriptures bear every imprint of Essene origin.

Since numerous fragments of all have been recovered, some in considerable profusion, there can be no doubt that these were among the most cherished scriptures of the cult, a fact reinforced by the internal evidence. Many scholars have doubted that these three documents were produced by the Qumran cult in anything like the form in which we have known them in spite of the fact that a great many fragments of Enoch have been recovered from the caves. However, if these scriptures are not Essene, just what are they? They certainly are not Pharisaic or Sadducaic; and it is simply incredible that Christians would have composed or completely rewritten such long and extraordinary documents without leaving some evidence of such authorship or revision. They contain no reference to any event subsequent to 60 B.C.E. and they reflect no knowledge of Christianity in any manner whatever. One be advised of this startling fact when he reads of these scrolls and we must consider this internal evidence decisive.

There is no longer any serious doubt among scholars that about the year 68-69, while the Roman armies were reducing Galilee, the Essenes carefully sealed some six hundred of their scrolls in jars, and hid them in almost inaccessible places (Dupont-Sommer, The Essene Writings from Qumran, 3). The cultists never returned (as they must have expected to do), but the caves have been plundered, probably several times (Cf. Yigael Yadin, The Message of the Scrolls, pp. 73-80). Certainly none was intact in 1947. Undoubtedly, the Karaites discovered a number of Essene documents, perhaps in the 9th century, which may have influenced their development. Thus it happened that The Zadokite Fragments were found in a synagogue of this cult. R. H. Charles included The Fragment of a Zadokite Work in his Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament (pp. 785-834). And again, because of his total lack of comprehension concerning the Essenes, he was guilty of several weird misinterpretations. He believed that the document was originally composed between 106 and 57 B.C.E. and then rewritten between 18 and 8 B.C.E. (cf. pp. 785, 787).

Damage to the Essene library has been enormous. Of all the leather scrolls so carefully laid away in 68 or 69, less than a dozen are known by the public to have emerged comparatively intact; and, as Dupont-Sommer remarks, these are, of course, "only a remnant of an immense corpus of literature...." (Dupont-Sommer, The Essene Writings from Qumran, 15). In addition to several books of the Old Testament, at least four major documents, previously unknown and almost complete, were found:

- The Manual of Discipline
- The Habakkuk Commentary
- The War of the Sons of Light with the Sons of Darkness
- The Thanksgiving Psalms

Several lesser works have been translated and published, notably by Theodor Gaster; many others, however, remain unpublished. Thousands of fragments are now on hand, or at least they were before the Six-Day War of 1967, housed in the Jordanian Museum in Jerusalem; the extremely important section 14 of "Levi"—which had always been considered certainly Christian—was found in Cave 4 in 1952. Sec. 14 of "Levi"—in our historical version—reads: "I have learnt from the writings of Enoch that at the last ye will deal ungodly, laying your hands upon the Lord in all malice; and your brethren shall be ashamed of you, and to all the gentiles shall it become a mocking. For our father Israel shall be pure from the ungodliness of the chief priests who shall lay their hands upon the Saviour of the World.... So shall ye bring a curse upon our race for whom came the light of the world, which was given among you for the lighting up of every man. Him shall ye desire to slay, teaching commandments contrary to the ordinances of God." Millar Burrows states (More Light, p. 29) that "the texts from Cave 4 alone will require at least three volumes, one for the biblical and two for the non-biblical texts." Other caves have yielded their own treasure troves; and much material may still be held in secrecy by private persons. A vast quantity of Essene scripture, therefore, has remained and still remains in concealment. It was particularly frustrating to discover that the Palestine Archeological Museum, which had Section 14 and other portions of "Levi" in its possession, would not permit anyone to photograph them, or even to look at them. Concerning "Levi" and The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Allegro states (Dead Sea Scrolls, p. 120):
"Some parts of this work have long been recognized as Christian in origin ... Just how far Christian interpolation extends…has been a matter of great contention amongst scholars and naturally it was of supreme importance to have pre-Christian copies of any part of this work ... Now from the Qumran library we are able to see fragments of the Testament of Levi in their original Aramaic, and, incidentally, containing a portion of Chapter Fourteen, which has generally been supposed to have been one of the later interpolated sections."

Answer for yourself: What does "interpolated" mean? It simply means "to insert, to foist in, as a spurious word or passage in a manuscript or book; to corrupt by the insertion of new matter". In other words for our understanding this "Levi" from The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs was later "Christianized" and the original intention of the writer lost by the purposeful adulteration of the documents by those who wished to promote "their own" particular "theology." Such "interpolated documents" are basically useless for Christian study as they are biased by those who "altered" them.

It is not necessary for us to relate how the Arabs found the Scrolls, sold them, and went searching for more.

Nor need we describe the excavations carried out at Khirbet-Qumran and in the caves near the Dead Sea, which establish that the facilities there constituted the headquarters of the Society. including its cemetery, cisterns for daily baptisms, and a commodious building containing a scriptorium and an upper room where eucharistic meals were celebrated (cf. Mark 14:14, Luke 22:12-13, and Acts 1:13). Archeological evidence, such as coins, pottery, etc., found among the ruins, indicates that the building was erected about the year 104 and occupied until it was severely damaged by an earthquake in 31 B.C.E.; and that, restored in 4 B.C.E., it was reoccupied until about 68, when it was destroyed by fire, and the Essenes as an independent cult ceased to exist. All this has been told and retold; those who wish to pursue the subject further should peruse Millar Burrows' Dead Sea Scrolls and More Light on the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Factual material concerning the Essenes is both external and internal. The former consists of those passages in the writings of ancient contemporaries to which we have referred; and of archeological, paleographical, and philological evidence such as jars in the caves, the pottery and utensils left in the ruins, the excavated graves, the leather on which the Scrolls were written, the script and language used, etc. The decisive internal evidence is found in the documents themselves.

None of the writings could have been copied later than 68 A D.; but all of them were composed much earlier. Carbon 14 tests indicate that some of the skins on which the Scrolls are inscribed date from about 33 A.D. (Burrows, Dead Sea Scrolls, 52, 81); but the internal evidence shows that none originated later than 60 B.C.E.

I cannot stress the importance of this fact in your interpretation of the contents of these documents as not everything written "refers to Jesus" in spite of the desire of many to make it so.

Among a people totally dedicated to religion, the Essenes, from their proto-beginnings to the end of their career, were the most fervent, pietistic, and dedicated. Furthermore, after the consolidation of Yahwism, the Essenes alone were able to absorb the essence of other religious systems and so create a new and powerful religious synthesis of their own.

SCHOLARLY DIVERSITY

It may be for these reasons that several Jewish scholars have found it difficult to accept the Essene documents. Solomon Zeitlin, for example, wrote a number of articles maintaining that the Dead Sea Scrolls are medieval Christian forgeries ("The Fiction of the Recent Discoveries Near the Dead Sea" in the Jewish Quarterly Review, 1953, 85-115, and many other articles by the same author), a position with which E. L. Sukenik radically disagrees ("The Scrolls: A Reply to Dr. Zeitlin," Jewish Chronicle, Nov. 17, 1950, 13). J.L. Teicher, echoing De Quincey, and agreeing with various other writers, maintained that the Essenes were none other than a cult of Christians ("The Essenes," Studia Patristica (Berlin), 1 1957, 540-545; "The Dead Sea Scrolls," Journal of Jewish Studies, 1951, 67-99; "The Damascus Fragments and 43; and other articles by the same author); Isaac Rabinowitz declared that all the Scrolls were composed before 130 B.C.E. ("A Reconsideration of 'Damascus' and '390 Years' in the 'Damascus' ('Zadokite') Fragments," in the Journal of Biblical Literature, 1954, 11-35; and various other articles by the same author), and so could have had little or no direct influence upon Christianity. M. H. Gottstein stated that the Covenanters could not have been Essenes at all, because, in the former, membership was permanent, whereas at Qumran—he , believed—periodic renewals were required ("Anti-Essene Traits in the Dead Sea Scrolls," Vestus Testamentum, 1954, 141-147). Other Jewish scholars have advanced theories which reflect even greater diversity of opinion.

Nor have Christian writers failed to propose novel hypotheses. The eminent Dupont-Sommer, for example, declared that The Damascus Document, even though it certainly portrays an organization based on private property, was written about 60 B.C.E., and that the Teacher mentioned therein is the same as in The Habakkuk

Commentary (The Essene Writings from Qumran, 118-119). Upton C. Ewing, in a variation of the De Quincey theory, believed that all the Christological and Messianic references in Essene literature point only to the founder of Christianity; that they were, therefore, genuinely prophetic; and that there was only a single cult of this kind in Palestine, which might be called Essene-Christian (The Prophet of the Dead Sea Scrolls, 132-3, etc.). Duncan Howlett theorized that the Essene community resulted from a division among the Pharisees after John Hyrcanus turned against them (The Essenes and Christianity, 51-54); and that, therefore, in spite of the evidence in Josephus, the cult could have had no existence preceding 110 B.C. Raymond E. Brown expressed the widespread opinion that the Dead Sea Scrolls are closely interlocked with the Johannine literature of the New Testament (The Scrolls and the New Testament, edited by Kristin Stendahl, 183-207), in spite of the diversity in socioeconomic principles. There have even been writers who tried to identify the Essenes with the professional assassins known as the Sicarii and with the revolutionaries known as the Zealots (Burrows, The Dead Sea Scrolls, 294-96). In fact, the conclusions which investigators have reached concerning the Men of the Community are indeed wonderful for their number, variety, and mutual contradictions.

While many modern scholars ignore the similarities linking the Dead Sea Scrolls to the Synoptic Gospels, there are notable exceptions. Dupont-Sommer *(*The Dead Sea Scrolls, p. 99) declared: "The Galilean master, as He is presented in the writings of the New Testament, appears in many respects as an astonishing reincarnation of the Master of Justice." Edmund Wilson stated:*(*The Scrolls from the Dead Sea, p. 97-98): "The monastery" (at the Dead Sea) "with its oven and its inkwells, its mills and its cesspool, its constellation of sacred fonts and unadorned graves of its dead, is, perhaps, more than Bethlehem or Nazareth, the cradle of Christianity." In 1956, John Allegro in a series of broadcasts over the BBC hinted broadly that the Essene leader had "been crucified...." (The Treasure of the Copper Scroll, p. 29). In his Dead Sea Scrolls, p. 161, he stated that "it seems very likely that the Jewish Christian Church won its first adherents from the Essenes, and this, again, would account for its possession of so much Qumran thought, and, perhaps, literature." The somewhat more conservative Theodore Gaster said that the Essenes "mirror a form of religious organization many elements of which were adopted by the primitive Church" *(*The Dead Sea Scriptures, p. 12). And it is interesting to note that long ago a number of German scholars, in extraordinarily learned and elaborate treatises,' set forth, with slight variations, the thesis that at the time of his passion Jesus was still an Essene in good standing; that the crucifixion involved only a simulated death, for which Jesus had been thoroughly prepared by previous rehearsals and by the administration of potent drugs; that members of the Order removed him from the tomb and nursed him back to strength; that on a few occasions (still scarcely recognizable because of his recent ordeal), Jesus presented himself to his disciples, who were thus persuaded that an actual resurrection had occurred. After addressing them for the last time on a mountain side, he walked up into a mist; and this became the assumption of his physical body into heaven. Actually, he simply retired to an Essene commune, where he remained thereafter in concealment.

Interestingly enough, before his death in Palestine, James Pike, former Episcopal bishop, wrote a scenario intended for motion-picture production, which followed a close approximation of this story-line.

Dr. Hugh J. Schonfield (The Passover Plot, pp. 160-181) restates the theory of a simulated death and resurrection, which he believes to have been planned entirely by Jesus himself and carried out with the aid of accomplices. He gives Jesus no credit for supernaturalist expectations; he believes that his co-conspirators first placed him in, and then removed him from, the tomb; and does not believe that any guards were stationed there. If this hypothesis is true, then was he indeed what the Pharisees called him, a deceiver and an impostor.

THE ESSENE'S DIVERGENCE FROM JUDAISM

Like many other cults, the Essenes began by accepting the dominant religion and its Scriptures; but before very long, the Essenes were creating new and divergent revelations, which to them in time became superior to the orthodox (Torah, Tanakh). Martin Larson, in his three books on the Essenes, chronicles this divergence of Essene though from normative Judaism. Following the Maccabee victory and the assumption of the High Priesthood by the non-Zadok Hasmoneans, the Zadok priests retired to the wilderness to await the coming of the LORD for both their vindication and judgment on the apostate Israel. This rejection of normative Judaism resulted in the production of their own literature that pronounces judgment on the corrupt "wicked priests" and at the same exonerates these "new covenanters." This production of "new revelation" for self-seeking purposes by this Zadok-splinter group of "pious ones" or Essenes is precisely what was done by Swedenborg, Joseph Smith. and Mary Baker Eddy. Every successful prophet builds upon' but remakes, the doctrines and practices accepted by his prospective converts. An attractive bridge is thus constructed which serves as a passageway over the gulf separating the abandoned habitations from the new-built mansions. Thus, almost every new faith possesses in reality two related but also disparate scriptures: first, the established and conventional; and, second, the new revelations, the distinctive possession of the avant-garde. Thereupon, the cult takes the next step: it claims also a unique power to interpret the old canon. Thus self-designated as the only one capable of interpreting the Jewish Scriptures properly, the new communion becomes independent. Almost from the beginning, the Essenes began the creation of new scriptures; and they believed with realizing certainty that their leader, known in successive generations as the Teacher of Righteousness, the Master of Justice, the Man Who Reneweth the Law, etc., alone could reveal the esoteric and prophetic meanings in the orthodox Jewish revelations.

The Essenes were certain that their scriptures, especially The Book of Enoch, possessed unquestionable priority and supremacy. The unparalleled authority of such works lay in their exact prophecies, accurate to the date of composition, which the amazed communicant could easily understand. These already-accomplished predictions were then followed by others for which similar and imminent fulfillment was confidently expected. This is known as the pseudepigraphic method; and behind it lies a long and interesting history.

When the Jewish priests consolidated their power after the return from Babylon, they outlawed all new prophecy (Zech. 13:3-6), since this could disturb the public tranquillity and discredit the incumbent priesthood. The purpose of this proscription was to freeze the existing canon. The ingenuity of man, however, is not so easily thwarted; and effective techniques were developed by which new revelations could be promulgated. The ban against prophecy gave rise to the literary form known as the pseudepigraphic literature and apocalypse, which was to play so large a role for several centuries in Jewish life.

The method was daring: a fervent prophet with an irrepressible message composed a '`revelation" which he attributed to some ancient personage, provided a suitable historical setting, delineated history up to his own day under easily understood symbolisms, and then, relying on the credit established by this historical accuracy, he predicted the most astounding catastrophes for the future, especially an eschatological cataclysm. Daniel is a classic example of this literary form: and it is interesting to note that Josephus based his own belief in the existence of providence on the remarkable prophecies contained in this document, which, he says, could not have been made had not God actually revealed the future to this writer. The various portions of Enoch were all said to have been written on Heavenly Tablets many centuries before; but the crucial and final passages predicted an imminent and apocalyptic catastrophe and the establishment of the Essene kingdom.

The Chasids, the Essenes, and the Pharisees became masters of the pseudepigraphic method; and, by its use, composed an entire corpus of extraordinary literature, edited by R. H. Charles and published in 1913 as The Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament.

CONCLUSION

This overview has hopefully opened your eyes to the very difficult subject of the study of the Dead Sea Scrolls. It is not as simple as Pliny, Philo, or Josephus might make it sound. The Essenes separated from normative Judaism and eventually, in reaction against their rejection as rightful priests, would end up rejecting Judaism as they knew it, and in the process, produce a literature that "saw things from their perspective" and it is this literature as well as "prophecy" which would later enter into the Jesus Movement as oral traditions which later would be applied to him. Understand as stated, that no new literature was written following 60 B.C.E. and that all later interpretations of Jesus by the Christian Church would draw heavily upon these "new revelations" culminating from the Essene religious synthesis. The question that must be answered by the reader is simple: "Were these revelations from God or were they more in keeping with sour-grapes-theology since the Essenes were rejected from the Priesthood by the powers that ruled in Jerusalem"?

The only way to discern this for sure is to examine their literature and see if it is possible to detect if it is "unique and Divine revelation" or if it is nothing more than "borrowed theology from prior pagan religions." "Impossible," you say? Well, you better read what comes next if you want to know for sure.

Shalom.

THE ESSENE INFLUENCE AT ALEXANDRIA ON THE TRANSLATION OF THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES INTO GREEK (LXX)

Answer for yourself: Why did Christianity prosper, and why was Jesus of Nazareth believed to be a divine incarnation and Saviour when no such teachings can be found in the Jewish Masoretic Text of the Tanakh?

There were many causes for this, but as we can devote volumes to the subject, I will try to treat it briefly.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE ESSENES AND THEIR RELIGIOUS BELIEF SYSTEM ON THE NEW TESTAMENT

For many centuries before the time of Jesus there lived a sect of religious monks known as Essenes, or Therapeutae. Numerous bodies of ascetics (Therapeutae), especially near Lake Mareotis, devoted themselves to discipline and study, abjuring society and labor, and forgetting it is said, the simplest wans of nature, in contemplating the hidden wisdom of the Scriptures. Eusebius even claimed them as Christians and some of the forms of monasticism (by Christians) were evidently modeled after the Therapeutae" (Smith's Bible Dictionary, art, "Alexandria").

Answer for yourself: What happened to the Essenes, for after all, we have their existing theological literature from the Dead Sea Scroll?

"An in-depth study of early church history will show you that the Essenes entirely disappeared from history shortly after the time assigned for the crucifixion of Jesus"...Christian Ginsburg, The Essenes: Their History And Doctrines,1864.

Simply said these Essenes became believers and followers of Jesus and entered the Jesus Movement after his crucifixion. One should not forget that what began as a righteous separation from the Temple by the Zadok priests in the early second century B.C.E. would later evolve into the current "Essenes" of Jesus' day. The word "Zadok" in Hebrew means:

6659 Tsadowq- Zadok="righteous";

Zadok was the high priest, son of Ahitub of the house of Eleazar the son of Aaron, and 11th in descent from Aaron; he joined David after Saul's death and supported him against Absalom and Adonijah; and later anointed Solomon as king

Acts 6:7 7 And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith. (KJV)

These priests were not the traditional Sadducees of the day in league with Rome. These were the Essenic residue of the Zadok priesthood which no longer had control or ties with the Temple. There were thousands of them, and their monasteries were to be counted by the score. C.F.D. Moule, of page 13 of his The Birth Of The New Testament, says: "...we have some idea, through the accounts of the Essenes in Philo and Josephus, and recently, through the Qumran writings of how differently a sectarian, but still priestly, group might be behaving at the same time. Evidently the Qumran sect maintained a priesthood and a ritual organization."

Many have asked the question, "What became of these priestly Essenes?" If we examine this group and their religious beliefs we find:

- That they were expecting the advent of an *Angel-Messiah
- That they considered Jesus of Nazareth to be this Angel-Messiah following his crucifixion in the similar way as had been their teacher of righteousness previously
- That they came over to Christianity in a body (Acts 6..above); and,
- That they brought the legendary histories of the former Angel-Messiahs as taken from their sun-myths and applied these to Jesus

The origin of the sect known as Essenes is enveloped in mist, and will probably never be revealed fully. To speak of all the different ideas entertained as to their origin would make a volume of itself, we can therefore but glance at the subject. I am indebted to many authors for their informative books on the Essenes who have given us the ability to understand the religious climate of the first century in Palestine; authors like James Charlesworth, Lawrence Schiffman, A. DuPont-Summer, John Allegro, Hugh Schonfield, Millar Burrows, Geza Vermes, Hershel Shanks, and especially Martin Larson for his excellent treatment of the Essenes and their evolution as a sect within Judaism of the Second Temple Period in his many books [The Story Of Christian Origins, The Essene Christian Faith, The Essene Heritage, On The Religion Of The Occident].

What escapes most Christian writers today is that the Essenes contemporary with the Jesus era are completely different in theology and scope from the original Zaddok Priests of Qumran from the early second century B.C.E. which were Torah believers. What began as a righteous "separatist movement" by the Zadok priesthood since being prevented from returning to their rightful priesthood following Israel's victory over Antiochus Epiphanies, they protested the Hasmoneans' control of the Temple and possession of the Priesthood by separating from the Temple cult and beginning a "New Israel" and a "New Covenant" in the desert of Qumran. Sadly, what began as a righteous movement of Judaism will culminate in the days of Jesus and following in a synchronistic Phythagorean-Buddhist-Jewish sect containing a synthesis of religious beliefs built upon astrology and sun-worship mixed with their Jewish heritage; many of these "Essene" beliefs deviated significantly from conservative Torah faith and the traditional Messianic hope. On must look deeper than the superficial accounts of the Essenes provided by Pliny, Philo, and Josephus to acquaint oneself with such facts, as their accounts are somewhat superficial in many aspects and tend to provide only summaries of the sect and their beliefs. In-depth theological analysis of their beliefs is not possible from these accounts; one must be quite familiar with the individual writings to be able to understand the nuances of their theology.

Theophilus Gale, who wrote a work called The Court of the Gentiles, Oxford, 1671, undoubtedly hits upon the truth when he says:

> "Now, the origination or rise of these Essenes (Jewish sect of apocalyptic believers) I conceive by the best conjectures I can make from antiquity, to be in or immediately after the Babylonian captivity, though some make them later."

With such an admission one must understand that implied in "Babylonian captivity" is the borrowing of many theological beliefs by the returning Jews from their captors. Needless to say, the Persian victory over the Babylonians only furthered such borrowing of beliefs as these captive Jews were now introduced into the Persian Mysteries and Zoroastrianism. Now it is understandable with the Jewish nation's return by Cyrus to Palestine that another "mixed multitude" was to find its way to Palestine as had once before again possessing a syncretism of beliefs; the irony of the whole story is found that behind the Jewish, Babylonian, and Persian beliefs was an Egyptian religious substrate that had contributed to all of the above as well. The out-working of such beliefs are to be found the the new Apocalyptic of the Jewish faith held by some, but not all. Thus we find in the Judaism that developed after the return from Babylonian captivity the multitude of competing "sects" all with varying religious belief systems.

This new Apocalyptic literature consists of those parts of the Jewish Bible and other Jewish and Christian books that embody an apocalypse, or revelation, given through a symbolic vision of the future. Apocalyptic literature concerns the final period of world history, and depicts the final confrontation between God and the powers of evil. The conflict frequently culminates in a world catastrophe; sometimes a messianic figure is responsible for the triumph over evil. It will be here we find the Essenic Angel-Messiah. Frequently the authors recount history up to their own time in symbolic form (as in Dan. 7:1-8) and then give a vision of the future salvation to be brought by God at the end of the present world. Classic examples are the books of Daniel and Revelation. Passages such as Isaiah 24-27, Zechariah 9-14, and Mark 13 belong to this type of literature. Other examples of literature held sacred by the Essenes are Enoch, Jubilees, and the Apocalypse of Baruch today which can be found in the Jewish Pseudepigrapha, as well as the Apocalypse of Peter in the Apocryphal New Testament.

Apocalyptic literature is usually pseudonymous, written under the name of a famous person. Books such as Daniel and Enoch are examples. But St. John, the author of Revelation in the New Testament, apparently wrote in his own name. Sometimes apocalypses, especially the Apocalypse of Adam and others in the literature of Gnosticism, contain elements drawn from Greek Mythology as well as from the Bible and from Jewish tradition. The New Testament contains all of the above.

Many Christian writers trace the origin of the Essenes all the way back to an origin in India (that is where they picked up many of their sun-myths) and were a sort of Buddhist sect. All of these influences will be amalgamated into a complex theological system that found its latest expression among the Essenes of Qumran in the first century A.D. and their literature attests to it.

Gfrorer, who wrote concerning them in 1835, and said that "the Essenes and the Therapeutae (of Egypt) are the same sect, and hold the same views," was undoubtedly another writer who was touching upon historical ground.

PARALLELS WITH THE NEW TESTAMENT

The identity of many of the precepts and practices of Essenes and those of the New Testament is unquestionable (T.W. Doane, Bible Myths and Parallels In Other Religions, 1882, p. 420).

Essenism urged on its disciples to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness. The Essenes forbade the laying up of treasures upon earth. The Essenes demanded of those who wished to join them to sell all heir possessions, and to divide it among the poor brethren. The Essenes had all things in common, and appointed one of the brethren as steward to manage the common bag. Essenism put all its members on the same level, forbidding the exercise of authority of one over the other, and enjoining mutual service. Essenism commanded its disciples to call no man master upon the earth. Essenism laid the greatest stress upon being meek and lowly in spirit. The Essenes commended the poor in spirit, those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, the merciful, the pure in heart, and the peacemaker. They combined the healing of the body with that of the soul.

They declared that the power to cast out evil spirits, to perform miraculous cures, etc. They taught that such power should be possessed by their disciples as signs of their belief. The Essenes did not swear at all; their answer was yea, yea, and nay, nay. When the Essenes started on a mission of mercy, they provided neither gold nor silver, neither took coats, neither shoes, but relied on hospitality for support. The Essenes though repudiating offensive war, yet took weapons with them when they went on a perilous journey. The Essenes abstained from connubial intercourse! The Essenes did not offer animal sacrifices, but strove to present their bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God, which they regarded as a reasonable service! It was the great aim of the Essenes to live such a life of purity and holiness as to be the temples of the Holy Spirit, and to be able to prophesy.

Many other comparisons might be made, but these are sufficient to show that there is a great similarity between the two. These similarities have led many Christian writers to believe that Jesus, if he did not belong to this order, was influenced by them. Dr. Ginsburg, an advocate of this theory, says :

"It will hardly be doubted that our Saviour himself belonged to this holy brotherhood. This will especially be apparent when we remember that the whole Jewish community, at the advent of Christ, was divided into three parties, the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes, and that every Jew had to belong to one of these sects. Jesus, who, in all things, conformed to the Jewish law, and who was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners, would therefore naturally associate himself with that order of Judaism which was most congenial to his holy nature. Moreover, the fact that Christ, with the exception of once, was not heard of in public until his thirtieth year, implying that he lived in seclusion with this fraternity, and that though he frequently rebuked the scribes, Pharisees and Sadducees, he never denounced the Essenes, strongly confirms this conclusion" (Ginsburg, Essenes, p. 24).

We hear very little of the Essenes after A.D. 40, therefore, when we read of the "primitive Christians," we are reading of Essenes, and others (Ginsburg, Essenes, p. 27).

Ginsburg tell us: "We hear very little of them after A.D. 40; and there can hardly be any doubt that, owing to the great similarity existing between their precepts and practices and those of primitive Christians, the Essenes as a body must have embraced Christianity" (Dr. Ginsburg, Essenes, p. 27).

The similarity of the sentiments of the Essenes, or Therapeutae, to those of the Church of Rome, induced the learned Jesuit, Nicolaus Serarius, to seek for them an honorable origin. He contended therefore, that they were Asideans and derived them from the Rechabites, described so circumstantially in the thirty-fifth chapter of Jeremiah; at the same time, he asserted that the first Christians monks Essenes. (Hardy, Eastern Monachism, p. 358).

There is strong evidence to believe the first Christians were Essenes, or as you are more familiar with the term, "Nazarenes."

Mr. King, Gnostics and their Remains, on page 1 speaking of the Christian sect called "Gnostics," says:

"Their chief doctrines had been held for centuries before (their time) in many of the cities of Asia Minor. There, it is probable, they first came into existence as "Mystae," upon the establishment of a direct intercourse with India under the Seleucidae and the Ptolemies (Egypt). The colleges of Essenes and Megabyzae at Ephesus, the Orphics of Thrace, the Curetes of Crete, are all merely branches of one antique and common religion, and that originally Asiatic.

Again King says:

" The introduction of Buddhism into Egypt and Palestine affords the only true solution of innumerable difficulties in the history of religion (Ibid., p. 6).

Again:

"That Buddhism had actually been planted in the dominions of the Seleucidae and Ptolemies (Palestine belonging to the former) before the beginning of the third century B.C.E., is proved to demonstration by a passage in the Edicts of Asoka, grandson of the famous Chandragupta, the Sandracottus of the Greeks. These edicts are engraven on a rock at Girnur, in Guzerat." Again notice the link to Egypt, in particular we will find Alexandria, Egypt to be of importance in this regard (King, Gnostics and their remains, p. 23).

Eusebius, in quoting from Philo concerning the Essenes, seems to take it for granted that they [the Essenes] and the Christians were one and the same, and from the manner in which he writes, it would appear that it was generally understood so. He says that Philo called them "Worshipers," and concludes by saying:

"But whether he himself gave them this name, or whether at the beginning they were so called, when as yet the name of Christians was not everywhere published, I think it not needful curiosity to sift out" (Ecc. History, lib. 2, ch. xvii).

This celebrated ecclesiastical historian (Eusebius) considered it very probable that the writings of the Essenic Therapeuts in Egypt had been incorporated into the gospels of the New Testament, and into some Pauline epistles.

His words are:

> "It is very likely that the commentaries (Scriptures) which were among them (the Essenes) were the Gospels, and the works of the apostles, and certain expositions of the ancient prophets, such as partly that epistle unto the Hebrews, and also the other epistles of Paul do contain" (Ecc. Hist., lib. 2, ch. xvii).

You need to stop and think about what was just said. The key word was "incorporated"! These Essene Therapeuts did not possess the Gospels in Egypt "after their writing;" but had before their writing much that would be incorporated into these "gospels" when they would be written....this would come from their existing theologies long before Jesus ever lived. In other words, stories and doctrines from these Pythagorean-Buddhist Essenes were later to be ascribed to Jesus which had no historical value or relationship to the real man from Galilee. The synthesis of their Egyptian, Babylonian, and Persian religious beliefs would be filtered through Biblical Judaism and like as before "out jumped this golden-calf" which we call the Christian Jesus today. Instead of understanding Jesus as a Jew we attach to him the theologies of pagan nations never knowing that when reading the New Testament today we are reading a lot of Pythagorean-Buddhist theology from their sun-myths and we think we are reading the truth about the Jesus who really lived. Nothing could be further from the truth!

It would be a serious mistake on your part to assume that the above reference to the "Gospels" included the Four Gospels which most are familiar with today since it can be shown that at the destruction of Qumran and the Essenic library and community in 68 A.D. that these particular "Four Gospels" did not yet exist and that no quotes from them can be found prior to roughly 200 A.D. in the early Church Fathers. You should consider this amazing if they yet existed. Yet understand, many such references in the writings of these Church Fathers came from nothing more than oral tradition or possibly some of the hundreds of conflicting "gospels" possessed by competing sects which were in circulation after the death of Jesus as we are informed by the writer of the Gospel today called by the name of Luke.

THE ANGEL-MESSIAH OF THE ESSENES

"The principal doctrines and rites of the Essenes can be connected with the East, with Parsism, and especially with Buddhism. Among the doctrines which Essenes and Buddhists had in common was that of the Angel-Messiah" (Bunsen, The Angel-Messiah, p. vii).

"The New Testament is the Essene-Nazarene Glad Tidings!" (S.F. Dunlap, The Son of Man, p. iii).

Godfrey Higgins says:

"The Essenes were called physicians of the soul, or Therapeutae; being resident both in Judea and Egypt. they probably spoke or had their sacred books in Chaldee (Babylon)." He goes on to say:

"These Essenes were Pythagoreans, as is proved by all their forms, ceremonies, and doctrines, and they called themselves the sons of Jesse. If the Pythagoreans or Conobitae, as they are called by Jamblicus, were Buddhists, the Essenes then held many beliefs of Buddhism mixed among their own.Many of the Essenes lived in Egypt, on the lake of Parembole or Maria, in monasteries. These are the very places in which we formerly found the Gymnosophists, or Samaneans, or Buddhist priests to have lived ; which Gymnosophistae are placed also by Ptolemy in north-eastern India." Let us stop just a minute to focus on the links we have seen so far that affect the assimilation by the Essenes of other world religions: Egypt, Babylon, Persian, India, and Judaism. The syncretism of religious beliefs is being formed and will find its full expression in the New Testament." He goes on to say:

"Their (the Essenes) parishes, churches, bishops, priests, deacons, festivals are all identically the same (as the Christians). They had apostolic founders ; the manners which distinguished the immediate apostles of Christ; Scriptures divinely inspired; the same allegorical mode of interpreting them, which has since obtained among Christians, and the same order of performing public worship. They had missionary stations or colonies of their community established in Rome, Corinth, Galatia, Ephesus, Phillippi, Colosse, and Thessalonica, precisely such, and in the same circumstances, as were those to whom St. Paul addressed his letters in those places. All the fine moral doctrines which are attributed to the Samaritan Nazarite, and I doubt not justly attributed to him, are to be found among the doctrines of these ascetics" (Higgins, Anacalypsis, vol. i. p. 747).

And Arthur Lillie says in Buddha and Early Buddhism, p. vi:

"It is asserted by calm thinkers like Dean Mansel that within two generations of the time of Alexander the Great, the missionaries of Buddha made their appearance at Alexandria. "In this he was supported by philosophers of the calibre of Schilling and Schopenhauer, and the great Sanscrit authority, Lassen. Renan also sees traces of Buddhist propagandism in Palestine before the Christian era. Hilgenfeld, Muter, Bohlen, King, all admit the Buddhist influence. Colebrooke saw a striking similarity between the Buddhist philosophy and the Pythagoreans. Dean Milman was convinced that the Therapeuts sprung from the "contemplative and indolent fraternities" of India. And, he might have added, the Rev. Robert Taylor in his Diegesis, and Godfrey Higgins in his Anacalypsis have brought strongest arguments to bear in support of this theory"

This is confirmed in the east by the Asoka monuments-in the west by Philo.

Lillie expressly maintains the identity in creed of the higher Judaism and that of the Gymnosophists of India who abstained from the 'sacrifice of living animals', in a word, the Buddhists. It would follow from this that the priestly religion of Babylonia, Palestine, Egypt, and Greece were undermined by certain kindred mystical societies organized by Buddha's missionaries under the various names of Therapeutae, Essenes, Neo- Pythagoreans, Neo-Zoroastrians etc. Thus Buddhism prepared the ground work and the way of Christianity and its interpretation of the Messiah of Israel. (Arthur Lillie, Buddha and Early Buddhism, p. vi).

The doctrine of the "Anointed Angel-Messiah," consisted of :

- 1. The incarnation of a man from heaven...the Angel-Messiah [origin in the sun-myths of Gentile nations]
- 2. The Angel-Messiah as the Creator of the world
- 3. The doctrine of the atoning sacrificial death of the Angel-Messiah through cosmic crucifixion personified on a cross as taken from their sin-myth synthesis (this is not as simple as it sounds because the crucifixion they understood was a personified crucifixion or crossing of orbits of plants and suns...see our website for further understanding and how this concept was later personified and applied to Jesus by the Essenes after his death
- 4. The resurrection on the 3rd day of this Angel-Messiah as determined by the winter solstice and the failure of the sun to rise any higher in the sky for 3 days...again a personification of sun-myths of Gentile nations

What is alarming to those who study enough to see this is that many of the doctrines of Paul can, with more or less certainty, be connected with the Essenes and their Phythagorean -Buddhist-Iranian sun-myths and seem less than a "unique revelation from God." Sad but true in final analysis. It has taken me over 15 years of comprehensive and extensive research to put the puzzle pieces together to see this clearly for myself. Today I see what those courageous men of old tried to tell the masses about the truth of the Christian faith as it has been passed down to us by the Roman juggernaut called the "church." Instead of the faith of Jesus we have a faith derived from sun-myths moulded around him. With the later creation of documents bearing the Apostle's names it is a small miracle than anyone could find the truth about such a matter when the deception has been so extensive. It becomes almost a certainty that Eusebius was right in surmising that Essenic writings have been used by Paul and others who would later write the "gospels" and later apply the Apostle's names to them. The sun-myths were later applied to a Jewish Rabbi and authority was given to them through various writings proposing such beliefs by competing sects to which final authority was later to be given by attaching the names of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John to them.

Now is should be getting very clear to you that is was not Jesus, but Paul who would be the cause of the separation of the Jews from the Christians (Bunsen, Angel-Messiah, p. 240). The later "Gospels," written under such a Pauline and an Essenic influence thereby attesting to the Angel-Messiah instead of a Davidic human Messiah would be the last straw to break the camel's back along with the repudiation of the Torah by the evolving Gentile Christian community. The Jews had their Palestinian Jewish Scriptures preserved that read completely different from the corrupted Greek translation and they looked yet for the Davidic Messiah and not a cosmic sun-godman as taught in the doctrine of the Angel-Messiah. One only needs to read the Gospel of John and compare it with the Jesus of the Synoptic Gospels to see we are talking about two very different persons!

The probability, then, that that sect of vagrant quack-doctors, the Therapeutae, who were established in Egypt and its neighborhood many ages before the period assigned by later theologians as that of the birth of Jesus, were the original fabricators of the writings contained in the New Testament, becomes a certainty on the basis of evidence and the positive statement of the historian Eusebius, that "those ancient Therapeutae were Christians, and that their ancient writings were our gospels and epistles."

The Essenes, the Therapeuts, the Ascetics, the Monks, the Ecclesiastics, and the Eclectics, are but different names for one and the self-same sect.

The word "Essene" is nothing more than the Egyptian word for that of which Therapeutae is the Greek, each of them signifying "healer " or "doctor," and designating the character of the sect as professing to be endued with the miraculous gift of healing; and more especially so with respect to diseases of the mind.

Their name of "Ascetics" indicated the severe discipline and exercise of self-mortification, long fastings, prayers, contemplation, and even making of themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake, as did Origen, Melito, and others who derived their Christianity from the same school; Jesus himself is represented to have recognized and approved their practice.

Their name of "Monks" indicated their delight in solitude, their contemplative life, and their entire segregation and abstraction from the world, which Jesus, in the Gospel, is in like manner represented as describing, as characteristic of the community of which he was a member.

Their name of "Eccleastics" was of the same sense, and indicated their being called out, elected, separated from the general fraternity of mankind, and set apart to the more immediate service and honor of God. From the Greek word "ecclesia" we get the term so often used today: "church."

Answer for yourself: Did you catch the unique name above for the Essenes, Therapeutae, and their Monks? There were called "Ecclesiastics." On the surface this is rather boring until you understand that "ecclesia" is the term from which we get the English translation "church." The name translated from the Greek means "CHURCH". This give a whole new meaning to the passage supposedly where Jesus said he was to build his "Essenic Community." The follow of such an interpolation to the New Testament is readily seen in the fact that Jesus never envisioned a movement of any great length or duration as he expected the appearance imminently of the Kingdom of God well before 70 C.E. He had no 2000 year plan. He was made to have one after the crucifixion by these Ecclesiastics who considered themselves the "New Israel."

THE ALEXANDRIAN LINK AND THE TRANSLATION OF THE JEWISH SCRIPTURES INTO GREEK

These Essenes had a flourishing university, or corporate body, established upon these principles, at Alexandria in Egypt, long before the period assigned for the birth of Christ Jesus. The Essenes abounded in Egypt, especially about Alexandria (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist., lib. 2, ch. xvii). They esteemed this "corporate body" to such a degree that went so far as to mistranslate on purpose much of the Tanakh to promote their own theological beliefs and theological agenda. I have for your examination overwhelming evidence as to this purposeful mistranslation and adulteration of the Jewish Scriptures at another website: http://geocities.com/faithofyeshua where the corruption of the Jewish Bible is revealed and how the Gentile Church only built off such a corrupt substrate owing that they found parallels with such "corrupted texts" with their prior paganism.

C.D.F. Moule, in The Birth Of The New Testament, records for us on page 59 that the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures is "a wildly inaccurate translation." Likewise, Lucetta Mowry, in The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Early Church, again tells us on page 11-12: "...the Qumran authors....altered the stories of the Pentateuch by pious and frequently fanciful embellishments. A more serious purpose of alteration was the attempt to use the stories as authoritative expression of the tenants of the Sect....rewriting familiar events of Israel's history and by inserting legendary details to make the Law of Moses correspond with Qumran thought. These documents, together with the commentaries, testify to the Sect's interest in supplementing biblical authority by adapting canonical works to its own purpose. The community desired in particular to prove that its members were the true heirs of Israel's tradition and that the promise of redemption revealed by God to the patriarchs and to Moses now belonged to their brotherhood." This is just the tip of the iceberg and you should understand that many Greek Fathers of the church, men like Clement of Alexandria, who grew up and was schooled in Alexandria, not only heard this Essene theology and their teachings on the Angel-Messiah, but their documents, even the Greek translation of the Jewish Bible had such tenants of the group included within it. This explains the natural tendency for these early Greek Fathers to accept and promote a theology that was in opposition to what the conservative Jews of Palestine believed as preserved in their Jewish Scriptures, which now read quite differently from the Greek translation of the Essenes in Alexandria.

There are literally hundreds of embellishments, but let me give you one such example as I have dealt with hundreds of examples of the corruption of the Jewish Scriptures when then were translated on another website that you might wish to examine to see the evidence for yourself: http://faithofyeshua.faithweb.com.

Now for example... Christian Ginsburg details for us on page 32 of his monumental work The Essenes, Their History and Doctrines, when these Greek-Jews of Alexandria were employed to translate the Prophet and the Psalms into Greek, that they availed themselves of the opportunity to introduce their tenants and rites into their version of the translation. This version is called the Septuagint and is a grossly mistranslated version of the Jewish Scriptures. Millions of Christians are not aware of this and many of the Christian scholars stop short to examine the evidence for themselves; simply they just don't know it happened. Not being able to read Hebrew for themselves, they accept the Greek translation bequeathed to them as if it came for God. Your evaluation of the facts concerning this translation will show you otherwise. One example should suffice to begin your curiosity into the matter. Thus, for instance, when David said "Sacrifice and burn offering thou didst not desire, mine ears has thou opened" (Psalm 40:6) was changed by the Essenes translators of Alexandria to: "Sacrifice and burnt offering thou didst not desire, but a body hast thou prepared me." The Essenes, by changing this verse and taking away and adding to the Word of God introduced three of their tenets:

1. They made the Prophets speak absolutely as if God had entirely rejected sacrifices because they themselves would offer none

2. By dropping my the words, "mine ears has thou opened," they showed disapproval of slavery:

Exod 21:6 6 Then his master shall bring him (his slave) unto the judges; he shall also bring him to the door, or unto the door post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an aul; and he shall serve him for ever. (KJV)

3. By substituting "a body has thou prepared me," the were promoting their college of devout Essenes in Alexandria who met together as a body, and whom they believed God had appointed instead of the corrupt Priesthood. This body of Essenes was to be the now corporate "body" of Israel; the New Israel. Along with this the Torah and the Tanakh had been replaced with the religious and Apocalyptic writings of the community.

From this Essene corporate body of the "New Israel" they sent out missionaries promoting their theologies, and had established colonies, auxiliary branches, and affiliated communities, in various cities of Asia Minor, which colonies were in a flourishing condition before the preaching of St. Paul. Now you can understand that when Paul went on his journeys preaching "Christ crucified" that this was not a new message to his recipients. Jesus was just another name in a long line of crucified sun-god saviors that had come before. Chrishna crucified was now Christ crucified. There had been a long line of "personified Sun-god-men" who were crucified; first in the heavens due to the blending of astrology and religion, and later personified in human terms reflecting the "heroes" of various Indo-Germanic nations since the beginning of time.

Col 1:23 23 If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven; whereof I Paul am made a minister; (KJV) Notice please Paul used the "past tense" indicating that "his gospel" had already gone into all the world. A little study in comparative religion verifies the truth to his statement.

Answer for yourself: Have you ever wondered what was "the gospel" preached all over the world before Paul took the Christian message? These nations had already received the cosmic sun-myths from these Buddhist-Essene missionaries which covered according to their own testimony the whole of the known world. So Christ crucified was not a new message, but the personification of sun-myths long held by primitive mankind. Paul was only reiterating what they already knew and this explains the rapid spread of the Christian message...he had to give them nothing new...only a new name for their crucified godman. This also explains why the Jews continually followed Paul on his travels troubling him in their efforts to "undo" his preaching as the men from Jerusalem knew the distortions Paul was preaching about the Jesus that had personally known! Sadly, the New Testament blasts these men as "Judaizers." Redactionist history at its best!

The very ancient and Eastern doctrine of an Angel-Messiah had been applied to Gautama-Buddha, and so it was applied to Jesus Christ by the Essenes of Egypt and of Palestine, who introduced this new Messianic doctrine into Essenic Judaism and Essenic Christianity (Bunsen, Angel-Messiah, p. 255).

In the Pali and Sanscrit texts the word Buddha is always used as a title, not as a name. It means "The Enlightened One." Gautama Buddha is represented to have taught that he was only one of a long series of Buddhas, who appear at intervals in the world, and who all teach the same system. After the death of each Buddha his religion flourishes for a time, but finally wickedness and vice again rule over the land. Then a new Buddha appears, who again preaches the lost Dharma or truth. The names of twenty-four of these Buddhas who appeared previous to Gautama have been handed down to us. The Buddhavansa, or "History of the Buddhas," the last book of the Khuddaka Nikaya in the second Pitca, gives the lives of all the previous Buddhas before commencing its account of Gautama himself ; and the Pali commentary on the Jatakas gives certain details regarding each of the twenty-four (Rhys David, Buddhism, p. 179).

An Avatar (one descended from Heaven as an incarnated deity ...from Oriental and Iranian religious beliefs) was expected about every six hundred years. This interval is clearly shown by Mr. Higgins in his Anacalypsis. It should be remembered that Gautama Buddha, the "Angel-Messiah," and Cyrus, the "Anointed" of the Lord, are placed about six hundred years before Jesus, the "Anointed." This cycle of six hundred years was called the "great year." Josephus, the Jewish historian, alludes to it when speaking of the patriarchs that lived to a great age (Josephus, Antiq., bk. i. c. iii.). "From this cycle of six hundred," says Col. Valliancey, "came the name of the bird Phoenix, called by the Egyptians Phenu, with the well-known story of its going to Egypt to burn itself on the altar of the Sun (at Heliopolis) and rise again from its ashes, at the end of a certain period."

MESSIANIC EXPECTATIONS IN THE FIRST CENTURY

At the time of Jesus of Nazareth an Avatar was expected, not by some of the Jews alone, but by most every eastern nation.

"Philo's writings prove the probability, almost rising to a certainty, that already in his time the Essenes did expect an Angel-Messiah as one of a series of divine incarnations. Within about fifty years after Philo's death, Elkesai the Essene applied this doctrine to Jesus, and it was promulgated in Rome about the same time, if not earlier, by the Pseudo-Clementines" (Bunsen, The Angel-Messiah, p. 118).

Many persons were thought at that time to be, and undoubtedly thought themselves to be, the Christ, and the only reason why the name of Jesus of Nazareth was connected with crucifixion and salvation above all others, is because the Essenes, who were expecting an Angel-Messiah, espoused it after identifying Jesus with their killed "Teacher of Righeousness" who was their Avatar. Following the crucifixion and death of Jesus these Essenes made the connection with their "crucified-sun-god man" and made conversion to the Jesus Movement. Had it not been for this almost indisputable fact, the name of Jesus of Nazareth would undoubtedly not be known at the present day as connected with the pagan doctrines which it has been. In place of this would be the truth concerning the Davidic Messiah and the Torah instead of a paganized New Testament which originated from a strong Essenic influence and Alexandrian philosophy of religion which influence the Greeks as well and their writings which today we call "Early Church Fathers." Without such perversion of truth the Jerusalem church's legacy would have succeeded instead of the one of Rome.

Epiphanius, a Christian bishop and writer of the fourth century, says, in speaking of the Essenes:

"They who believed on Christ were called Jessaei (or Essenes), before they were called Christians. These derived their constitution from the signification of the name Jesus, which in Hebrew signifies the same as Therapeutes, that is, a saviour or physician."

Thus we see that, according to Christian authority, the Essenes and Therapeutes are one, and that the Essenes espoused the cause of Jesus of Nazareth, accepted him as an Angel-Messiah, and became known to history as Christians, or believers in the Anointed Angel.

This ascetic Buddhist sect called Essenes were therefore expecting the Angel-Messiah, because Gautama announced to his disciples that another Buddha, and therefore another angel in human form, another organ or advocate of the wisdom from above, would descend from heaven to earth, and would be called the "Son of Love."

The learned Thomas Maurice says:

"From the earliest post-diluvian age, to that in which the Messiah appeared, together with the traditions which so expressly recorded the fall of the human race from a state of original rectitude and felicity, there appears, from an infinite variety of hieroglyphic monuments and of written documents, to have prevailed, from generation to generation, throughout all the regions of the higher Asia, a uniform belief that, in the course of revolving ages, there should arise a sacred personage, a mighty deliverer of mankind from the thraldom, of sin and of death. In fact, the memory of the grand original promise, that the seed of the woman should eventually crush the serpent, was carefully preserved in the breasts of the Asiatics; it entered deeply into their symbolic superstitions, and was engraved aloft amidst their mythologic sculptures."' (Hist. Hindostan, vol. ii. p. 273).

That an Angel-Messiah was generally expected at this time may be inferred from the following facts: Some of the Gnostic sects of Christians, who believed that Jesus was an emanation from God, likewise supposed that there were several AEons, or emanations from the Eternal Father.

Among those who taught this doctrine was Basilides and his followers! (Lardner's Works, vol. viii. p 352).

MESSIANIC HOPE BREEDS TOO MANY MESSIAHS

Simon Magus was believed to be "He who should come." Simon was worshiped in Samaria and other countries, as the expected Angel-Messiah, as a God.

Justin Martyr says:

> " After the ascension of our Lord into heaven, certain men were suborned by demons as their agents, who said that they were gods (i.e., the Angel Messiah). Among these was Simon, a certain Samaritan, whom nearly all the Samaritans and a few also of other nations, worshiped, confessing him as a Supreme God" (Apol. 1, ch. xxvi).

His miracles were notorious, and admitted by all. His followers became so numerous that they were to be found in all countries. In Rome, in the reign of Claudius, a statue was erected in his honor.

Clement of Rome, speaking of Simon Magus, says that:

"He wishes to be considered an exalted person, and to be considered 'the Christ.' He claims that he can never be dissolved, asserting that he will endure to eternity. "

Montanus was another person who evidently believed himself to be an Angel-Messiah. He was called by himself and his followers the "Paraclete," or "Holy Spirit" (Lardner's Works, vol. viii. p 593)

Socrates, in his Ecclesiastical History, tells us of one Buddhas (who lived after Jesus):

> "Who afore that time was called Terebynthus, which went to the coasts of Babylon, inhabited by Persians, and there published of himself many false wonders : that he was born of a virgin, that he was bred and brought up in the mountains, etc."

He was evidently one of the many fanatics who believed themselves to be the Paraclete or Comforter, the "Expected One."

Another one of these Christ was Apollonius. This remarkable man was born a few years before the commencement of the Christian era, and during his career, sustained the role of a philosopher, religious teacher and reformer, and a worker of miracles. He is said to have lived to be a hundred years old. From the history of his life, written by the learned sophist and scholar, Philostratus, we glean the following:

Before his birth a god appeared to his mother and informed her that he himself should he born of her. At the time of her delivery, the most wonderful things happened.' All the people of the country acknowledged that he was the "Son of God." As he grew in stature, his wonderful powers, greatness of memory, and marvelous beauty attracted the attention of all. A great part of his time was spent, when a youth, among the learned doctors; the disciples of Plato, Chrysippus and Aristotle. When he came to man's estate, he became an enthusiastic admirer and devoted follower of Pythagoras. His fame soon spread far and near, and wherever he went he reformed the religious worship of the day. He went to Ephesus, like Christ Jesus to Jerusalem, where the people flocked about him. While at Athens, in Greece, he cast out an evil spirit from a youth. As soon as Apollonius fixed his eyes upon him, the demon broke out into the most angry and horrid expressions, and then swore he would depart out of the youth. He put an end to a plague which was raging at Ephesus, and at Corinth he raised a dead maiden to life, by simply taking her by the hand and bidding her arise. The miracles of Apollonius were extensively believed, by Christians as well as others, for centuries after his time. In the fourth century Hierocles drew a parallel between the two Christs -Apollonius, and Jesus - which was answered by Eusebius, the great champion of the Christian church.

In it he admits the miracles of Apollonius, but attributes them to sorcery.

Apollonius was worshiped as a god, in different countries, as late as the fourth century. A beautiful temple was built in honor of him, and be was held in high esteem by many of the Pagan emperors. Eunapius, who wrote concerning him in the fifth century, says that his history should have been entitled "The Descent of a God upon Earth."

It is as Albert Reville says:

"The universal respect in which Apollonius was held by the whole pagan world, testified to the deep impression which the life of this Supernatural Being had left indelibly fixed in their minds; an expression which caused one of his contemporaries to exclaim, We have a God living among us."

A Samaritan, by name Menander, who was contemporary, with the apostles of Jesus, was another of these fanatics who believed himself to be the Christ. He went about performing miracles, claiming that be was a Savior, "sent down from above from the invisible worlds, for the salvation of mankind" (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist., lib. 3, ch. xxiii). He baptized his followers in his own name. His influence was great, and continued for several centuries.

Justin Martyr and other Christian Fathers wrote against him.

Manes evidently believed himself to be "the Christ," or "he who was to come." His followers also believed the same concerning him. Eusebius, speaking of him, says:

"He presumed to represent the person of Christ; he proclaimed himself to be the Comforter and the Holy Ghost, and being puffed up with this frantic pride, chose, as if he were Christ, twelve partners of his new-found doctrine, patching into one heap false and detestable doctrines of old, rotten, and rooted out heresies, the which he brought out of Persia" (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist., lib. 7, ch. xxx).

The word Manes, says Usher in his Annals, has the meaning of Paraclete or Comforter or Saviour. This at once lets us into the secret, a new incarnation, an Angel-Messiah, a Christ, born from the side of his mother, and put to a violent death, flayed alive, and lung up, or crucified, by a king of Persia. This is the teacher with his twelve apostles on the rock of Gualior.

Du Perron, in his Life of Zoroaster, gives an account of certain prophecies to be found in the sacred books of the Persians. One of these is to the effect that, at successive periods of time, there will appear on earth certain "Sons of Zoroaster," who are to be the result of immaculate conceptions. These virgin-born gods will come upon earth for the purpose of establishing the law of God. It its also asserted that Zoroaster, when on earth, declared that in the "latter days" a pure virgin would conceive, and bear a son, and that as soon as the child was born a star would appear, blazing even at noonday, with undiminished splendor. This Christ is to be called Sosiosh. He will redeem mankind, and subdue the Devs, who have been tempting and leading men astray ever since the fall of our first parents.

Among the Greeks the same prophecy was found. The Oracle of Delphi was the depository, according to Plato, of an ancient and secret prophecy of the birth of a "Son of Apollo," who was to restore the reign of justice and virtue on the earth (Plato in Apolog. Anac., ii. p. 189)

Those who believed in successive emanations of AEons from the Throne of Light, pointed to the passage in the Gospels where Jesus is made to say that he will be succeeded by the Paraclete or Comforter. Mohammed was believed by many to be this Paraclete, and it is said that he too told his disciples that another Paraclete would succeed him. From present appearances, however, there is some reason for believing, that the Mohammedans are to have their ancient prophecy set at naught by the multiplicity of those who pretend to be divinely appointed to fulfill it. The present year was designated as the period at which this great reformer was to arise, who should be almost, if not quite, the equal of Mohammed. His mission was to be to purify the religion from its corruptions; to overthrow those who had usurped its control, and to rule, as a great spiritual caliph, over the faithful. According to accepted tradition, the prophet himself designated the line of descent in which his most important successor would be found, and even indicated his personal appearance. The time having arrived, it is not strange that the man is forthcoming, only in this instance there is more than one claimant. There is a “holy man" in Morocco who has allowed it to be announced that he is the designated reformer, while cable reports show that a rival pretender has appeared in Yemen, in southern Arabia, and his supporters, sword in hand, are now advancing upon Mecca, for the purpose of proclaiming their leader as caliph within the sacred city itself.

History then relates to us the indisputable fact that at the time of Jesus of Nazareth an Angel-Messiah was expected, that many persons claimed, and were believed to be, the “Expected One," and that the reason why Jesus was accepted above all others was because the Essenes - a very numerous sect - believed him to be the true Messiah, and came over to be his followers in a body.

It was because there were so many of these Christs in existence that some follower of Jesus ,but no one knows who, wrote as follows:

"If any man shall say to you, Lo, here is Christ, or, lo, he is here; believe him not; for false Christs and false prophets shall rise, and shall show signs and wonders to seduce, if it were possible, even the elect" (Mark, xiii. 21-22).

The reasons why Jesus was not accepted as the Messiah by the majority of the Jews was mainly for two reasons:

1. Because the majority expected a daring and irresistible warrior and conqueror, who, armed with greater power than Caesar, was to come upon earth to rend the fetters in which their hapless nation had so long groaned, to avenge them upon their haughty oppressors, and to re-establish the kingdom of Judah; and this Jesus - although he evidently claimed to be the Messiah -did not do.

2. Besides this the kingdom was to come through righteousness and Israel, expected to be a Holy Nation of Priests, had to merit the Kingdom and her King. Israel's failure in this regard meant the Messianic prophecies were not fulfilled and the Davidic King redeemer would not succeed. The understanding of such is available to you at:

Tacitus, the Roman historian, says

> " The generality had a strong persuasion that it was contained in the ancient writings of the priests, that at that very time the east should prevail : and that some one, who should come out of Judea, should obtain the empire of the world ; which ambiguities foretold Vespasian and Titus. But the common people (of the Jews), according to the influence of human wishes, appropriated to themselves, by their interpretation, this vast grandeur foretold by the fates, nor could be brought to change their opinion for the true, by all their adversities."

Suetonius, another Roman historian, says:

> " There had been for a long time all over the east a constant persuasion that it was recorded in the fates (books of the fates, or foretellings), that at that time some one who should come out of Judea should obtain universal dominion. It appears by the event, that this prediction referred to the Roman emperor ; but the Jews, referring it to themselves, rebelled."

This is corroborated by Josephus, the Jewish historian, who says:

"That which chiefly excited them (the Jews) to war, was an ambiguous prophecy, which was also found in the sacred books, that at that time some one, within their country, should arise. that should obtain the empire of the whole world. For this they had received by tradition, that it was spoken of one of their nation; and many wise men were deceived with the interpretation. But, in truth, Vespasian's empire was designed in this prophecy, who was created emperor (of Rome) in Judea."

As the Rev. Dr. Geikie remarks, the central and dominant characteristic of the teaching of the rabbis, was the certain advent of a great national Deliverer - the Messiah - but not a God from heaven.

For a time Cyrus appeared to realize the promised Deliverer, or, at least, to be the chosen instrument to prepare the way for him, and, in his turn, Zerubabel became the center of Messianic hopes. In fact, the national mind had become so inflammable, by constant brooding on this one theme, that any bold spirit, rising in revolt against the Roman power, could find an army of fierce disciples who trusted that it should be he who would redeem Israel (Geikie, The Life Of Christ, vol. i. p. 79).

The "taxing " which took place under Cyrenius, Governor of Syria (A. D. 7), excited the wildest uproar against the Roman power. The Hebrew spirit was stung into exasperation; the puritans of the nation, the enthusiasts, fanatics, the zealots of the law, the literal constructionists of prophecy, appealed to the national temper, revived the national faith, and fanned into flame the combustible elements that smoldered in the bosom of the race. The Messianic hope was strong in these people; all the stronger on account. of their political degradation. Born in sorrow, the anticipation grew keen in bitter hours. That Jehovah would abandon them could not be believed.

The thought would be atheism. The hope kept the eastern Jews in a perpetual state of insurrection. The cry "Lo here, lo there! " was incessant. Claimant after claimant of the dangerous supremacy of the Messiah appeared, pitched a camp in the wilderness, raised the banner, gathered a force, was attacked, defeated, banished, or crucified; but the frenzy did not abate.

The last insurrection among the Jews, that of Bar-Cochba, "Son of the Star," revealed an astonishing frenzy of zeal. It was purely a Messianic uprising. Judaism had excited the fears of the Emperor Hadrian, and induced him to inflict unusual severities on the people. The effect of the violence was to stimulate that conviction to fury. The night of their despair was once more illumined by the star of the east. The banner of the Messiah was raised. Potents, as of old, were seen in the sky; the clouds were watched for the glory that should appear. Bar-Cochba seemed to fill all the popular idea of the deliverer. Miracles were ascribed to him; flames issued from his mouth. The vulgar imagination made haste to transform the audacious fanatic into a child of David. Multitudes flocked to his standard. The whole Jewish race throughout the world was in commotion. The insurrection gained head. The heights about Jerusalem were seized and occupied, and fortifications were erected; nothing but the "host of angels" was needed to insure victory.

The angels did not appear; the Roman legions did. The " Messiah," not proving himself a conqueror, was held to have proved himself an impostor, the "son of a lie" (Frothingham, Cradle of the Christ).

The impetuous zeal with which the Jews rushed to the standard of this Messianic impostor, in the 130th year of the Christian era, demonstrates the true Jewish character, and shows how readily any one who made the claim, was believed to be " He who should come." Even the celebrated Rabbi Akiba sanctioned this daring fraud. Akiba declared that the so-called prophecy of Balaam: "a star shall rise out of Jacob, "was accomplished. Hence the impostor took his title of Bar-Cockabas, or Son of the Star; and Akiba not only publicly anointed him " KING OF THE JEWS," and placed an imperial diadem upon his head, but followed him to the field at the head of four-and-twenty thousand of his disciples, and acted in the capacity of master of his horse.

In the absence of the fulfillment of the Jewish prophecies in the Jewish Scriptures, faith in Jesus as the Messiah waned, especially in the failure of him to reappear before the destruction of the Temple as well as the war of 135 A.D. Those who yet believed on the meek and benevolent Jesus, and whose number was very small, were of that class who believed in the doctrine of the Angel-Messiah, first heard of among them when taken captives to Babylon. The Davidic Messiah did not appear. Hopes were split between the yet coming of the Biblical Messiah with those of the Angel-Messiah of the Essene-Christians. These believed that just as Buddha appeared at different intervals, and as Vishnu appeared at different intervals, the avatars appeared among the Jews. Adam, and Enoch, and Noah, and Elijah or Elias, might in outward appearance be different men, but they were really the self-same divine person successively animating various human bodies! This is clearly seen from the statement made by the writer of the Gospel of Matthew (xvii:9-13) that the disciples of Jesus supposed John the Baptist was Elias.

The prevailing opinion of the Rabbis and the people alike, in Jesus' day, was, that the Messiah would simply be a great prince, who should found a kingdom of matchless splendor. With a few, however, like the Essene-Christians, the conception of the Messiah's kingdom was pure and lofty...Daniel, and all who wrote after him, painted the "Expected One," as a heavenly being. He was the "messenger," the "Elect of God," appointed from eternity, to appear in due time, and redeem his people (Geike, Life of Christ, vol. 1, pp. 80-81). In the book of Daniel, by some supposed to have been written during the captivity, by others as late as Antiochus Epiphanies (B.C.E. 175), the restoration of the Jews is described in tremendous language, and the Messiah is portrayed as a supernatural personage, in close relation with Jehovah himself. In the book of Enoch, supposed to have been written at various intervals between 144 and 120 B.C.E., and to have been completed in its present form in the first half of the second century that preceded the advent of Jesus, the figure of the Messiah is invested with supernatural abilities. He is called "The Son of God," "whose name was spoken before the Sun was made;" "who existed from the beginning in the presence of God," that is, was pre-existent. At the same time his human characteristics are insisted on. He is called "Son of Man," even "Son of Woman," "The Anointed," or "The Christ," "The Righteous One" (Frothingham,The Cradle of the Christ, p. 20).

JESUS AS AN AVATAR

Christ Jesus was the avatar of the ninth age, Christ Cyrus was the avatar of the eighth. Of the hero of the eighth age it is said: "Thus said the Lord to his Anointed (i.e., His Christ), his Messiah, to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden to subdue nations.'" The eighth period began about the Babylonish captivity, about six hundred years before Christ Jesus.

The ninth began with Christ Jesus, making in all eight cycles before Jesus.

"What was known in Judea more than a century before the birth of Jesus Christ cannot have been introduced among Buddhists by Christian missionaries. It will become equally certain that the bishop and church-historian, Eusebius, was right when be wrote, that he considered it highly probable that the writings of the Essenic Therapeuts in Egypt had been incorporated into our Gospels, and into some Pauline epistles" (Bunsen, The Angel-Messiah, p. 17).

Well there you have it in summary form: How the Jewish Messiah, thought by many to be Jesus, was later interpreted as a Phythagorean-Buddhist-Iranian sun-godman and how the concepts were later blurred as we find today in the writings of the New Testament as quotes from a forged and adulterated Old Testament which was purposefully mistranslated by the Greek-Jewish Essenes of Alexandria to further their authority for their corporate body. With the crucifixion of Jesus these "beliefs" were applied to him following his death and with the conversion of this corporate body into the early Jewish Messianic Movement these "Essenic beliefs" would later divide the conservative Pharisees from the Essenes. The separatist movement would gather steam as the documents of this sect and their teachings highly influenced the Greeks who were coming to the faith as well as their intellectuals which were again influenced by the Alexandrian religious thought. For further information on the subject of the connection between Essenism and Christianity, the reader is referred to Taylor's Diegesis, Bunsen's Angel-Messiah, and the works of S. F. Dunlap.

THE ALEXANDRIAN INFLUENCE UPON EARLY CHRISTIANITY

In Alexandria, in Egypt, there was an immense library, founded by the Ptolemies. This library was situated in the Alexandrian Museum; the apartments which were allotted for it were beautifully sculptured, and crowded with the choicest statues and pictures; the building was built of marble. This library eventually comprised four hundred thousand volumes. In the course of time, probably on account of inadequate accommodation for so many books, an additional library was established, and placed in the temple of Serapis. The number of volumes in this library, which was called the daughter of that in the museum, was eventually three hundred thousand. There were, therefore, seven hundred thousand volumes in these royal collections.

In the establishment of the museum, Ptolemy Soter, and his son Philadelphus, had three objects in view:

1. The perpetuation of such knowledge as was then in the world;
2. Its increase;
3. Its diffusion.

1. For the perpetuation of knowledge. Orders were given to the chief librarian to buy, at the king's expense, whatever books he could. A body of transcribers was maintained in the museum, whose duty it was to make correct copies of such works as their owners were not disposed to sell. Any books brought by foreigners into Egypt were taken at once to the museum, and when correct copies had been made, the transcript was given to the owner, and the original placed in the library. Often a very large pecuniary indemnity was paid.

2. For the increase of knowledge. One of the chief objects of the museum was that of serving as the home of a body of men who devoted themselves to study, and were lodged and maintained at the king's expense. In the original organization of the museum the residents were divided into four faculties-Literature, Mathematics, Astronomy, and Medicine. An officer of very great distinction presided over the establishment, and had general charge of its interests. Demetius Phalareus, perhaps the most learned man of his age, who had been Governor of Athens for many years, was the first so appointed. Under him was the librarian, an office sometimes held by men whose names have descended to our times, as Eratosthenes and Apollonius Rhodius. In connection with the museum was a botanical and a zoological garden. These gardens, as their names imply, were for the purpose of facilitating the study of plants and animals. There was also an astronomical observatory, containing armillary spheres, globes, solstitial and equatorial armils, astrolabes, parallactic rules, and other apparatus then in use, the graduation on the divided instruments being into degrees and sixths.

3. For the diffusion of knowledge. In the museum was given, by lectures, conversation, or other appropriate methods, instruction in all the various departments of human knowledge.

There flocked to this great intellectual centre, students* from all countries. It is said that at one time not fewer than fourteen thousand were in attendance. Subsequently even the Christian church received from it some of the most eminent of its Fathers, as Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Athanasius, etc.

The library in the museum was burned during the siege of Alexandria by Julius Caesar. To make amends, for this great loss, the library collected by Eumenes, King of Pergamus, was presented by Mark Antony to Queen Cleopatra. Originally it was founded as a rival to that of the Ptolemies. It was added to the collection in the Serapion, or the temple of Serapis.

It was not destined, however, to remain there many centuries, as this very valuable library was willfully destroyed by the Christian Theophilus, and on the spot where this beautiful temple of Serapis stood, in fact, on its very foundation, was erected a church in honor of the "noble army of martyrs," who had never existed.

This we learn from the historian Gibbon, who says that. after this library was destroyed, the appearance of the empty shelves excited the regret and indignation of every spectator, whose mind was not totally darkened by religious prejudice.

The destruction of this library was almost the death-blow to free-thought - wherever Christianity ruled - for more than a thousand years.

The death-blow was soon to be struck, however, which was done by Saint Cyril, who succeeded Theophilus as Bishop of Alexandria.

Hypatia,* the daughter of Theon, the mathematician, endeavored to continue the old-time instructions. Each day before her academy stood a long train of chariots; her lecture-room was crowded with the wealth and fashion of Alexandria. They came to listen to her discourses on those questions which man in all ages has asked, but which have never yet been answered What am I ? Where am I? What can I know ?

Hypatia and Cyril; philosophy and bigotry; they cannot exist together. As Hypatia repaired to her academy, she was assaulted by (Saint) Cyril's mob - a mob of many monks. Stripped naked in the street, she was dragged into a church, and there killed by the club of Peter the Reader. The corpse was cut to pieces, the flesh was scraped from the bones with shells, and the remnants cast into a fire. For this frightful crime Cyril was never called to account.

It seemed to be admitted that the end sanctified the means. So ended Greek philosophy in Alexandria, so came to an untimely close the learning that the Ptolemies had done so much to promote.

The fate of Hypatia was a warning to all who would cultivate profane knowledge. Henceforth there was to be no freedom for human thought. Every one must think as ecclestical authority ordered him ; A.D. 414.

In Athens itself philosophy awaited its doom. Justinian at length prohibited its teaching and caused all its schools in that city to be closed.

After this followed the long and dreary dark ages, but the sun of science, that bright and glorious luminary, was destined to rise again.

THE LINK TO THE MESSIAH OF CHRISTIANITY

The history of this great Alexandrian library is one of the keys which unlock the door, and exposes to our view the manner in which the Hindoo incarnate god Chrishna, and the meek and benevolent Buddha, came to be worshiped under the name of Christ Jesus. For instance, we have just seen:

- That, “orders were given to the chief librarian to buy at the king's expense *whatever books he could."
- That, “one of the chief objects of the museum was that of serving as the home of a body of men who devoted themselves to study."
- That, “any books brought by foreigners into Egypt were taken at once to the museum and correct copies made."

- That, "there flocked to this great intellectual center students from all countries."
- That, "the Christian church received from it some of the most eminent of its Fathers."

And also:

- 6. That, the chief doctrines of the Gnostic Christians "had been held for centuries before their time in many of the cities in Asia Minor. There, it is probable, they first came into existence as Mystae upon the establishment of a direct intercourse with India under the Seleucidae and the Ptolemies."
- 7. That, "the College of Essenes at Ephesus, the Orphics of Thrace, the Curetes of Crete, are all merely branches of one antique and common religion, and that originally Asiatic."
- 8. That, "their introduction of Buddhism into Egypt and Palestine affords the only true solution of innumerable difficulties in the history of religion."
- 9. That, "Buddhism had actually been planted in the dominions of the Seleucidae and Ptolemies (Palestine belonging to the former)before the beginning of the third century B. C., and is proved to demonstration by a passage in the edicts of Asoka."[BEFORE THE THIRD CENTURY B.C.E.!]
- 10. That, "it is very likely that the commentaries (Scriptures) which were among them (the Essenes) were the Gospels."
- 11. That, "the principal doctrines and rites of the Essenes can be connected with the East, with Parsism, and especially with Buddhism."
- 12. That, "among the doctrines which the Essenes and Buddhists had in common was that of the Angel-Messiah."
- 13. That, " they (the Essenes) had a flourishing university or corporate body, established at Alexandria, in Egypt, long before the period assigned for the birth of Christ."
- 14. That, "the very ancient and Eastern doctrine of the Angel-Messiah bad been applied to Gautama Buddha, and so it was applied to Jesus Christ by the Essenes of Egypt and Palestine, who introduced this new Messianic doctrine into Essenic Judaism and Essenic Christianity."

THE CORRUPTION OF THE JEWISH BIBLE WHEN TRANSLATED INTO GREEK

What you need to know is that these Essenic-Phytagorean-Buddhists of Alexandria, Egypt, 200 B.C.E. translated the Jewish Bible into Greek. It is called the Septuagint. What you don't know is that many of these ancient religious tenants possessed by these Buddhist Essenes would be written into the Greek translation of the Bible. The existing Jewish Scriptures (the Tanakh) would be mistranslated on purpose in hundreds of places whereby the existing "theologies" of the Greek-Jewish Phythagorean-Buddhists would be intermingled among the existing Jewish texts in order to promote their "beliefs." The theology of this Egyptian sect replaced the writings of Moses and the Prophets in many places and few know it today.

This was the modus operandi used to corrupt the Jewish Scriptures. Of major interest in New Testament study is the alterations of many passages whereby the Essenic Cosmic Angel-Messiah was to replace the Davidic Messiah of the Jewish Scriptures. The Essenes believed in a Cosmic Angel-Messiah godman which finds its ultimate origin in sun-myths from the most ancient of days. This Angel-Messiah was made to be the fulfillment of Messianic prophecy originally intended to apply to the Davidic Messiah only!

The doctrine of the "Anointed Angel-Messiah" as taken from the evolution of sun-myths consisted of:

- The Sun-godman from heaven (Angel-Messiah incarnation as personified from sun worship).
- This Sun-godman was also the Creator

- The doctrine of the atoning sacrificial death of this Sun-godman...called the Essene Angel-Messiah... (these concepts coming from Iranian, Pythagorean, Buddhist backgrounds and influences upon the Essenes)
- The resurrection of this Angel-Messiah following 3 days (as taken from the sun-myths and the winter soltice).

These doctrines which most think Paul first taught can, with more or less certainty, be connected with the Essenes; even the Essenes in Egypt. It becomes almost a certainty that Eusebius was right in surmising that Essenic writings have been used by Paul and the evangelists. So Paul's "gospel" was not unique by any means but had been taught in all the world for thousand of years among the nation who worshipped the sun. All this information is laid out for your inspection: http://paganizingfaithofyeshua.netfirms.com.

This Angelic-Messiah had evolved from the Phythagorean synthesis of Indian and Buddhist beliefs which they themselves had assimilated from Egypt. Thus we find the blending of a sun-godman and an earthly Davidic Messiah-king. This will not be a problem until the death of Jesus and the application of these cosmic sun-god myths to him following the Essenes converting to the Jesus Movement following his crucifixion.

Acts 6:7 7 And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith. (KJV)

Simply said these Essenes priests became believers and followers of Jesus and entered the Jesus Movement after his crucifixion. One should not forget that what began as a righteous separation from the Temple by the Zadok priests in the early second century B.C.E. would later evolve into the current "Essenes" of Jesus' day. It should be remembered that these Essenes were once considered priest of Zadok: The word "Zadok" in Hebrew means:

6659Tsadowq- Zadok = "righteous";

Zadok was the high priest, son of Ahitub of the house of Eleazar the son of Aaron, and 11th in descent from Aaron; he joined David after Saul's death and supported him against Absalom and Adonijah; and later anointed Solomon as king. In the time of Jesus the Zadoks no longer had connections to the Temple.

When these remnant Essenic priests converted they brought their cosmic redeemer theology with them and applied this to a crucified Jesus in the same motif as their beliefs in their sun-myths. Now we have the Pharisees expecting a Davidic Messiah and these Essenes expecting a godman crucified. The New Testament contains both "theologies" jumbled together thanks to the writers of the New Testament. To understand how these Essenes understood that the Angel-Messiah was to be crucified one needs to understand how they believed in a crucified sun-godman redeemer. I suggest you go to our website and read up on it: http://paganizingfaithofyeshua.netfirms.com.

That, "we hear very little of them (the Essenes) after A.D. 40; and there can hardly be any doubt that the Essenes as a body must have embraced Christianity" Christian Ginsburg,The Essenes, 1864.

Thus you can easily see how these Essene Buddhist of the first century A.D. brought their religious ideas and beliefs concerning the Angel-Messiah with them. Later those influenced by this theological thought center of Alexandria, with its great library and its university, will write from this perspective and viewpoint, and we, two thousand years later when reading such materials, will not have the facts to understand why people wrote that Jesus was a god, etc. The early Greek Church Fathers, many of which grew up in Alexandria and were schooled there, could not help be influenced by such religious ideas. That is why many of their writings contain such ideas not found in the Jewish Bible and its teachings on Messiah.

THE SOLUTION TO THE PROBLEM

The sacred books of Hindus and Buddhists were among the Essenes, and in the library at Alexandria. The Essenes, who were afterwards called Christians, applied the legend of the Angel-Messiah-" the very ancient Eastern doctrine," which I have both read and researched out beyond satisfaction, but also have such information delineated at our own personal website: http://paganizingfaithofyeshua.netfirms.com. We have shown throughout this site how the Gentile nations personified their sun-myths into a "pattern" redeemer. The nations, having seen the same things in the heavens, have quite similarity in their myths. Over time, however, would come additions to the legend from other sources. That is why the myths are similar, yet divergent.

Portions of the legends related of the Persian, Greek and Roman Saviours and Redeemers of mankind, were, from time to time, added to the already legendary history of the Christian Saviour. This is especially prominent by the Essenes whose writings already had deviated from the Jewish Bible and contained similar sun-god myths within their "holy scriptures."

Thus history was repeating itself. Thus the virgin-born God and Saviour, worshiped by all nations of the earth, though called by different names, was but one and the same.

Albert Reville' says:

"Alexandria, the home of Philonism, and Neo-Platonism, was naturally the center whence spread the dogma of the deity of Jesus Christ."* In that city, through the third century, flourished a school of transcendental theology, afterwards looked upon with suspicion by the conservators of ecclesiastical doctrine, but not the less the real cradle of orthodoxy. It was still the Platonic tendency which influenced the speculations of Clement, Origen and Dionysius, and the theory of the Logos was at the foundation of their *theology."

Among the numerous gospels in circulation among the Christians of the first three centuries, there was one entitled The Gospel of the Egyptians.

"Epiphanius (A. D. 385), speaking of it, says :

“Many things are proposed (in this Gospel of the Egyptians) in a bidden, mysterious manner, as by our Saviour, as though he had said to his disciples, that the Father was the same person, the Son the same person, and the Holy Ghost the same person."

That this was one of the “scriptures" of the Essenes, becomes very evident when we find it admitted by the most learned of Christian theologians that it was in existence "before either of the canonical Gospels," and that it contained the doctrine of the Trinity, a doctrine not established in the Christian church until A. D. 327, but which was taught by this Buddhist sect in Alexandria, in Egypt, which has been well called, " Egypt, the land of Trinities."

The learned Dr. Grabe thought it was composed by some Christians in Egypt, and that it was published before either of the canonical Gospels. Dr. Mill also believed that it was composed before either of the canonical Gospels, and, what is more important than all, that the authors of it were Essenes.

These" Scriptures" of the Essenes were undoubtedly amalgamated with the "Gospels" of the Christians, the result being the canonical Gospels as we now have* them. The "Gospel of the Hebrews," and such like, on the one band, and the “Gospel of the Egyptians," or Essenes, and such like, on the other. That the "Gospel of the Hebrews" spoke of Jesus of Nazareth as the son of Joseph and Mary, according to the flesh, and that it taught nothing about his miracles, his resurrection from the dead, and other such prodigies, is admitted on all hands. That the “Scriptures " of the Essenes contained the whole legend of the Angel-Messiah, which was afterwards added to the history of Jesus, making him a CHRIST, or an Anointed Angel, is a probability almost to a certainty.

This information should now help you to better understand how all the traditions and legends, originally Indian, escaping from the great focus through Egypt, were able to reach Judea, Greece and Rome. Besides that you now should be able to see how Alexandria, the center for Essenic study, aided by the great library and university, was the mecca for the synthesis of religious ideas from Iran, Egypt, the Orient, Persia, Israel, etc. Out of this theological mix will come a great synthesis of the Phythagoreans to which the Essenes would not be immune. We have the blending of a little bit of everything as it is later applied to Jesus. The early Greek philosophers were not immune from such influences; thus we find as early as 110 A.D. Church Fathers from Alexandria teaching concerning the Angel Messiah of the Essenes; however one thing is different, they give him a name; Jesus.

ORIGINS FOR BASIC CHRISTIAN RELIGIOUS DOCTRINES

THE CENTRAL ELEMENTS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT THE ESSENE-CHRISTIAN SYNTHESIS

The broad appeal of Christianity stems from the fact that it is a synthesis of the most important doctrines which had already been developed in the great pre-Christian cultures during thousands of years.

Had this not been so, it would simply have been a narrow creed and would, like many others, soon have vanished from the stage of history. The central elements in the Synoptic Gospels (Matthew, Mark, and Luke) are first the divine, atoning, and sacrificial savior, who gives his own life to redeem that of his followers and who, by rising from the grave, is empowered to confer divinity and immortality upon them also; second an ethical system which makes everyone economically and politically equal in a social order where want and injustice are forever abolished; third, a doctrine concerning the after-life according to which the redeemed will enjoy happiness in communion with each other in a kingdom of righteousness; and, fourth, the promise of an imminent Second Coming, when the Savor as the Great Messiah will reappear in power to conduct the Last Judgment and institute the kingdom of heaven, which will then belong to the saints in perpetuity. As an additional inducement, the redeemed would be healed of all physical and spiritual maladies in time for all eternity.

The immediate source of these concepts was the Essene society; but their ultimate origins must be traced to the mystery-cults and the major religions of the pre-Christian -world.

THE SAVIOR-CONCEPT: FROM EGYPT

The Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt, as well as Palestine, adapted the "soter" or "savior" of Egypt. The original savior-god was the Great Osiris, the Egyptian deity who plays such a preponderant role in the religious history, not only of the Nile Valley, but also of the entire area which finally became the Graeco-Roman Empire. The facts, the legend, the myth, and the soteriology (doctrine of salvation) surrounding this majestic but also pathetic figure stretch back into the very roots of western culture and civilization.

A powerful force of Aryans, from Mesopotamia, conquered the much less developed Nilotics, about 4,000 or 3,500 B. C. The Sumerians superimposed their own economy, jurisprudence, architecture, agriculture, and general way of life upon the conquered, first, by intertwining their own religious concepts with those of the natives; and, second, by making their own the active and preponderant force. This was a long and complicated process, in the course of which cannibalism and other primitive poultices were outlawed and the flood waters of the Nile brought under control; and roads, temples, and cities were constructed. Scientific agriculture was instituted, an elaborate code of law established an elevated morality adopted, and a popular and powerful religious system perfected. The result was the greatest civilization yet known, which continued substantially intact for nearly forty centuries.

It is at least probable that Osiris was an historical person who had married his sister, became king of Egypt, and conquered many nations; that he was murdered by a group of conspirators headed by his brother, Set; and that he was finally transformed into the god-man savior by the priests of a great cult which became dominant in Egypt and later proliferated into all adjacent lands.

According to the Osirian myth, the sun-god Ra detected his wife Nut in the embrace of Seb, the earth-god. He therefore decreed that her offspring could not be born on any day of the year, which then consisted of 360 days. Nut, however, appealed for help to Thoth, the God of Wisdom; and, by playing at draughts with the moon, he won from her a seventy-second portion of each day. Thus, five intercalated days were added to the year, on none of which the curse of Ra was effective. Successively on these, Nut bore quintuplets: Osiris, Horus, Set, Isis, and Nephthys. Osiris, born on the 25th of December, symbolized the rebirth of the sun; in due course, he married Isis, who bore the Younger Horus, who, with his parents, made up the Egyptian Holy Family. Set married Nephthys, who became the mother of Anubis. The Elder Horus remained the celibate and intellectual Scribe. These five personalities, born of earth and heaven, were equally human and divine, mortals with a capacity for immortality. Osiris became the supreme god-man and Isis the ultimate mother-goddess, whose role and importance expanded over the centuries in the Osirian cult and who finally emerged as a supreme divinity in her own right.

After conferring a superior culture upon the Egyptians, Osiris set out at the head of his beneficent armies to do the same for other nations; he marched all the way to India and later in Europe to the Straits of Gibraltar. Finally, according to the legend, laden with the gifts of many grateful peoples, he returned home in triumph. This helps explain the spread of such religious ideas and myths as spread throughout the world.

In his absence, however, the evil Set conspired with the seventy-two displaced reactionary priests to seize the throne for himself. Having constructed a coffin, he induced his brother to lie down in it: whereupon the conspirators welded the lid shut with molten lead, so that Osiris died of suffocation. Thrown into the Nile, the coffin floated across the Mediterranean to Byblus (modern Jebeil), in Syria, where the body became encased in a tree.

Escaping the rage of Set, Isis took refuge in the Delta Swamps, where Horus was born. Leaving her child to be reared in Buto, she set out in search of her husband; finding almost all of his body except his penis, she returned with it to Egypt. The implacable Set, however, hacked this into fourteen pieces, and buried one in each of the names or provinces of the country.

Now began the incomparable passion of Isis, which ultimately made of her the supreme mother-goddess of the ancient world. Up and down Egypt she went, seeking and searching, until she found all the dismembered portions of the body and reconstituted them into its previous semblance; then, with the help of Thoth and Horus, Isis resurrected Osiris into a second and immortal life. Risen from death, he could never again be subject to its power. In due course, he entered his solar ship which transported him to the Elysian Fields, the realm of Khenti-Amenti, where he became and forever remains the judge of all who die and the ruler of the blessed.

Osiris, then, symbolized the reborn sun; as Apis, the Bull, he was the emblem of sexual virility; but, most of all, he was the god of agriculture. This, more than anything else, elevated the Egyptians from savagery and barbarism into actual civilization. Isis, meanwhile, who was identified with the moon and the cow, was the great and nurturing Mother; it would be Isis who taught mankind to transform the wheat into the bread of life, the barley into the joyous and invigorating ale as a forerunner of the Eucharist! Osiris gave men virility; Isis made motherhood possible and even delightful. Osiris gave mankind agriculture and Isis gave them civilized food. These two divinities gave humanity the more abundant life.

The sexual, astronomical, and agricultural symbolism woven into the Isis-Osiris myth reflects the deepest needs and desires of mankind. The offspring of Nut and Seb were conceived at the time when Sirius the Dog-star appeared in the East, as it did then on the first of June, when also the waters of the Nile began to rise, augmented, so the people believed, by the tears of Isis, weeping for Osiris, who was called the Morning Star who brings the waters, as well as the Great Bull, and the Reborn Sun. Deeply significant is the fact that the dismembered god was buried throughout Egypt on the very day when the grain was planted; and his resurrection occurred when the green shoots first emerged from the soil. The great rituals and festivals of Osiris were celebrated with the planting and the sprouting of the grains. In countless images of the god found in Egyptian tombs, his body lies on is bier with the tendrils of wheat growing from his body.

The ritual of Osiris consisted primarily in the celebration of a Eucharistic meal, in which the communicants ate the flesh of the god in the form of wheat-cakes and drank his blood in the form of barley-ale.

By so doing, his divinity became their own which was diffused through their members: and they became portions of him in body and spirit as well as heirs with him in his eternal kingdom. Osiris gave mankind immortality with his heavenly bread; he died that men might have life and have it more abundantly; he gave his body to eat and his blood to drink that men and women might, like himself. rise from the grave, divine into everlasting life.

Answer for yourself: What is so imporant about this?

This brief was the central core of the Osirian mystery and since, for millennia, the Egyptian was the principal culture of the ancient world, a reconstituted Osiris penetrated many nations and countries, especially throughout Asia Minor and the eastern Mediterranean. Perhaps as early as 2,500 B.C., the Egyptian god-man was united with the Semitic Astarte to constitute the Adonis-Aphrodite cult; later, as Attis, he became the dying and annually resurrected god of the cult of Cybele; in the 13th century, B. C., he appeared in Thrace as Dionysus or Orpheus, the savior-god of Orphism. After he migrated into Greece, he finally became the center of the great Eleusinian mystery itself, which was dedicated to the worship of Demeter, who was herself the Greek reconstitution of Isis. In the Roman world, he was known as Father Baccus and Demeter as Ceres.

And finally, about 520 B.C., he was incorporated into the Phythagorean cult as the central element in the first great religious synthesis of the western world.

Various mysteries spread throughout the Graeco-Roman world, especially after the Trojan War; but the cult of Isis at last outstripped all others in popularity, magnificence, power, and influence, wherein Osiris, while continuing as the sacrificial savior-god, became the secondary to his sister-wife in importance. These pagan savior-cults were wonderful for their number and diversity; and by the first century A.D., they had achieved almost complete dominion over the masses. All had one element in common: the worship of the atoning, sacrificial, and immortalizing savior god, substantially the replica of the great Osiris.

This very same concept, of an Angel-Messiah as a reborn Sun, or Son of the Sun-god, was the concept of the Essenes which grafted it onto the already existing Davidic Messiah of the Jewish Scriptures.

COMMUNAL EQUALITY: FROM INDIA & THE BRAHMANISM & BUDDHISM

About 2000 B.C.E., another army of Aryans invaded India and conquered the culturally backward inhabitants.

The newcomers revolutionized the social, political, and economic structure of the nation, first by commingling their own religious concepts with those of the natives; and, second, by making their own ideology predominant. A system of caste was established, in which the Brahmans (father-priests or divinities) occupied the highest rank; the Kshatriyas, or kings, nobles, and warriors, stood second; the Vaisyas, or artisans, tradesmen, peasants, etc., were third; and the Sudras, who were propertyless servants, constituted the lowest order. Only Aryans could belong to the two upper casts. However, every member of a caste occupied a definite and permanent hereditary position, and possessed certain rights in varying degrees. Below all this were multitudes who, for one reason or another, had lost their inherited social position: these were the outcasts, known as parasavas and khandalas, doomed to a life of misery in the most repulsive employments, while existing at a starvation level. Brahmans could have four wives Kshatriyas three, Vaisyas two, Sudras one, outcasts none at all. Elaborate codes were devised, which exacted the most fearful punishment for offenses against members of the higher castes, but little or no penance for the same acts when perpetrated against an outcast or a prostitute.

The hierarchy enjoyed complete control over education, morals, marriage, and the canonical codes. Theirs was a total way of life, which left nothing to any other discipline: like communist or Roman Catholic polities, it embraced every aspect of existence. The civil government existed only to enforce the decrees of the priests. The Brahmans were immune from all taxation, social obligations, or criminal prosecution. A more privileged or powerful bureaucracy, secular or religious, has never existed. The Brahmans made laws for all others, but were themselves exempt from punishment. They received tribute from everyone, but gave nothing tangible in return. They were the lords of life; and their regimen resented perhaps the most complete union of church and state ever known.

Since no one could rise in the social scale, the doctrines of karma and renunciation were devised to provide moral sanctions for caste. During this earthly life, every human being enters his good and evil deeds, as it were, in a book of credits and debits; and for these he is rewarded or punished, not in this life, but in the next. At death, each person who has lived good, or, rather, an obedient and subservient life, goes to paradise for a certain period, and will in due course be reborn in a higher caste; but if he had done evil, he will be unsigned to the twenty-three hells for a millennium, and then be reborn in a lower caste, or in the form of an animal, a reptile, a fish, a bird, or even an insect. Since every living feature is animated by a once-human soul, no one may kill even a louse, since it might be his own mother. Human misery, therefore, continues through endless aeons on a do dolorous Wheel of Life. Only through sainthood may Nirvana at last be attained; and this state of total unconsciousness or personal extinction was the Brahmanic substitute for the Egyptian Elysium and the Zoroastrian heavens.

In this system, there was no relief for outcasts and Sudras. It continued substantially unchanged for centuries; however, since the spirit of man will not endure such indignities forever without bitter resentment, certain safety-valves for social unrest were provided. Under the Brahmanic system, men were permitted to become students: but, when so doing, were required to take the vows of chastity, obedience, and poverty. Others, more advanced in years, were permitted to seek Nirvana by becoming hermits or ascetics, (just like the Essenes later) begging their food; however, all had to undergo a course in Vedic study and submit forever to the authority of the Brahmans. Even under these restrictions, vast numbers chose renunciation to escape the Wheel of Life and thus commingle at last with the Universal Soul—the Brahma or the Atman.

By the 6th century, B. C., various movements had arisen in opposition to the Brahmanic authority. The most important of these were Gainaism, or Jainism, founded by Mahavira, and Buddhism, established by Prince Gautama, said to have been a pre-existing divinity, who entered his mother's body at conception and was, therefore, born of a true virgin birth. Not to be outdone, Mahavira had a double virgin birth; for during gestation, he transferred himself from a Brahmani to Kshatriya mother so that, in addition to be being divine, he partook also of the nature of both upper castes. Actually, both movements, but particularly the Buddhist, represented a coalition of the nobles and the middle classes against the entrenched power of the priesthood. These new religions absorbed from Brahmanism such elements as transmigration, karma, heaven and hell, the Wheel of Life, renunciation, and Nirvana. Nevertheless, Buddhism was one of the most profoundly revolutionary movements in all history. It sought, not only freedom from upper-class tyranny, but also permanent release for its communicants from all labor and every kind of social obligation. Perhaps the most far-reaching of all Buddhist objectives was the substantial separation of the religious from the civil authority (church from state). No man was ever again to be called Brahmana, or Father, which signified priest-god (Matt. 23:9).

Buddhism denounced and outlawed a society based on caste, and proclaimed the utter wickedness of employing labor or accumulating private wealth. Persuaded that the duty to support parents, wife, and children is not only an integral element in the whole system of social exploitation but also a burden under which most toilers die unrequited, Buddhism declared that the family, based on sex and procreation, is an infamous evil; that the sexual relationship is the crime and corruption for which there can be no forgiveness; and that the highest conceivable virtue consists in renouncing and abandoning father, mother, sister, brother, wife, children, lands, and houses. Dressed in their yellow robes and with begging bowls in hand, the Buddhist saints sallied forth to obtain their food from the children of Mara And since Vedic study was the chief means by which the Brahmans consolidated their authority, the new ascetics declared knowledge so obtained to be utterly worthless or actually harmful.

The Buddhists made good use of several Brahmanic doctrines: hell was transformed into a place of torture for all who, in this world, had contracted matrimony, reared families, cared for their parents, and taught, or submitted to Brahmanic doctrines. Nirvana became the reward for a life of renunciation; a good karma was now to be attained by the children of this world only by giving generous alms to the Buddhist saints, who were by no means intent upon suffering material hardship: the greatest rewards in paradise were therefore reserved for the wealthy who donated their palaces as rest homes for the delectation of the holy ones. Communal orders of male and female celibates sprang up everywhere, into which the indigent thronged, where they could live idly in security, although under the strictest discipline. It was Buddhist dogma that, while personal property contaminates and destroys the character of the owner, the same wealth, when owned collectively and shared equally by the redeemed, is righteous and holy. You should immediately see the similarity in the communism of the early church as depicted in the Book of Acts as well as the Essenic celibacy; this is no coincidence but rather an example of strong influence that was exerted on the Essenes. I find this rather amazing that these Essene, knowing full-well that the first commandment in the Torah is to be fruitful and multiply, would violate this by enforcing celibacy on their adherents.

Under King Asoka, Buddhism became the national religion of India in 256 B. C. In his and subsequent generations, it proselytized throughout the whole known world; and its principal elements penetrated the stream of culture almost everywhere. Since western religion has its roots in oriental sources, Buddhist influence upon it has been immense.

In fact, long before Buddhism became the national religion of India, its basic concepts had appeared in the Graeco-Roman world. As early as the sixth century, B. C., it had already become a central element in the synthesis of Pythagoras.

The concept of the truly religious life as one of renunciation, celibacy, and communism was therefore deeply embedded in human consciousness; it became a major element in most important subsequent religious movements; and one phase of this philosophy emerged in the 19th century as Marxism. In this secular form, it has achieved its greatest conquests; and approximately one-third of the human race is now attempting to achieve a better life through communal organization and discipline, not in private communities, but through the control of great nations by the machinery of the state.

It should, however, be noted that after several centuries, Buddhism was expelled from India, which was reconquered by a reconstituted form of Brahmanism, known as Hinduism, which retains most of the central speculative doctrines of its ancient progenitor, such as the caste system, karma, and transmigration. The overwhelming force of religious ideology is apparent to any westerner who travels in India: useless cows and monkeys have been sacred, eating the scarce food, for want of which untold thousands of infants died of malnutrition. The killing of a vulture could cause a greater public disturbance than the sight of millions of starving indigents lying unhoused in the streets.

The religion of Gautama has undergone many revisions and divisions during the last thousand years; it exists today principally on the fringes of the greater cultures or as important minorities in Japan and elsewhere; however, it still commands the adherence of about 225 million communicants find exercises no small influence, not only in the Orient, but in the western world as well. Modern existentialism is in reality an offshoot of Buddhism, as are the doctrines of Zen. Various spin-offs like the Hare Krishna cult are today virulent in the United States; and it should be noted that since there are more than 515 million Hindus in the world-in 1979-80, these two cults originating in India, almost rival in numbers the 975 million credited to all existing divisions of Christianity. If you have any familiarity with the Essenes the parallels are striking as well with the communism and equality of good as stressed by the Book of Acts and the later celibacy as well which was later enforced upon the priesthood in the Catholic Church.

DOCTRINES OF THE AFTER-LIFE: FROM PERSIA & ZOROASTRIANISM

Although there are many elements in the religions of India and Egypt dealing with the after-life, the concepts of heaven, hell, and purgatory were developed to the highest degree by the Persians. The Jews were introduced to this in the Babylonian and Persian captivity and some of the Jews brought these religious concepts home to Israel with them.

In the 6th century, B.C., the prophet Zoroaster, by reconstructing the Mazdean Persian-Aryan religion, made it into a powerful nationalist instrument by which to unite his people as masters of a great empire. Three basic elements characterize this creed:

- Dualism
- Doctrines concerning the after-life
- Messianic expectations

Zoroastrian dualism predicated two cosmic, untreated powers or forces, of which the first, known as Ahura-Mazda or Ormazd, was the Lord of Spirits, the God of Warmth, Light, and Order, the source of life and immortality, the ruler of the celestial spheres, the creator of all things good or spiritual; and the second was Ahriman, known also as Angra Mainyu, the Evil One, the source of cold, darkness, matter, and chaos, the power of death and destruction, and the Prince of the Air in this world. These two powers were seen as essentially equal; but, since Ahura-Mazda possessed prescience, of which his cosmic foe was devoid, he was, from the beginning, able to devise a long-term strategy which would ultimately result in the triumph of Good and Light. These antagonists were said to be engaged in a universal conflict, which extended to every living creature, especially all humanity, who are therefore pilloried throughout life on the horns of this dreadful dilemma and enmity. The spirit or soul is from the God of Light, the King of Heaven; but the body is of Ahriman, the Lord of Darkness. In the heart of every human being a fierce battle therefore rages between the spirit and the flesh: those who are redeemed are the Elect, the Children Light and Heaven; those who reject the pure religion of Zoroaster are reprobates, the Children of Hell and Darkness. This concept is reflected in Shakespeare's 146th sonnet, which begins: "Poor soul, the center of my sinful earth . . ." and constitutes the basis of the Pauline anthropology set forth in our New Testament. It is also the basis of the Augustinian, Lutheran. and Calvinist doctrines of predestination and moral depravity.

The second great element in the Zoroastrian system was its a eschatology, according to which every human being has an immortal soul; and, since this appears only once on earth, its eternal destiny is determined by its activities here. The human race was divided into three general categories: first, those whose deeds are preponderantly good and who, therefore, emerge as Children of Light—at death, these go directly to one of the seven heavens (reproduced in the Divina Commedia of Dante); second, those whose careers have been dedicated to wickedness—these must be plunged into hell, there to suffer terrible and long drawn-out tortures; and, third, those in whom good and evil so nearly balance as to render them unfit for immediate entry into the celestial kingdoms, yet not deserving of hell-fire—these are consigned to purgatory, whence, after a Period of discipline purification, they are permitted to enter one of the lower celestial spheres.

THE ESSENE ANGEL-MESSIAH FROM ZOROASTRIAN-INDIA AND SUN-WORSHIP

The third basic Zoroastrian doctrine was that, following 660 B.C., would appear a great virgin-born savior, prophet, or Angel-Messiah, at the close of three consecutive millenniums. These concepts were taken directly from astrology and astronomy and later personified as if were a real person. Every Aryan nation had their own adaptation from the stars but Zoraster's influence made his the most prolific. On this web-site I have documented countless examples with more than sufficient bibliographies and references to prove the point beyond any reasonable doubt.

According to such Zoroastrian eschatology in 341 A.D., the great Hushedar was due; in 1341, the greater Hushedar-Mah would come; and in 2341, the greatest of all, the Soshans, would, after defeating all enemies at the final Armageddon, conduct the Last Judgment, and inaugurate the Kingdom of Saints, which would consist of a New Heaven and a New Earth, after the old had passed away in a cosmic holocaust.

We should note that Zoroastrianism was a universalist religion; for even the most wicked of men, after fearful refinement in a river of molten metal, would finally emerge as saints into an eternity of peace and glory.

Zoroastrianism included other important tenets; but these constitute its basic contributions to world-religion. By 510 B.C., Darius the Great Hystaspes, the son-in-law of Cyrus, ruled which stretched from Libya and Greece to the center of India, a territory comprising two million square miles and twenty-three nations. Throughout this vast complex, theology of Zoroaster exercised a potent and pervasive influence, and some of its elements became integral in Grecian Stoicism, in the creeds of the mystery cults, the tenets of the Jewish Chasids, and the speculative synthesis of the Orphic-Pythagorean brotherhoods. As you can see both the Pharisees as well as the Essenes were influenced by such a system and "borrowed" extensively from it in their writings. In the trappings of noisy and pagan solemnity, it is set forth in splendor in the Sixth Book of Virgil's Aeneid, composed in the first century, B.C., and in Dante's Purgatorio and Paradiso, composed in the fourteenth century, A.D. These concepts became the common heritage of the western world.

THE HUMAN MESSIAH: THE JUDAIC CONTRIBUTION

We should not discount entirely the influence upon Essene ideology of the Messiah-concept as found in orthodox Judaism, which may or may not have been directly altered by Zoroastrian influence. The belief that a powerful personality, a human agent, would one day emerge who, either by force of Jewish arms or by supernatural intervention by God and with God's support, would defeat all enemies and establish at least an independent nation, or, more probably, a great empire, had been a basic element in Jewish expectations for centuries before the time of Alexander. This Messiah, however, was quite different from the Angel-Messiah of Zoroastrian-Essene theology: his purposes were entirely temporal and terrestrial and were restricted to the ethnic interests of the Jews. He was not a moral judge; there was no Last Judgment; and his projected kingdom was not one of saints or of' righteousness. The Essene Angel- Messiah, in contrast, was the overwhelming Zoroastrian Soshans engrafted upon the age-old political and economic protagonists of Judaic visions.

THE SECOND COMING: AN ESSENE CONTRIBUTION

Every important new religious system draws heavily upon its predecessors as the basis for its novel synthesis; and almost always it adds at least one or two significant origins elements of its own.

During their maturity and a later evolution of Essene theology, we find that the Essenes eliminated from their system the doctrine of purgatory (which they had previously embraced) as well as the possibility of post-mortem redemption. In Essene-Christian doctrine there is no second chance.

However, the most important specific ideological creation of the Essenes was the promulgation of the Second Conning known among Christian theologians as the Parousia. Paul teaches this doctrine along with Jesus in the New Testament. The Essene's last Teacher of Righteousness was expected, before the conclusion of the then-existing generation, to send a representative who would be endowed with power to conduct the Last Judgment and to set up the kingdom of the saints on earth. With the formulation of this doctrine, all the principal elements comprising the Synoptic synthesis had been incorporated into the Essene canonical system. The religion of the western world was thereby substantially completed and today Jesus is the one most look toward for the fulfillment of this religious synthesis.

PYTHAGORAS: THE FIRST GREAT RELIGIOUS SYNTHESIS ...PUTTING IT ALL TOGETHER

In the 6th century, B.C., Pythagoras organized the first great religious synthesis of the western world where all of the above concepts, and more, were combined into one religious ideology or philosophy. About 105 B.C., the Essenes incorporated the doctrines and practices of the Phythagoreans into their own system and superimposed these upon the Zoroastrianism which they had already adopted about seventy years earlier. By so doing, they became the transmission belt by which the principal elements Egyptian, Persian, Indian, and Greek-mystery religions became integral portions of western faith which today is called Christianity.

CONCLUSION

The broad appeal of Christianity stems from the fact that it is a synthesis of the most important doctrines which had already been developed in the great pre-Christian pagan cultures during thousands of years.

Had this not been so, it would simply have been a narrow creed and would, like many others, soon have vanished from the stage of history. The central elements in the Synoptic Gospels (Matthew, Mark, and Luke) are:

- The divine, atoning, and sacrificial savior, who gives his own life to redeem that of mankind and who, by rising from the grave, is empowered to confer divinity and immortality upon them also
- An ethical system which makes everyone economically and politically equal in a social order where want and injustice are forever abolished
- A doctrine concerning the after-life according to which the redeemed will enjoy everlasting happiness in communion with each other in a kingdom of righteousness
- The promise of an imminent Second Coming, when the Savior as the Great Messiah will reappear in power to conduct the Last Judgment and institute the kingdom of heaven, which will then belong to the saints forever.
- The redeemed would be healed of all physical and spiritual maladies in time for all eternity.

What will be most shocking to you as a typical Gentile Christian is that the immediate source of these concepts was the Essene society; but their ultimate origins must be traced to the mystery-cults and the major religions of the pre-Christian-world.

I know this is a shock to many of our readers. Let me only say that we have in reality no recourse but to reevaluate the Christian faith in light of this information and re-examine Yeshua the Jew to see if we be in the faith of Torah and Tanakh. One must realize that the early church, Essenic in character, has put much into the mouth of Jesus on the pages of the New Testament. As you can see Yeshua was not a Christian but a Jew and it would serve us well to investigate Biblical Judaism as the faith once given to the saints. If those doctrines as espoused by the Essenes can be found in the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings, so be it and this is good. If not however, and if these Essenic religious beliefs which can be found not only in their sectarian writings as well as the New Testament can be shown to contradict Moses and the Prophets, then they must be cast aside as leaven. Shalom.

THE ALEXANDRIAN INFLUENCE UPON EARLY CHRISTIANITY

In Alexandria, in Egypt, there was an immense library, founded by the Ptolemies. This library was situated in the Alexandrian Museum; the apartments which were allotted for it were beautifully sculptured, and crowded with the choicest statues and pictures; the building was built of marble. This library eventually comprised four hundred thousand volumes. In the course of time, probably on account of inadequate accommodation for so many books, an additional library was established, and placed in the temple of Serapis. The number of volumes in this library, which was called the daughter of that in the museum, was eventually three hundred thousand. There were, therefore, seven hundred thousand volumes in these royal collections.

In the establishment of the museum, Ptolemy Soter, and his son Philadelphus, had three objects in view:

1. The perpetuation of such knowledge as was then in the world;
2. Its increase;
3. Its diffusion.

1. For the perpetuation of knowledge. Orders were given to the chief librarian to buy, at the king's expense, whatever books he could. A body of transcribers was maintained in the museum, whose duty it was to make correct copies of such works as their owners were not disposed to sell. Any books brought by foreigners into Egypt were taken at once to the museum, and when correct copies had been made, the transcript was given to the owner, and the original placed in the library. Often a very large pecuniary indemnity was paid.

2. For the increase of knowledge. One of the chief objects of the museum was that of serving as the home of a body of men who devoted themselves to study, and were lodged and maintained at the king's expense. In the original organization of the museum the residents were divided into four faculties-Literature, Mathematics, Astronomy, and Medicine. An officer of very great distinction presided over the establishment, and had general charge of its interests. Demetius Phalareus, perhaps the most learned man of his age, who had been Governor of Athens for many years, was the first so appointed. Under him was the librarian, an office sometimes held by men whose names have descended to our times, as Eratosthenes and Apollonius Rhodius. In connection with the museum was a botanical and a zoological garden. These gardens, as their names imply, were for the purpose of facilitating the study of plants and animals. There was also an astronomical observatory, containing armillary spheres, globes, solstitial and equatorial armils, astrolabes, parallactic rules, and other apparatus then in use, the graduation on the divided instruments being into degrees and sixths.

3. For the diffusion of knowledge. In the museum was given, by lectures, conversation, or other appropriate methods, instruction in all the various departments of human knowledge.

There flocked to this great intellectual centre, students* from all countries. It is said that at one time not fewer than fourteen thousand were in attendance. Subsequently even the Christian church received from it some of the most eminent of its Fathers, a Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Athanasius, etc.

The library in the museum was burned during the siege of Alexandria by Julius Caesar. To make amends, for this great loss, the library collected by Eumenes, King of Pergamus, was presented by Mark Antony to Queen Cleopatra. Originally it was founded as a rival to that of the Ptolemies. It was added to the collection in the Serapion, or the temple of Serapis.

It was not destined, however, to remain there many centuries, as this very valuable library was willfully destroyed by the Christian Theophilus, and on the spot where this beautiful temple of Serapis stood, in fact, on its very foundation, was erected a church in honor of the "noble army of martyrs," who had never existed.

This we learn from the historian Gibbon, who says that. after this library was destroyed, the appearance of the empty shelves excited the regret and indignation of every spectator, whose mind was not totally darkened by religious prejudice.

The destruction of this library was almost the death-blow to free-thought - wherever Christianity ruled - for more than a thousand years.

The death-blow was soon to be struck, however, which was done by Saint Cyril, who succeeded Theophilus as Bishop of Alexandria.

Hypatia,* the daughter of Theon, the mathematician, endeavored to continue the old-time instructions. Each day before her academy stood a long train of chariots; her lecture-room was crowded with the wealth and fashion of Alexandria. They came to listen to her discourses on those questions which man in all ages has asked, but which have never yet been answered What am I ? Where am I? What can I know ?

Hypatia and Cyril; philosophy and bigotry; they cannot exist together. As Hypatia repaired to her academy, she was assaulted by (Saint) Cyril's mob - a mob of many monks. Stripped naked in the street, she was dragged into a church, and there killed by the club of Peter the Reader. The corpse was cut to pieces, the flesh was scraped from the bones with shells, and the remnants cast into a fire. For this frightful crime Cyril was never called to account.

It seemed to be admitted that the end sanctified the means. So ended Greek philosophy in Alexandria, so came to an untimely close the learning that the Ptolemies had done so much to promote.

The fate of Hypatia was a warning to all who would cultivate profane knowledge. Henceforth there was to be no freedom for human thought. Every one must think as ecclestical authority ordered him ; A.D. 414.

In Athens itself philosophy awaited its doom. Justinian at length prohibited its teaching and caused all its schools in that city to be closed.

After this followed the long and dreary dark ages, but the sun of science, that bright and glorious luminary, was destined to rise again.

THE LINK TO THE MESSIAH OF CHRISTIANITY

The history of this great Alexandrian library is one of the keys which unlock the door, and exposes to our view the manner in which the Hindoo incarnate god Chrishna, and the meek and benevolent Buddha, came to be worshiped under the name of Christ Jesus. For instance, we have just seen:

- That, "orders were given to the chief librarian to buy at the king's expense *whatever books he could."

- That, “one of the chief objects of the museum was that of serving as the home of a body of men who devoted themselves to study."
- That, “any books brought by foreigners into Egypt were taken at once to the museum and correct copies made."
- That, "there flocked to this great intellectual center students from all countries."
- That, "the Christian church received from it some of the most eminent of its Fathers.”

And also:

- 6. That, the chief doctrines of the Gnostic Christians “had been held for centuries before their time in many of the cities in Asia Minor. There, it is probable, they first came into existence as Mystae upon the establishment of a direct intercourse with India under the Seleucidae and the Ptolemies."
- That, "the College of Essenes at Ephesus, the Orphics of Thrace, the Curetes of Crete, are all merely branches of one antique and common religion, and that originally Asiatic."
- That, "their introduction of Buddhism into Egypt and Palestine affords the only true solution of innumerable difficulties in the history of religion."
- That, “Buddhism had actually been planted in the dominions of the Seleucidae and Ptolemies (Palestine belonging to the former)before the beginning of the third century B. C., and is proved to demonstration by a passage in the edicts of Asoka."[BEFORE THE THIRD CENTURY B.C.E.!]
- That, “it is very likely that the commentaries (Scriptures) which were among them (the Essenes) were the Gospels."
- That, "the principal doctrines and rites of the Essenes can be connected with the East, with Parsism, and especially with Buddhism."
- That, “among the doctrines which the Essenes and Buddhists had in common was that of the Angel-Messiah."
- That, " they (the Essenes) had a flourishing university or corporate body, established at Alexandria, in Egypt, long before the period assigned for the birth of Christ."
- That, “the very ancient and Eastern doctrine of the Angel-Messiah bad been applied to Gautama Buddha, and so it was applied to Jesus Christ by the Essenes of Egypt and Palestine, who introduced this new Messianic doctrine into Essenic Judaism and Essenic Christianity."

THE CORRUPTION OF THE JEWISH BIBLE WHEN TRANSLATED INTO GREEK

What you need to know is that these Essenic-Phytagorean-Buddhists of Alexandria, Egypt, 200 B.C.E. translated the Jewish Bible into Greek. It is called the Septuagint. What you don't know is that many of these ancient religious tenants possessed by these Buddhist Essenes would be written into the Greek translation of the Bible. The existing Jewish Scriptures (the Tanakh) would be mistranslated on purpose in hundreds of places whereby the existing "theologies" of the Greek-Jewish Phythagorean-Buddhists would be intermingled among the existing Jewish texts in order to promote their "beliefs." The theology of this Egyptian sect replaced the writings of Moses and the Prophets in many places and few know it today.

This was the modus operandi used to corrupt the Jewish Scriptures. Of major interest in New Testament study is the alterations of many passages whereby the Essenic Cosmic Angel-Messiah was to replace the Davidic Messiah of the Jewish Scriptures. The Essenes believed in a Cosmic Angel-Messiah godman which finds its ultimate origin in sun-myths from the most ancient of days. This Angel-Messiah was made to be the fulfillment of Messianic prophecy originally intended to apply to the Davidic Messiah only!

The doctrine of the "Anointed Angel-Messiah" as taken from the evolution of sun-myths consisted of:

- 1. The Sun-godman from heaven (Angel-Messiah incarnation as personified from sun-worship).
- 2. This sun-godman was also the Creator
- 3. The doctrine of the atoning sacrificial death of this Sun-godman....called the Angel Messiah... these concepts coming from originally Egyptian, then later Iranian, Pythagorean, Buddhist backgrounds and influences upon the Essenes}
- 4. The resurrection of this Angel-Messiah following 3 days [taken from the winter soltice]

These doctrines which most think Paul first taught can, with more or less certainty, be connected with the Essenes; even the Essenes in Egypt. It becomes almost a certainty that Eusebius was right in surmising that Essenic writings have been used by Paul and the evangelists. So Paul's "gospel" was not unique by any means but had been taught in all the world for thousand of years among the nation who worshipped the sun.

This Angelic-Messiah had evolved from the Phythagorean synthesis of Indian and Buddhist beliefs which they themselves had assimilated from Egypt. Thus we find the blending of a sun-godman and an earthly Davidic Messiah-king. This will not be a problem until the death of Jesus and the application of these cosmic sun-god myths to him following the Essenes converting to the Jesus Movement following his crucifixion.

Acts 6:7 7 And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith. (KJV)

Simply said these Essenes priests became believers and followers of Jesus and entered the Jesus Movement after his crucifixion. One should not forget that what began as a righteous separation from the Temple by the Zadok priests in the early second century B.C.E. would later evolve into the current "Essenes" of Jesus' day. It should be remembered that these Essenes were once considered priest of Zadok: The word "Zadok" in Hebrew means:

6659Tsadowq- Zadok="righteous";

Zadok was the high priest, son of Ahitub of the house of Eleazar the son of Aaron, and 11th in descent from Aaron; he joined David after Saul's death and supported him against Absalom and Adonijah; and later anointed Solomon as king. In the time of Jesus the Zadoks no longer had connections to the Temple.

When these remnant Essenic priests converted they brought their cosmic redeemer theology with them and applied this to a crucified Jesus in the same motif as their beliefs in their sun-myths. Now we have the Pharisees expecting a Davidic Messiah and these Essenes expecting a godman crucified. The New Testament contains both "theologies" jumbled together thanks to the writers of the New Testament. To understand how these Essenes understood that the Angel-Messiah was to be crucified one needs to understand how they believed in a crucified sun-godman redeemer.

That, "we hear very little of them (the Essenes) after A.D. 40; and there can hardly be any doubt that the Essenes as a body must have embraced Christianity" Christian Ginsburg, The Essenes, 1864.

Thus you can easily see how these Essene Buddhist of the first century A.D. brought their religious ideas and beliefs concerning the Angel-Messiah with them. Later those influenced by this theological thought center of Alexandria, with its great library and its university, will write from this perspective and viewpoint, and we, two thousand years later when reading such materials, will not have the facts to understand why people wrote that Jesus was a god, etc. The early Greek Church Fathers, many of which grew up in Alexandria and were schooled there, could not help be influenced by such religious ideas. That is why many of their writings contain such ideas not found in the Jewish Bible and its teachings on Messiah.

THE SOLUTION TO THE PROBLEM

The sacred books of Hindus and Buddhists were among the Essenes, and in the library at Alexandria. The Essenes, who were afterwards called Christians, applied the legend of the Angel-Messiah to the Jesus of history!; the very ancient Eastern doctrine," which I have both read and researched out beyond satisfaction, but also have such information delineated at our various websites. We have shown throughout this site how the Gentile nations personified their sun-myths into a "pattern" redeemer. The nations, having seen the same things in the heavens, have quite similarity in their myths. Over time, however, would come additions to the legend from other sources. That is why the myths are similar, yet divergent.

Portions of the legends related of the Persian, Greek and Roman Saviours and Redeemers of mankind, were, from time to time, added to the already legendary history of the Christian Saviour. This is especially prominent by the Essenes whose writings already had deviated from the Jewish Bible and contained similar sun-god myths within their "holy scriptures."

Thus history was repeating itself. Thus the virgin-born God and Saviour, worshiped by all nations of the earth, though called by different names, was but one and the same.

Albert Reville' says:

"Alexandria, the home of Philonism, and Neo-Platonism, was naturally the center whence spread the dogma of the deity of Jesus Christ." In that city, through the third century, flourished a school of transcendental theology, afterwards looked upon with suspicion by the conservators of ecclesiastical doctrine, but not the less the real cradle of orthodoxy. It was still the Platonic tendency which influenced the speculations of Clement, Origen and Dionysius, and the theory of the Logos was at the foundation of their theology."

Among the numerous gospels in circulation among the Christians of the first three centuries, there was one entitled The Gospel of the Egyptians.

"Epiphanius (A. D. 385), speaking of it, says :

"Many things are proposed (in this Gospel of the Egyptians) in a bidden, mysterious manner, as by our Saviour, as though he had said to his disciples, that the Father was the same person, the Son the same person, and the Holy Ghost the same person."

That this was one of the "scriptures" of the Essenes, becomes very evident when we find it admitted by the most learned of Christian theologians that it was in existence "before either of the canonical Gospels," and that it contained the doctrine of the Trinity, a doctrine not established in the Christian church until A. D. 327, but which was taught by this Buddhist sect in Alexandria, in Egypt, which has been well called, " Egypt, the land of Trinities."

The learned Dr. Grabe thought it was composed by some Christians in Egypt, and that it was published before either of the canonical Gospels. Dr. Mill also believed that it was composed before either of the canonical Gospels, and, what is more important than all, that the authors of it were Essenes.

These" Scriptures" of the Essenes were undoubtedly amalgamated with the "Gospels" of the Christians, the result being the canonical Gospels as we now have* them. The "Gospel of the Hebrews," and such like, on the one band, and the "Gospel of the Egyptians," or Essenes, and such like, on the other. That the "Gospel of the Hebrews" spoke of Jesus of Nazareth as the son of Joseph and Mary, according to the flesh, and that it taught nothing about his miracles, his resurrection from the dead, and other such prodigies, is admitted on all hands. That the "Scriptures " of the Essenes contained the whole legend of the Angel-Messiah, which was afterwards added to the history of Jesus, making him a CHRIST,or an Anointed Angel, is a probability almost to a certainty.

This information should now help you to better understand how all the traditions and legends, originally Indian, escaping from the great focus through Egypt, were able to reach Judea, Greece and Rome. Besides that you now should be able to see how Alexandria, the center for Essenic study, aided by the great library and university, was the mecca for the synthesis of religious ideas from Iran, Egypt, the Orient, Persia, Israel, etc. Out of this theological mix will come a great synthesis of the Phythagoreans to which the Essenes would not be immune. We have the blending of a little bit of everything as it is later applied to Jesus. The early Greek philosophers were not immune from such influences; thus we find as early as 110 A.D. Church Fathers from Alexandria teaching concerning the Angel Messiah of the Essenes; however one thing is different, they give him a name; Jesus.

THE TRANSLATION OF THE JEWISH SCRIPTURES INTO GREEK...THE TRUTH ABOUT THE BACKGROUND OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

In order to come to an accurate understanding of the value and authority of the New Testament for the Christian believer today many things need to be understood; most of which few Christians have ever concerned themselves with. Your research must begin at the origin of the New Testament and that, believe it or not, begins long before it was written.

WHICH OLD TESTAMENT ARE WE TO HONOR AND USE?

Within the New Testament are hundreds of quotes taken from the Old Testament. The problem is which Old Testament are we to believe because there is in reality are two every different translations of the Jewish Scriptures. The Jews today have one and the Christians have one. They are not the same! The Jewish Old Testament is called the Palestinian Jewish Scriptures or the Masoretic text. Christianity has their Old Testament as taken from the Greek translation, or should I say "a purposeful mistranslation" of the Hebrew Scriptures. The translators of the Jewish Scriptures altered them terribly and wrote their sect's beliefs within it in the form of prophecies giving authority to their sect's beliefs. That is right, there are two very different Old Testaments today and the vast majority of Christians have never heard about this. Most of you never knew that. There was a time I did not as well. What I will show you in the beginning of our study is the truth and facts concerning the translation of the Jewish Scriptures into Greek and how pagan concepts were purposefully mingled within in by the Alexandrian translators and later these concepts concerning pagan sun-godmen were applied to Jesus by the apocalyptic messianic believers of the first century following the crucifixion of Jesus. We ended up with the conservative Pharisees looking for a Davidic Messiah or the return of Jesus to fulfill that mode; opposite this we had the Pythagorean-Buddhist Essenes who believed in a cosmic godman as their "anointed redeemer." These concepts were later mixed together and applied to Jesus and today we read them again mingled together in the New Testament never knowing that they were originally two conflicting and contradicting concepts; one Biblical and one Extra-Biblical. Dear ones, there is a big difference between legend and fact. The selection of which Old Testament you read and believe is of monumental importance for the Christian faith. One leads the reader down the path of righteousness and the other the path of idolatry.

The vast majority of Christian believers never even considered that their Old Testaments in their Christian Bible could possibly contain falsifications and purposeful mistranslations of the Jewish Masoretic text made over 2200 years ago which were made to further the theological agenda of the Greek-Jews of Alexandria, Egypt. If you were like me once you took it for granted when you bought your first Bible that you had the "Word of God." Well, yes and no. It never entered your mind that you might be reading religious passages that were never read by Jesus when reading the Old Testament. You simply took it for granted that you were buying the same Bible that Jesus used. If you bought a Christian Bible instead of a Jewish Tanakh nothing could have been further from the truth for you. Jesus would not use the Old Testament that is used by Christians today because the quotes taken from there and used in the New Testament about the "messiah" are adulterated and corrupted in most places when compared to the Hebrew Masoretic text. So by default the New Testament, in quoting much of the Old Testament prophecies as taken from the Christian Old Testament are incorrect and misrepresent the historical Jesus.

What we will examine first is the corruption of the Jewish Hebrew Scriptures when they were translated by the Greek-Jews of Alexandria, Egypt, over 200 years before the birth of Jesus. The importance for you to understand in this study is that the New Testament contains hundreds of quotes from this Greek Old Testament, and if it can be proven that this Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures contain purposeful mistranslations, misquotations, and scriptures continually taken out of context from the original documents used in the translation in order to promote the religious beliefs of the translators in Alexandria, Egypt, then that means that "these quotes" as as taken from this forged Old Testament translation as found in the New Testament distorts the truth about Jesus and recasts him in the image of pagan godmen. This is a very serious charge and one not made lightly. The reason I and others can bring such a charge against the New Testament is that we have done the research over years that proved beyond any shadow of doubt these tragic facts. That is why I had to leave the pastorate after several years of such study; I was wrong and preaching lies. The Jews were right; their Jewish Scriptures are the ONLY Holy Word of God we have! The time to learn and repent is now in hope before we die we can return to the faith once given to the saints; the true faith of Jesus (Yeshua). Such would be a honor to both Jesus and the God you love. Let us begin by letting us prove this to yourself beyond any doubt. It will require some reading but the trip is worth the price.

SEPTUAGINT STUDIES

The Jewish Scriptures were translated from the Hebrew into the Greek language in Alexandria, Egypt. We must begin our study here as we attempt to familiarize ourselves with the religious climate of the day and the influences at work which played a huge part on the translations and corruption of the Jewish Scriptures. It will be this fraudulent Greek translation of the Old Testament which will sever as the Bible for the Western World let alone the substrate for the quotations in the New Testament. If it can be shown, and it can, that this was a faulty translation to say the least, then the impact upon the New Testament is devastating.

WHAT SCHOLARS HAVE SAID ABOUT THE GREEK TRANSLATION OF THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES (OLD TESTAMENT)

Let me set the stage for what you will see in these articles. There are two completely different "Messiah" in the New Testament; one real and one false. One was the culmination of Eastern and Oriental sun-myths and the other from the Davidic lineage of Israel. They two very different concepts concerning the redeemer to come are blurred in the New Testament. One approaches the New Testament and reads it as if both these concepts were included in Jesus of Nazareth. The later "Gospels" would be written under a Pauline and an Essenic influence; and influence that promoted an Angel-Messiah instead of a Davidic human Messiah. Such a doctrine of the Messiah would be the last straw to break the camel's back and separate the Jewish church from the Gentile church along with the repudiation of the Torah by the evolving Gentile Christian community. The Jews in Palestine in the days of Jesus had their Palestinian Jewish Scriptures (the Palestinian Masoretic text) preserved and it read completely different from the corrupted Greek translation (Septuagint) and these Jews looked yet for the Davidic Messiah and not a cosmic sun-godman as taught in the doctrines of the Angel-Messiah which were added throughout the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures by these Greek-Jews of Alexandria, Egypt. One only needs to read the Gospel of John and compare it with the Jesus of the Synoptic Gospels to see we are talking about two very different persons!

In other words reading the Gospel attributed to John we read of a godman, but when reading the Synoptic Gospels attributed to Matthew, Mark, and Luke, we find a human anointed leader only. But such a dual-Messiahship is not true to the Jewish Scriptures not the beliefs of the Jews who were not looking for a cosmic redeemer but the Messiah of Israel.

The translators of the Jewish Scriptures, the Greek-Jewish Pythagorean-Buddhist sects of Alexandria, Egypt, 200 years before Jesus, wrote "into" their Greek translations of the Jewish Scriptures the religious beliefs of their sect intermingled among the pages of their Old Testament translation. THIS IS A FACT THAT CAN BE SEEN TODAY! Today we read the Christian Old Testaments, which came from this Greek source, never knowing that such forgery has been done. We fall into the trap of reading such "added sun-myths" and concepts concerning Jesus as quoted in the New Testament, as taken from this corrupted Old Testament, as if they are truths concerning the Jesus of history. Nothing could be further from the truth.

THE SCHOLARS SPEAK CONCERNING THE ALEXANDRIAN LINK AND THE CORRUPTION OF THE TRANSLATION OF THE JEWISH SCRIPTURES INTO GREEK

EUSEBIUS

These Essenes had a flourishing university, or corporate body, established upon these principles, at Alexandria in Egypt, long before the period assigned for the birth of Christ Jesus. The Essenes abounded in Egypt, especially about Alexandria (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist., lib. 2, ch. xvii). They esteemed this "corporate body" to such a degree that went so far as to mistranslation on purpose much of the Tanakh to promote their theological ganeda (Christian Ginsburg, The Essenes , Their History And Doctrines, 1863, p. 32).

C.D.F. MOULE

C.D.F. Moule, in The Birth Of The New Testament, records for us on page 59 that the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures is "a wildly inaccurate translation."

LUCETTA MOWRY

Likewise, Lucetta Mowry, in The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Early Church, again tells us on page 11-12: "...the Qumran authors....altered the stories of the Pentateuch by pious and frequently fanciful embellishments. A more serious purpose of alteration was the attempt to use the stories as authoritative expression of the tenants of the Sect....rewriting familiar events of Israel's history and by inserting legendary details to make the Law of Moses correspond with Qumran thought. These documents, together with the commentaries, testify to the Sect's interest in supplementing biblical authority by adapting canonical works to its own purpose. The community desired in particular to prove that its members were the true heirs of Israel's tradition and that the promise of redemption revealed by God to the patriarchs and to Moses now belonged to their brotherhood." This is just the tip of the iceberg and you should understand that many Greek Fathers of the church, men like Clement of Alexandria, who grew up and was schooled in Alexandria, not only heard this Essene theology and their teachings on the Angel-Messiah, but their documents, even the Greek translation of the Jewish Bible had such tenants of the group included within it. This explains the natural tendency for these early Greek Fathers to accept and promote a theology that was in opposition to what the conservative Jews of Palestine believed as preserved in their Jewish Scriptures, which now read quite differently from the Greek translation of the Essenes in Alexandria.

There are literally hundreds of embellishments, but let me give you one such example as I have dealt with hundreds of examples of the corruption of the Jewish Scriptures when then were translated on another website that you might wish to examine to see the evidence for yourself: http://faithofyeshua.faithweb.com.

CHRISTIAN GINSBURG

Now for example... Christian Ginsburg details for us on page 32 of his monumental work The Essenes, Their History and Doctrines, when these Greek-Jews of Alexandria were employed to translate the Prophet and the Psalms into Greek, that they availed themselves of the opportunity to introduce their tenants and rites into their version of the translation. This version is called the Septuagint and is a grossly mistranslated version of the Jewish Scriptures. Millions of Christians are not aware of this and many of the Christian scholars stop short to examine the evidence for themselves; simply they just don't know it happened. Not being able to read Hebrew for themselves, they accept the Greek translation bequeathed to them as if it came for God. Your evaluation of the facts concerning this translation will show you otherwise. One example should suffice to begin your curiosity into the matter. Thus, for instance, when David said "Sacrifice and burn offering thou didst not desire, mine ears has thou opened" (Psalm 40:6) was changed by the Essenes translators of Alexandria to: "Sacrifice and burnt offering thou didst not desire, but a body hast thou prepared me." The Essenes, by changing this verse and taking away and adding to the Word of God introduced three of their tenets:

1. They made the Prophets speak absolutely as if God had entirely rejected sacrifices because they themselves would offer none

2. By dropping my the words, "mine ears has thou opened," they showed disapproval of slavery:

Exod 21:6 6 Then his master shall bring him (his slave) unto the judges; he shall also bring him to the door, or unto the door post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an aul; and he shall serve him for ever. (KJV)

3. By substituting "a body has thou prepared me," the were promoting their college of devout Essenes in Alexandria who met together as a body, and whom they believed God had appointed instead of the corrupt Priesthood. This body of Essenes was to be the now corporate "body" of Israel; the New Israel. Along with this the Torah and the Tanakh had been replaced with the religious and Apocalyptic writings of the community.

From this Essene corporate body of the "New Israel" they sent out missionaries promoting their theologies, and had established colonies, auxiliary branches, and affiliated communities, in various cities of Asia Minor, which colonies were in a flourishing condition before the preaching of St. Paul. Now you can understand that when Paul went on his journeys preaching "Christ crucified" that this was not a new message to his recipients. Jesus was just another name in a long line of crucified sun-god saviors that had come before. Chrishna crucified was now Christ crucified: http://paganizingfaithofyeshua.netfirms.com. There had been a long line of "personified sun-godmen" who were crucified; first in the heavens due to the blending of astrology and religion, and later personified in human terms reflecting the "heroes" of various Indo-Germanic nations since the beginning of time.

Col 1:23 23 If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven; whereof I Paul am made a minister; (KJV) Notice please Paul used the "past tense" indicating that "his gospel" had already gone into all the world. A little study in comparative religion verifies the truth to his statement.

Answer for yourself: Have you ever wondered what was "the gospel" preached all over the world before Paul took the Christian message? These nations had already received the cosmic sun-myths from these Buddhist-Essene missionaries which covered according to their own testimony the whole of the known world. So Christ crucified was not a new message, but the personification of sun-myths long held by primitive mankind. Paul was only reiterating what they already knew and this explains the rapid spread of the Christian message...he had to give them nothing new...only a new name for their crucified godman. This also explains why the Jews continually followed Paul on his travels troubling him in their efforts to "undo" his preaching as the men from Jerusalem knew the distortions Paul was preaching about the Jesus that had personally known! Sadly, the New Testament blasts these men as "Judaizers." Redactionist history at its best!

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

Thus the pseudo-Aristeas, as cited by Josephus; thought, as a matter of fact, this Septuagint Version, so-called because of the legendary Seventy-two, was in the grossest manner inaccurate, and imported innumerable errors into the Christian religion which was based upon and propagated for several centuries only through the Septuagint texts. Indeed, "the text of the Septuagint was regarded as so unreliable, because of its freedom in rendering, and of the alterations which had been introduced into it, etc., that, during the second century of our era it was discarded by the Church." (Catholic Encyclopedia. iv, 625.)

In the course of a century or two before the Christian Era, the other Hebrew sacred books were likewise translated into Greek for the use of the Greek-speaking Jews of "the Dispersion," together with numbers of the forged Jewish apocrypha, and all these were added to the rolls of "Scriptures." This final and adulterated form of the Septuagint "was the vehicle which conveyed these additional Scriptures [i.e. the apocryphal Tobias, etc.] into the Catholic Church." (Catholic Encyclopedia, iii, 271.)

The role of the Holy Ghost in certifying the ill-translated and tempered Septuagint for the foundations of Christian Faith, was very disastrous, as CE. Points out:

"The Church had adopted the Septuagint as its own; this differed from the Hebrew not only by the addition of several books and passages but also by innumerable variations of text, due partly to the ordinary process of corruption in the transcription of ancient books, partly to the culpable temerity, as Origen called it, of correctors who used not a little freedom in making 'corrections,' additions, and suppressions, partly to mistakes in translation, and finally in great part to the fact that the original Septuagint had been made from a Hebrew text quite different from that fixed at Jamnia as the one standard by the Jewish Rabbis." (CE. vii, 316.)

"Copies of the Septuagint," says CE., "were multiplied, and, as might be expected, many changes, deliberate as well as involuntary, crept in." (CE. xiii, 723.)

ARTHUR G. PATZIA

Arthur Patzia is associate professor of New Testament and director of Fuller Theological Seminary in Norther California. On the translation of the Jewish Scriptures into the Greek he says this in his book The Making Of The New Testament: "The formation of the LXX was a gradual process spanning several centuries. Scholars have rightly judged that the Letter of Aristeas (B.C.E. 275-295) is a legendary or romantic piece of Jewish propaganda about the origin of the LXX.....But the translation of certain parts of the Old Testament into Greek was not always done consistently and carefully. Some books differ considerable from our present Hebrew Bible.....there are many Old Testament passages in the New Testament which agree with the LXX but differ considerably from the Hebrew Old Testament.....the LXX became identified as the Old Testament of the Christian Church....this led to a Jewish rejection of the LXX in its current form and the production of several other Greek versions that attempted to translate the Hebrew text more accurately...by becoming the Bible of the early church fathers, the LXX influenced church dogma....even the threefold division of Law, Prophets, and Writings was replaced with the Greek fourfold division of Law, History, Poetry, and Prophets" (p. 25-26).

FRANK MOORE CROSS

Frank Moore Cross, in Qumran And The History Of The Biblical Text, says in speaking of the translation of the Jewish Scriptures into the Greek: "these errors and textual diversities between the versions affect the intrinsic message only in relatively few instances. Nevertheless this may occur. Some examples of variants significant from a theological or ideo-historical angle may in fact be found....the Septuagint, commonly designated LXX, was in the Pentateuch less open to the uncontrolled impact of translators' idiosyncrasies. It contains indeed fewer deviations from the Hebrew text here than in the renderings of the other books...the ensuing embarrassing textual diversity of the versions of the sacred books soon called for the application of the methods of textual analysis and textual criticism to remedy this deficiency.....the Masoretic manuscripts showed no deviation of any consequence....all (Hebrew manuscripts of the Old Testament known today) exhibited a tradition which was identical to the smallest minutiae....taken as a whole the Greek tradition represented a textual family which differed from the Masoretic text."

MILLAR BURROWS

In Burrows' The Dead Sea Scrolls he says in regard to the Jewish Masoretic text of which we no earlier manuscript evidence than the ninth century until the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls in 1948 say regarding this: "The age of the manuscript, of course, does not establish its importance. An old manuscript is not necessarily a good manuscript. A copy made in the ninth or tenth century A.D. may be more accurately reproduce the original text than one made in the first or second century B.C." [this in response to many Christian commentators which have supposed the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures to be superior to the Jewish Masoretic text because we had "older manuscripts;" thus believing that "oldest" is most accurate]. As you can see this is not always correct!

"Many of the differences between the St. Mark's Isaiah scroll [discovered at Qumran] and the Masoretic text can be explained as mistakes in copying. Apart from these, there is remarkable agreement, on the whole, with the text found in the medieval manuscripts. Such agreement in a manuscript so much older gives reassuring testimony to the general accuracy of the traditional text...what it shows is that anymajor changes that occurred in the translation of the text had already been made before the beginning of the Christian era. In other words, a virtual standardization of the text had come about more or less automatically two or three centuries before the Masoretes made it official. As Hempel puts it, the decisive history of the text of the Old Testament had already been completed by the time of Jesus, not only in the books of the law, of which no jot or title should be altered, but also in the books of the prophets" (pp. 303-304).

Let me explain what you just read. The Christian Old Testament, corrupted since the Greek translation from which it was later re-translated, contains many passages interpreted as "messianic" and the church interprets these as if Jesus is the fulfillment. In reality, these are not true "messianic passages" as spoken by the prophets but adulterations meant to promote the sun-godmen theology of the translators in Alexandria. As Christians, we read them as if they are "messianic" and apply them to Jesus as if they were originally written concerning him. Needless to say, the Jewish Hebrew Scriptures do not read like this Greek "messianized" translation and many passages which read as if they were "messianic" in the Christian Old Testament were never given by the prophets as recorded in the Christian Bibles. The Christian response, when shown that their Old Testament is completely different in this regard when compared with the Jewish Scriptures, respond that the "Jews changed their Bible in response to the Christian message and tried to write-out Jesus from the Old Testament and "de-messiahize the prophets." This is simply false. As you read from scholar after scholar the Masoretic text, although until recently no copies could be discovered as early as the Greek translations, did not undergo change in reaction to the Christian church and its theology; rather the Masoretic text has been an accurate translation esteemed by the Jews since well before the days of Jesus and the passages that the Christian Church reads as if "messianic" are in reality purposeful corruptions of the Jewish text by the translators of the Jewish Scriptures in Alexandria.In other words, many of the beliefs held and applied to Jesus from this corrupted Old Testament in the Christian Bible are completely false and pagan in origin; and if that was not bad enough, such beliefs renders one an idolator!

Further Burrows states: "Considering how widely the earliest manuscripts of the New Testament vary, how radically, the ancient Greek versions differ from the traditional Hebrew text, and what a long time interval between the Dead Sea Scrolls and the oldest of the medieval manuscripts, one might have expected a much larger number of variant readings and a much wider degree of divergence. It is a matter for wonder that through something like a thousand years the text (of the Jewish Masoretic text) underwent so little alterations" (p. 304).

Now listen to what he says that I have already alluded to above: "We must still ask, however, whether the official scribes altered the text to eliminate what they considered objectionable implications, or whether the alteration was made by the covenanters [Essenes[to introduce their own beliefs into the text [beliefs about the Angel-Messiah in contrast to the Davidic Messiah]. That the latter procedure would not have been out of the question is shown by what was done by what was done with the text of Habakkuk..." (p. 313).

Again, "We cannot pause here to discuss each of those variants, but anyone who carefully examines the passages in question will find that the supposed Messianic implications are decidedly questionable" (p. 313)

Again, in contrasting the LXX and the Masoretic text he says: "By and large it confirms the antiquity and authenticity of the Masoretic text. Where it departs from the traditional text, the latter (the Masoretic text) is usually preferable" (p. 314).

ST. AUGUSTINE

Augustine, in his City of God 15:14 speaking of these Greek translations of the Jewish Scriptures states: "Apart from the errors of copyists, there are discrepancies which may conform to and even emphasize the truth. In such cases, we may well believe that the translators were inspired by divine Spirit to depart deliberately from the original, for along with their duties as scholars they had rights as prophets. [WHAT?] This explains why as Apostles rightly lend their authority not only to the Hebrew text but also the Septuagint, as when they quote Scripture texts from the latter."

Answer for yourself: Did you hear what he just said...that the Holy Spirit inspired these translators to depart deliberately from the original Words of God? What did YHVH warn us about adding to or taking away from His Word? Then how can we rightfully understand that God lied as Augustine just said?

THE PESHITTA HOLY BIBLE...GEORGE LAMSA'S TRANSLATION

The versions translated from Semetic languages into Greek and Latin were subject to constant revisions. Learned men who copied them introduced changes.....The Septuagint was made in the 3rd century B.C., for the Alexandrian Jews. This version was never officially read by the Jews in Palestine who spoke Aramaic and read Hebrew. Instead, the Jewish authorities condemned the work and declared a period of mourning because of the defects in the version. Evidently Jesus and his disciples used a text which came from an older Hebrew original. This is apparent because Jesus' quotations from the Old Testament agree with the Peshitta text but do not agree with the Greek text (Peshitta, pp. vi-ix).

A HISTORICAL ACCOUNT OF THE TRANSLATION OF THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES INTO GREEK...AS TAKEN FROM THE INTRODUCTION OF THE SEPTUAGINT (LXX)

The earliest version of the Old Testament Scriptures which is extant, or of which we possess any certain knowledge, is the translation executed at Alexandria in the third century before the Christian era: this version has been so habitually known by the name of the Septuagint, that the attempt of some learned men in modern times to introduce the designation of the Alexandrian version (as more correct) has been far from successful.

The history of the origin of this translation was embellished with various fables at so early a period that it has been a work of patient critical research in later times to bring into plain light the facts which may be regarded as well authenticated.

We need not wonder that but little is known with accuracy on this subject; for, with regard to the ancient versions of the Scriptures in general, we possess no information whatever as to the time or place of their execution, or by whom they were made: we simply find such versions in use at particular times, and thus we gather the fact that they must have been previously executed. If, then, our knowledge of the origin of the Septuagint be meager, it is at least more extensive than that which we possess of other translations.

After the conquests of Alexander had brought Egypt under Macedonian rule, the newly-founded city of Alexandria became especially a place where the Greek language, although by no means in its purest form, was the medium of written and spoken communication amongst the varied population there brought together. This Alexandrian dialect is the idiom in which the Septuagint version was made.

Amongst other inhabitants of Alexandria the number of Jews was considerable: many appear to have settled there even from the first founding of the city, and it became the residence of many more during the reign of the first Ptolemy. Hence the existence of the sacred books of the Jews would easily become known to the Greek population.

The earliest writer who gives an account of the Septuagint version is Aristobulus, a Jew who lived at the commencement of the second century B.C. He says that the version of the Law into Greek was completed under the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and that Demetrius Phalereus had been employed about it. Now, Demetrius died about the beginning of the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and hence it has been reasonably inferred that Aristobulus is a witness that the work of translation had been commenced under Ptolemy Soter.

Different opinions have been formed as to what is intended by Aristobulus when he speaks of the Law: some consider that he refers merely to the Pentateuch, while others extend the signification to the Old Testament Scriptures in general: the former opinion appears to be favored by the strict meaning of the terms used, the latter by the mode in which the Jews often applied the name of Law to the whole of their sacred writings.

The fact may, however, be regarded as certain, that prior to the year 285 B.C. the Septuagint version had been commenced, and that in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, either the books in general or at least an important part of them had been completed.

The embellishments and fictitious additions which this account soon received might be scarcely worthy of notice in this place, were it not that they are intimately connected with the authority which this version was once supposed to possess, and with the name by which it is commonly known.

A writer, who calls himself Aristeas, says that when Ptolemy Philadelphus was engaged in the formation of the Alexandrian Library, he was advised by Demetrius Phalereus to procure a translation of the sacred books of the Jews. The king accordingly, as a preliminary, purchased the freedom of more than one hundred thousand Jewish captives, and he then sent a deputation, of which Aristeas himself was one, to Eleazar the high-priest to request a copy of the Jewish Law and seventy-two interpreters, six out of each tribe. To this the priest is represented to have agreed; and after the arrival of the translators and their magnificent reception by the king, they are said to have been conducted to an island by Demetrius, who wrote down the renderings on which they agreed by mutual conference; and thus the work is stated to have been completed in seventy-two days. The translators are then said to have received from the king most abundant rewards; and the Jews are stated to have asked permission to take copies of the version.

As stated earlier legends abound concerning the translation of the Jewish Scriptures into the Greek. Other additions were subsequently made to this story: some said that each translator was shut into a separate cell and that all by divine inspiration made their versions word for word alike, others said that there were two in each cell, accompanied by an amanuensis; but at all events miracle and direct inspiration were supposed to be connected with the translation: hence we cannot wonder that the authority attached to this version in the minds of those who believed these stories was almost unbounded.

The basis of truth which appears to be under this story seems to be, that it was an Egyptian king who caused the translation to be made, and that it was from the Royal Library at Alexandria that the Hellenistic Jews received the copies which they used.

In examining the version itself, it bears manifest proof that it was not executed by Jews of Palestine, but by those of Egypt:—there are words and expressions which plainly denote its Alexandrian origin: this alone would be a sufficient demonstration that the narrative of Aristeas is a mere fiction. It may also be doubted whether in the year 285 B.C. there were Jews in Palestine who had sufficient intercourse with the Greeks to have executed a translation into that language, for it must be borne in mind how recently they had become the subjects of Greek monarchs, and how differently they were situated from the Alexandrians as to the influx of Greek settlers.

Some in rejecting the fabulous embellishments have also discarded all connected with them: they have then sought to devise new hypotheses as to the origin of the version. Some have thus supposed that the translation was made by Alexandrian Jews for their own use, in order to meet a necessity which they hail felt to have a version of the Scriptures in the tongue which had become vernacular to them.

There would be, however, many difficulties in the way of this hypothesis. We would hardly suppose that in a space of thirty-five years the Alexandrian Jews had found such a translation needful or desirable: we must also bear in mind that we find at this period no trace of any versions having been made by Jews into the languages of other countries in which they had continued for periods much longer than that of their settlement at Alexandria.

The most reasonable conclusion is, that the version was executed for the Egyptian king; and that the Hellenistic Jews afterwards used it as they became less and less familiar with the language of the original (Hebrew).

If the expression of Aristobulus does not designate the whole of the books of the Old Testament as translated in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, the question arises, when were the other books besides the Pentateuch turned into Greek? To this no definite answer could be given: we may however be certain that various interpreters were occupied in translating various parts, and in all probability the interval between the commencement and the conclusion of the work was not great.

The variety of the translators is proved by the unequal character of the version: some books show that the translators were by no means competent to the task, while others, on the contrary, exhibit on the whole a careful translation. The Pentateuch is considered to be the part the best executed, while the book of Isaiah appears to be the very worst.

In estimating the general character of the version, it must be remembered that the translators were Jews, full of traditional thoughts of their own as to the meaning of Scripture; and thus nothing short of a miracle could have prevented them from infusing into their version the thoughts which were current in their own minds. They could only translate passages as they themselves understood them. This is evidently the case when their work is examined.

[Let me interject that you think about what you just read and then try to reason with yourself that such a translation could even possibly be considered inspired, infallible, and inerrant. This alone testifies to the numerous contradictions when compared to the Jewish Masoretic Text]

It would be, however, too much to say that they translated with dishonest intention; for it cannot be doubted that they wished to express their Scriptures truly in Greek, and that their deviations from accuracy may be simply attributed to the incompetency of' some of the interpreters, and the tone of mental and spiritual feeling which was common to them all.

One difficulty which they had to overcome was that of introducing theological ideas, which till then had only their proper terms in Hebrew, into a language of Gentiles, which till then had terms for no religious notions except those of heathens. Hence the necessity of using words and phrases in new and appropriated senses.

These remarks are not intended as depreciatory of the Septuagint version: their object is rather to show what difficulties the translators had to encounter, and why in some respects they failed; as well as to meet the thought which has occupied the minds of some, who would extol this version as though it possessed something resembling coordinate authority with the Hebrew text itself.

[There you have the redactor of the LXX testifying to the inferior authority of the LXX when compared with the Jewish Scriptures]

One of the earliest of those writers who mention the Greek translation of the Scriptures, speaks also of the version as not fully adequate. The Prologue of Jesus the son of Sirach (written as many suppose B.C. 130) to his Greek version of his grandfather's work, states: "For the same things expressed in Hebrew have not an equal force when translated into another language. Not only so, but even the Law and the prophecies and the rest of the books differ not a little as to the things said in them." The writer of this Prologue had come into Egypt from the Holy Land: he had undertaken the translation of his grandfather's work into Greek, but in explanation of the difficulty which he had to encounter in this work, he refers to the defects found even in the version of the Law, the prophets, and the other books, of which he had previously spoken. Doubtless coming into Egypt he wads more conscious of the defects of the Septuagint version than could have been the case with Egyptian Jews, who had used the translation commonly and habitually for a century and a quarter,

At Alexandria the Hellenistic Jews used the version, and gradually attached to it the greatest possible authority: from Alexandria it spread amongst the Jews of the dispersion, so that at the time of our Lord's birth it was the common form in which the Old Testament Scriptures had become diffused.

In examining the Pentateuch of the Septuagint in connection with the Hebrew text, and with the copies preserved by the Samaritans in their crooked letters, it is remarkable that in very many passages the readings of the Septuagint accord with the Samaritan copies where they differ from the Jewish. We cannot here notice the various theories which have been advanced to account for this accordance of the Septuagint with the Samaritan copies of the Hebrew; indeed it is not very satisfactory to enter into the details of the subject, because no theory hitherto brought forward explains all the facts, or meets all the difficulties. To one point however, we will advert, because it has not been sufficiently taken into account,—in the places in which the Samaritan and Jewish copies of the Hebrew text differ, in important and material points, the Septuagint accords much more with the Jewish than with the Samaritan copies, and in a good many points it introduces variations unknown to either.

The Septuagint version having been current for about three centuries before the time when the books of the New Testament were written, it is not surprising that the Hellenistic writers of the New Testament should have used it more often than not in making citations from the Old Testament. They used it as an honestly-made version in pretty general use at the time when they wrote. They did not on every occasion give an authoritative translation of each passage, but they used what was already familiar to the ears of converted Hellenists {thus the parallels to their existing heathen legends worked in among the texts), when it was sufficiently accurate to suit the matter in hand. In fact, they used it as did their contemporary Jewish writers, Philo and Josephus, but not, however, with the blind implicitness of the former.

In consequence of the fact that the New Testament writers used on many occasions the Septuagint version, some have deduced a new argument for its authority,—a theory which we might have thought to be sufficiently disproved by the defects of the version, which evince that it is merely a human work. But the fact that the New Testament writers used this version on many occasions supplies a new proof in opposition to the idea of authority, for in not a few places they do not follow it, but they supply a version of their own which rightly represents the Hebrew text, although contradicting the Septuagint.

The use, however, which the writers of the New Testament have made of the Septuagint version must always invest it with a peculiar interest; we thus see what honor God may be pleased to put on an honestly-made version, since we find that inspired writers often used such a version, when it was sufficiently near the original to suit the purpose for which it was cited, instead of rendering the Hebrew text exactly on every occasion.

Another important point on which the Septuagint stands in close connection with the New Testament is the general phraseology of the version,—a phraseology in which the traces of Hebrew elements are most marked, but with regard to which we should mistake greatly if we supposed that it originated with the New Testament writers. Thus we may see that the study of the Septuagint is almost needful to any biblical scholar who wishes to estimate adequately the phraseology of the New Testament.

Besides the direct citations in the New Testament in which the Septuagint is manifestly used, there are not a few passages in which it is clear that the train of expression has been formed on words and phrases of the Septuagint: thus an intimate acquaintance with this version becomes in a manner necessary on the part of an expositor who wishes to enter accurately into the scope of many parts of the New Testament.

Thus, whatever may be our estimate of the defects found in the Septuagint—its inadequate renderings, its departures from the sense of the Hebrew, its doctrinal deficiencies owing to the limited apprehensions of the translators—there its no reason whatever for our neglecting the version, or not being fully alive to its real value and importance. But one, when he studies this out, must be alert that within it exists major departures from the sense of the Hebrew that is manifested in doctrinal errors from the pens of its translators!

After the diffusion of Christianity, copies of the Septuagint became widely dispersed amongst the new communities that were formed; so that before many years had elapsed this version must have been as much in the hands of Gentiles as of Jews.

The veneration with which the Jews had treated this version (as is shown in the case of Philo and Josephus), gave place to a very contrary feeling when they found how it could be used against them in argument due to its inadequate translations and its doctrinal changes: hence they decried the version, and sought to deprive it of all authority. As the Gentile Christians were generally unacquainted with Hebrew, they were able to meet the Jews on the ground which they now took; and as the Gentile Christians at this time believed the most extraordinary legends of the origin of the version, so that they fully embraced the opinions of its authority and inspiration, they necessarily regarded the denial on the part of the Jews of its accuracy, as little less than blasphemy, and as a proof of their blindness. But being incapable of reading and translating the Hebrew thereby seeing the discrepancies, it was they who were blinded to the alterations, substitutions, and doctrinal inadequacies of the Septuagint!

In the course of the second century, three other complete versions of the Old Testament into Greek were executed: these are of importance in this place, because of the manner in which they were afterwards connected with the Septuagint.

The first off the Greek versions of the Old Testament executed in the second century was that of Aquila. tie is described as a Jew or Jewish proselyte of Pontus, and the date commonly attributed to his version its about the year A.D. 126. His translation is said to have been executed for the express purpose of opposing the authority of the Septuagint: his version was in consequence upheld by the Jews. His labor was evidently directed in opposing the passages which the Christians were accustomed to cite from the Septuagint as applicable to the Lord Jesus. The general characteristic of this version is bold literality of rendering: such an endeavor is made to render each Hebrew word and particle into Greek, that all grammar its often set at defiance, and not infrequently the sense is altogether sacrificed. From the scrupulosity of Aquila in rendering each Hebrew word, his work, if we possessed it complete (and not merely in scattered fragments), would be of great value in textual criticism.

Another Greek translator at a subsequent period in the second century was Syrnmachus. He is described as an Ebionite, a kind of semi-Christian. His version seems to have been executed in good and pure Greek perhaps he was the more particular in his attention to this in consequence of the mere barbarism of Aquila.

A third translator in the same century was Theodotion, an Ebionite like Symrnachus, to whom he was probably anterior. His version is in many parts based on the Septuagint. He is less servile in his adherence to the words of the Hebrew than Aquila, although he is void of the freedom of Symmachus. His knowledge of Hebrew was certainly but limited, and without the Septuagint it is hardly probable that he could have undertaken this version.

Thus, before the end of the second century there were, besides the Septuagint, three versions of the Old Testament in Greek, known to both Jews and Christians. All this could not fail in making the Old Testament Scriptures better known and more widely read.

Although many Christians believed in the inspiration and authority of the Septuagint, yet this could not have been universally the case; otherwise the disuse of the real Septuagint version of the book of Daniel, and the adoption of that of Theodotion in its stead, could never have taken place. This must have arisen from an apprehension of the poverty and inaccuracy of the Septuagint in this book, so that another version similar in its general style was gladly adopted.

We have now to speak of the labors of Origen in connection with the text of the Septuagint This learned and enterprising scholar, having acquired a knowledge of Hebrew, found that in many respects the copies of the Septuagint differed from the Hebrew text. It seems to be uncertain whether he regarded such differences as having arisen from mistakes on the part of copyists, or from errors of the original translators themselves.

The object which he proposed to himself was not to restore the Septuagint to its original condition, nor yet to correct mere errors of translation simply as such, but to cause that the Church should possess a text of the Septuagint in which all additions to the Hebrew should be marked with an obelus, and in which all that the Septuagint omitted should be added from one of the other versions marked with an asterisk. He also indicated readings in the Septuagint which were so incorrect that the passage ought to be changed for the corresponding one in another version.

With the object of thus amending the Septuagint, he formed his great works, the Hexapla and Tetrapla; these were (as the names imply) works in which the page was divided respectively into six columns and into four columns.

The Hexapla contained, 1st, the Hebrew text; 2nd, the Hebrew text expressed in Greek characters; 3rd, the version of Aquila; 4th, that of Symmachus; 5th, the Septuagint; 6th, Theodotion. The Tetrapla contained merely the four last columns.

Besides these four versions of the entire Old Testament, Origen employed three anonymous Greek versions of particular books; these are commonly called the fifth, sixth, and seventh versions. Hence in the parts in which two of these versions are added, the work was designated I Octapla, and where all the three appeared, it was called Enneapla.

References were then made from the column of the Septuagint to the other versions, so as to complete and correct it: for this purpose Theodotion was principally used. This recension by Origen has generally been called the Hexaplar text. The Hexapla itself is said never to have been copied: what remains of the versions which it contained (mere fragments) were edited by Montfaucon in 1714, and in an abridged edition by Bahrdt in 1769-70.

The Hexaplar text of the Septuagint was copied about half a century after Origen's death by Pamphilus and Eusebius; it thus obtained a circulation; but the errors of copyists soon confounded the marks of addition and omission which Origen placed, and hence the text of the Septuagint became almost hopelessly mixed up with that of other versions.

The Hexaplar text is best known from a Syriac version which was made from it; of this many books have been published from a MS at Milan; other books are now in the British Museum amongst the rest of the Syriac treasures obtained from the Nitrian monasteries. This Syro-Hexaplar translation preserves the marks of the Greek text, and the references to the other translations. It may yet be made of great use in separating the readings which were introduced by Origen from those of an older date.

There were two other early attempts to revise the Septuagint besides that of Origen. In the beginning of the fourth century, Lucian, a presbyter of Antioch, and Hesychius, an Egyptian bishop, undertook similar labors of the same kind. These two recensions (which they were in the proper sense of the term) were much used in the Eastern Churches.

From the fourth century and onward, we know of no definite attempt to revise the text of the Septuagint, or to correct the discrepancies of various copies. It is probable, however, that just as the text of the Greek New Testament became in a great measure fixed into the same form as we find it in the modern tropics, something of the same kind must have been the case with the Septuagint. As to the Greek New Testament, this seems to have occurred about the eleventh century, when the mass of copies were written within the limits of the patriarchate of Constantinople. It is probable that certain copies approved at the metropolis, both politically and religiously, of those who used the Greek tongue, were tacitly taken as a kind of standard.

We find amongst the members of the Eastern (churches who use the Greek language), that the Septuagint has been and is still so thoroughly received as authentic Scripture, that any effort to introduce amongst them versions which accurately represent the Hebrew (as has been attempted in modern times) has been wholly fruitless.

Thus the Septuagint demands our attention, were it only from the fact that the whole circle of religious ideas and thoughts amongst Christians in the East has always been molded according to this version, Without an acquaintance with the Septuagint, numerous allusions in the writings of the Fathers become wholly unintelligible, and even important doctrinal discussions and difficulties (such even as some connected with the Arian controversy) become wholly unintelligible,

As the Septuagint was held in such honor in the East, it is no cause for surprise that this version was the basis of the other translations which were made in early times into vernacular tongues. There was, however, also another reason;—the general ignorance of the original Hebrew amongst the early Christians prevented their forming their translations from the fountain itself. The special exception to this remark is the Syriac version of the Old Testament formed at once from the Hebrew.

WHAT IS THE MASORETIC TEXT AND IS IT IN THE CHRISTIAN'S BIBLE?

YES AND NO! This needs explanation.

The term “Masoretic Text” is the name for the Hebrew text handed down from the Jews since the Babylonian captivity. The word “Masoretic” comes from “masor,” a Hebrew word meaning “traditional.” It means to hand down from person to person. The Masoretes handed down this text from generation to generation, guarded it and kept it well. There were families of Hebrew scholars in Babylon, in Palestine, and in Tiberius. According to most students of these matters, these Masoretes safeguarded the consonantal text of the Jewish Scriptures.

"The Masoretes flourished from about 500 to 1000 A.D. They were supposed to have standardized the Hebrew O.T. in about 600-700 A.D. by putting in the vowel pointings to aid in the pronunciation of the consonantal text. Their text is called the Masoretic Text or M.T. if you want to abbreviate it. Many assume that these Jewish Scriptures, as preserved by these Masoretes, are the "same" Jewish Scriptures contained in their Christian Bibles today. Nothing could be further from the truth!

DOES THE CHRISTIAN BIBLE CONTAIN THE JEWISH MASORETIC TEXT.....OR HAS IT BEEN ALTERED?

It would be a wonderful thing if in the Christian Bible we had a faithful replication of the Jewish Palestinian Masoretic text but we do not. Therefore the need for ministries like Bet Emet to bring this sad fact to your attention in hopes that your recognition of such a problem will lead to your own investigation into the matter to not only confirm what we have said, but also lead you in repentance of many false religious beliefs you hold as a traditional "Christian."

In looking over the introductory notes of several of the Bibles I posses I was struck by the statements by several Bible committees guarantying that within their “translations” we have the Jewish Scriptures. One hardly ever approaches one's Christian Bible thinking it could be wrong and thus we, by default, are led astray.

If you open the beginnings of your Christian Bibles you often find in the preface to the Old Testament a commentary detailing how your Christian Old Testament was put together. Granted this is just a collection of summary statements but you can get the drift. Let me give you an example.

The Oxford Study Edition of The New English Bible with Apocrypha states on page xix: “the earliest known Hebrew manuscripts containing any parts of the Old Testament are among the Scrolls (commonly called the Dead Sea Scrolls) found in the caves of Qumran near the north-western end of the Dead Sea; they may be dated in the last two centuries B.C., though some may be a little earlier and others somewhat later.”

So far so good. But watch what they say later:

"The text which they present is to a large extent identical with that in our Hebrew Bibles."

THAT STATEMENT IS SIMPLY JUST NOT TRUE AND I CAN PROVE IT TO YOU IF YOU WILL LISTEN!

WHAT YOU DON'T KNOW CAN HURT YOU

Most of you would read such a comment "large extent identical with that in our Hebrew Bibles" and be reassured that your Christian Old Testament is a faithful representation of the Old Testament in the Jewish Hebrew Bible.

Answer for yourself: What about those portions that do not fall within the above "To a large extent"? Do these portions make a major theological difference? Are these differences the reason why the Jews do not accept the Christian's Old Testament and much that is taught about Jesus by the Christian church and their texts?

Answer for yourself: What if I could show you that the above statement as representative of most Christian Old Testaments was a lie?

Over my dedicated fifteen plus years as a serious Bible researcher I have heard it all. The only way to know the truth for yourself is to find it yourself. I set out to do that and I have. And it is this truth I share with you. So many today have "holes" in their beliefs; holes when filled would alter their perspectives. But most study to a superficial level it seems and end up accepting and promoting the "party line" or "denominational position" for acceptability within the fraternity, or being preconditioned to a particular "belief" then when challenged they dismiss their opponents challenges.

What you just read above "that the Christian Old Testament in your Bibles is to a 'large extent identical' with the Hebrew Bible" is a lie spread by those of a particular religious position that produced that particular Bible. I have invested great time and finances to find out what the facts are concerning the changes and differences in the Jewish Hebrew Bible that are "NOT to a large extent" the same as the Christian Old Testament.

I have been humbled to say the least by my research and these comparisons and this led directly to my resignation as a Christian Pastor. As my studies progressed during the eight years of my pastorate I came to a place finally where I could no longer continue the charade. I had to resign. Simply said, based on what I discovered the facts were as plain as the nose on my face; I had not been preaching the truth as taught by the Bible Jesus used and read. Then why continue.

SO WHAT IS WRONG WITH THE CHRISTIAN OLD TESTAMENT IN MOST CHRISTIAN BIBLES?

There are basically two major problems with the Christian Old Testament: Doctrine and Prophecy.

The Christian Old Testament is not a faithful representation of the Jewish Hebrew Scriptures in multiple places. Simply said, many DOCTRINES as recorded and taught about Jesus in the New Testament come directly from what is recorded in the Christian's Old Testament. If these doctrines find their origin in a falsified and corrupted Old Testament which the Christian Bibles use, then understand such doctrines in the New Testament are false! That means the quotes in the New Testament are wrong if the sources for them can be shown to be wrong! A simple comparison between the Christian's Old Testament, along with the Septuagint (the corrupted Greek translation of these Jewish Scriptures) against these Jewish Scriptures in the Jewish Tankah will convince even a blind man! You just need to know they exist and that your investigation into the matter will reveal it beyond any doubt.

What I am saying is that what are supposedly "fulfilled prophecies" from the Old Testament in our Christian Bibles, seen as quotes in the New Testament, are in reality quotes of forgeries in many places because the Christian's Old Testament come from texts which were altered and falsified in the Greek translation of them 200 years before Jesus. Therefore the New Testament's reference to these as "fulfillments," upon examination with the real Jewish Masoretic text, can be shown to but gross falsifications and purposeful mistranslations in many instances. Understand I am not saying "all Messianic prophecy" is corrupted, but much is and you should know about it. There is a big difference when reading the Old Testament and believing what you are reading came from God or from men with a theological agenda. Many of these "doctrines" and "prophecies" were literally "created" by the Pythagorean-Greek Jews of Alexandria which they translated the Jewish Scriptures into Greek.

THE TERRIBLE IRONY OF THIS

Answer for yourself: Have you ever confused "Messianic prophecy" with "Sun-worship" and the prophecy concerning the coming of sun-god redeemers?

Before you say "no" you need to listen to this. These Pythagorean-Greek Jews of Alexandria (the Essenes) had long since separated from conservative Judaism. Study will reveal this to you. Just because Jews lived in Alexandria does not mean they were not Hellenized and had been influenced by the religious climate that existed in Alexandria, Egypt.

These Greek-Jews (Essenes) of Alexandria were the translators of the Jewish Scriptures and were responsible for the Greek translation of the Old Testament which would later find its way into the Christian Bible. In other words, many religious teachings of these Pythagorean-Buddhist Essenes, as taken from Pythagorean and Buddhist religious beliefs, as well as Iranian sun-worship, were "added" into their Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures in order to enhance the religious authority of their sect. This is a fact! They made it look as if God had sanctioned them as "His people" instead of Israel! Besides that they altered what the Tanakh said concerning the "anointed one to come" and patterned the Messiah after sun-gods.

These Pythagorean-Buddhist Greek-Jews looked toward a cosmic sun-god incarnated man. This man will be "crucified" and killed in the heavens. These concepts were later personified as if this man was real. The stories and legends grew (http://paganizingfaithofyeshua.netfirms.com). The irony is that when Jesus was "crucified," this large group of Essene believers, in the turbulent Messianic confusion of the first century, looked to the "crucified Jesus" as the one they had been waiting for, but admittedly missed identifying him as such while he was alive. So, if you followed, these pagan beliefs as held by these Pythagorean-Buddhist Essenes, which originated from sun-worship, the same "pagan religious beliefs" which had been "added" to the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures, were now applied to Jesus after his crucifixion. Jesus became the "fulfillment" of them only because these Essenes identified him after he was crucified with their crucified theological heroes.

So what was never Messianic prophecy in the Greek translation and alteration of the Jewish Scriptures, now becomes "Messianic prophecy" to these Essenes in the first century. Religious concepts held by these Essenes which they applied to their incarnated sun-god redeemer Angel-Messiah were now applied to Jesus. These Essenes literally convert as a large group to the Jesus' movement in the first century and almost totally vanish. They become the first Christians. Now within the synagogues in the latter part of the first century and later we have two Messianic beliefs jockeying for mastery: one Davidic, and one Cosmic; one from the Tanakh and one from a synthesis of Pythagorean-Indian-Buddhist belief which trace their origin to astrology and sun-worship and which were recorded in a falsified translation of the Jewish Scriptures by prior Essenes in Alexandria in order to bolster the authority of their sect by promoting the sect and their religious views as if given by God in the Bible. No wonder the Jews down through history, as well as today, don't accept much what is taught by the Christian church about Jesus and the Messiah; their Bibles never had such stuff in it!

The problem for the Christian is that the Tanakh never said such things about the Davidic Messiah. Many of these concepts as held by these Essenes which were applied by them from the corrupted Greek Old Testament to Jesus, their acclaimed Angel-Messiah, never could be found in the Jewish Tanakh. Their beliefs about Messiah were not to be found in the Tanakh, but only in their own writings to which they exalted above the writings of Moses and the prophets.

The same passages that these Essenes yielded to in the Greek Old Testament for their beliefs concerning their godman, when examined in the Jewish Scriptures and rightly understood and interpreted by conservative Rabbis, never were intended to be of a Messianic nature in the first place.

Answer for yourself: Do you want to believe the truth about Jesus and the Messiah, or will fantasy and pagan beliefs, long ago added to the Word of God and undetected by most today, suffice for your religious beliefs as far as your concerned?

Tragically, we read these "added" religious doctrines in our Christian Old Testament, and read the "quotes in the New Testament as taken from the same source" as if given by God. We read them as if this were the truth about the Messiah and Jesus. We never had a reason to doubt our Christian Old Testament or its quotes in the New Testament. Just a cursory reading of these documents will not reveal what I have said in this article to hardly anyone. Only serious study and comparative study of the documents will do this. We choose to believe like "good and faithful" Christians and like sheep we were led astray and never knew it. And we never knew, that is up till now! God knows we have believed a lie even if we don't, and I thank Him that is love is not contingent on us being "right." But if we can learn the truth and alter our worship whereby we remove ourselves, based on what we learn, from idolatry, then our love for God should demand we study to find the truth and not die as idolators.

The Christian Old Testaments might read as if came from God, because most of it did, and the New Testament's quotes of these falsified passages might seem reassuring, but if you took the time to compare these problem passages with the Jewish Bibles today you would see for yourself the prophets never said such things as recorded in many places in the Christian Old Testaments. Besides that, the quotes in the New Testament, when taken from these problem passages, are completely wrong and misleading as well.

There exists today the Jewish Hebrew Scriptures and the Christian Old Testament and they are not the same in very important places affecting both doctrines and prophecies. As a Christian you will never know that until someone first tells you and then you go look for yourself to see if this be true. When I was confronted with such information I, as a Pastor, had to know. What if I had been wrong? What if I had the wrong book? What if 2000 years ago things were changed and I don't know it and believe what I have been told and taught by others who don't know as well?

As stated above, but its importance requires its restatement. Many quotes from this altered Christian Old Testament were again included in the New Testament and you read them as if they are again true and given by God. All you are reading are the accepted traditions of those who came before you who either never knew how to read Hebrew, knew of this deception or willfully added to it.

The New English Bible goes on to say:

"In the second century A.D. or even earlier the Rabbis, the Jewish religious leaders, compiled a text from such manuscripts as had survived the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, and on this basis was established the traditional or Massoretic text, so called from the Hebrew word “massorah” or “tradition”. The earliest surviving manuscripts of this text date from the ninth to eleventh centuries A.D.; and it is this text, as printed in R. Kittel’s Biblia Hebraica (3rd edition, 1937), which has been used for the present translation".

Let me tell you what you just read....Another lie!

The text in the Oxford’s New English Bible, like all Christian Old Testaments, is NOT the text that is used, or has been used, by the Jewish Rabbis and people since long before Jesus! That's right. The text you are reading is the one handed down by the Alexandrian translators which forged many of their sects Pythagorean-Buddhist and Essene doctrines into their translations. You are reading the evolution of their Greek translation and not the Hebrew Masoretic text in all instances. In the majority of the passages we find agreement between the Greek and the Hebrew, and any differences are minor to say the least. Yet, it not these passages that trouble us, but the one which make for theological and doctrinal diversity.

This is the purpose of the Web Site and the many articles listed; to reveal this problem to all those who show interest. On this site I have provided for you what I believe to be overwhelming evidence to not only the falsification and purposeful mistranslation of the Jewish Scriptures, but hundreds of examples of these divergent doctrines and religious beliefs which influenced many in the early years of the early church. Some never deterred from the faith of Jesus; but many did. Many were influenced by this Greek adulteration of the Jewish Bible, and forthcoming were doctrines taken from this Greek text along with variant readings which ended up in your Christian Bibles. We go to church and "hear" these falsehoods taught and "amended" but never take the time to compare. I have don't that for you. The evidence is not pretty, but repentance is. With every lie exposed, with every false doctrine crushed, and with every step toward truth and obedience, then God is closer.

Not only did you not know of these things before now, but those who published this Oxford Bible did not know as well; at least hopefully for it would be a terrible thing to think that such deception was done on purpose. To list all the Christian Bibles which have fallen to this same deceptions would take forever.

THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE CHRISTIAN’S OLD TESTAMENT TEXT

"What about the Hebrew text used by the KJV translators? Here is some background on it. The Daniel Bomberg edition, 1516-17, was called the "First Rabbinic Bible." That's a joke. This text, in many places, was derived from the Septuagint instead of the Palestinian Masoretic text, which I will show you in the following pages on this web site, is but an altered and poorly constructed falsification of the Jewish Scriptures in many places. Again, I must be fair. Much confirms the Jewish Masoretic text, but there are instances where it does not and these are theological and doctrinal problems for the Christian if he only knew.

Then in 1524-25, Bomberg published a second edition edited by Abraham Ben Chayyim (or Ben Hayyim) iben Adonijah. This is called the Ben Chayyim edition of the Hebrew text. Daniel Bomberg's edition, on which the KJV is based, was the Ben Chayyim Masoretic Text. This was called the Second Great Rabbinic Bible. This became the standard Masoretic text for the next 400 years. All along you need to understand this is a fraudulent text and now the people, uneducated, never knew. Sounds a lot like today. They accepted what they had been handed just like you and me. Bomberg never knew himself for the adulteration of the Jewish Scriptures into Greek was clouded in embellished legends (the letter of Aristeas) which had grown around the importance and divine creation of the Greek translation which scholars today recognize as lies told to increase the importance and acceptance of this falsified text by the Gentiles as against the Jewish Bible. You need to realize when one begins with a misrepresented text, and when quotes are taken from these falsified, perverted, twisted, and adulterated passages, then the quotes are just a wrong as its parent document!

"The Ben Chayyim Masoretic Text was used even in the first two editions of Biblia Hebraica by Rudolf Kittel.

The dates on those first two editions were 1906 and 1912. He used the same Hebrew text as the KJV translators (it is already corrupted). Now the KJV has this same falsified and corrupted Old Testament as the Septuagint and few know today; except the Rabbis who both know and read Hebrew.

Answer for yourself: Have you ever wondered why the Rabbis don't use the Christian Bible's Old Testament? Could it be that they know it is theologically mutant in many places? Why not use it if it is accurate?

SO WHY HAS CHRISTIANS REJECTED THE JEWISH BIBLE JESUS USED? IS "OLDEST" REALLY THE "BEST"?

Today, the reason that most of the Hebrew departments, in colleges, universities, and seminaries who teach Hebrew, use Septuagint and Christian Old Testaments instead of the Palestinian Masoretic text is the same reason they use the critical Greek text in the N.T. They believe the "oldest" texts, either in Hebrew or in Greek, must always be the best.Not necessarily. Since no copies of the Masoretic text could be found till the 9th century A.D. these “differences” of what I spoke were assumed to be nothing more than a Jewish reaction to Christianity. Christian writers and scholars of their day assumed that the variant readings were because the Jewish Rabbis removed the “prophecies” in reaction to Christianity and Jesus. Without sufficient knowledge and on the surface this makes all the sense. We have two Old Testaments. One is made to be a constant prophecy about the Messiah or Jesus. The other is not. The Greek manuscripts of the Jewish Hebrew Scriptures were older than any existing Jewish Masoretic texts by a thousand years, and following the rule "oldest is best" preference was given by most to the Greek translation over the Hebrew Masoretic text. Not all agreed however. I find it rather startling that Clement of Rome, the first Bishop of Rome, referenced in all his writings the Jewish Masoretic Palestinian text and never quoted from the Greek. Check me out and see if I am right. The first Church father beyond Paul did not use the Greek Scriptures and he was the Bishop of Rome.

Answer for yourself: What did he know that we don't? Could he possibly have known that the Greek translation had been perverted and misrepresented the Messiah so badly that he could not use it?

So, logically following the “oldest is best” rule the Christians paid little attention the the Jewish Bible and their Jewish texts which were definitely “not Christianized (in the form of promotion of the Essene Angel-Messiah).” What you need to understand is that even though these Greek translations might be the oldest, they were doctored by Essene heretics and therefore are not the "best" regardless that they are the oldest. Oldest never means most accurate or truthful.

Answer for yourself: But how can we know for sure? How can we know the Rabbis' Old Testaments today are true and the Christian Old Testament falsified? Until the last 50 years it has been one camp vs the other camp; opinion vs opinion. Nothing was settled.

THE ROCKS CRY OUT

Then God did something wonderful.

With the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls came evidence to the existence of this Jewish Masoretic text just as old or older then the Septuagint (Greek translations of the Old Testament). The identical similarity of a texts separated by over a thousand years was infinitesimal. The accuracy was astonishing and almost beyond belief. No longer could Christians say the Jews changed their Old Testaments after Jesus as a sour-grapes reaction to Christianity! Since the discovery of the manuscripts at Qumran we now have copies of the same texts reading identical which are separated by more than one thousand years. This exactness in the comparison of the 900 A.D. texts with the 200 B.C.E. texts has convinced textual scholars, both Jews and Christians, that such uniformness can be applied safely to all of the Masoretic texts. It must not be forgotten that we now have in our possession Masoretic texts as old or order than the Septuagint which contradict and correct the deviant readings which were added to the Greek mistranslation of the Hebrew texts by the Alexandrian Greek-Jews and Essenes. We now know the Septuagint is the errant text and one needs to begin to examine the origin of this translation in order to come to an understanding who it was that was behind the translation, and the existing religious beliefs of the sect that translated it, and their reasons for doing so.

The discovery at Qumran revealed that the Masoretic text we have today as preserved and used by Rabbis all over the world, is the same Masoretic text unaltered for the most part that existed long before the time of Jesus. It is this Masoretic text which should have been used in all readings of the Christian's Old Testament and it was not! And again let us not forget that this Jewish Masoretic text, as found at Qumran, differs considerably with the Greek translations found there also. If this more accurate Masoretic text had been used for the Christian's Old Testament instead of the corrupted Essene one, then the lies told about Jesus in the New Testament would not have existed, or at least been promulgated as if were Divine fiat.

What should concern you now is whether you want to read the real Word of God before you die or not. What should concern you is that you have a choice before you: you can obtain an "accurate" translation of the Jewish Scriptures in English by accepting the Jewish Tanakh, or you can continue to read your contemporary Christian Old Testament and its fables concerning a godman Angel-Messiah. A "translation" is what you were expecting when you bought your Christian Bible; you got a purposeful mistranslation in many places, and not possessing the knowledge, you are forced to read it not discerning the meat from the bones.

Answer for yourself: Don't you want a faithful translation? If it could be proven to you that the Greek translation was falsified over two thousand years ago would you not want to know? It it could be shown that those who did this translation were not the Rabbis as attested by legend as you have been told... would you want to know? Do you want to get behind the legends and get the facts and the truth?

DID JESUS LEAVE US ANY CLUES?

Not only was the Jewish Scripture preserved by the Jews in Palestine, but it was authorized by Jesus. Understand that in Jesus' day the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures existed and had for almost two hundred years. It can be shown that Jesus authorized the traditional Masoretic Hebrew O.T. text and not the Greek translation of these Jewish Scriptures:

Matt 4:4

4 But he answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.

Matt 5:17-18

17 Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill.

18 For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled (referencing the Hebrew text and not the Greek).

Luke 24:44

44 And he said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms, concerning me.

Jesus never refuted any text, any word, or any letter in the Hebrew O.T. He didn't say, "Now Moses was misquoted here, it should have been this..." Jesus neve said: "We need to get the Greek translation because the Messianic prophecies in the Hebrew have been altered and I have been taken out of them." He never said: "The doctrines as taught in the Hebrew texts have passed away and the newer ones in the Greek is what God really intended to say." THINK!

He offered no textual criticism whatever. Had there been any changes, I'm sure he would have at least mentioned it somewhere in his teaching and preaching or at least corrected it if it had been in error. If he had then we would have some record of it, but in all that is recorded of his life and his sayings there is not one instance of him ever correcting "the text" or telling us that the existing Greek translation is the true Word of God and should be heeded over the Palestinian Masoretic text. Jesus was quick to correct sin and error in behavior of the people, and the source for his authority and truth which was the standard for all mankind's conduct was the Hebrew texts. It would seem that if such beliefs and dogmas in the Hebrew Masoretic text had been wrong and different ones and changes in the Greek translation had been right, then Jesus would have been a hypocrite to teach from and correct others from a Hebrew Masoretic text which was not authoritative or Divine. Jesus, if from God, would have been obligated to teach from the new improved Greek Bible. He did not!

Jesus never alluded to the Greek Bible once, but always referred to the Jewish Masoretic text as it existed in his day! Understand the Greek texts and translation of the Jewish Scriptures existed in his day and this Greek Bible had 4 divisions and not 3 like the Jewish Bible. Again, he tells us in Luke 24:44 that it is the: 1) Law of Moses, 2) prophets, and 3) psalms where all is to be fulfilled. (3 divisions and not 4). Jesus alludes directly to the Jewish Bible and not the Greek Bible.

Answer for yourself: Don't you think Jesus knew of the alterations and corruptions of the Greek translation and could this be the reason both he and the Jewish religious leaders in Palestine refused to use it?

Jesus' stamp of approval is on the Masoretic Hebrew text, and yours needs to be as well.

Shalom.

DID THE RABBIS TRANSLATE ONLY THE FIRST 5 BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT?

As legends would have it the Jews are credited with translating the Jewish Scriptures in the Greek; thus giving the world the Greek Old Testament. In reality, this is just not so. Only when one come to the correct understanding of history and the origin of the LXX can one explain why this Greek OT deviates in hundreds of places from the Masoretic Hebrew Text. Often men will say that the LXX is a faithful translation of the Jewish Masoretic Text, but personal research into the true history will reveal to the serious student the fallacy of such false traditions. This explains the hundreds of purposeful misquotations and mistranslations that litter the pages of the LXX. The problem is no one knows, unless he compares line upon line and precept upon precept with the Jewish Tanakh. Such research will reveal to you how, among other things how "young woman" becomes "virgin" in Isaiah. I have done such homework. Have you? So let us study Josephus and see what he has to say on the matter of the translation of the Jewish Scriptures into the Greek.

THE ANTIQUITIES OF THE JEWS…PREFACE

1. THOSE who undertake to write histories, do not, I perceive, take that trouble on one and the same account, but for many reasons, and those such as are very different one from another. For some of them apply themselves to this part of learning to show their skill in composition, and that they may therein acquire a reputation for speaking finely: others of them there are, who write histories in order to gratify those that happen to be concerned in them, and on that account have spared no pains, but rather gone beyond their own abilities in the performance: but others there are, who, of necessity and by force, are driven to write history, because they are concerned in the facts, and so cannot excuse themselves from committing them to writing, for the advantage of posterity; nay, there are not a few who are induced to draw their historical facts out of darkness into light, and to produce them for the benefit of the public, on account of the great importance of the facts themselves with which they have been concerned. Now of these several reasons for writing history, I must profess the two last were my own reasons also; for since I was myself interested in that war which we Jews had with the Romans, and knew myself its particular actions, and what conclusion it had, I was forced to give the history of it, because I saw that others perverted the truth of those actions in their writings.
2. Now I have undertaken the present work, as thinking it will appear to all the Greeks (2) worthy of their study; for it will contain all our antiquities, and the constitution of our government, as interpreted out of the Hebrew Scriptures. And indeed I did formerly intend, when I wrote of the war, (3) to explain who the Jews originally were, - what fortunes they had been subject to, - and by what legislature they had been instructed in piety, and the exercise of other virtues, - what wars also they had made in remote ages, till they were unwillingly engaged in this last with the Romans: but because this work would take up a great compass, I separated it into a set treatise by itself, with a beginning of its own, and its own conclusion; but in process of time, as usually happens to such as undertake great things, I grew weary and went on slowly, it being a large subject, and a difficult thing to translate our history into a foreign, and to us unaccustomed language. However, some persons there were who desired to know our history, and so exhorted me to go on with it; and, above all the rest, Epaphroditus, (4) a man who is a lover of all kind of learning, but is principally delighted with the knowledge of history, and this on account of his having been himself concerned in great affairs, and many turns of fortune, and having shown a wonderful rigor of an excellent nature, and an immovable virtuous resolution in them all. I yielded to this man's persuasions, who always excites such as have abilities in what is useful and acceptable, to join their endeavors with his. I was also ashamed myself to permit any laziness of disposition to have a greater influence upon me, than the delight of taking pains in such studies as were very useful: I thereupon stirred up myself, and went on with my work more cheerfully. Besides the foregoing motives, I had others which I greatly reflected on; and these were, that our forefathers were willing to communicate such things to others; and that some of the Greeks took considerable pains to know the affairs of our nation.

3. I found, therefore, that the second of the Ptolemies was a king who was extraordinarily diligent in what concerned learning, and the collection of books; that he was also peculiarly ambitious to procure a translation of our law, and of the constitution of our government therein contained, into the Greek tongue. Now Eleazar the high priest, one not inferior to any other of that dignity among us, did not envy the forenamed king the participation of that advantage, which otherwise he would for certain have denied him, but that he knew the custom of our nation was, to hinder nothing of what we esteemed ourselves from being communicated to others. Accordingly, I thought it became me both to imitate the generosity of our high priest, and to suppose there might even now be many lovers of learning like the king; for he did not obtain all our writings at that time; but those who were sent to Alexandria as interpreters, gave him only the books of the law, while there were a vast number of other matters in our sacred books. They, indeed, contain in them the history of five thousand years; in which time happened many strange accidents, many chances of war, and great actions of the commanders, and mutations of the form of our government. Upon the whole, a man that will peruse this history, may principally learn from it, that all events succeed well, even to an incredible degree, and the reward of felicity is proposed by God; but then it is to those that follow his will, and do not venture to break his excellent laws: and that so far as men any way apostatize from the accurate observation of them, what was practical before becomes impracticable (5) and whatsoever they set about as a good thing, is converted into an incurable calamity. And now I exhort all those that peruse these books, to apply their minds to God; and to examine the mind of our legislator, whether he hath not understood his nature in a manner worthy of him; and hath not ever ascribed to him such operations as become his power, and hath not preserved his writings from those indecent fables which others have framed, although, by the great distance of time when he lived, he might have securely forged such lies; for he lived two thousand years ago; at which vast distance of ages the poets themselves have not been so hardy as to fix even the generations of their gods, much less the actions of their men, or their own laws. As I proceed, therefore, I shall accurately describe what is contained in our records, in the order of time that belongs to them; for I have already promised so to do throughout this undertaking; and this without adding any thing to what is therein contained, or taking away any thing therefrom.

4. But because almost all our constitution depends on the wisdom of Moses, our legislator, I cannot avoid saying somewhat concerning him beforehand, though I shall do it briefly; I mean, because otherwise those that read my book may wonder how it comes to pass, that my discourse, which promises an account of laws and historical facts, contains so much of philosophy. The reader is therefore to know, that Moses deemed it exceeding necessary, that he who would conduct his own life well, and give laws to others, in the first place should consider the Divine nature; and, upon the contemplation of God's operations, should thereby imitate the best of all patterns, so far as it is possible for human nature to do, and to endeavor to follow after it: neither could the legislator himself have a right mind without such a contemplation; nor would any thing he should write tend to the promotion of virtue in his readers; I mean, unless they be taught first of all, that God is the Father and Lord of all things, and sees all things, and that thence he bestows a happy life upon those that follow him; but plunges such as do not walk in the paths of virtue into inevitable miseries. Now when Moses was desirous to teach this lesson to his countrymen, he did not begin the establishment of his laws after the same manner that other legislators did; I mean, upon contracts and other rights between one man and another, but by raising their minds upwards to regard God, and his creation of the world; and by persuading them, that we men are the most excellent of the creatures of God upon earth. Now when once he had brought them to submit to religion, he easily persuaded them to submit in all other things: for as to other legislators, they followed fables, and by their discourses transferred the most reproachful of human vices unto the gods, and afforded wicked men the most plausible excuses for their crimes; but as for our legislator, when he had once demonstrated that God was possessed of perfect virtue, he supposed that men also ought to strive after the participation of it; and on those who did not so think, and so believe, he inflicted the severest punishments. I exhort, therefore, my readers to examine this whole undertaking in that view; for thereby it will appear to them, that there is nothing therein disagreeable either to the majesty of God, or to his love to mankind; for all things have here a reference to the nature of the universe; while our legislator speaks some things wisely, but enigmatically, and others under a decent allegory, but still explains such things as required a direct explication plainly and expressly. However, those that have a mind to know the reasons of every thing, may find here a very curious philosophical theory, which I now indeed shall wave the explication of; but if God afford me time for it, I will set about writing it (6) after I have finished the present work. I shall now betake myself to the history before me, after I have first mentioned what Moses says of the creation of the world, which I find described in the sacred books after the manner following.

SO WHY SHOULD THIS MATTER TO THE CHRISTIAN?

First of all you should desire as truthful translation of the Jewish Scriptures Yeshua used as possible. For over 200 years the Greek translation had been in existence and falsely translated by the Greek-Jews of Alexandria for theological purposes who patterned YHVH's Messianic predictions after their pagan gods. Such is the fruit of Hellenization on the Jews. In many places the Word of YHVH has been altered to make the Messiah conform to the pattern of mystery religions. As it that was not enough, when one's religious belief system includes a belief about Yeshua, then understand prophecies altered in the LXX would mistakenly be applied to him which have little relevance to his historical existence. False beliefs are attached to Yeshua let alone the Jewish Messiah. Many of these beliefs, all stemming from a fraudulent translation, are in the Words of the Jewish Scriptures considered sin by YHVH. And if that is not enough, this falsified Greek translation, in which the Jewish Rabbis only translated the first 5 books, has become the substrate for all Greek New Testaments which follow. If the Greek NT is based off a fraudulent translation of the Palestinian Masoretic text in hundreds of places because of the theological agendas of these Greek-Jewsish Pythagorean-Buddhists of Alexandria, Egypt, in the first two centuries B.C.E. as well as the futher corruptions by the monks during the Church age, then understand the Christian Bibles we have are false as well in these places. The quest for you is to divide the truth from the chaff. Such is an absolute impossibility without years of intense study in manuscript evidences. I have devoted much of my life to such a purpose and share these findings with you in hopes you, the reader, will understand that such alterations pass off today as truth and the sad fact of the reality of the matter is that God never gave it and Yeshua never believed it. Thus when alluding to the Scriptures in his day, Yeshua on two occasions mentions that the Palestinian text, and not the LXX, refers to him. Without a doubt Yeshua knew of the problems with the Greek translation in his day. So did the Rabbis.

Answer for yourself: Do You? And does it matter to you? The bottom line in all of this dear one, is that unless you have the Palestinian text, you have never read the unadulterated Word of God yet in you life. You have accepted in total faith a religious propagandist document full of hundreds of mistranslations, misquotations, and verses lifted out of context which has almost destroyed the true revelation of the Messiah given to Israel. If this touches your heart let us hear from you as we can help you better worship the Father in Spirit and in Truth and not through corrupted pagan texts mixed with some truth as found in your Christian Bibles. Shalom.

MORE TRUTH ABOUT THE ORIGIN OF THE GREEK TRANSLATION OF THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES

Werner Keller in his book The Bible As History: Second Revised Edition, gives us an interesting insight into the origin of the Greek Scriptures. He has no ax to grind. He isn't writing "contra" anything, but simply showing how archaeology and science delve 4,000 years into the past to document the Bible as history. He writes:

"Two unusually far-sighted rulers, Ptolemy I and his son Ptolemy II Philadelphus, developed their capital city of Alexandria into a nursery of Hellenistic culture and learning . . . and made it a radiant center of attraction for emigrants from Judah among others. In this crucible they steeped themselves in the beauty of the Greek language . . . It was the international language of learning and of commerce, the language of tens of thousands of Israelites who knew no other home.

"The rising generation no longer knew Hebrew as their mother tongue. They could no longer follow the sacred text in the services of the synagogue. Thus it came about that the Jews in Egypt decided to translate the Hebrew scriptures. About 250 B.C. the Torah [FIRST FIVE BOOKS OF THE BIBLE ONLY...my emphasis] was translated into Greek, a fact of immeasurable import for Western civilization.

"The translation of the Bible into the Greek tongue was for the Jews in Egypt such an incredible step forward that legend took hold of it. The story is told in an apocryphal letter of Aristeas of Alexandria.

"Philadelphus, the second of the Ptolemaic dynasty, took great pride in the fact that he possessed a collection of the finest books in the world. One day the librarian said to the monarch that he had brought together in his 995 books the best literature of all nations. But, he added, the greatest books of all, the five books of Moses, were not included among them. Therefore Ptolemy II Philadelphus sent envoys to the high Priest to ask for a copy of these books. At the same time he asked for men to be sent who could translate them into Greek [the five books only]. The High Priest granted his request and sent together with the copy of the Torah 72 learned and wise scribes. Great celebrations were organized in honour of the visitors from Jerusalem, at whose wisdom and knowledge the king and his courtiers were greatly astonished. After the festivities they betook themselves to the extremely difficult task which had been assigned to them . . ." (p.312).

Max I. Dimont, in his book Jews, God and History, also discusses the Septuagint.

"There is an interesting legend telling how the Greek translation of the Old Testament came to be called the Septuagint. About 250 B.C., word of a famous and beautifully written book possessed by the Jews had reached the ear of the Ptolemaic King Philadelphus. He suggested that seventy Jewish scholars translate the work into Greek. According to this pious legend, each of the seventy scholars worked independently, yet all seventy translations, when completed, were identical, word for word, thus proving God's guiding hand. And so the work became known as the book of the 'Seventy,' or Septuagint in Greek" (p.114).

Modern scholars tend to discount this legend, as preserved in a "Letter of Aristeas." All scholars agree that the first five books of Moses were translated in Alexandria, Egypt, during the time of the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus! Furthermore, all the ANCIENT sources agree that the essentials of the "letter of Aristeas" are true -- including the Jewish high priest Aristobulus who lived in Alexandria less than a century later, the Jewish historian Josephus of the first century A.D., and the Jewish philosopher and moralist Philo, who lived in Alexandria during the time of Peter and the apostles.

Philo, in his account of the history of the Septuagint, relates the following:

"Some persons, thinking it a scandalous thing that these laws [of Moses] should only be known among one half portion of the human race, namely, among the barbarians, and that the Greek nations should be wholly and entirely ignorant of them, turned their attention to their translation...He, then, being a sovereign of this character, and having conceived a great admiration for and love of the legislation of Moses, conceived the idea of having our laws translated into the Greek language; and immediately he sent ambassadors to the high-priest and king of Judea, for they were the same person. And having explained his wishes, and having requested him to pick him out a number of men, of perfect fitness for the task, who should translate the law, the high-priest, as was natural, being greatly pleased, and thinking that the king had only felt the inclination to undertake a work of such character from having been influenced by the providence of God, considered, and with great care selected the most respectable of the Hebrews whom he had about him, who in addition to their knowledge of their national scriptures, had also been well instructed in Grecian literature, and cheerfully sent them... (The Works of Philo, p.494).

The Witness of Aristobulus, the High Priest, says The New Westminster Dictionary of the Bible about the origin of the Septuagint:

"The Septuagint. The Old Greek version of the Hebrew Scriptures and the earliest complete translation of them. It was called the Septuagint, commonly designated by LXX, after the 70 translators reputed to have been employed on the Pentateuch in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, 285-246 B.C. The number 70 may be an approximation for 72, or it may have developed traditionally . . . Originally the name was applied to the translation of the Pentateuch, but eventually to the whole Greek Old Testament. Aristobulus, a Jewish high priest who lived in Alexandria during the reign of ptolemy philometor 181/180-145 B.C., and who is mentioned in II Maccabees 1:10b, is quoted by Clement of Alexandria and Eusebius as stating that while portions relating to Hebrew history had been translated into Greek previously, THE ENTIRE LAW WAS TRANSLATED from the Hebrew IN THE REIGN OF PTOLEMY PHILADELPHUS under the direction of Demetrius Phalereus" (p.971).

Before we go on, notice that this man, Aristobulus, himself was a high-ranking High Priest and obviously a well-informed, intelligent man, and he lived in Alexandria, Egypt for a while, and that he lived between 60-100 years after the translation was reputed to have taken place. This is important to consider. He very likely had access to knowledge and information we do not have, today. His testimony that the translation of the Hebrew Scriptures contained only the First Five Books Of Moses ought to be considered conclusive on this point. He testifies that indeed the law of Moses was translated from Hebrew to Greek during the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. There was no doubt in his mind, and he lived there -- and only one or two generations removed from the actual event itself!

The same tradition, but considerably embellished, is contained in a letter purporting to have been written by Aristeas to Philocrates. This letter is generally regarded by modern scholars as spurious. It is the same story as that told by Aristeas which is repeated with slight variations by Josephus, who may have had access to the letter."

Notice! Now we have two ancient authorities who confirm the essential story of the translation of the Pentateuch into Greek during the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. "In the mouth of two or three witnesses he every word be established," God says. The fact that Josephus' account differs slightly -- has "variations" -- from the letter of Aristeas is proof that he did not just copy the letter or get his information from the letter itself, entirely, but had other sources at his disposal. These slight "variations" add further weight to the evidence that only the First Five Books of the Hebrew Scriptures were translated into the Greek and not the whole of the Hebrew Scriptures.

Josephus, the Jewish historian of the first century, gives us additional insight into the origin of the Septuagint. His version tends to confirm at least the essentials of the so-called "legend" as given in the "Letter of Aristeas." Josephus, who lived in the generation following Christ, and who fought in the Jewish-Roman war of 70 A.D., wrote in his Antiquities of the Jews this straightforward account:

". . .Philadelphus then took the kingdom of Egypt, and held it forty years within one. He procured the law to be interpreted, and set free those that were come from Jerusalem into Egypt, and were in slavery there, who were a hundred and twenty thousand. The occasion was this: -- Demetrius Pharerius, who was library-keeper to the king, was now endeavoring, if it were possible, to gather together all the books that were in the habitable earth, and buying whatsoever was anywhere valuable, or agreeable to the king's inclination, (who was very earnestly set upon collecting of books;) to which inclination of his, Demetrius was zealously subservient. And when once Ptolemy asked him how many ten thousands of books he had collected, he replied, that he had already about twenty times ten thousand; but that in a little time, he should have fifty times ten thousand. But he said he had been informed that there were many books of laws among the Jews worthy of inquiring after, and worthy of the king's library, but which, being written in characters and in a dialect of their own, will cause no small pains in getting them translated into the Greek tongue . . . So the king thought that Demetrius was very zealous to procure him abundance of books, and that he suggested what was exceeding proper for him to do; and therefore he wrote to the Jewish high priest that he should act accordingly" (Antiquities, Book XII, 1, p.246).

Josephus gives a very in depth presentation of the details of this event. He tells how Aristeus, one of the king's most intimate friends, resolved to petition the king to set all the captive Jews in his kingdom free. Knowing of the desire to get the Jewish books of the law, for the king, he made the following speech to the king:

"It is not fit for us, O king, to overlook things hastily, or to deceive ourselves, but to lay the truth open: for since we have determined not only to get the laws of the Jews transcribed, but interpreted also, for thy satisfaction, by what means can we do this, while so many of the Jews are now slaves in thy kingdom? Do thou then what will be agreeable to thy magnanimity, and to thy good-nature: free them from the miserable condition they are in, because that God, who supporteth thy kingdom, was the author of their laws, as I have learned by particular inquiry; for both these people and we also worship the same God, the framer of all things" (XII, 2).

The entire account, preserved in Josephus, rings true. The king was appealed to and his counselors backed up the request, and the slaves who had been captured by his father or himself were released. Josephus quotes the king's decree. The king then sent fifty talents of gold to the Jewish high priest, and a huge quantity of precious stones, and appointed one hundred talents in money to be used for temple sacrifices in Jerusalem, accompanied by a letter to the high priest Eleazar, stating, in part:

> "I have determined to procure an interpretation of your law, and to have it translated out of Hebrew into Greek, and to be deposited in my library. Thou wilt therefore do well to choose out and send to me men of a good character, who are now elders in age, and six in number out of every tribe. These, by their age, must be skillful in the laws, and of abilities to make an accurate interpretation of them; and when this shall be finished, I shall think that I have done a work glorious to myself . . ."

Eleazar the high priest send back a reply as follows:

> "When we received thy epistle, we greatly rejoiced at thy intentions; and when the multitude were gathered together, we read it to them, and thereby made them sensible of the piety thou hast towards God. . . . Know then that we will gratify thee in what is for thy advantage, though we do what we used not to do before. . . We have also chosen six elders out of every tribe, which we have sent, and the law with them . . ."

The details that Josephus brings to the whole account, together with the witnesses of Philo, Aristobulus, and Biblical scholarship, all prove conclusively that the translation of the five books of Moses during the time of Ptolemy Philadelpus was not a mere legend, but that the essential contents of the "letter of Aristeas" are based on actual fact. Josephus gives rich incredible detail as to the gifts sent, the return to Egypt, the celebrations, and the journey to the island where the work of translation of the five books of Moses was to be undertaken. Josephus records:

"When he had brought them thither, he entreated them (now they had all things about them which they wanted for the interpretation of their law), that they would suffer nothing to interrupt them in their work. Accordingly, they made an ACCURATE INTERPRETATION, with great zeal and great pains; and they continued to do until the ninth hour of the day; after which time they relaxed and took care of their body, while their food was provided for them in great plenty Now when the law was transcribed, and the labour of interpretation was over, which came to its conclusion in seventy-two days, Demetrius gathered all the Jews together to the place where the laws were translated, and where the interpreters were, and read them over. The multitude did also approve of those elders that were the interpreters of the law" (Antiquities, Bk XII, 13-14).

THE DIFFICULTY SURROUNDING WHEN WAS THE SEPTUAGINT WRITTEN?

You may not know it yet but there is a real problem associated with the dating of the Septuagint. If we go with the tradition that the Septuagint was translated by the Rabbis then we date the book in the third century as the accounts above attest. But we find that only the Rabbis translated the first 5 Books of the Torah only. What we uncover is that the Gnostic Essenes of Alexandria will translate the Prophets and Writings later in the second century. Let us examine some sources that discuss the dating of the Septuagint. Says Unger's Bible Dictionary, about the origin of the Septuagint:

"The Greek Septuagint. The Hebrew Old Testament enjoys the unique distinction of being the first book or rather library of books, for such it is, known to be translated into another language. This translation is called the Septuagint and was made IN THE THIRD AND SECOND CENTURIES B.C. During this period the entire Hebrew Bible was put into the Greek language. It was in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus (285-246 B.C.) that the Pentateuch was put into the Greek tongue Certainly by the middle of the second century B.C. the Old Testament was COMPLETELY RENDERED IN GREEK. The name Septuagint was eventually applied to the entire Greek Old Testament" (p.1147).

Answer for yourself: Why must we be careful about the above attestation by the Under Bible Dictionary? Simply because there is a big difference between the translation of the Law by the Rabbis and the later translation of the Prophets and Writings some 100 plus years later. It would be during this time that many theological dogmas would be altered as well as inserted into the Essene translation of the Hebrew Scriptures.

The dean of evangelical Biblical scholars, F. F. Bruce, says in his excellent book The Canon of Scripture concerning the Septuagint:

"The Greek translation of the scriptures was made available from time to time in the third and second centuries B.C. (say during the century 250-150 B.C.). The law, comprising the five books of Moses, was the first part of the scriptures to appear in a Greek version; the reading of the law was essential to synagogue worship, and it was important that what was read should be intelligible to the congregation" (p.43-44).

The Interpreters Dictionary of the Bible, under the heading "Septuagint," tells us about the character of the Septuagint. Says this multi-volume authority:

"The Greek OT as it exists today is a composite book, the work of various translators of varied ability who worked at different times. The whole OT was probably complete by the middle, certainly by the end, of the second century B.C. It is generally held that the provenance of all of them was Egypt . . . The Pentateuch was undoubtedly translated first, probably during the reign of Philadelphus" (volume 4, p.276). "Probably" is not good enough for me. So let us keep going.

Peloubet's Bible Dictionary tells us further, about the Septuagint:

"The Jews of Alexandria had probably still less knowledge of Hebrew than their brethren in Palestine; their familiar language was Alexandrian Greek. They had settled in Alexandria in large numbers soon after the time of Alexander, and under the early Ptolemies. They would naturally follow the same practice as the Jews in Palestine; and hence would arise in time an entire Greek version. The commonly received story respecting its origin is contained in an extant letter ascribed to Aristeas . . . This is the story which probably gave to the version the title of the Septuagint, and which has been repeated in various forms by the Christian writers. But it is now generally admitted that the letter is spurious, and is probably the fabrication of an Alexandrian Jews shortly before the Christian era. Still, there can be no doubt that there was a basis of fact for the fiction; on three points of the story there is no material difference of opinion, and they are Confirmed by the study of the version itself:

- 1. The version was made at Alexandria.
- 2. It was begun in the time of the early ptolemies, about 280 B.C.
- 3. The law (i.e., the Pentateuch) alone was translated at first" [this is what I have been saying...the Rabbis only translated the first five Books of Moses ONLY].

"The Septuagint version was highly esteemed by the Hellenistic Jews before the coming of Christ. Because of the dispersion of the Jews throughout the world the Greek translation of their Scriptures was an important factor in preparing the way for Christ's coming. Its existence in a language which could be read throughout the world made even the Gentiles familiar with the beliefs of the Jews, and their wonderful history which would of course include the guiding Providence of God, and his promise of a Saviour to come, throughout the nations. No less wide was the influence of the Septuagint in the spread of the Gospel. For a long period the Septuagint was the Old Testament of the far larger part of the Christian Church" (p.604).

No doubt the LXX paved the way for the acceptance of later Christian religious dogmas concerning the Christ; namely it will become the Old Testament of the Gentile Christian Church along with the fact that it contained the addition and adulteration of the Hebrew Scriptures in which religious doctrines concerning the Essene's Angel-Messiah were written in places within the translation normally reserved for the Jewish human messiah. The Cosmic Godman dogmas were inserted and developed in the Essene's translation of the Hebrew Scriptures and later this assumes a life of its own under the Pauline influence which itself also later shaped and influenced the writers of the New Testament.

The New Bible Dictionary tells us more about the Septuagint. It corroborates the account of Peloubet, and other scholars, and provides additional details for us to consider. As to the origin of the Septuagint, it declares:

"1. ORIGINS. Its precise origins are still debated. A letter, purporting to be written by a certain Aristeas to his brother Philocrates in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus (285-246 B.C.), relates how Philadelphus, persuaded by his librarian to get a translation of the Hebrew scriptures for his royal library, appealed to the high priest at Jerusalem The same story is told WITH VARIATIONS by Josephus [indicating that Josephus the historian also had OTHER SOURCES for his detailed version of the event], but later writers embellish it with miraculous details. A Jewish priest Aristobulus, who lived in the 2nd century B.C., is quoted by Clement of Alexandria and Eusebius as stating that while portions relating to Hebrew history had been translated into Greek previously, THE ENTIRE LAW WAS TRANSLATED IN THE REIGN OF PTOLEMY PHILADELPHUS . . ." (p.1258).

NOW LET US PAY ATTENTION TO WHAT IS SAID NEXT....VERY CAREFULLY

The New Bible Dictionary provides us the some other very important information concerning the Septuagint by pointing out:

"But in numerous places the unrevised LXX text disagrees with the MT in meaning, order, and content; and this is important, since the LXX was, until recently, the earliest witness to the Old Testament text." No Hebrew MS, until the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, was earlier than the late 9th century A.D. Moreover, these Hebrew MSS all contained the text as edited by the Masoretes, whereas the LXX (i.e., before the main revisions) witness to a pre-Masoretic text. Where it differs from the MT, the LXX is in some places evidently inferior, in other places just as clearly superior; sometimes it is supported by the Samaritan text or one of the Dead Sea Scrolls. These latter occasionally agree with the LXX, where formerly we thought that the LXX was merely a loose paraphrase, unauthorized by any Hebrew . . ." (p.1260).

Answer for yourself: How in the world can the LXX disagree the Hebrew Masoretic Text "IN MEANING, ORDER, AND CONTENT" if it is an accurate translation taken from it? Simply it cannot; unless the Jewish scribes and scholars purposely altered their texts to "write out Jesus."

We have to consider that it is possible that the Jewish sages and scholars possibly did "write out Jesus" during the years of the canonization of the Hebrew Scriptures as the reason for such a wide theological diversity that exits between the LXX and the Jewish Masoretic text. The Gentile Christian Church, which has accepted the LXX for their Old Testaments over the Hebrew Masoretic text, has believed that to be the case now for over 1900 years as the reason why the earliest known copies of the Jewish Bible from the 9th century differ so significantly theologically when compared with the LXX.

But if we are honest we have to allow likewise that it was not the Palestinian Jews but the Essene translators of Alexandria, Egypt, who would later "write into the Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures" their own religious beliefs concerning their Angel-Messiah...Cosmic godman and that it would be these erroneous and bogus religious texts that would later be applied to their Teacher of Righteousness and later Jesus following his death not only by the Essenes in Palestine but by the non Hebrew speaking Gentiles and Jews (being that this is the only Bible that they could read). Let us never forget that the Essene Angel-Messiah was but a concept, an office if you like, that was to be fulfilled by one who was to come. History records for us that this cosmic godman was first recognized in the Essene's Teacher of Righteousness and following his death his return was seen by then in his reincarnation as Jesus much later (Acts 6...where a great company of Priests [Essenes] converted to the faith).

Answer for yourself: Which is it? Was the LXX a butchered and forged translation of the existing Hebrew Scriptures or was the Hebrew Masoretic Texts altered to "write out Jesus?"

We have seen that it was only the Palestinian Rabbis which translated the first Five Books of Moses ONLY! If you are not aware of it there is not a lot of "messianic materials" explicitly mentioned in these 5 books. We have to look elsewhere for our "messianic doctrines" like the Prophets and the Writings, but as we saw, the Palestinian Rabbis did not translate them but this translation was done over the next 150 year or so by others in Alexandria, Egypt. We know from other studies that it was the Essenes of Alexandria who had their own theolgoical university no less which would undertake such a task. It would be this Essene translation when added to the first Five Books of Moses which would later comprise the LXX we know today.

Let us read and think clearly about what comes next!

It is not in question that Paul and the early Gentile Church along with the later Gospel writers who were under his influence used the Septuagint version of the Old Testament and not the Masoretic Hebrew texts that existed. Of course this is to be expected considering that the intended audience could not read Hebrew and since they were unfamiliar with the readings from the Hebrew these Greek renderings of these prior Essene translated texts suited their purpose and theological agendas especially in light of the fact that both Paul and the Essenes saw in the expected Jewish Messiah a "Divine Mediator" as the Gnostic Redeemer. If you know anything about Gnosticism then you know their understanding of the Messiah of Israel was that he was not a "human" but a Divine Creature. Thus the injunction to believe that "Christ has come in the flesh." The Gnostic Redeemer had no physical body. This explains why Paul hardly deals with the historical Jesus and only mention just two of Jesus' teaching which are but "one liners" in all of his writings in the New Testament which is primarily 2/3 Pauline literature. Paul never met nor was interested in the human Jesus or the human Messiah. What we fail to understand today is that the apocalyptic sects of that day and time expected a Cosmic Godman-Redeemer to come in the the like of the Osiris Pattern. This sadly is what we read in the New Testament and a lot of places in our Christian Old Testaments in these Essene altered texts and never know it!

Heightened credibility was given the translation of the LXX not only by the false traditions of the Letter of Aristeas and the later embellishments as to the miracle of its very translation but Irenaeus, who would respond to Marcion's First New Testament with his own Second New Testament, will also state "The Old Testament writings are indispensable witnesses to the history of salvation; the Septuagint version was DIVINELY INSPIRED" (Bruce, p.173; Iraneaus, Against Heresies, 3.21.2). Now we have the testimony of a very important Church Father that the LXX is from God! The Fathers, however, could not rest content with this unvarnished original fabrication in the name of Aristeas, of an ordinary human and errant translation of the "Law"; they avidly set about embellishing it in the accepted clerical style, adding fanciful and lying details to emphasize the miraculous and inspired origin of the Version. Later on their own attestation as to the Divine origin of the LXX guaranteed the success of the LXX over the Palestinian Masoretic text.

Clement of Alexandria, also, stresses the inspiration of the Septuagint version of the Old Testament (Bruce, p.188; Clement, Strom. 1.22). He spent the last quarter of the second century, in Alexandria, before migrating to Asia Minor when persecution came on the church in Alexandria in 202 A.D.

What bothers me is what I discovered in my studies concerning Clement of Rome. What I find amazing is that Clement of Rome, the Bishop of Rome, the first major Christian writer after Paul, used only the Jewish Palestinian text for "all" his quotations of Scripture in his writings and refused to use the LXX. This is not a widely know fact but it is damaging to the typical LXX propaganda churched out by the early Gentile Church (James Kleist, The Epistles of St. Clement Of Rome And St. Ignatius Of Antioch, Newman Press, 1946). It is not as if he did not know Greek, for being the Bishop of Rome dictated such, but yet, he quoted only from the Jewish Scriptures and not the Greek translation.

Answer for yourself: What did he know that we have not been told or know today that made he use the Hebrew over the Greek, yet being the first Pope of the Roman Church in a Greek-Latin speaking nation?

WHAT VERSION DID JESUS AND THE APOSTLES QUOTE FROM?

We read in The New Bible Dictionary:

"V. SIGNIFICANCE. Valuable as a monument of Hellenistic Greek, the LXX occasionally preserves meanings of Hebrew words that were current when the LXX translation was made, but which were subsequently lost. It acts also as a linguistic and theological bridge-head between the Hebrew of the Old Testament and the Greek of the New; for it served as 'Bible' to generations of Greek-speaking Jews in many countries, and it is OFTEN QUOTED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. The New Testament quotations which do not agree with the LXX can be attributed to inexact quotation from memory, the writer's own translation, translation of Aramaic sources, translation of Hebrew texts different from the MT, perhaps to other Greek translations, perhaps also to deliberate adaptation of the Hebrew under the Holy Spirit's guidance.)" (p.1261).

I don't know if you just caught that but the authors of the New Bible Dictionary just told you that the Holy Spirit gave permission to misquote the Word of God!

- Deut 4:2 2 Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish ought from it, that ye may keep the commandments of the LORD your God which I command you. (KJV)
- Deut 12:32 32 What thing soever I command you, observe to do it: thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it. (KJV)

Let it be known that I am not speaking of small differences to what I address; but major theolgoical doctrinal differences between the LXX and the Jewish Masoretic texts of the 9th century A.D.

We really have not proof that the Septuagint was the translation of choice in the vast majority of New Testament quotations from the Old Testament by Christ and the apostles due to the heavy censoring by the Roman church of these texts let alone their continual alteration and subjection of them chronologically to their successive Church Councils where "accepted religious dogmas" were being ground out and "heresies" identified.THINK!

We hear all the time that Jesus quoted from the LXX in the New Testament. We simply don't know this for a fact due to manipulation of these texts by the monks and religious clerics of the Roman Church. We can know certain things for certain if we read closely in the New Testament to information that survived the censors.

DID JESUS LEAVE US ANY CLUES?

Not only was the Hebrew Scriptures preserved by the Jews in Palestine throughout the centuries meticulously, but it was authorized by Jesus in the New Testament. This is just the opposite of what many New Testament writers and scholars would have us believe. Understand that in Jesus' day the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures existed and had for almost two hundred years. Jesus or any Rabbi in Palestine could have referenced it anytime they desired or could choose not to if knowing that is was a falsified and forged version of their Hebrew texts. Much escaped the scissors and pens of the monks and their creative history and theology down through the years but you have to know where to find it (like the fact mentioned above about Clement of Rome and his refusal to use the LXX).

It can be shown that Jesus authorized the traditional Masoretic Hebrew O.T. text and not the Greek translation of these Jewish Scriptures:

- Matt 4:4 4 But he answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.
- Matt 5:17-18 17 Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill. 18 For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled (referencing the Hebrew text and not the Greek).
- Luke 24:44 44 And he said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms, concerning me.

These three Scriptures found in the New Testament no less prove that Jesus did not and would not use the LXX as you shall quickly see! Jesus never refuted any text, any word, or any letter in the Hebrew O.T. He didn't say, "Now Moses was misquoted here, it should have been this..." Jesus neve said: "We need to get the Greek translation of the Old Testament used by the fringe movements of Judaism like the Essenes because the Messianic prophecies in the Hebrew have been altered by the Rabbis and they have taken me out of them." He never said: "The doctrines as taught in the Hebrew texts have passed away and the newer ones that replace them found only in the Greek is what God really intended to say." THINK!

He offered no textual criticism whatever. Had there been any changes to the Hebrew Scriptures that both he and the Pharisaical Rabbis used, I'm sure he would have at least mentioned it somewhere in his teaching and preaching or at least corrected it if it had been in error. If he had then we would have some record of it, but in all that is recorded of his life and his sayings there is not one instance of him ever correcting "the text" or telling us that the existing Greek translation is the true Word of God and should be heeded over the Palestinian Masoretic text in use at that time by the Jews of Palestine and Babylon. Jesus was quick to correct sin and error in behavior of the people, and the source for his authority and truth which was the standard for all mankind's conduct was the Hebrew texts. It would seem that if such beliefs and dogmas in the Hebrew Masoretic text had been wrong and different ones and changes in the Greek translation had been right, then Jesus would have been a hypocrite to teach from and correct others from a Hebrew Masoretic text which was not authoritative or Divine. Jesus, if from God, would have been obligated to teach from the new improved Greek Bible that we are told today Gentile Christianity that is superior to the Hebrew Scriptures. He did not!

Jesus never alluded to the Greek Bible once, but always referred to the Jewish Masoretic text as it existed in his day! Let me explain how this was done. Understand the Greek texts and translation of the Jewish Scriptures existed in his day and this Greek Bible in the days of Jesus was know to have 4 divisions and not 3 like the Jewish Bible. Again, he tells us in Luke 24:44 that it is the:

- 1) Law of Moses,
- 2) prophets, and
- 3) psalms where all is to be fulfilled. (3 divisions of the Bible and not 4).

Answer for yourself: Which Bible is Jesus pointing to in his day...the LXX or the Hebrew Scriptures? Jesus alludes directly to the Jewish Bible and not the Greek Bible.

Answer for yourself: Don't you think Jesus knew of the alterations and corruptions of the Greek translation that were widely know in his day and this was the reason both he and the Jewish religious leaders in Palestine refused to use it?

Jesus' stamp of approval is on the Masoretic Hebrew text, and yours needs to be as well.

Answer for yourself: So what does all this mean to me?

It should mean that you should be suspect when a Hebrew text from the Jewish Hebrew-English Tanakh is at variance with the ones from the LXX or later Christian Old Testaments which are taken from it as well as any and all quotes or scriptural inventions in the New Testament. That means you have to compare line upon line, precept upon precept key texts if you want the truth today concerning Jesus since the Jewish sages and Rabbis had nothing to do with not only the translation of the LXX excepting the first Five Books of Moses ONLY!

THE JEWISH RESPONSE TO THE LXX

By the time of Christ, even among the Jews, a majority of the people spoke Aramaic and Greek, not Hebrew. The New Testament writers evidence their inclination to the Septuagint by using it when quoting the Old Testament. Because of the broad acceptance and use of the Septuagint which deviated so drastically from the earlier Hebrew texts as know and recognized by knowledgeable Jewish sages and scholar and owing to its use among Christians, the Jews renounced the LXX in favor of a number of other Greek versions. Aquila, a proselyte and disciple of Rabbi Akiba, produced a new translation around A.D. 130. In the spirit of his teacher, Aquila wrote an extremely literal translation, often to the point of communicating poorly in Greek. This literal approach, however, gained this version wide acceptance among Jews. The Jewish sages were so upset with the fact that the Christians were quoting from the Septuagint to promulgate their new "heresy" that they themselves came to "renounce" the Septuagint. If you take a second and think you should understand what these Jewish sages understood: What good is a mistranslation when it leads one astray in such important areas such as idolatry where a Cosmic godman has replaced the Davidic Messiah?

Acts 15:19-21 19 Wherefore my sentence is, that we trouble not them (Gentiles), which from among the Gentiles are turned to God: 20 But that we write unto them, that they abstain from pollutions of idols, and from fornication, and from things strangled, and from blood. 21 For Moses of old time hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every sabbath day. (KJV)

This same Hebrew Scriptures and texts should be the texts from which we as non-Jews are instructed today. One thing is for certain and that James and the Jerusalem church did not read from or use the LXX. They used the Hebrew Scriptures which today is called the Masoretic Texts by the Jewish nation and which as been preserved by them unto this day. This is the Bible that they and Jesus used and the one we should as well. I use the Stone Edition Tanakh and recommend it highly. If you do not own or have read the Jewish Tanakh then you have sadly NEVER read the true Word of God before in your life but have sadly inherited the forgery!

THE CHOICE IS YOURS

I have shared with you the truth as I know it to be after a resigned Pastorate and almost twenty years of scholarly study. I ask not anyone to believe anything I have said but only study to see if you can see what I have uncovered over my years of study.

Christian writers may acknowledge that the LXX differs from the Masoretic text, in several places, yet they bolster there cause by saying that the LXX was originally the OFFICIAL BIBLE OF JEWISH SYNAGOGUES throughout the Roman Empire, where Greek was spoken. What we fail to take thought of is sadly the LXX had to be since the Hebrew language was almost forgotten if not forgotten by the diaspora Jews during the centuries since the destruction of the Temple in 70 A.D. That being the case does not make it true or accurate to the Hebrew Scriptures and the doctrines that these Hebrew Scriptures both taught then and still teach today that are diametrically opposed to what the LXX espouses.

- Answer for yourself: Why is the LXX different, and what do these differences mean?
- Answer for yourself: What is their significance? Is the truth about both Jesus and the Messiah obscured because of the LXX and its deviation from the Hebrew texts that existed prior to it?
- Answer for yourself: Has the Essenes fed us their Angel-Messiah for the Davidic Messiah along with a falsified Old Testament and we not know it?
- Answer for yourself: Are the Jews right about Messianic beliefs and the Christian Church and their Bibles wrong?
- Answer for yourself: Are the quotes from this falsified Old Testament as applied to Jesus distorted the truth concerning this man?

- Answer for yourself: Has the human Davidic Messiah been made into a Cosmic Godman and are we idolators for accepting and professing such beliefs about the Messiah and Jesus?

That is for you to determine through your own study. I already have spent years getting the answers and know for certain!

You can either begin the most serious study of your life before it is too late or you can accept the standard propaganda by the Christian paper mill which says for example in the The New Westminster Dictionary of the Bible:

"The LXX REPRESENTS A PRE-MASORETIC HEBREW TEXT and accordingly is important for textual and exegetical studies

"The LXX became the O.T. of the Christians, who used it in their controversies with the Jews, even though it differed in various words or passages from the Hebrew text then in vogue. The quotations from the O.T. in the N.T. are usually citations from the LXX either verbatim or with unimportant verbal changes; in other cases, the N.T. writers apparently themselves translated from the original Hebrew.

That is simply the biggest lie ever told in the history of the planet!

The New Westminster Dictionary of the Bible goes on to tell you that the Septuagint text actually represents a PRE-MASORETIC HEBREW TEXT, which appears to have been lost over the centuries. They then tell you that it is this THIS PRE-MASORETIC TEXT, the basis of the LXX, that Jesus quoted from!

The writers of the New Testament who often betray their Gentile roots no doubt used the LXX for their religious propaganda and even state it plainly:

John 20:31 31 But these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name. (KJV)

The problem for you and me is that if these passages we are told to trust are presented accurately in our Christian Bibles as well as the LXX from which they are taken.

Let me close with a promise, as I make very few if any in my articles. You will have an impossible task on your hand if you try to prove that Jesus, his Apostles, and the Jerusalem Church ever used the LXX or would condone what is taught today in religious documents touted to be accurate translations of the Hebrew Scriptures or the supposed accurate quotes from them as found in the New Testament!

The implications for us are staggering as the harsh reality begins to hit us head on once you begin serious study into these issues. We have been taught the lie of the Essenes and don't know it. Jesus did. The Apostles did. The Palestinian and Babylonian Jews did. The Jews and their sages of today know as well. There is no Cosmic Godman...only allegories and metaphors from observations of the Heavens and Nature later taught as if LITERAL as taken from the original Osiris Pattern and later applied to men as if real! Jesus is the last in a long line of them. The picture of Jesus and the Messiah as presented in the New Testament is sadly not factually true to the Hebrew Scriptures from which we have inherited Christian Bibles that misrepresent them repeatedly throughout the Book. Yet we are assured by our Christian teachers that we have a faithful translation in our Christian Bibles of the Hebrew Scriptures. I will let you decide once you undertake such a serious study.

Mark 13:5 5 And Jesus answering them began to say, Take heed lest any man deceive you: (KJV)

A RABBIS RESPONSE CONCERNING THE GREEK TRANSLATION OF THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES

The following is taken and presented as a paraphrase from an E-Mail response to a reader by Rabbi Singer in which he reflects the Jewish understanding concerning the authority of the Septuagint for Biblical studies.

It first has to be stated that the Septuagint which we possess today is not a Jewish document, but rather a Christian one. The original Septuagint, created 2,200 years ago by 72 Jewish translators, was a Greek translation of the Five Books of Moses alone. It the original Septuagint consisting only of the first Five Books of Moses which the Rabbis originally translated only did not contain prophetic Books of the Bible such as Isaiah, which many Christian commentators assert that Matthew quoted from. This fact alone explains all the tragic theological deviations from the original Hebrew which we find today in the Greek translation of the Hebrew Isaiah and its resulting duplication in the Christian Old Testament along with its resultant erroneous quotes in the New Testament (the Virgin Birth for example). The Septuagint as we have it today, which includes the Prophets and Writings as well, is a product of the Gentile Church and its theology, not the Jewish people. In fact, the Septuagint remains the official Old Testament of the Greek Orthodox Church, and the manuscripts that consist of our Septuagint today date to the third century C.E. The fact that additional books known as the Apocrypha, which are uniquely sacred to the Roman Catholic and Orthodox Church, are found in the Septuagint should raise a red flag to those inquiring into the Jewishness of the Septuagint.

Christians such as Origin and Lucian (3rd and 4th century C.E.) had an enormous impact on creating and shaping the Septuagint that Christianity down through the ages has used to advance their untenable arguments against Judaism. In essence, the present Septuagint is largely a post-second century, Christian translation of the Bible, used zealously by the church throughout the centuries as an indispensable apologetic instrument to defend and sustain Christological alterations of the Jewish scriptures.

The fact that the original Septuagint translated by rabbis more than 22 centuries ago was only of the Pentateuch and not of prophetic books of the Bible such as Isaiah is confirmed by countless sources including the ancient Letter of Aristeas, which is the earliest attestation to the existence of the Septuagint. The Talmud also states this explicitly in Tractate Megillah (9a), and Josephus as well affirms that the Septuagint was a translation only of the Law of Moses in his preface to Antiquities of the Jews (Josephus, preface to Antiquities of the Jews, section 3. For Josephus' detailed description of events surrounding the original authorship of the Septuagint, see Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, XII, ii, 1-2).

Moreover, Jerome, a church father and Bible translator who could hardly be construed as friendly to Judaism, affirms Josephus' statement regarding the authorship of the Septuagint in his preface to The Book of Hebrew Questions (St. Jerome, Preface to the Book of Hebrew Questions, Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, Volume 6. Pg. 487. Hendrickson).

Likewise, the Anchor Bible Dictionary reports precisely this point in the opening sentence of its article on the Septuagint which states, "The word "Septuagint," (from Lat septuaginta = 70; hence the abbreviation LXX) derives from a story that 72 elders translated the Pentateuch into Greek; the term therefore applied originally only to those five books" (The Anchor Bible Dictionary. Excerpt from "Septuagint," New York: Vol. 5, pg. 1093).

In fact, Dr. F.F. Bruce, the preeminent professor of Biblical exegesis, keenly points out that, strictly speaking, the Septuagint deals only with the Pentateuch and not the whole Old Testament. Bruce writes, "The Jews might have gone on at a later time to authorize a standard text of the rest of the Septuagint, but . . . lost interest in the Septuagint altogether. With but few exceptions, every manuscript of the Septuagint which has come down to our day was copied and preserved in Christian, not Jewish, circles" (F.F. Bruce, The Books and the Parchments, p.150).

Mention was made above about Isaiah and the supposed mention of the Virgin Birth in the Book of Isaiah. A fact known by too few Christians is that the Hebrew of Isaiah NEVER mentions a Virgin Birth; one has to go to the corrupted Greek translation of this Hebrew Book in order to find the mention of a "virgin." Rabbi Singer goes on to mention in his email response: "With regard to your assertion that Matthew was quoting from the Septuagint, nowhere in the Book of Matthew does the word Septuagint appear, or, for that matter, is there any reference to a Greek translation of the Bible ever mentioned in all of the New Testament; and there is good reason for this. The first century church was well aware that a Jewish audience would be thoroughly unimpressed by a claim that Jesus' virgin birth could only be supported by a Greek translation of the Bible. They (the Jewish audience) understood that if Jews were to find their Christian message convincing, they would need to assert that it was the actual words of the prophet Isaiah that clearly foretold Mary's virgin conception, not from the words of a Greek translation. Therefore, in Matthew 1:22-23, the author of the first gospel insists that it was "spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, Behold, a virgin shall be with child . . . " Matthew loudly makes the point that it was specifically the prophet's own words that proclaimed the virgin birth, not the words of any translator. Isaiah, of course, did not preach or write in Greek, and therefore the word parthenos never left the lips of the prophet throughout his life."

All 66 chapters of the Book of Isaiah were spoken and then recorded in the Hebrew language alone. The author of the Gospel of Matthew, however, was attempting to place in the mind of his intended Jewish reader that it was the words of prophet Isaiah himself that declared that the messiah would be born of a virgin. Nothing of course could be further from the truth.

Rabbi Singer goes on to further state: "Furthermore, this contention becomes even more preposterous when we consider that the same missionaries who attempt to explain away Matthew's mistranslation of the Hebrew word alma by claiming that Matthew used a Septuagint when he quoted Isaiah 7:14 also steadfastly maintain that the entire first gospel was divinely inspired. That is to say, these same Christian missionaries insist that every word of the New Testament, Matthew included, was authored through the Holy Spirit and is therefore the living word of God. Are these evangelical apologists therefore claiming that God needed a Greek translation of the Bible and therefore quoted from the Septuagint? Did the passing of 500 years since His last book cause God to forget how to read Hebrew that He would need to rely on a translation? Why would God need to quote from the Septuagint?"

Rabbi Singer goes on to state: "Matthew's mistranslation of the Hebrew word alma was deliberate, not the result of his unwitting decision to quote from a defective Greek translation of the Bible. This is evidenced by the fact that the context of Isaiah 7:14 is not speaking of the birth of a messiah at all. The seventh chapter of the Book of Isaiah begins by describing the military crisis that was confronting King Ahaz of the Kingdom Judah. In about the year 732 B.C.E. the House of David was facing immanent destruction at the hands of two warring kingdoms: the Northern Kingdom of Israel and the Syrian kingdom. These two armies had laid siege to Jerusalem. The Bible relates that the House of David and King Ahaz were gripped with fear. In response these two warring armies, God sent the prophet Isaiah to reassure King Ahaz that divine protection was at hand - the Almighty would protect him, their deliverance was assured, and these two hostile armies would fail in their attempt to subjugate Jerusalem. It is clear from this chapter that Isaiah's declaration was a prophecy of the unsuccessful siege of Jerusalem by the two armies of the Kingdoms of Israel and Syria, not a virgin birth more than 700 years later. If we interpret this chapter as referring to Jesus' birth, what possible comfort and assurance could Ahaz, who was surrounded by two overwhelming military enemies, find in the birth of a child seven centuries later? Both he and his people would long be dead and buried. Such a sign would make no sense. This fact remains obvious even to the most casual reader of the seventh chapter of Isaiah. For Matthew, the prophet's original intent regarding the young woman in Isaiah 7:14 was entirely superseded by his fervid desire to somehow prove to the Jewish people that the virgin birth was prophesied in the Hebrew scriptures. Bear in mind that the author of the first gospel - more than any other writer in the New Testament - shaped and contoured his treatise with the deliberate purpose of promoting Christianity amongst the Jews. In essence, Matthew was writing with a Jewish audience in mind. He understood that in order to convince the Jewish people to embrace Jesus as the messiah, it was essential to demonstrate his claim of the virgin birth from the Jewish scriptures. Luke, in contrast, was writing for a non-Jewish, Greek audience and therefore makes no attempt to support his version of the virgin birth from the Hebrew Bible."

Rabbi Singer next mentions a fact that I have ascertained as well from many years of serious study into textual matters when contrasting the Hebrew Scriptures against later Greek and English counterparts. I concur with his statements and this fact, coupled with others, was one of the leading reasons for my resignation from my Pastorate years ago. Rabbi Singers states: "In his attempt to promote numerous Christian creeds amongst the Jews, Matthew was faced with a serious quandary. How would he prove that Jesus was the messiah from the Jewish scriptures when there is no relationship between the Jesus of Nazareth of the New Testament and the messianic prophecies of the Jewish scriptures? How was he going to merge newly inculcated pagan myths into Christianity such as the virgin birth with a Hebrew Bible where a belief in a virgin birth was unknown?"

"In order to accomplish this daunting task, verses in the Hebrew scriptures were altered, misquoted, taken out of context, and mistranslated by the author of the Book of Matthew in order to make Jesus' life fit traditional Jewish messianic parameters, and to make traditional Jewish messianic parameters fit the life of Jesus. In essence, he had to claim that it was the Hebrew prophets themselves who foretold that Jesus was the messiah. It is therefore no coincidence that no other writer in the New Testament misuses the Jewish scriptures with abandon to the extent that Matthew does throughout his gospel."

"The irony of all this Bible manipulation is that the first gospel was written for the sole purpose of convincing a Jewish audience that Jesus was the promised messiah. Yet, if the Book of Matthew had never been written, the church would almost certainly have been more effective in its effort at evangelizing the Jews. In essence, had promoters of Christianity avoided the kind of scripture tampering that can be found in virtually every chapter in the Book of Matthew, the church might have enjoyed far more success amongst the Jews as did previous religions that targeted the Jewish people for conversion."

Once the nation of Israel was confronted with a corruption of their sacred scriptures which they knew by heart by authors and apologists of the New Testament, their apostasy to Christianity for the most part became unpalatable and the Jewish people remained the most difficult nation for the church to convert throughout history. Consequently, whereas the gospels of Mark, Luke, and John enjoyed overwhelming success amongst their targeted gentile audiences which lacked the knowledge of them by heart let alone the ability to read the Hebrew Scriptures or even to possess them, the gospel of Matthew played an enormous role in the ultimate failure of the church to effectively convert the Jews to Christianity, at least the knowledgeable ones.

As Christians and followers of Jesus we are at the terrible disadvantage. Not possessing Hebrew as our native tongue and not possessing the knowledge that the Hebrew Scriptures have been tragically altered in "key theological positions" throughout our Christian Bibles we approach our Christian Bibles taught to believe everything in it as "inerrant and inspired." Nothing could be further from the truth once one begins to compare these "key theological passages" in a Hebrew-English Bible against their later Greek and English counterparts. This is by no means a simple or short task but sadly a necessary one owing to the corruption of our Christian Old Testaments and New Testaments which goes undetected by almost all today unless possessing a most critical eye when reading these Christian texts. Understand that this corruption of the Hebrew Scriptures began long ago with the purposeful alteration of the Prophets and Writings which the Rabbis of Palestine had nothing to do with; in fact they rejected the use of the Septuagint in Palestine because of such corruptions and made attempts to write their own Greek translations of the Hebrew Scriptures to counter the corrupt Septuagint since knowing that it sadly misrepresented the revelation given them by God. Only those Jews and Gentiles not possessing the ability to read Hebrew or possess copies of the Scriptures in Hebrew were relegated to having to use the Greek mistranslations (the diaspora) and in so doing were led astray daily in accepting an altered revelation from God provided them by men with theological agendas; namely the Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt. Later these altered Scriptures play right in the hands of Rome who likewise was involved in Astral-Theology and Sun Worship as had been the Essenes of Alexandria. These corrupted passages were then later applied to Jesus and out comes a "golden calf" and the truth about Jesus and the Messianic prophecies are lost to all but those possessing the Hebrew Scriptures and the knowledge of the Hebrew language. With the planned extermination of these Hebrew texts later by Rome the truth was eradicated from this planet.

"For then I will restore to the peoples a pure language, that they all may call on the name of the LORD, to serve Him with one accord." (Zephaniah 3:9)

Hebrew is one of the oldest languages in the world. It is also one of the newest. Or to be more accurate, it lived for thousands of years, it (mostly) died for thousands of years, and for the last, less than 200 years, it has lived and breathed once again. By the grace of God and the efforts of great Jewish men and women to recover their culture and language have the ability to learn to read the Hebrew Scriptures in their original language or at least use good Hebrew-English study aids which reveal to such students the Hebrew-English texts as they once read before their corruptions over the last 2,200 years by not only the Essenes but the Roman church as well in the supposed accurate translations we have been fed by them.

In closing the facts of language, history, and archeology today are laying bear the lies of yesterday; serious lies that have distorted not only the Bible that Jesus used but the ones we have inherited from the Roman propaganda mill. It is time we listen to men like Rabbi Singer and those elsewhere who are sounding a trumpet in Zion that repentance is needed in our lack of serious study of the Bible. Only in so doing can you, through tedious study of these Hebrew, Greek, and English texts, come to the truth about what has happened to the faith once given the saint and the Bible that Jesus used and the faith once given to the saints. Only in this way can we ever hope to be true followers of Jesus and not deceived ones.

Blessings.

JEROME'S AND HIS INFLUENCE UPON THE TRANSLATION OF THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES

Jerome was by no means the first translator. Nor was he the best. He often seems to have misunderstood the text he was translating. Jerome was, however, among the first to combine practice and theory. As a consequence, not only did he change the course of history with his major translation, the Latin version of the Hebrew Bible, but he also determined the way subsequent thinkers would regard the art and science of translation. Jerome is the paradigm for all those translators today who must both practice their art on a daily basis and theorize about their method, for all those who are both practical translators and linguistic scientists. Most importantly, he realized that translation is necessarily subjective.

Jerome (Eusebius Hieronymus in the Latin formulation of his Greek name) was born in Dalmatia around 348. He was raised a speaker of Latin, a skill which he polished at Rome in the school of the famed rhetorician Aelius Donatus. He went for advanced theological training to Antioch, a Greek-speaking city. Although he claims to have mastered Greek there, Jerome had probably spoken that language from childhood and meant, therefore, only that he developed his competence in Greek to the sophisticated level he had achieved in Latin. Like most citizens of the Roman Empire, Jerome was both bilingual and bicultural. In 375, when he was in his late twenties, Jerome began the study of his third language, Hebrew. He learned it with great difficulty and, although he developed a scholar's command of the then almost dead language of the Jews, Jerome was never able to read Hebrew with the facility with which he read Greek or Latin. He illustrates the strengths and weaknesses of his knowledge of Hebrew in his Onomastica Sacra, "Book of Sacred Names," a compendium of etymologies, sometimes insightful, as often, however, fantastic.

Jerome learned Hebrew to approach the Hebraica vera, the Hebrew truth, more closely. Up to the fourth century, the Latin West had only the so-called Vetus Latina for their knowledge of the Old Testament. The work done by various anonymous hands was, in fact, a translation of a translation since it rendered into Latin the Septuagint, the Greek version of the Hebrew Bible, a translation made in the third century B.C.E. in Alexandria. Understand clearly what was just said: the existings Latin translations of the Old Testament were taken from the Greek and not the Hebrew! Although it was commonly believed in Christian circles and even among some Jews outside Palestine in the diaspora that the Septuagint (mainly translated by non-Jews except for the first 5 books which were done by Rabbis) was divinely inspired, Jerome was early able to recognize that this Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures diverged, often dramatically, from Hebrew and was, in fact, inferior. Since Hebrew was little known in the West and no adequate translation of the Hebrew scriptures was available, Christian apologists, as Jerome realized, were at a serious disadvantage when they argued with Jews. About 390, Jerome thrust his "hand into the flame" and began his great task which he would complete only sixteen years later.

He was well prepared both as a translator and as a scholar. Already he had translated works of other Christian scholars and he had done extensive commentaries on many of the books of the Hebrew Bible. He knew the problems inherent in translating and he knew the text he was rendering. Just as important, he knew Latin. Of all the Fathers of the Western Church, Jerome wrote a Latin which most closely approximated the beauty and power of the great classical authors. Jerome claims to have dreamed that a divine voice accused him of being not a Christian but a Ciceronian, that is, of being devoted more to the language of the secular masters than to the gospel of the Son of God. Jerome realized, however, that the Latin he wrote was not the Latin that people spoke but he was sufficiently competent in his native tongue that he could function brilliantly at all levels of style.

When he began what would become the Vulgate or People's Bible, Jerome made several decisions of the sort that every translator must make. He first determined that the Latin he would use would not be in the style of a Cicero or of a Seneca but in that of the people who were Christians, that is, people with an average education who spoke colloquial Latin. He chose, for example, to translate indirect discourse not with the standard infinitive and subject accusative but to follow the model of common language (and not so incidentally of Hebrew) and use a noun clause with a finite verb introduced by "quod." Jerome literally changed the way people speak.

Jerome also determined that he would not translate verbum ad verbum but ad sensum, not word for word but according to sense. Augustine, Jerome's contemporary, criticized this decision. Such a procedure, Augustine argued, would lead inevitably away from the sacred text and permit the introduction of error. Augustine had a point. Jerome, for example, was all too willing to emphasize the messianic implications of Hebrew text and insert his own doctrine into verses where it had not existed.

Augustine, however, was probably monolingual; certainly he knew only Latin well and not the Hebrew of which he spoke and he had a very poor appreciation of the problems the translator faces. Yet undeniably Jerome presented the world with a translation where the translator's subjectivity was often apparent.

Critics claimed that Jerome had inaccurately rendered the Greek original and had done so deliberately. Jerome rose to defend himself in his brilliant Letter LVII, sometimes given the title "On the Best Type of Translating." Here, several years before he began his work on the Bible he outlined his theory of translation.

After a lengthy invective against those who had attacked him, Jerome writes:

I not only confess but freely profess that in the rendering of Greek texts... I write not word for word but sense for sense. My authority in this matter is Cicero, who translated Plato's Protagoras, Xenophon's Oeconomicus and the two very beautiful speeches of Aeshines and Demosthenes against each other. This is not the moment to say how much in these works Cicero passed over, how much he added or how much he changed in order to explain the characteristics of the Greek in the idiom of the Latin. (Epist. LVII.5)

Jerome here states in summary what he argues then at length in the remainder of the letter, that the translator has the freedom to do what he must do to render the original language of a text into any other tongue. He suggests that addition and deletion are not only allowable but even desirable and necessary. How revolutionary a doctrine this must have seemed in a society where the number of letters in the Hebrew Bible was regarded as determined by God.

The American poet and translator, Louis Zukofsky, has written that a translation should "breathe the 'literal' meaning" of the original. He expresses well what Jerome argued and exemplified. Jerome recognized the importance of the subjective and the personal in translation. He knew that rendering the meaning of one language in the idiom of another is a human science, a fact often forgotten in today's world of translators and linguists.

I challenge anyone really interested in such a deviation from the true Jewish Text to investigate other articles on this website.

THE "SEPTUAGINT"...THE GREEK TRANSLATION OF THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES

Answer for yourself: How do you give authority to a new book that is in competition with a prior "best seller?"

Well that is simply, you build up big legends about this "new book" and spread them to the populace. In time your "new book," if merchandised correctly, will outsell your competition. This was done with the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures.

THE LETTER OF ARISTEAS

Forged tales were fabricated to account for the translation into Greek of the Jewish Scriptures, in what is known as the Septuagint Version. After the conquests by Alexander the Great and his establishment of the city of Alexandria in Egypt, immense numbers of Jews were settled in the new city, which quickly became the commercial and intellectual center of the ancient world, with Greek the universal language. The holy Hebrew language had become a dead language to the Jews of the "Dispersion"; their synagogue services could not be conducted in the mother tongue. The Alexandrian Jews, the vast majority who had been influenced by Hellenism and the Greek religious culture, were accordingly under necessity to render the "Law" into Greek for their public use; and this was gradually done by such of them as thought themselves able to do such work. These Greek-Jewish Essenes of Alexandria would take it upon themselves to translation the Jewish Scriptures into Greek as well as add many of their sect's doctrines and dogmas among its pages. But this common-place mode of rendering the sacred Hebrew into a Gentile speech did not satisfy the pious wonder-craving Jewish mind. Accordingly, somewhere about 200 B.C., an anonymous Jew invented a more satisfactory tale, which has had incalculable influence on the Christian faith and dogmas. This pious Israelite had the customary recourse to religions forgery; he forged a letter in the name of one Aristeas, an official of Ptolemy II, Philadelphus, the Greek king of Egypt, 285-247 B.C., purporting to be addressed to his brother, Philocrates, and giving a marvelous history of the Translation.

Here, in substance, is what we read of the first origin of the Version, limited therein to the "law" of Moses, as first related by Josephus. What we need to do is stop and think right now: at this time at the translation of the Jewish Scriptures into Greek the Jews recognized as their "Bible' ONLY the first five books of Moses. This is important because the legend will make it sound as if the Rabbis translated the whole of the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings. Their failure to do so explains the hundreds of corruptions and adulterations made to the text as it was translated into Greek by these Greek-Jews of Alexandria later. Ptolemy had recently established a library at Alexandria, which he purposed should contain a copy of every obtainable literary work extant. This Library became the most extensive and celebrated of the ancient world, containing some 700,000 manuscript books at the time it was savagely destroyed, in 391 A.D., by the benighted Christian zeal and fury of Bishop Theophilus of Alexandria and his crazy monks of Nitria, as related in Kingsley's Hypatia or any history of the times. CE. xiv, 625.) At the suggestion of Demetrius, his Librarian, fables the pseudo-Aristeas through Josephus, that he should enrich the Library with a copy of the sacred law (notice again it was the first 5 books of the Law only) of the Jews Ptolemy wrote to Eleazar the chief priest at Jerusalem, sending the letter and magnificent presents "to God" by the hand of a delegation including Aristeas, requesting a copy of the Law and a number of learned Jews competent to translate it into Greek. The embassy was successful; a richly ornamented copy of the holy law, written in letters of gold, was sent to the King, together with seventy-two Doctors of Israel, deputed to deliver the Book and to carry out the wishes of the King. They were received with great honor, says pseudo-Aristeas, and duly feted for several days; they were then conducted across the long causeway to the Island of Pharos to the place which was prepared for them, "which was a house that was built near the shore, and was a quiet place, and fit for their discoursing together about their work, ... Accordingly they made an accurate interpretation, with great zeal and great pains," working until the ninth hour each day, and visiting Ptolemy every morning. "Now when the Law was transcribed [first 5 books only],and the labor of interpretation was over, which came to its conclusion in seventy-two days," the work was read over to the assembled Jews, who rejoiced that "the interpretation was happily finished"; they were enjoined to report any errors or emissions which they might discover, to the "Seventy," who would make the necessary corrections in their work. (Josephus, Antiq. Jews, Bk. XII, chap. 2; CE. xiii, 722.) Thus the translation was only of "The Law," the Five Books of Moses; and it was open team-work, all the Seventy-two working together, comparing and discussing as they proceeded, and expressly enjoining the Jews to note and report for correction all errors of omission or commission which they might discover.

NECESSARY CORRECTIONS? WHAT'S UP?

Thus the pseudo-Aristeas, as cited by Josephus; thought, as a matter of fact, this Septuagint Version, so-called because of the legendary Seventy-(two), was in the grossest manner inaccurate, and imported innumerable errors into the Christian religion which was based upon and propagated for several centuries only through the Septuagint texts. Indeed, "the text of the Septuagint was regarded as so unreliable, because of its freedom in rendering, and of the alterations which had been introduced into it, etc., that, during the second century of our era it was discarded by the Church." (Catholic Encyclopedia. iv, 625.) We shall notice the fearful error of Isaiah's "virgin-birth" text; for other well-known instances, it makes out Creation 1195 years earlier than the Hebrew and Vulgate, 4004 B.C., and the venerable Methuselah is made to survive the Flood by fourteen years.Despite, however, its patently legendary character, the pseudo-Aristeas' account, the forged letter and the story, were eagerly accepted as genuine and authentic by Fathers, These Greek early Church Fathers, believing the legend, fell prey to the errors in the Greek text. Coupled with that and their inability to read Hebrew whereby such "purposeful mistranslations" could be easily spotted, they like most of us, fell prey to relying on a text full of error of which they never knew since adopting and believing in simple faith that this Greek translation was accurate and was the "Bible from God!" Popes and ecclesiastic writers until the sixteenth century, when their spurious character was revealed by the nascent modern criticism. "The authenticity of the letter, called in question first by Louis Vives (1492-1540), professor at Louvain, is now universally denied." (CE. xiii, 722.)

FURTHER EMBELLISHING OF THE LXX LEGEND...THE CREATIVITY OF THE CHURCH FATHERS

The Fathers, however, could not rest content with this unvarnished original fabrication in the name of Aristeas, of an ordinary human and errant translation of the "Law"; they avidly set about embellishing it in the accepted clerical style, adding fanciful and lying details to emphasize the miraculous and inspired origin of the Version. These actions guaranteed the success of the LXX over the Palestinian Masoretic text. What I find amazing is that Clement of Rome, the Bishop of Rome, the first major Christian writer after Paul, used only the Jewish Palestinian text for "all" his quotations of Scripture in his writings. It is not as if he did not know Greek, for being the Bishop of Rome dictated such, but yet, he quoted only from the Jewish Scriptures and not the Greek translation.

Answer for yourself: Did he know something we don't, are as yet just coming to the knowledge of?

As this notable instance of belief in legends serves admirably to illustrate the childish and uncritical credulity of the Fathers, their reckless disregard of truth, their chronic zest for any untruth or fable quotable to pander to the glory of God and enhance the pious superstition of the Faithful, let us here watch the growth of this simple human yarn of the Jewish Aristeas-forger into the wonderful and ever more embellished miracle as it passes from Father to Father, -- exactly as the Gospel-fables grew from "Mark" to "John." According to Fathers Tertullian, St. Augustine, St. Jerome, et als., the 72 were inspired by God each severally for the entire work; in translating they did not consult with one another; they had been shut up incomunicados in separate cells on Pharos, either singly or in pairs, and their several translations, when finished and compared, were found to agree entirely both as to sense and the expressions employed, with the original Hebrew text and with each other (St. Clement of Alexandria, St. Irenaeus, Justin Martyr). Finally, the 72 translated not only the Law, but the entire Old Testament, -- several of whose Books were not yet at the time written. Again this betrays the lack of truth and honesty as found in the early Church Fathers and yet we are to believe them and untold is the influence they had upon what we call Christianity today!

WHY CAN'T JUSTIN MARTYR GET THE FACTS RIGHT THE SECOND TIME?

Father Justin Martyr adds near-eye-witness verification to the false and already embroidered history, saying that the "Seventy" were, by order of the King, (Ptolemy)" shut up in as many separate cells, and were obliged by him, each to translate the whole Bible apart, and without any communication with each other, yet all their several translations were found to agree verbatim from the beginning to the end, and were by that means demonstrated to be of divine inspiration"; and he adds, for confirmation of faith! -- like Paul, protesting he is not lying in anticipation of the accusation: "These things, ye men of Greece, are no fable, nor do we narrate fictions; but we ourselves having been in Alexandria, saw the remains of the little [cells] at the Pharos still preserved." (Ad Graec. ch. xiii; ANF. i, 278-9.)

But in repeating the tale to the Roman Emperor, Father Justin makes the unhappy blunder of saying, that Ptolemy "sent to Herod, who was at that time king of the Jews, requesting that the books of the prophets [pseudo-Aristeas said the "Law"] be sent to him; and the king did indeed send them" (I Apol. ch. xxxi; ANF. i, 173).

Answer for yourself: Did you catch his lie?

Herod lived some 300 years after Ptolemy died. This forged fable is time and again repeated as sober truth.

Bishop Saint Irenaeus emphasizes the miraculous nature of the translation of all the Books, saying that when the 72 identical translations were compared, "God was indeed glorified, and the Scriptures were acknowledged an truly divine; ... even the Gentiles present perceived that the Scriptures had been interpreted by the inspiration of God. And there was nothing astonishing in God having done this. ... He inspired Esdras the priest (after the return from captivity) to recast all the words of the former prophets, and to reestablish with the people of God the Mosaic legislation." (Adv. Haer. III, xxi, 2; ANF. i, 451-2.) By now you should be seeing little miraculous was connected with them.

THE TRANSLATION OF THE REST OF THE JEWISH SCRIPTURES

In the course of a century or two before the Christian Era, the other Hebrew sacred books were likewise translated into Greek for the use of the Greek-speaking Jews of "the Dispersion," together with numbers of the forged Jewish apocrypha, and all these were added to the rolls of "Scriptures." This final and adulterated form of the Septuagint "was the vehicle which conveyed these additional Scriptures [i.e. the apocryphal Tobias, etc.] into the Catholic Church." (CE. iii, 271.)

The role of the Holy Ghost in certifying the ill-translated and tempered Septuagint for the foundations of Christian Faith, was very disastrous, as CE. Points out:

"The Church had adopted the Septuagint as its own; this differed from the Hebrew not only by the addition of several books and passages but also by innumerable variations of text, due partly to the ordinary process of corruption in the transcription of ancient books, partly to the culpable temerity, as Origen called it, of correctors who used not a little freedom in making 'corrections,' additions, and suppressions, partly to mistakes in translation, and finally in great part to the fact that the original Septuagint had been made from a Hebrew text quite different from that fixed at Jamnia as the one standard by the Jewish Rabbis." (CE. vii, 316.)

So YHVH only knows what he actually said and did in the 4004 years up to the time of the birth of Jesus.

BUT THE WORST IS YET TO COME...IF THAT IS POSSIBLE

Matters grew worse as time progressed: the ex-Pagan Greek Fathers who founded Christianity, propagated the new Faith for several centuries only from the tortuous texts of this falsified Septuagint, which was the only Old Testament "Scriptures" known to and used by them as the source of the "prophecies fulfilled by Jesus Christ" and the holy mysteries of the Jewish-Christian Faith. "Copies of the Septuagint," says CE., "were multiplied, and, as might be expected, many changes, deliberate as well as involuntary, crept in." (CE. xiii, 723.) Indeed, the itch for Scripture-scribbling was so rife among such ex-Pagan Christians as could write and get hold of a copy, that St. Augustine complains: "It is possible to enumerate those who have translated the Scriptures from Hebrew into Greek, but not those who have translated them into Latin. In sooth, in the curly days of the faith whoso possessed a Greek manuscript and thought he had some knowledge of both tongues was daring enough to undertake a translation." (De Doct. Christ. II, xi; CE. ix, 20.) So the Faith was founded on befuddlement of the Blessed Word of God as any nondescript scribbler palmed it off to be.

The Holy Church never possessed or used a single book of "Scripture" or other document of importance, to the glory of God and the glorification of the Church, which was not a rank original forgery and bristled besides with "many deliberate changes" or forged interpolations.

THE FORGERY OF JESUS' BIBLE...AND WE WERE NEVER TOLD!

Very few Christians I know have ever taken the time to study out for themselves the extent of the forgery of the Hebrew Scriptures as contained in the Christian's Bibles that we have inherited today. Few know of the need to do such study let alone the extent of such forgery of the Hebrew Scriptures in the Bibles they carry. I must admit when my studies began to lead me into such areas of study I cringed at the thought that such charges against my Christian Bible might possibly be true. I remember the fear that rose up inside me when confronted with such challenges against my Christian Bible because at that time I had done already considerable study into the Hebrew Roots of Christianity and in so doing had exposed much of what had been taught as Christian truth to be little more than antisemitic lies. That being so I feared that this ultimate challenge to my Bible might again be proved correct when examined. But I had to know for sure so a new branch of study was undertaken to see if my Christian Bible might pass the test if put to such scrutiny by comparison of it's texts when compared with the Hebrew texts from the Jewish Bibles.

It only took about nine months to get all the answers that I needed to remove the doubt and fears that I carried concerning this issues. As I had previously discovered that priestly forged tales were fabricated to account for the origin and preservation of many sacred religious books so like pious frauds were adopted to account for the very notable translation into Greek of the Hebrew Scriptures as found in the letter of Aristeas. This translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek is known today as the Septuagint Version. After the conquests by Alexander the Great and his establishment of the city of Alexandria in Egypt, immense numbers of Jews were settled in the new city, which quickly became the commercial and intellectual center of the ancient world, with Greek the universal language. The holy Hebrew language had become a dead language to the Jews of the "Dispersion"; their synagogue services could not be conducted in the mother tongue. The Alexandrian Jews were accordingly under necessity to render the "Law" into Greek for their public use; and this was gradually done by such of them as thought themselves able to do such work. But this common-place mode of rendering the sacred Hebrew into a Gentile speech did not satisfy some of the Jews. Accordingly, somewhere about 200 B.C.E., an anonymous person invented a more satisfactory tale, which has had incalculable influence on the Christian faith and dogmas. This pious Israelite had the customary recourse to religious forgery; he forged a letter in the name of one Aristeas, an official of Ptolemy II, Philadelphus, the Greek king of Egypt, 285-247 B.C.E, purporting to be addressed to his brother, Philocrates, and giving a marvelous and embellished history of the translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into the Greek language.

Here, in substance, is what we read of the first origin of the Version, limited therein to the "Law" of Moses, as first related by Josephus. Contrary to tradition received today in Christianity the Jews only translated the first 5 Books of the Bible [the Torah] and did not translate the rest of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek when translating the Septuagint. Now let us get back to our story. Ptolemy had recently established a library at Alexandria, which he purposed should contain a copy of every obtainable literary work extant. This Library became the most extensive and celebrated of the ancient world, containing some 700,000 manuscript books at the time it was savagely destroyed, in 391 A. D., by the benighted Christian zeal and fury of Bishop Theophilus of Alexandria and his crazy monks of Nitria, as related in Kingsley's Hypatia or any history of the times (Catholic Encyclopedia, xiv, 625.) At the suggestion of Demetrius, his Librarian, fables the pseudo-Aristeas through Josephus, that he should enrich the Library with a copy of the sacred Law of the Jews, Ptolemy wrote to Eleazar the chief priest at Jerusalem, sending the letter and magnificent presents "to God" by the hand of a delegation including Aristeas, requesting a copy of the Law and a number of learned Jews competent to translate it into Greek. The embassy was successful; a richly ornamented copy of the holy Law, written in letters of gold, was sent to the King, together with seventy-two Doctors of Israel, deputed to deliver the Book and to carry out the wishes of the King. They were received with great honor, says pseudo-Aristeas, and duly feted for several days; they were then conducted across the long causeway to the Island of Pharos to the place which was prepared for them, "which was a house that was built near the shore, and was a quiet place, and fit for their discoursing together about their work.

Accordingly they made an accurate interpretation, with great zeal and great pains," working until the ninth hour each day, and visiting Ptolemy every morning. "Now when the Law [only the first 5 Books of the Old Testament] was transcribed, and the labour of interpretation was over, which came to its conclusion in seventy-two days," the work was read over to the assembled Jews, who rejoiced that "the interpretation was happily finished"; they were enjoined to report any errors or omissions which they might discover, to the "Seventy," who would make the. necessary corrections in their work. (Josephus, Antiq. Jews, Bk. XII, chap. 2; Catholic Encyclopedia, xiii, 722.) Thus the translation was only of "The Law," the Five Books of Moses; and it was open team-work, all the Seventy-two working together, comparing and discussing as they proceeded, and expressly enjoining the Jews to note and report for correction all errors of omission or commission which they might discover.

Thus the pseudo-Aristeas, as cited by Josephus; though, as a matter of fact, this Septuagint Version, so-called because of the legendary Seventy-(two), was in the grossest manner inaccurate, and imported innumerable errors into the Christian religion which was based upon and propagated for several centuries only through the Septuagint texts. If you have been a consistent reader of Bet Emet Ministries then you are acquainted with the efforts of Bet Emet to expose this forgery of the Hebrew Scriptures as many of our articles contrast the Hebrew texts with the later forgeries of them as found in the Greek and English mistranslations that followed. Such comparisons of texts is mandated by the very confessions of earlier Christians in history that spoke out in their day about such abominations and liberties being taken with the Hebrew Scriptures. I never cease to be amazed at the earlier testimonies of early Christians who spoke out about such corruptions. Sadly today their voices are covered over by the many years of Catholic tradition but yet the echoes of their voices can be heard if one diligent studies the origins of the Christian faith. Take time reading the next sentence and let the impact of what you read settle in before continuing to read the rest of this article. At one time, "the text of the Septuagint was regarded as so unreliable, because of its freedom in rendering, and of the alterations which had been introduced into it, etc., that, during the second century of our era it was discarded by the Church." (Catholic Encyclopedia, iv, 625.)

Please take note that this is a quote from a Christian source no less!

You just read that in the second century, before Constantine, there was a move to discard the Septuagint among Gentile Christianity because it was recognized as terrible translation of the Hebrew Scriptures and because of its numerous alterations and forgeries that it was known by most of that day to be worthless as a source for Biblical truth.

Despite, however, its patently legendary character, the pseudo-Aristeas' account, over time the forged letter and the story, were eagerly accepted as genuine and authentic by Fathers, Popes and ecclesiastic writers until the sixteenth century, when their spurious character was revealed by the beginning of Biblical modern criticism. "The authenticity of the letter, called in question first by Louis Vivés (1492-1540), professor at Louvain, is now universally denied" (Catholic Encyclopedia, xiii, 722.)

The Fathers, however, could not rest content with this unvarnished original fabrication in the name of Aristeas, of an ordinary human and errant translation of the "Law"; they avidly set about embellishing it in the accepted clerical style, adding fanciful and lying details to emphasize the miraculous and inspired origin of the Version. As this notable instance serves admirably to illustrate the childish and uncritical credulity of the Fathers, their reckless disregard of truth, their chronic zest for any untruth or fable suitable to pander to the glory of God and enhance the pious superstition of the Faithful, let us here watch the growth of this simple human yarn of the Jewish Aristeas-forger into the wonderful and ever more embellished miracle as it passes from Father to Father, exactly as the Gospel-fables grew from "Mark" to "John." According to Fathers Tertullian, St. Augustine, St. Jerome, etc., the 72 were inspired by God each severally for the entire work; in translating they did not consult with one another; they had been shut up incomunicados in separate cells on Pharos, either singly or in pairs, and their several translations, when finished and compared, were found to agree entirely both as to sense and the expressions employed, with the original Hebrew text and with each other (St. Clement of Alexandria, St. Irenaeus, Justin Martyr). Finally, the 72 translated not only the Law, but the entire Old Testament; ironically several of whose Books were not yet at the time written!!! But that did not seem to matter as the need for the invention of authority for such a version overruled the desire for truth.

Father Justin Martyr adds near-eye-witness verification to the false and already embroidered history, saying that the "Seventy" were, by order of the King, "shut up in as many separate cells, and were obliged by him, each to translate the whole Bible apart, and without any communication with each other, yet all their several translations were found to agree verbatim from the beginning to the end, and were by that means demonstrated to be of divine inspiration"; and he adds, for confirmation of faith!-like Paul, protesting he is not lying in anticipation of the accusation: "These things, ye men of Greece, are no fable, nor do we narrate fictions; but we ourselves having been in Alexandria, saw the remains of the little [cells] at the Pharos still preserved." (Ad Graec, ch. xiii; ANF. 1, 278-9.) But in repeating the tale to the Roman Emperor, Father Justin makes the unhappy blunder of saying, that Ptolemy "sent to Herod, who was at that time king of the Jews, requesting that the books of the prophets [pseudo-Aristeas said the "Law"] be sent to him; and the king did indeed send them" (I Apol. ch. xxxi; ANF. i, 173); whereas Herod lived some 300 years after Ptolemy died! That is impossible and again betrays the fiction of which we read and rely upon for authority of this translation which so tragically departs from the Hebrew from which is supposedly taken. This forged fable is time and again repeated as sober truth. Bishop Saint Irenaeus emphasizes the miraculous nature of the translation of all the Book [only the first 5 books were done...remember], saying that when the 72 identical translations were compared, "God was indeed glorified, and the Scriptures were acknowledged as truly divine; . . . even the Gentiles: present perceived that the Scriptures had been interpreted by the inspiration of God. And there was nothing astonishing in God having done this. . . . He inspired Esdras the priest (after the return from captivity) to recast all the words of the former prophets, and to re-establish with the people of God the Mosaic legislation." (Adv. Haer. III, xxi, 2; ANF. i, 451-2.). Here is another proof that St. Irenaeus is a liar and if you begin to really get into it a forger of much of the New Testament that is "created" by him in response to Marcion's first New Testament in 150 A.D. [Irenaeus is responsible for much of the writing of the New Testament and New Testament theology in the names of Apostles and Paul...like Rom. chapters 9-11 which miraculously appears after 180 A.D. in Paul's name].

In the course of a century or two before the Christian Era, the other Hebrew sacred books were likewise translated into Greek for the use of the Greek-speaking Jews of "the Dispersion," together with numbers of the forged Jewish apocrypha, and all these were added to the rolls of "Scriptures." This final and adulterated form of the Septuagint "was the vehicle which conveyed these additional Scriptures [i. e. the apocryphal Tobias, etc.] into the Catholic Church." (Catholic Encyclopedia, iii, 271.) This conceit of the supposed Holy Ghost in certifying the ill-translated and tampered Septuagint for the foundations of Christian Faith, was very disastrous, as the Catholic Encyclopedia points out: "The Church had adopted the Septuagint as its own; this differed from the Hebrew not only by the addition of several books and passage: but also by innumerable variations of texts, due partly to the ordinary process of corruption in the transcription of ancient books, partly to the culpable audacity, as Origen called it, of correctors who used not a little freedom in making "corrections," additions, and suppressions, partly to mistakes in translation, and finally in great part to the fact that the original Septuagint had been made from a Hebrew text quite different from that fixed at Jamnia as the one standard by the Jewish Rabbis" (Catholic Encyclopedia, vii, 316.)

It is absolutely amazing but here is Christian testimony to their own forgery of the Bible Jesus used!

Matters grew worse as time progressed: the ex-Pagan Greek Fathers who founded Christianity, propagated the new Faith for several centuries only from the tortuous texts of this falsified Septuagint, which was the only Old Testament "Scriptures" known to and used by them as the source of the "prophecies fulfilled by Jesus Christ" and the holy mysteries of the Jewish-Christian Faith. "Copies of the Septuagint," says Catholic Encyclopedia, "were multiplied, and, as might be expected, many changes, deliberate as well as involuntary, crept in." (Catholic Encyclopedia, xiii, 723.) READ THAT AGAIN!

Again such testimony of early Christianity to their own forgery of the Hebrew Scriptures is incredible. Indeed, the itch for Scripture-scribbling was so rife among such ex-Pagan Christians as could write and get hold of a copy, that St. Augustine complains: "It is possible to enumerate those who have translated the Scriptures from Hebrew into Greek, but not those who have translated them into Latin. In truth, in the early days of the faith whoso possessed a Greek manuscript and thought he had some knowledge of both tongues was daring enough to undertake a translation." (De Doct. Christ. II, xi; Catholic Encyclopedia, ix, 20.)

So the Christian Faith came to be founded on the corruption of the Hebrew Scriptures known then to be the Blessed Word of God as any nondescript scribbler palmed it off to be.

It has been said that the Holy Church never possessed or used a single book of "Scripture" or other document of importance, to the glory of God and the glorification of the Church, which was not a rank original forgery and bristled besides with "many deliberate changes" or forged interpolations.

Answer for yourself: What religious beliefs and religious doctrines in our New Testaments that come from quotes and passages from forged and corrupted Old Testament passages that were purposely invented, altered, misquoted, and mistranslated from the original Hebrew do we as Christians and followers of Jesus believe today and follow and trust in and should we? And which ones of the many in our New Testament are the forgeries and how do we learn the difference between the "real" and the "fake"?

Thank God that there are ministries like Bet Emet and others who are called of God to teach the truth in these days of religious confusion and deception passed off upon the world through Gentile Christianity.

THE SEPTUAGINT...IS IT A FRAUD AND FORGERY? CAN WE TRUST IT?

Well the title of this article sure is alarming; especially when we discover that the foundation for all our Christian Old Testaments and quotes from it in the New Testament come from the Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures called the Septuagint (LXX).

Since the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls the Septuagint Version of the Old Testament has come in for a great deal of criticism, one writer calling it a fraud, forgery, and "utterly corrupt."

Answer for yourself: But is this true? When was the Septuagint translated? By whom and for whom? What is the TRUTH? Did Jesus and his apostles really quote from the Septuagint or are the records in the New Testament "back written" by the Gentile Church in order to show that Jesus, a Jew, used and condoned the use of the Septuagint translation of the Hebrew Scriptures? Was it commonly used in Jewish synagogues throughout the Greek speaking world? Was it used in Israel? Why then did they Jews in Palestine cease to use it yet was used in Greek speaking nations of the world.

I believer that the readers should know right up front that many scholars, but not all by any means, claim that the Septuagint Version of the Old Testament -- the Greek LXX as it has been called -- is "totally corrupt and unreliable!" These same scholars claim that the "only evidence" that a "Septuagint translation was ever made" was a document called the "letter of Aristeas" which is regarded today as a total fiction created to bolster the importance of the Greek translation of these Hebrew Scriptures to the Greek speaking world.

Some scholars maintain that there is only "ONE and one only" Greek manuscript of the Old Testament written before the time of Jesus. It is a minute scrap dated at 150 B.C. which is called the Rylands Papyrus #458 which contains only the 23-28 chapters of the book of Deuteronomy. I don't know about you that that is hardly convincing evidence that the whole of the Pentateuch or the whole Old Testament had been translated 130 years earlier.

Many scholars claim that the early church theologian Origen, out of a motive of vanity and desire for fame, apparently, sought to have official church recognition for his work, and produced a 6-column harmony of the available Greek texts of his time, called the Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, and LXX (Septuagint). This is seen by many scholars as nothing more than Origen's own attempt at producing a Greek version of the Old Testament for which he wanted official church recognition.

Besides the books of the Old Testament canon, the Septuagint includes other ancient Jewish books called the "Apocrypha," such as the first and second books of Maccabees. Catholic church tradition claims that even these books were supposed to have been translated by the 72 scholars sent to Egypt, along with the entire Septuagint. But such a boast flies directly into the face of historical facts. No Hebrew high priest would ever have sent these apocryphal books to be translated into Greek simply because they were not considered Scripture let alone authoritative at the time of the translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek.

Many scholars today accuse Origen of having deliberately and knowingly taking the New Testament quotations from the Old Testament and inserting them into his Septuagint version as found in his Hexapla. They maintain that when Origen, in the process of putting together his version of the LXX, came to an O.T. passage that he knew is quoted in the N.T., he simply wrote the Greek text from the New Testament into the Greek LXX. In plain English, he made the Greek version of the Old Testament quote the Greek of the N.T. verbatim in order to give greater credibility to his work. That way it would look as if the New Testament writers were quoting from his LXX text. This implies clearly that Origen was less than honest and a deceitful manipulator, full of vain intrigue, who falsified his copy of the LXX by deliberately changing all Old Testament portions quoted in the Greek New Testament to conform to the New Testament!

Answer for yourself: If the Hebrew Scriptures were translated into Greek for the non-Hebrew speaking Jews in the Greek speaking nations of the world then why would the Jewish disciples and apostles write such New Testament documents about the Christ in Greek since living in Palestine where Hebrew/Aramaic was spoken? Does it not seem to you that if their witness of Christ was to the Jews that these documents, if written by them, would have been in Aramaic/Hebrew mix and not Greek? Do we have any records of a Gospel written in Hebrew?

DOES THE SEPTUAGINT AND OUR CHRISTIAN BIBLES MAKE US IDOLATORS?

Scholars with a critical eye point out to Biblical Students that in Hebrew 1:10 we read, "And, Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth," which he says, is quoted from Psalm 102:25: "Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth." Scholars maintain that the author, Origen added the word "Lord" to his Septuagint version, making it identical to the quotation from the book of Hebrews in the New Testament. This one example alone shows us the tendency of Origen to simply "copy" the text from Hebrews 1:10-12 back into his version of the LXX. Anyway you want to look at this we have a purposeful Scriptural forgery in the LXX.

In Hebrews 1:6, we read:

"And again, when he bringeth in the firstbegotten into the world, he said, And let all the angels of God worship him."

My KJV Bible has a reference in the center column referring me to Deut. 32:43 which indicates that this is quotation from the Old Testament.

The passage from the LXX is quoted next:

"Rejoice ye heavens, with him, and let all the angels of God worship him:"

Let me remind you that this is a quote supposedly taken from the Hebrew Scriptures; at least that is what my KJV and the LXX states. Now when I opened my Hebrew-English Bible to look at the Hebrew from which these two above "translations" come I found only this at Deut. 32:43 in the Jewish Tanakh:

Sing aloud, O ye nations, of His people; for He doth avenge the blood of His servants, and doth render vengeance to His adversaries, and doth make expiation for the land of His people

Answer for yourself: What is missing? What is the context of the verse in the first place which the LXX and later the New Testament writers supposedly quote...or should I say "misquote"?

THERE IS ABSOLUTELY NO REFERENCE IN THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES WHATSOEVER TO "WORSHIP" ANYONE HERE LET ALONE JESUS AS PAUL, OR THE WRITER OF THE BOOK OF HEBREWS INSISTS!

Jesus teaches us that a lot of the New Testament and Old Testament as has come down to us is false but we have to be on our toes and think clearly when we read the "red" of our Bibles to see this warning and make the accurate correlations.

Matt 4:10 10 Then saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan: for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. (KJV)

Here we have it very plainly. The correction of the Essenes and their falsification of the LXX and Paul and the writer of the Book of Hebrews as well as other New Testament books like John if we only think on our feet. Not only that we have in the mouth of two or more witnesses, let alone the testimony of the Jewish nation to whom these Scriptures were given in the first place that we are to worship God only and not a man or a cosmic godman as others do who get confused when reading the adulterated Christian religious texts.

The LXX translators at least point to the worship of God [understand that the Essene cosmic redeemer-angel messiah was God to hem] with the reference of the angels who are instructed to worship God but yet the later writer of the Book of Hebrews has inserted Jesus in the context as the object of worship instead of only God. The study notes in my KJV Annotated Study Bible explicitly say:

"The main point of chapters 1 and 2 of the Book of Hebrew is that Christ is superior to "the angels" because of the work He has accomplished. In verses 4-14 the writer of Hebrew proves Christ's superiority by citing seven Old Testament passages. It was necessary to prove to his readers Christ's superiority over the angels." These study notes in my KJV go on to explicitly say that "Christ is to be worshipped (v 6).

Now I just showed you that there is no reference whatsoever in the Hebrew Bible to worship the Messiah in Deut. 32:43 nor certainly Jesus but yet the translations that we have inherited that supposedly are faithful to the Hebrew certainly are not. it should be evident to you that the translators of the LXX INVENTED this passage as they recorded it since it did not exist in the Hebrew. Even if they had a different Hebrew text which might have contained such a rendering let us not forget that such a "unique rendering" flies right in the fact of over 3000 years of Conservative Jewish Biblical Exegesis of their own Scriptures. The problem, as delineated by Bet Emet Ministries elsewhere on our other websites, is that these Essenes who translated the Hebrew Scriptures in Alexandria, Egypt, had their own theological agenda where they had already significantly departed from normative Jewish Scriptural exegesis. This is a fact revealed over and over again on this website for those who have the courage and devote the time to read these articles.

Yet I head from many Christian writers that the LXX...the Greek translation of the Old Testament is superior to the Hebrew and that there are very few differences of any theological note. I heard that all the time in Seminary and in many books penned by Christians upon the LXX and the New Testament. They call these "minor" variants between the Septuagint and the Masoretic Text. Thank God that not all Christian scholars and writers don't all say that and with the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls only fifty years ago honest Christian scholars with integrity and with no fear of loosing a paycheck are beginning to speak out about the truth concerning the LXX and our Christian Bibles which lead us into idolatry due to the purposeful invention and mistranslation and misquotation of the Hebrew Scriptures.

Answer for yourself: Now I ask you: "Don't you think that being led by the writer of the Book of Hebrews to worship Jesus as if a quote from the Old Testament is serious in light of the fact that no such quote EVER EXISTED IN THE HEBREW BIBLE? The writer of the Book of Hebrews just made you an IDOLATOR in the sight of God by his renderings of the Hebrew Scriptures which he not only severely misquoted but INVENTED!

So what we have before us here is a bogus claim made by Paul or whomever was the Gnostic writer of the Book of Hebrews who saw in the Jewish Messiah a cosmic godman just like the Essenes who saw the same in first their Teacher of Righteousness and later Jesus after his crucifixion.

Either the Essenes deliberately put this phrase into Deut.32:43 or Origen did the same to make it appear that Paul quoted the phrase from the Septuagint. Being a Gentile who was unable to read or speak Hebrew such a deception would never be noticed by the typical Gentile of the day. The Gnostic cosmic godman was thereby written in the Greek when such a concept was never to be found in the Hebrew Scriptures nor the Masoretic text of 900 A.D. Let me say it again very clearly: this phrase is nowhere found in the Masoretic text of the Old Testament! This is another forgery of our Christian Bibles that goes undetected except by those with the most critical eye upon the texts.

I mentioned above the fact that modern biblical scholars now know there were a number of variant texts of the Hebrew Scriptures in the time before Christ, and one of these other variations was the primary source material for the Septuagint version itself -- a version in some respects distinctly different from the Masoretic text which is the commonly accepted version of the Old Testament, which was itself finalized during the time of the Masoretes, about 500 years after the time of Christ.

With such a possible duplication of the Hebrew texts then we must ask why the Essenes at Qumran possessed such a deviant Hebrew text from the accepted Hebrew Scriptures that will become later the true Masoretic text. Understand right up front that this Essene Hebrew text deviated in from the later accepted Masoretic text of Biblical and Rabbinical Judaism in that it promoted this cosmic godman over a human messiah. As shown on this site as well as others such an idea comes from Osiris, the first godman of Egyptian theology and no wonder the Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt, would include such concepts in their renderings of the Hebrew Scriptures when translated later into the Greek (especially the Prophets and the Writings).

The only LXX we have today stands exposed as a corrupt forgery and cannot be trusted for theolgoical dogmas and doctrines upon which we can trust for our Eternal Life. Just ask the Hebrew speaking Jews...they know of the horrible corruption of the Hebrew Scriptures and the Bible Jesus used.

THE HEBREW MANUSCRIPTS OF THE BIBLE

THE TESTIMONY OF THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA CONCERNING THE HEBREW MANUSCRIPTS OF THE BIBLE

THE PRE-MASSORETIC TEXT

The earliest Hebrew manuscript is the Nash papyrus. There are four fragments, which, when pieced together, give twenty-four lines of a pre-Massoretic text of the Ten Commandments and the shema (Ex., xx, 2-17; Deut., v, 6-19; vi, 4-5). The writing is without vowels and seems paleographically to be not later than the second century. This is the oldest extant Bible manuscript (see Cook, "A Pre-Massoretic Biblical Papyrus" in "Proceed. of the Soc. of Bib. Arch.", Jan., 1903). It agrees at times with the Septuagint against the Massorah. Another pre-Massoretic text is the Samaritan Pentateuch. The Samaritan recension is probably pre-exilic; it has come down to us free from Massoretic influences, is written without vowels and in Samaritan characters. The earliest Samaritan manuscript extant is that of Nablûs, which was formerly rated very much earlier than all Massoretic manuscripts, but is now assigned to the twelfth or thirteenth century A.D. Here mention should be made of the non-Massoretic Hebrew manuscripts of the Book of Ecclesiasticus (q.v.). These fragments, obtained from a Cairo genizah (a box for worn-out or cast-off manuscripts), belong to the tenth or eleventh century of our ear. They provide us with more than a half of Ecclesiasticus and duplicate certain portions of the book. Many scholars deem that the Cairo fragments prove Hebrew to have been the original language of Ecclesiasticus (see "Facsimiles of the Fragments hitherto recovered of the Book of Ecclesiasticus in Hebrew", Oxford and Cambridge, 1901).

THE MASSORETIC TEXT

All other Hebrew manuscripts of the Bible are Massoretic, and belong to the tenth century or later. Probably the earliest Massoretic manuscripts are: "Prophetarium Posteriorum Codex Bablyonicus Petropolitanus", dated A.D. 916; the St. Petersburg Bible, written by Samuel ben Jacob and dated A.D. 1009; and "Codex Oriental. 4445" in the British Museum, which Ginsburg (Introduction, p. 469) assigns to A.D. 820-50. The text critics differ very widely in the dates they assign to certain Hebrew manuscripts. De Rossi is included to think that at most nine or ten Massoretic manuscripts are earlier than the twelfth century (Variæ Lectiones, I, p. xv).

The critical study of this rich assortment of about 3400 Massoretic rolls and codices is not so promising of important results as it would at first thought seem to be. The manuscripts are all of quite recent date, if compared with Greek, Latin, and Syriac codices. They are all singularly alike. Some few variants are found in copies made for private use; copies made for public service in the synagogues are so uniform as to deter the critic from comparing them. All Massoretic manuscripts bring us back to one editor -- that of a textual tradition which probably began in the second century and became more and more minute until every jot and tittle of the text was almost absolutely fixed and sacred. R. Akiba seems to have been the head of this Jewish school of the second century. Unprecedented means were taken to keep the text fixed. The scholars counted the words and consonants of each book, the middle word and middle consonants, the peculiarities of script, etc. Even when such peculiarities were clearly due to error or to accident, they were perpetuated and interpreted by a mystical meaning. Broken and inverted letters, consonants that were too small or too large, dots which were out of place -- all these oddities were handed down as God-intended. This lack of variants in Massoretic manuscripts leaves us hopeless of reaching back to the original Hebrew text save through the versions. Kittel in his splendid Hebrew text gives such variants as the versions suggest.

THE TRUTH ABOUT WHAT WAS FOUND AT QUMRAN

There sure is a lot of talk about the Dead Sea Scrolls and what was discovered at Qumran. Sadly few know of what they are speaking of as rumor has again replaced solid facts and easily discernible evidence. The debate today, among those pseudo-scholars who have read at least one book on the subject, rages between which texts of the Bible found at Qumran are "authoritative." Many, too many, reply upon the Greek translation of the Jewish Bible for their Old Testaments today, and that for several reasons. First of all, this Greek translation was the translation used by the Greek-speaking church and later it would be the ultimate source and standard for all English translations since the beginning. Coupled with this was the discovery of portions of the Greek translations of the Jewish Scriptures at Qumran. With the failure of the church to read and understand Hebrew the Jewish Hebrews texts, along with the loss of the Hebrew language among the Hellenized Jews of the Second Temple period, even in the days of Jesus, Aramaic had replaced the use of Hebrew among all but the intellectuals and spiritual leadership. Needless to say the ability to read Hebrew fell into disuse long, long ago, and few early Church Fathers could handle the language. Therefore, for them their Bible had to be Greek.

This Greek Septuagint translation of the Torah was done between 285 and 244 B.C.E., as my quote from the Judaica below attests to. Further more, the other books of the Tanach were translated during the following 2 centuries, i.e. between 244 and 44 B.C.E.

"Septuagint, the oldest Greek translation of the Bible...the legend contained in the apocryphal letter of Aristeas, according to which 72 elders of Israel, six from each tribe, translated the LAW [Torah] into Greek in Alexandria, during the reign of Ptolemy II Philadelphus (285-244 B.C.E.)...The designation Septuagint was EXTENDED to the rest of the Bible and non-canonical books that were translated to Greek during the following two centuries" (Encylopaedia Judaica, Volume 14, p1178).

As stated above Biblical manuscripts were recovered in the Qumran excavations; some were Greek, some Aramaic, and some Hebrew. What escapes almost all today, even some scholars it seems, is that the Essenic community possessed conflicting "Bibles." In other words, the Greek read often exactly opposite to what the Hebrew would read.

Answer for yourself: How can this be and yet be the Word of God?

Without serious investigation on your part you most likely never knew this fact in the first place. Besides that, most today, if they know anything at all, have failed to be told about these alarming inconsistencies in the Biblical texts recovered there. There seems to be a general acceptance that the Greek manuscripts found there only solidify the authority already accepted for the Septuagint (the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures).

Let me say that the facts state otherwise along with some scholars who will attest to such. Let us examine just what was found there and see if the manuscripts discovered there confirm the authority of the Greek Bible over the Hebrew Old Testament.

THE FACTS DON'T LIE.....SO WHAT ARE THEY?

The Biblical manuscripts found in the Qumran, are distributed as follows: 60% Proto-Masoretic texts, 20% Qumran style manuscripts, 10% Nonaligned texts, 5% Proto-Samaritan texts, and 5% Septuagintal type texts.

Answer for yourself: Did you notice only 5 % of all the manuscripts found there were Greek? That means the vast majority of the texts were in Hebrew or Aramaic. So much for the fact that the Essenes accepted the authority of the Greek Old Testament and its variant readings over the Palestinian Massoretic text.

Further more, the Qumran style manuscripts have their bases in the proto-Masoretic texts. The Masoretic type texts were dominant in the time of the Hasmonean period (about 160 B.C.E.). (p172 of Reclaiming the Dead Sea Scrolls by Shiffman)

Furthermore, most of the text that vary from the Masoretic (4 LXX manuscript fragments, for example, dating to the 1st and second century B.C.E.), come from cave 4. This is the cave where the texts were not preserved carefully in jars. It is conjectured, that cave 4 was a geniza for the depositing of texts that were damaged or had textual errors.

Some say, 'Cave 4 is close to to Qumran, and had shelves, so it must have been where they kept the books they were currently using.' I disagree. The geniza of Cairo shows that flawed texts, text no longer usuable or never usable, that contained the Name of God were stored nearby. Many synagogues today have genizas in the synagogue itself. It would have been more likely for the people of Qumran to have stored the books they used daily or weekly directly in their settlement, in a building where it could be easily used. These cave 4 scrolls, were, in my opinion, part of a genizia of texts that were in error or unacceptable in other ways, yet could not be merely thrown out, as they contained the Name of God or were part of faulty Scriptural texts.

Additionally, another quote from the Encyclopaeadia Judaica supports this. "In talmudic and midrashic literature, however, it is [geniza] used as a nomen actionis (Shab. 16:1; Lev. R. 21:12; Meg. 26b), as a place for the putting away of all kinds of sacred articles, such as sacred books no longer usable, as well as the books of Sadducees and heretics, and other writings of which the sages disapproved but which were not required to be burned" ("Genizah", Encyclopaeadia Judaica)

Cave 7 contained a collection of only Greek texts, including 2 LXX fragments on paprus. (Shiffman, p 212).

Clearly, by the time of the Hasmoneans (who were before Jesus in history) at least, the Masoretic texts were the majority texts. Jesus himself followed the same division of the Tanach into Torah, Prophets, and Psalms (ie writings), as it says in Luke 24:44. Jesus never made mention of the "four divisions" of the Greek Bible which was existing in his day.

The texts are sacred to us, so the task of copying them is considered of utmost importance. A number of safe guards are taken to preserve the accuracy by the scribe himself. The congregation who gets the scroll is another check in the accuracy of the scroll. They always have someone checking the Hebrew as the scroll is read, comparing it to a scroll that is known to be Kosher (i.e., without errors). Based on the Biblical scrolls found in Qumran, the Jewish scribes have done a remarkably accurate job of passing the text down for the last 2200 years.

In the approximately 2000 years since the writing of the Dead Sea Scroll Isaiahs, it is interesting to note that the only difference between those and the Masoretic text are minor spelling errors in the DSS Isaiah versions. Scholars interpret this and understand that such "accuracy" for such older manuscripts (the DSS Isaiah almost 1000 years older than any known existing Hebrew manuscript before the find at Qumran) lends credibility and assurance that the older existing Massoretic texts which were previously only known from the 9th century A.D., were just as equally meticulously preserved as well from their earlier sources. So this meticulousness in care and copying of the Hebrew manuscripts has been attested to and proven by archeological finds. Such precision and care can be expected to be applied to all the translations by the Jewish scribes. And when Qumran reveals Massoretic and pre-Massoretic texts existing contemporary to the Septuagint, then there is no longer any need for doubt reading its accuracy. The problem comes when one realizes that and can no longer blame the divergent readings of the Massoretic texts as Jewish reactionism to Christianity in the Middle Ages. This simply will not hold water any longer. One must now deal with these divergent readings found at Qumran and as attested in the Jewish Tanakh as they oppose many readings in the Greek Septuagint and the later Christian translations.

It is also important to note that in communities as far apart as Syria or Yemin and England, isolated from each other, the Torah is the same. This is amazing given the distance between them before the age of mass communication and given the isolation of the 2 communities from each other. They were not comparing notes, but copying the Torah from previous ones in their possession. This attests to the accurate transmission of the Torah and Tanach following the scribal methods.

In contrast, early in Church history, a Church Father set out to make a standard version of the LXX, due to the fact that there were so many versions out there.

Origen became alarmed at the state of the Greek text of the Bible: the latter not only differed considerably from the Hebrew text of the Jews, which he believed to be the original one, but it appeared in a wide range of forms in the manuscripts current among the Christians. His purpose in producing his enormous work known as the Hexapla ("the sixfold," completed in 245 C.E.) was to reconstitute and standardize the "genuine" text of the Septuagint, essential both to sound exegesis and effective apologetics.

The Hexapla did not become preeminent throughout the Christian world, since, at the end of the fourth century, Jerome referred to the existence of two other recensions, one Egyptian by Hesychius, and the other made in Asia Minor by Lucian. The existence of these three versions might in itself afford a sufficient explanation of the many discrepancies displayed by the Septuagint manuscripts (Encyclopaedia Judaica, "Bible: Translations").

Considering the painstaking accuracy with which the Tanach is copied, I would rather rely on the oldest Hebrew manuscripts we have today and their translation rather than the Greek mistranslation, no matter how good it might be or others attest to it. You see, the language of the translation limits its accuracy. Greek is very different from Hebrew, and the translation was designed to meet the needs of a Greek-speaking audience. The language you use colors the meaning, and the LXX is thus colored by the Greek language let alone purposefully mistranslated in many, many places. Something that might be of interest to you. Origen, one of the Church father's, believed that the Hebrew text of the Jews was the original text. (Encylopaedia Judaica, "Bible", p853). Many modern translations, such as the NRSV, make use of the Hebrew Masoretic text.

THE SCHOLARS SPEAK CONCERNING THE NEW TESTAMENT...HAVE YOU HEARD THEM?

Again we need to think and answer some questions before we proceed:

1. What is the truth?

2. Who has the truth? Is it your Pastor or televangelist? Could it possibly be the scholar?

3. Is the truth what we usually hear in our churches and over television or read today in the "top ten" of our corner Christian book store, or could the truth be buried in archeology, history, and antiquity and few today know of it today?

4. Are the popular accounts and superficial rhetoric heard today by those today who never knew, investigated, or studied in-depth such fields as archeology, biblical history, biblical linguistics, and antiquity to be considered more trustworthy than the actual examination of the earliest documents first hand and those who originally wrote the documents and were closer to the events at hand than contemporary commentators?

5. Is it possible that those who lived in the earliest times and who wrote about the events of antiquity be closer to the truth that those, say, 2000 years later who wrote of the same events with denominational biases?

6. Does the testimony of the earliest Church Fathers, when read, often incriminate themselves and their biases concerning the deceptions used in the formation of the New Testament Canon?

Too many times our religious knowledge today, take the New Testament for example, concerning spiritual matters is limited to our generation and our generation only. We seem to forget that the "top ten" at your corner Christian Book store pails in comparison to a scholarly book. To much denominational bias and "party line" occupy the bookshelves today. Most Christians I know have never read a scholarly Biblical book in their life, but yet to listen to them, they have all truth because the Holy Spirit led them to it. This always amuses me when the same Holy Spirit has evidently led almost 1 billion people to the worship of Mary as well.

Over the years of intense study I have seem first-hand how that we have lost more knowledge than we currently possess. Even in Seminary I was beginning to get the "drift" that all is not what it is made out to be thanks to credible and honest professors who walked a thin line between their "paychecks" and truth.

Those who consider themselves "knowledgeable" today concerning the Christian religion seldom seem to know more than rhetoric or their "denominational company line." Antiquity possesses the truths we look for if we would only look; for much it has to say is a blatant contradiction to what we have been taught today. Our complacency and our laziness to search out these matters to see if we have been taught the truth has robbed us of this precious commodity.

The idea of a complete and clear-cut canon of the New Testament existing from the beginning, that is from Apostolic times, has no foundation in history. The Canon of the New Testament, like that of the Old, is the result of a development, of a process at once stimulated by disputes with doubters, both within and without the Church, and retarded by certain obscurities and natural hesitations, and which did not reach its final term until the dogmatic definition of the Tridentine Council. New Testament

DISTURBING QUOTES FROM SCHOLARS CONCERNING THE NEW TESTAMENT

The following I provide to provoke your thinking. These men saw severe problems with the Canon and New Testament which most likely you, the reader, has not seen yet. Again, your inability to see these problems does not negate their existence. It is our hope at Bet Emet that once reading these quotes you will awaken to the personal need of serious study into the document you have accepted "by faith" without verification.

"In the Twentieth Century it is astounding to hear Christian people declare that the Bible and particularly the New Testament , says so-and-so, and that therefore it must be true. Do they not understand that the New Testament is a collection of books of varying credibility only in the Fourth Century A.D., by clergy having the limited mentality of that very uncritical age?" (Authur Weigall, The Paganism in Our Christianity, G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York, 1928, p. 34).

"The Scriptures were in the hands of the clergy only, and they had every opportunity to insert whatsoever they pleased; thus we find them (New Testament) full of interpolations. Johann Solomo Semler, one of the most influential theologians of the eighteenth century, speaking of this, says: " The Christian doctors never brought their sacred books before the common people; although people in general have been wont to think otherwise; during the first ages, they were in the hands of the clergy only" (Robert Taylor, Diegesis, p. 48).

"All the earliest external evidences points to the conclusion that thy synoptic gospels are non-apostolic digesis of spoken and written apostolic tradition, and that the arrangement of the earlier material in orderly form took place only gradually and by many essays..." (T. W. Doane, Bible Myth And Their Parallels In Other Religions, The Truth Seeker Co., New York, 1882, p. 463.).

"Dr. Hooykaas, speaking of the four 'Gospels,' and 'Acts,' says of them: 'Not one of these five books was written by the person whose name it bears, and they are all of more recent date than the heading would lead us to suppose'" (T. W. Doane, Bible Myth And Their Parallels In Other Religions, The Truth Seeker Co., New York, 1882, p. 463.).

"We cannot say that the 'Gospels' and the book of 'Acts' are unauthentic, for not one of them professes to give the name of its author. They appeared anonymously. The titles placed above them in our Bibles owe their origin to an ecclesiastical tradition which deserves no confidence whatever" (Bible for Learners, vol. iii. pp. 24-25).

"These Gospels 'can hardly be said to have had authors at all. They had only editors or compilers. What I mean is, that those who enriched the old Christian literature with these Gospels did not go to work as independent writers and compose their own narratives out of the accounts they had collected, but simply took up the different stories or sets of stories which they found current in the oral tradition or already reduced to writing, adding here and expanding there, and so sent out into the world a very artless kind of composition. These works were then, from time to time, somewhat enriched by introductory material or interpolations from the hands of later Christians, and perhaps were modified a little here and there. Our first two Gospels appear to have passed through more than one such revision. The third, whose writer says in his preface, that 'many had undertaken to put together a narrative (Gospel),' before him, appears to proceed from a single collecting, arranging, and modifying hand" (Ibid., p. 29).

Concerning the time when the canon of the New Testament was settled, Mosheim says: "The opinions, or rather the conjectures, of the learned concerning the time when the books of the New Testament were collected into one volume; as also about the authors of that collection, are extremely different. This important question is attended with great and almost insuperable difficulties to us in these later times" (Mosheim, Vol. i. pt. 2, ch. ii).

"Dr. Lardner says: 'Even so late as the middle of the sixth century, the canon of the New Testament had not been settled by any authority that was decisive and universally acknowledged, but Christian people were at liberty to judge for themselves concerning the genuineness of writings proposed to them as apostolical, and to determine according to evidences'" (Credibility of the Gospels, T. W. Doane, Bible Myth And Their Parallels In Other Religions, The Truth Seeker Co., New York, 1882, p. 464.).

The learned Michaelis says: "No manuscript of the New Testament now extant is prior to the sixth century, and what is to be lamented, various readings which, as appears from the quotations of the Fathers, were in the text of the Greek Testament, are to be found in none of the manuscripts which are at present remaining" (Marsh's Michaelis, Vol. ii. p. 160).

Bishop Marsh says: "It is a certain fact, that several readings in our common printed text are nothing more than alterations made by Origen, whose authority was so great in the Christian Church (A.D. 230) that emendations which he proposed, though, as he himself (acknowledged, they were supported by evidence of no manuscript, were very generally received" (Ibid., p. 368)

"Though Irenaeus, in the second century, is the first who mentions the evangelists, and Origen, in the third century, is the first who gives us a catalogue of the books contained in the New Testament, Mosheim's admission still stands before us. We have no grounds of assurance that the mere mention of the names of the evangelists by Irenaeus, or the arbitrary drawing up of a particular catalogue by Origen, were of any authority. It is still unknown by whom, or where, or when, the canon of the New Testament was settled. But in this absence of positive evidence we have abundance of negative proof. We know when it was not settled. We know it was not settled in the time of Emperor Justinian, nor in the time of Cassiodorus; that is, not at any time before the middle of the sixth century, "by any authority that was decisive and universally acknowledged; but Christian people were at liberty to judge for themselves concerning the genuineness of writings proposed to them as apostolical" (T. W. Doane, Bible Myth And Their Parallels In Other Religions, The Truth Seeker Co., New York, 1882, p. 464.).

"The Bible (New Testament) has been received by the Protestants on the authority of the church of Rome, and on no other authority. It is she that has said it is the word of God." Ingersoll's Works, Vol 5, Ibid., p. 364.

"None of those books have the appearance of being written by the persons whose names they bear, neither do we know who the authors were. They come to us on no other authority than the church of Rome, which the Protestant Priests...call the Whore of Babylon." Ingersoll's Works, Vol 5, Ibid., p. 365.

"...the bishop who has answered me has been obliged to acknowledge the fact, that the Books that compose the NT, were voted by yeas and nays to be the word of God, as you now vote a law, by the Popish councils of Nicea and Laodicea, about 1,450 years ago." Interviews, Ingersoll's Works, Vol 5, Ibid. p. 325.

"I admit that books were voted in and out, and that the Bible was finally formed in accordance with a vote...." Interviews, Ingersoll's Works, Vol 5, p. 300.

"Nothing can exceed the credulity of the early fathers, unless it may be their ignorance. They believed everything that was miraculous. They believed everything except the truth.... They revelled in the mishapen and the repulsive. They did not think it wrong to swear falsely in a good cause. They interpolated, forged, and changed the records to suit themselves, for the sake of Christ. They quoted from persons who never wrote. They misrepresented those who had written, and their evidence is absolutely worthless. They were ignorant, credulous, mendacious, fanatical, pious, unreasonable, bigoted, hypocritical, and for the most part insane." Interviews, Ingersoll's Works, Vol. 5, p. 273

"The great religious historian, Eusebius, ingenuously remarks that in his history he carefully omitted whatever tended to discredit the church, and that he piously magnified all that conduced to her glory." Interviews, Ingersoll's Works, Vol. 5, Ibid., Vol. 1, p. 293

"Now, Sir, it is impossible for serious men, to whom God has given the divine gift of reason, and who employs that reason to reverence and adore the God that gave it, it is I say, impossible for such a man to put confidence in a book that abounds with fable and falsehood as the New Testament does." The Life and Works of Thomas Paine, Vol. 9, p. 128

"Taylor's [Reverend Robert Taylor 1784 - 1844], conclusion is: 'As we see Protestantism to be a mere modification or reform of Popery, so Popery was nothing more than a similar modification or reform of Paganism. It is absolutely certain that the pagans were in possession of the whole Gospel story many ages before its JEWISH ORIGIN WAS PRETENDED; and it was not until the first error had been committed of suffering the people to become acquainted too intimately with the contents of the sacred books that it became necessary to invent a chronology, and to 'give to airy nothing a local habitation and a name.'" H. Cutner [1881-1969], The Devil's Chaplain Robert Taylor (1784-1844), The Pioneer Press, c. 1950, 41.

"The gradual development of the canon, in our view, was primarily the achievement of gentile Christianity, although of course THERE WOULD HAVE BEEN NO NEW TESTAMENT IF AN OLD TESTAMENT HAD NOT ALREADY EXISTED. Among the earliest Christians there was no New Testament; their Bible consisted of the Old Testament alone." The Formation of the New Testament, Robert M. Grant, Harper & Row, 1965.

"Ironically, the more fully the individual documents of the NT have been understood, the LESS INTELLIGIBLE the NT as a whole has become, both historically and theologically." [13]. · · · from: The New Testament Canon, Harry Y. Gamble, Fortress, 1985. The New Testament Canon, Harry Y. Gamble, Fortress, 1985).

As von Harnack [Adolph von Harnack 1851 - 1930] has pointed out (The Origin of the New Testament [New York, 1925], p. 5), there were four possibilities open to the Church: [1] the Old Testament alone, [2] an enlarged Old Testament, [3] no Old Testament, and [4] a second authoritative collection." The Canon of the New Testament, Bruce M. Metzger, Oxford, 1987.

"...originally NONE OF THE DOCUMENTS NOW INCLUDED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT HAD THE TITLES TO WHICH WE HAVE BECOME ACCUSTOMED in the headings of the different books in traditional English versions....Only after several Gospels or several Epistles had been collected together was there need for separate designations in order to distinguish one from another." The Canon of the New Testament, Bruce M. Metzger, Oxford, 1987, p.302).

'With respect to attribution, the [apocryphal] books resemble Jewish midrashim and the Old Testament apocrypha. TO SECURE AUTHORITY OR CREDIBILITY, THEY ARE WRITTEN UNDER THE HONORARY NAME OF AN APOSTLE OR SOME OTHER PROMINENT FIGURE. Put flatly, THEY ARE FORGED, but then SO ARE MANY [ALL!] OF THE CANONICAL NEW TESTAMENT BOOKS..." The Secret Gospels A Harmony of Apocryphal Jesus Traditions, Edited and Translated by R. Joseph Hoffmann, Westminster College-Oxford, Prometheus, 1996.

The Catholic Encyclopedia is quoted saying: "Until the Council of Trent, in 1546, there was no infallibly defined sanction of inspiration of these Jewish "apocrypha"; like the "canon" sacred Books of the Hebrew Bible, all alike were more or less eclectically accepted and used in the True Church; but, as said: "The Tridentine decree from which the above list is extracted was the first infallible and effectually promulgated pronouncement on the Canon, addressed to the Church universal. Being dogmatic in its purport, it implies that the Apostles bequeathed the same Canon to the Church as a part of the depositum fidei.... We should search the pages of the New Testament in vain for any trace of such action.... We affirm that such a status points to Apostolic sanction, which in turn must have rested on revelation either by Christ or the Holy Spirit" (Catholic Encyclopedia, vol. iii, 270.). This is luminous clerical reasoning: a lot of anonymous Jewish fables, derided by Jews and all the rest of the world for want of even common plausibility of fact or truth, and as to which the "inspired" Christian Books said to emanate from Apostles, are silent as the grave, are declared after 1500 years to have the ear-marks of Apostolic sanction, which "must have" been founded on divine revelation to them "either by Christ or the Holy Spirit,"—which the Church claims are one and the same Person; and it is curious that the "infallible" Council couldn't say which was which, but vaguely and uncertainly opined it must hate been one or the other. So much for infallible cock-suredness as to "inspiration" of Holy Scriptures. (Joseph Wheless, Forgery In Christianity, Alfred Knoph, New York, 1930, p. 54).

"The New Testament and the inspired Apostles are silent on the subject (inspiration) and left the matter to serious doubts and disputations for many centuries :''There are no indications in the New Testament . . . Of a definite new Canon bequeathed by the Apostles to the Church, or of a strong self-witness to Divine inspiration," admits the CE. (iii, 274); that is, there is nothing in the 27 booklets which would lead to the suspicion of their "inspiration" or truth. There was then no Church for them to bequeath to, nor was the Canon settled, as we shall see: "It was not until about the middle of the second century— [when we shall see the books were really written]—that under the rubric of Scripture the New Testament writings were assimilated to the Old.... But it should be remembered that the inspired character of the New Testament is a Catholic dogma, and must therefore in some way have been revealed to, and taught by, Apostles"! (Ibid., p.275.) This is a strikingly queer bit of clerical dialectic, and leaves the question of the "some way" of revelation to the Apostles and of their transmission of the "dogma" to posterity, in a nebulously unsatisfying state." (Joseph Wheless,Forgery In Christianity, Alfred Knoph, New York, 1930, p. 97-98).

"Further, the dubious and disputed status of the sacred writings through centuries, and the ultimate settlement of the controversies by the "ipse dixit" of a numerical majority of the Council of Trent, in 1546,—after the Reformation had forced the issue, is thus admitted: "The idea of a complete and clear-cut canon of the New Testament existing from the beginning, that is, from Apostolic times, has no foundation in history. The canon of the New Testament, like that of the Old, is the result of a development, of a process at once stimulated by disputes with doubters, both within and without the Church, and retarded by certain obscurities and natural hesitations, and which did not reach its final term until the dogmatic definition of the Tridentine Council.... And this want of an organized distribution, secondarily to the absence of an early fixation of the Canon, left room for variations and doubts which lasted far into the centuries." (CE. iii, 274.) The modus operandi of the Holy Council in ultimately "canonizing" Jerome's old Vulgate Version, and its motive for doing so, are thus exposed by the keen pen of the author ofThe Rise and Fall: "When the Council of Trent resolved to pronounce sentence on the Canon of Scripture, the opinion which prevailed, after some debate, was to declare the Latin Vulgate authentic and almost infallible; and this sentence, which was guarded by formidable anathemas, se-cured all the books of the Old and New Testament which composed that ancient version.... When the merit of that version was discussed, the majority of the theologians urged, with confidence and success, that it was absolutely necessary to receive the Vulgate as authentic and inspired, unless they wished to abandon the victory to the Lutherans, and the honors of the Church to the Grammarians." (Gibbon, A Vindication, v, 2; Istoria del Consiglio Tridentino, L. ii, p. 147.) A number of these books were bitterly disputed and their authenticity and inspiration denied by the leading Reformers, Luther, Grotius, Calvin, etc., and excluded from their official lists, until finally the Reformed Church followed the example of the Church hopeless of reform and swallowed the canon whole, as we have it today,—minus, of course, the Tobit, Judith, and like inspired buffooneries of the True Bible" (Joseph Wheless, Forgery In Christianity, Alfred Knoph, New York, 1930, p. 97-98).

"And no other Pope, Bishop or Father (except Papias and until Irenaeus), for nearly a century after "Pope Clement," ever mentions or quotes a Gospel, or names Matthew, Mark, Luke or John. So for a century and a half—until the books bobbed up in the hands of Bishop St. Irenaeus and were tagged as "Gospels according to" this or that Apostle, there exists not a word of them in all the tiresome tomes of the Fathers. It is humanly and divinely impossible that the "Apostolic authorship" and hence "canonicity" or divine inspiration of these Sacred Four should have remained, for a century and a half, unknown and unsuspected by every Church, Father, Pope and Bishop of Christendom—if existent. Even had they been somewhat earlier in existence, never an inspired hint or human suspicion was there, that they were "Divine" or "Apostolic," or any different from the scores of "apocryphal or pseudo-Biblical writings with which the East especially had been flooded,"—that they were indeed "Holy Scripture." Hear this notable admission: "It was not until about the middle of the second century that under the rubric of Scripture the New Testament writings were assimilated to the Old"! (CE. iii, 275),—that is, be-came regarded as apostolic, sacred, inspired and canonical,—or "Scriptures" (Joseph Wheless, Forgery In Christianity, Alfred Knoph, New York, 1930, p. 182-183).

"To argue and prove that the Four (Gospels) were regarded as "Apostolic" and hence "canonical" after the middle of the second century, argues and proves that until that late date they were not so regarded,— which we have seen is impossible if they had been written by Apostles a hundred years and more previously and authorized by them "for the purpose of being read in the Churches," as the very ground and pillar of their foundation and faith....Follow the proofs and argument of the Church to its own undoing: 'From the testimony of St. Irenaeus (A.D. 185) alone there can be no reasonable doubt that the Canon of the Gospel was inalterably fixed in the Catholic Church by the last quarter of the second century to the exclusion of any pretended Evangels. [Sundry writings mentioned] presuppose the authority enjoyed by the Fourfold Gospel towards the middle of tile second century.... Even Rationalistic scholars like Harnack admit the canonicity of the quadriform Gospel between the years 140-175.' (CE. iii, 275.) Even CE. does not prove or claim that it was any earlier; so here the Church and the Rationalists are in accord on this fatal fact! Certainly Popes Peter and Clement I, not to review the silent others, would have "inalterably fixed" the Divine Canonicity of the Four a century before, if they had known about these precious productions of the Apostles;—if, in fact, they had existed, the known works of Holy Apostles and apostolic men! But until "towards the middle of the second century" there was no "canon" or notion of divinely inspired Apostolic Gospels—simply for the reason that until just about that period they were not in existence....The sudden appearance at a certain late date, of a previously unknown document, which is then attributed to an earlier age and long since dead writers, is one of the surest earmarks of forgery" (Joseph Wheless, Forgery In Christianity, Alfred Knoph, New York, 1930, p. 184-185).

Surely after these few quotes you should be moved to want to know more about the document you have accepted "by faith" only and without personal investigation as to its claims and authority for your life.

GETTING STARTED

I think it appropriate that we begin our investigation of this issue concerning the canonization of the New Testament by turning to The Light of Reason, volume one, a writing that appeared several years ago by Schmuel Golding, the editor of the Biblical Polemics newsletter. Golding's synopsis of the process by which the Bible was formed is not only accurate but succinct. On page 23 he says,

"First the NT was not written by any of the disciples of Jesus nor by persons who even lived in that era . . . When the church fathers compiled the NT in the year 397, they collected all the writings they could find and managed them as they pleased. They decided by vote which of the books out of the collection they had made should be the word of God and which should not. They rejected several, they voted others to be doubtful, and those books which had a majority of votes were voted to be the word of God. Had they voted otherwise, all the people since calling themselves Christians would have believed otherwise. For the belief of the one comes from the vote of the other."

It is important to note the key concept here is that the Bible was put together by a group of men who met, went through a collection of writings, and chose through voting those that are to be deemed divinely inspired. Many of them wound up on the cutting room floor. Golding continues,

Who the people were that did all of this we know little of. They called themselves by the general name of church fathers and this is all the average Christian knows of the matter.... Disputes, however, ran high among the people calling themselves Christians not only as to points of doctrine but as to the authenticity of the books.

Although not stated verbatim, the essence of Golding's next paragraph is that when disputes broke out the opposition was often either eliminated or ostracized. Then, he continues by saying,

Constantine, an unbaptized pagan, convened the Council of Nicea in the year 325 in order to settle these disputes. A major issue was the nature of the deity they worshipped. Based upon their decisions Jesus was changed from man to God in the flesh, the sabbath was changed from Saturday to Sunday, the Passover was changed to Easter . . . and the NT was canonized as a holy book.

Answer for yourself: Knowing the events just described, can you explain to yourself how the Holy Spirit could be leading the changing of the Eternal Sabbath to Sunday, or changing the Passover to the pagan holiday of Isthar (Easter), or making a human messiah a God, which is admitted by most to be scandalous; yet we are to believe that in spite of such blunders by the Holy Spirit He got right the selection of a New Bible? Did the Holy Spirit have a bad day or something? Surely you can see that such events were not led by the Holy Spirit at all...for God cannot and will not contradict His Word...man may change it....as you saw...but the jots and titles are forever!

THE NEW TESTAMENT...THE WORK OF MEN OR GOD...WHO DO WE BLAME?

In other words, men, rather than God, composed the New Testament. And for that reason it is suspect in many regards whether you knew it or not. Many Christians, especially Protestants, have great difficulty with any assertion to the effect that men and not God is responsible for the New Testament coming into existence. On page 6 in Answering Christianity's Most Puzzling Questions, volume one, apologist Richard Sisson states.

"In fact, after the death of Jesus a whole flood of books that claimed to be inspired appeared.... [D]isputes over which ones were true were so intense that the debate continued for centuries. Finally in the fourth century a group of church leaders called a council and took a vote. The 66 books that comprised our cherished Bible were declared to be Scripture by a vote of 568 to 563."

Although this happens to be basically what occurred, Sisson then proceeds to allege that this is not what happened. He states on page 7 that what really occurred is that, "Actually when the council of Hippo in A.D. 393 and the Council of Carthage in A.D. 397, named the 27 books of our NT as authentic, they were simply recognizing the inspiration of those books."

Sisson has managed to highlight the key difference between the Protestant and Catholic positions. The Catholic position is historically more accurate and simply states that the church fathers assembled in a council, went through all the writings that were circulating at that time and chose the ones that were to be deemed divinely inspired. In other words, the church fathers, men, put the book together by a vote. The Protestant position, on the other hand, is that men went through the writings and chose those that were divinely inspired through mere recognition. They had already been made divinely inspired by God prior to their analysis. The difference between the positions is essentially one of recognition versus determination. Catholics say their leaders determined which books were divinely inspired; Protestants say they were divinely inspired by God and later recognized as such. In one case men did it; in the other God supposedly did it.

Theologically speaking, by simply stating that God created the book and men only discovered that fact, the Protestant position is stronger. Historically speaking, however, the Catholic position is much stronger and clearly more accurate. Men merely convened and determined which books were divinely inspired. Their choices were motivated by their current "religious beliefs;" many of which can be shown to be in conflict with the Old Testament and the Bible Jesus used. In Today's Handbook for Solving Bible Difficulties apologist David O'Brien on page 41 upholds the Protestant position by contending that although church councils put their stamps of approval on the canon of Scripture, "that canon was in place before they ever thought of meeting to approve it."

Ryrie makes the same point on page 108 in Basic Theology: "Remember that the books were inspired when they were written and thus canonical. The church only attested to what was inherently true."

And in Evidence that Demands a Verdict apologist Josh McDowell states the same position on page 33: "But the upshot of the Jamnia debates [Jamnia was another council in which the books of the Bible were being determined] was the firm acknowledgment that all these books were holy Scripture."

In other words, the church fathers simply acknowledged, they did not determine the books to be holy Scripture. But McDowell makes the following statement on page 29,

The word "canon" as applied to Scripture means an officially accepted list of books. One thing to keep in mind is that the church did not create the canon or the books included in what we call Scripture. Instead the church recognized that the books were inspired from their inception.... We don't know exactly what criteria the early church used to choose the canonical books.

McDowell had just stated that God inspired the canonical books. So how can he say that he does not know the criteria by which they were chosen? The criterion must be that they are God-inspired. An inadvertent contradiction is in evidence.

In essence, although possessed of a more impressive stance theologically, the Protestant position is historically indemonstrable. Historical evidence strongly implies that the books were not canonical but simply deemed as such by a group of influential religious and political figures. The book was put together by a vote; it was not compiled by God and subsequently discovered to be God's work.

IT IS TIME FOR AN HONEST LOOK AT THE NEW TESTAMENT

WHAT IS MY PURPOSE IN SHARING THE FOLLOWING INFORMATION?

In inviting the reader to share the inquiry, I wish to assure him that I have no theory to advocate. In opposing what I believe to be error, I desire simply to offer the evidence which is easily accessible to most, which seems not to have had its due prominence in theological discussion among the masses, and which, if properly appreciated, must result in great changes in religious beliefs.

THE MAIN SOURCES OF ANTIQUITY…..LISTENING AND LEARNING FROM THEM

The writings of the Christian Fathers, the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius (the oldest Christian history now extant) and the modern works, On The Canon of the New Testament, by Brooke Foss Westcott, D.D., and The Canon of the Bible, by Prof. Samuel Davidson, D.D., are the main sources from which the information in these articles are chiefly drawn. But we are not limited by these as the sources are in reality almost endless if one chooses to look the the problem of the New Testament. The inexperienced person has little idea of the difficulty which the critical party finds in getting its facts before the public; nor of the systematic suppression used by the Christian media and clergy to prevent unpleasant truths concerning the Christian religion from coming out. There is not an orthodox Christian media source I know of that will publish the facts concerning the origin of the New Testament which are given in these articles. Men who know the Christian theology to be untrue, have to get their audience as best they can. Thus the importance of the Internet for our world today.

One would suppose that the Christian clergy would be familiar with the history of the New Testament and how it came to be compiled (the canonization of the New Testament), the truth is, it is one of the subjects least understood. For our purposes, by "canon" is meant the list of the books composing the New Testament. Among the early Christians it meant the list of the books appointed to be read in the churches, and later, it came to mean the list of books which were sources and test of doctrine.

ORIGIN OF THE BOOKS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT...BY WHOM AND WHEN?

The reader must bear in mind that most of the books in the New Testament are anonymous. Despite the names appearing at the beginning of your Gospels in the New Testament or over the epistles no one knows who wrote them, or at least most of them, and no one knows when they were written. As to their origin there have been conjectures, but the number of authors named is about equal to the number of commentators engaged in the guessing.

This might come as a shock to you but the books of the New Testament which have no known authors are Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Acts, the Epistles to the Ephesians, Colossians, First Timothy, Second Timothy, Titus, Hebrews, the Epistle of James, Second Peter, Second John, Third John, Jude, and perhaps Revelation. The genuineness of Paul's Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians is doubted by some scholars, thought the majority accept them as from Paul. But this leaves ten of Paul's Epistles and the First of Peter, the First of John, and it may be Revelation as the only genuine writings in the New Testament!

Prof. Davidson says that the Gospel of Matthew, as we have it now, could not have been written by Matthew (Intro. New Test., i. 484). In his book he goes on to explain why the present Gospel of Mark was not written by Mark, and that its author is unknown (Ibid., ii. 83-84). He also makes a strong case that Luke did not write the Gospel now bearing his name (Ibid., ii. 25). Of the Gospel of John he says:

"Its existence before 140 A.D. is incapable either of decisive or probable showing….The Johannine authorship has receded before the tide of modern criticism; and though this tide is arbitrary at times, it is here irresistible" (Canon, 127).

"No certain trace of existence of the Fourth Gospel can be found till after Justin Martyr, ie., till after the middle of the second century" (Intro. New Test., ii. 520).

Of course, if it were not written till 140 or 150 A.D., the Apostle John could not have been its author, for he was dead long before that.

Again, Prof. Davidson says:

"If it be asked whether all the New Testament writings proceeded from the authors whose names they bear, criticism can not reply in the affirmative" (Canon, 153).

"Textual criticism has been employed to discredit the true dates of the present Gospels (i.e., to make them earlier than they really were), and the most exaggerated descriptions have been given of the frequent transcriptions of the text and its great corruption in the second century (i.e., the believers say the evidence of the late dates are corruptions of the second century)…But the evidence in favor of the authors traditionally assigned to the Gospels and some of the Epistles, is still uncertain. A wide gap intervenes between eye-witnesses of the apostles or apostolic men that wrote the sacred books, and the earliest Fathers who assert such authorship. The traditional bridge between them is a precarious one" (Canon, 159).

The Epistles to Titus, and the First and Second Epistles to Timothy, commonly known as the "Pastoral Epistles," were not written by Paul (Davidson, Canon, 239, 252, 261; Intro. New Test., ii. 193-194). What is of major importance for the reader to understand is that prior to the year 170 A.D., nothing was heard of the Second Epistle of Peter (Westcott, Canon, 227), and it was not generally known till the close of the third century (Ibid., 242). Dr. Westcott says that its canonicity can not even now, on historical grounds, be pronounced certainly authentic, and the most he can say for it is that it is better supported than the Shepherd of Hermas or the Epistle of Barnabas (Westcott, Canon, 227), of which we now hear nothing.

There has never been a time when the book of Revelation was not discarded by many persons competent to judge. The churches to which it was addressed, those in Asia, are the very ones which rejected it! It was not in the Bibles of the Eastern Christians for more than one thousand five hundred years, and was incorporated into those Bibles less than three centuries ago. Dionysius said that many of the early Christians denounced it as being without sense or reason, and as the forgery of Cerinthus (Euseb., Eccl. Hist., vii. 25). Dionysius himself did not believe it was written by John the Apostle (Ibid.), he did not know who did write it, although it another place he intimates that Cerinthus did so, and forged John's name to it (Ibid., iii. 28). Papias suggested that it might have been written by John the presbyter (Ibid., iii. 39). Caius said it was written by Cerinthus (Ibid., iii. 28). So great was the hostility and contempt for it in the East, that there is reason to believe that the bishops would not allow it to be read in the churches (Westcott, Canon, 442, note 2). In the synod of Toledo, a Western church, in 671 A.D., a special decree had to be passed affirming its authority (Ibid., 447, note 4). And so late as the sixteenth century, Beza, the friend of Luther and Calvin, conjectured that it was written by Mark (Prov. Apocalypsis).

Even yet, the Pauline authority of the Epistle of Hebrews, and its right to a place in the New Testament, have been denied by orthodox theologians. The genuine letters have the superscription, "Paul, called to be an Apostle," etc. This Epistle has none. Originally, no one claimed it to have been written by Paul. Tertullian, (202 A.D.), the Christian Father, said it was written by Barnabas (De dic. 20). In the Clermont manuscript it is to this day called the Epistle of Barnabas (Westcott, Canon, 263). The Old Latin version does not contain it (Ibid., 254). It was added subsequently, and then as an anonymous production (Ibid.). The early Latin Fathers, with entire unanimity, ignore it, and exclude it from the Bible. According to Origin some said it was written by Clement of Rome, others by Luke. Origin himself said, "But who it was that really wrote this epistle, God only knows" (Euseb., Eccl. Hist., vi. 23). Philastrius, of Brescia (387 A.D.), rejected it, saying that in some churches it was not read, and that is authorship was variously attributed to Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Luke and Paul (Haer. lxxxix). Grotius, in the seventeenth century, said it was obviously not written by Paul, and he believed it was written by Luke (Pref. To Hebrews). He also believed that the original title of the Second Epistle of Peter was the "Epistle of Simeon," James' successor as Bishop of Jerusalem (Pref. To 2 Peter). He also believed that the present Epistle was not the original one, but was compiled from two others by Simeon, of which the second begins as the third chapter. Dr. Westcott says that the Epistle to the Hebrews can not be shown to have been written by Paul (Westcott, Canon, 356). Kitto's Cyclopedia of the Bible says that its Pauline authorship, and its canonicity are assumptions, neither of which is admitted on all hands to have conclusive evidence (Art. "Hebrews, Epistle to the"). And yet, in the face of facts like these, certain Christian teachers have told us that we must believe these books, or be damned eternally in a like of literal fire! That is what unbelievers are opposing. They are not trying to tear down public morality. They are protesting against the elevation of stupidity as intelligence!

HOW DID WE EVER LEARN THESE THINGS?...THROUGH HISTORICAL CRITICISM...

When the assertion is made that it has been proved that Matthew did not write the Gospel bearing his name, and that a particular book was not written by the person to whom it is usually attributed, the question is asked, "How does scholarship learn these things?" It is by what is known as the "historical method" of criticism. In case of a literary forgery, it is often easy to show that the work was not written by the person claimed as its author, while at the same time it would be utterly impossible to show who did write it. A few evidence that the Gospel of John was not written by the Apostle, will illustrate how the method is used.

1. The book does not claim to have been written by John. It is called the Gospel "according" to John.
2. It was not heard of till about the year 180 A.D., nearly a hundred years after John was dead. No one of the Christian writers previous to that date makes the slightest mention of it. The inference is that it was not yet in existence.

3. It came into use first among the heretics, who did not ascribe it to John. It was not until toward the close of the second century that the book was attributed to him and then by the Fathers of the church (Davidson, Intro. New Test., ii. 520).
4. The Gospel of John says that Bethsaida was in Galilee (John 12:21). There is no such town in that district, and there never was. Bethsaida was on the east side of the sea of Tiberius, whereas Galilee was on the west side. St. John was born at Bethsaida, and the probability is that he would know the geographical location of his own birth-place.
5. John was the son of Zebedee (Matt. 10:2), and a Jew. But the author of the Gospel speaks of the Jews in the second and third persons. He says the "feasts of the Jews" (John 5:1), "the Passover, a feast of the Jews" (John 6:4), "the manner of the purifying of the Jews" (John 2:6), the law of the Jews is called "your law" (John 7:19; 10:34), "their law" (John 15:25), and he calls the Jews the children of the devil (John 8:44).
6. The other Evangelists narrate certain miracles, and say that John was the only one of the four Gospel writers who was an eyewitness; yet John does not mention them. The raising of Jarius' daughter is an illustration. This was a most astounding feat, enough to have stunned the observer and fixed him with amazement for a lifetime; and one would suppose that every well-authenticated case would have been carefully preserved by those who saw it. Matthew and Mark and Luke all narrate it. Mark and Luke distinctly asset that of the four Evangelists John was the only one present; but the Gospel of John makes not the slightest reference to it. The transfiguration is another. It is the only event of the kind that has ever occurred, and therefore the men who witnessed it ought certainly to have said something of it. Matthew, Mark, and Luke, who were not present, describe it. Each asserts in the plainest terms that, of the four Gospel writers, John was the only one who saw it. Yet John does not even hint at it!

These are a few of the evidence that John did not write the Gospel now bearing his name, and they give an idea of how scholars determine the fact that a work is a forgery.

THE TESTIMONY OF ANTIQUITY...SILENCE SPEAKS LOUDER THAN WORDS SOMETIMES

The reader has heard so much from orthodox sources, of the "unanimous testimony of antiquity to the authenticity of the Gospels," that he will be interested in knowing what that testimony is.

The first Christian writer whose works have come to us is Paul, and his Epistles we have in the New Testament. He makes no mention of the Four Gospels, makes no quotations from them, and makes not the slightest reference to them. The First Epistle of Peter, the First of John, which are generally believed to be genuine, and the Revelation of John, whose authenticity is conceded by many unbelievers, do not mention the Gospels, and do not quote from them. Likewise we have the book of Acts, Second John, Third John, James, and Jude, but none of them mentions the Four Gospels, or quotes from them, or gives the slightest indication that its author ever heard of them.

The Apostolic Fathers are they who immediately succeeded the Apostles, and the first of them was Clement of Rome (97 A.D.). We have his Epistle to the Corinthians, but in them there is no mention of either Matthew, Mark, Luke, or John. After him comes Ignatius (115 A.D.), from whom we have four epistles, believed to be genuine. Neither of them makes the least mention of the Four Gospels. Polycarp (116 A.D.), has an epistle passing under his name. It in there is no mention of any of the Four Gospels. There is an epistle attributed to Barnabas, the companion of Paul, but probably written about 130 A.D. It makes no mention of either of the Four Gospels. And, finally, there is the book called "The Shepherd of Hermas," generally conceded to be the work of Hermas or Rome, about the year 150 A.D. It like all the other books and epistles here referred to, is devoted to doctrinal and ethical ends, but it makes no reference to either of the Four Gospels. This comprises the whole of the existing Christian literature from the death of Jesus to the middle of the second century, and not one writer mentions the Four Gospels, or makes the slightest reference to them. They make quotations from tradition and from other Gospels, but not from our four.

We come to Papias, the Church Father, who lived about 150 A.D. (Davidson, Canon, 123). He says:

"And John the presbyter also said this: 'Mark being the interpreter of Peter, whatever he recorded he wrote with great accuracy, but not, however, in the order in which it was spoken or done by our Lord, for he neither heard nor followed our Lord, but, as before said, he was in company with Peter, who gave him such instruction as was necessary, but not to give a history or our Lord's discourses; wherefore Mark has not erred in anything, by writing some things as he has recorded them; for he was carefully attentive to one thing, not to pass by anything that he heard, or to state anything falsely in these accounts'" (Euseb., Eccl. Hist. iii. 39).

The question is, Does Papias here refer to our Gospel according to Mark?

1. We do not know what Papias said. His works are lost, and this quotation has been preserved in Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History. We only know what Eusebius says he said.
2. Papias preferred tradition to written records (Euseb., Eccl. Hist., iii. 39). The testimony of such a man is not trustworthy. Eusebius says that he was a man of "very limited comprehension," and that the traditions of Jesus which he collected were "rather too fabulous" (Ibid.).
3. Papias does not say that he ever saw the work. He simply mentions a traditions handed down by John the presbyter. It was natural enough that years after Jesus' death his followers should inquire, "Have we no records of his life?" and that a report should start that some one had written such a work. Later one, persons hearing the report, but finding no book, and seeing the opportunity would write one to fill the vacancy. Just as Revelation prophesied an Everlasting Gospel (Rev. 14:6), and in the 13th century one appeared of that name. Somebody saw an unfulfilled prophesy and took it on himself to make it good.
4. Suppose Papias is referring to our Gospel of Mark; what testimony have we to the authenticity of Jesus' words as contained in it? Just this: Eusebius says that Papias said that John the presbyter said that Mark said that Peter said that Jesus said thus and so. That is the historical lineage of the authenticity of the Gospel of Mark. When the reader has that, he has it all. He knows as much of it as the best theologian does, and is just as competent to decide whether or not it is to be credited. Eusebius goes on to say:

"Such is the account of Papias concerning Mark. Of Matthew, he has stated as follows: 'Matthew composed his history in the Hebrew dialect, and every one translated it as he was able" (Euseb., Eccl. History, iii. 39).

Does Papias refer to our present Gospel according to Matthew?

1. He says that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Hebrew. Our Gospel is in Greek.
2. If this is Matthew's Gospel, who translated it? No one knows. The assertion of Christian apologists that the translation was by any specific persons is pure assumption. Jerome asserts that the translator was uncertain (De. Vir. III., 3).
3. There were formerly another Gospel passing under the name of Matthew, which was used by Christians (McClintock and Strong, Cyclop., Art. "Matthew, Gospel of," iv. 3). How are we to know that the church as the right one? Nobody can tell.

To make the matter short, scholars admit that our Gospel of Matthew and Mark were not referred to. Tischendorf grants it ("When Were Our Gospels Written:" by Constantine Tischendorf; Religious Tract Society's edition, authorized. London, 1869, p. 107), and Prof. Davidson fully concedes it:

"Papias speaks of Matthew and Mark; but it is most probable that he had documents which either formed the basis of our present Matthew and Mark, or were taken into them and written over" (Davidson, Canon of the Bible, p. 124).

"The canonical Gospels of Matthew and Mark can not be identified with the logia of Matthew, and the things said and done by Jesus which Mark wrote, mentioned by Papias. The writer himself does not identify them" (Into. N.T., ii. 520).

This brings us to a period nearly one hundred and twenty years after the death of Jesus, and we have no textual evidence from Christian writers of the existence of our Four Gospels at this time....problematic? YOU BET!!!

We will continue our study as we pick up with Justin Martyr and what he contributes to our quest for an honest look into the history of the New Testament.

AN HONEST LOOK INTO THE HISTORY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT...SILENCE OF JUSTIN MARTYR

We finished the prior article by examining the astonishing lack of quotes of the New Testament in early Christian literature up until the middle second century (roughly 150 A.D.). This is absolutely amazing when you see the silence of early Church writers as to any reference to the existence of "any" of the Four Gospels which we today are told to believer were written early and by the Apostles of Jesus. Such is not the case upon examination of early Patristic Literature.

THE TESTIMONY OF JUSTIN MARTYR....OR THE LACK THERE OF...

Now we move to Justin Martyr about one hundred twenty years following the death of Jesus (roughly 150 A.D.). We again find no evidence of the existence of the Four Gospels. Justin Martyr flourished about 150 A.D. He is really the first writer who laid aside tradition, and appealed to records. In his works he frequently quotes from the Old Testament, and from what appears, at first sight, to be the New Testament, and the most strenuous exertions have been put forth by Christian apologists to show that he had our Four Gospels. But they utterly fail. Just makes three hundred and fourteen quotations from the Old Testament, and in one hundred ninety-seven of these-that is, in 2/3 of the cases, he names the book from which he is quoting. But in making his so-called New Testament quotations, he does not mention the name of any one of our Four Gospels.

Answer for yourself: Did you understand what I just shared with you? Justin made it a habit of quoting the Old Testament books by name when he quoted from them, but when quoting what one would believe to be "New Testament" quotes he NEVER mentions the name of the book from which the quotation comes. On the other hand, he states, distinctly and repeatedly, that the book from which he is quoting is the "Memoirs of the Apostles" (Apol. I. 66-67; Dial. C. Tryp. 100-104, 106), or the "Memoirs," "all things concerning Jesus Christ" (Apol., i. 33). He also quotes from the "Acts of Pilate" (Apol. I. 35, 48), giving the name of the book, and he refers to the "Memoirs or the Gospel of Peter" (Dial., 106).

Answer for yourself: Now, if he gives so often the names of the Old Testament books from which he quotes, and the names of what were to him the New Testament books which he used, why should he not give the names of the Four Gospels, if, as Christian apologists assert, he quotes from them?

The inference is plain. He was not quoting from our Four Gospels. He was using altogether different books. And yet, Christian theologians have asserted in the most positive manner that he distinctly recognizes all four of the evangelists! I give this as an illustration of the unfairness of orthodoxy and its statements.

To get around this sticky issue many Christian scholars, when advised of the above situation, retort that the "Memoirs of the Apostles" were in reality our Gospels under a different name. An evidence that this is not true, is that Justin makes nearly a hundred quotations from the "Memoirs," and in but two or three instances are they exactly the same as the parallel New Testament passages. In other words, his quotes don't agree with the New Testament passages in the vast majority of the cases. There is almost invariably some difference, either in sense or construction, showing that Justin's book was different from the Gospels which would come later. Moreover, he quotes from it things which are not even in the Gospels at all. He says that the "Memoirs" say that when Jesus went into the Jordan to be baptized a fire was kindles on the river (Dial., 88). There is no such thing in our Gospels. He says that the same devil which tempted Jesus on the Mount also tempted him as he was coming up out of the river (Dial., 108). Our Gospels say nothing to this effect.

You should find it very useful to keep these things in mind, for Justin Martyr's works are the great rallying point and battle-ground of orthodoxy. As he is the first polemical writer Christianity had the church has made every effort to show that he was acquainted with our Four Gospels. The efforts for those who study and read his works personally will show you that such endeavors by the church has been unsuccessful.

Answer for yourself: When was the first mention of the Gospels according to the names we not have for them?

The first writer who mentions either of the Evangelists by name as an author is Theophilus of Antioch in 180 A.D. He speaks of John's Gospel (Ad Adtol., ii. 22), but says nothing of the writer being an apostle. He simply calls the writer an "inspired man."

The first writer who mentions all four of our present Gospels by name was Irenaeus, who flourished in and about 200 A.D.

This is the whole of the "testimony of antiquity," to the beginning of the third century, as to the Four Gospels. The books are not heard of till 150 A.D., that is, till Jesus had been dead nearly a hundred and twenty years. No writer before 150 A.D. makes the slightest mention of them. Then comes the passages from Papias, which, as you now have seen, are rather the reflections of rumors rather than evidence for our Gospels. Justin Martyr does not mention the names of either of them. In quoting from other books, he mentions their names; and the inference is plain that he did not know of our Gospels in 150 A.D. Theophilus of Antioch, a 150 years after Jesus was dead, makes a slight mention of the Gospel of John. But not ill the year 200 A.D., nearly one hundred and seventy years after Jesus has died, do we hear of all Four Gospels.

THE EMERGENCE OF THE GOSPELS BEARING THE APOSTLE'S NAMES

One needs to understand that the earliest Church Fathers knew of no Gospels bearing the Apostle's names. It would be almost 170 years following the death of Jesus when the Latter Church Fathers would make reference to them. At the time of Irenaeus around 200 A.D. the Gospels are constantly quoted by the Christian Fathers, and when orthodoxy speaks of the "unanimous testimony of antiquity as to the authenticity of the Gospels," it usually states how many times the books were quoted by Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Eusebius, and other later Fathers. The Gospels were indeed quoted by them, for they all lived this side of the year 200 A.D., when the books had commenced to circulate under their present names. But those later Fathers knew no more of the authorship of the books than we do, and in fact not as much, for they had not the critical ability that this age has. And they do not, when they quote the books, vouch for their authenticity. The Fathers simply give the names by which the books were known; and the earlier Fathers would have given the same names if the books had been known by those names earlier. As Dr. Westcott says:

"The main testimony of the Apostolic Fathers is therefore to the substance and not to the authenticity of the Gospels" (Canon, p. 52).

I sure you can not have but observed how few Christian writings of the first two centuries we have. Dr. Westcott calls it the "dark age of Christian literature" because so scant are its remains; and he practically concluded that the Four Gospels were not in existence up to the year 150 A.D. by saying:

"A few letters of consolation and warning, two or three apologies addressed to heathen, a controversy with a Jew, a vision, and a scanty gleaning of fragments of lost works, comprise all Christian literature up to the middle of the second century" (Canon, p. 11).

HOW DOES CHRISTIANITY DEAL WITH THIS PROBLEM OF SILENCE?

I have already made mention of the fact that the Christian writers previous to the years 150 A.D. quote from tradition or from Gospels other than our four, and that the most violent efforts are now made to have it appear that the quotations are form our present Gospels. For example, Ignatius, in his epistle to Polycarp, without intimating that he is quoting it from any book or that it is other than his own sentiment, says: "Be in all things wise as a serpent, but harmless as a dove," and modern apologist assert that this is from Matthew, "Be ye therefore wise as serpents and harmless as doves." Polycarp says: "Be merciful, and ye shall obtain mercy," and the claim is that this is the famous beatitude, "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." There are a number of such passages as these, but they invariably differ more or less either in meaning or language from the New Testament parallels: and in no instance does the writer say that he obtained them from our Gospels! Even if passages were identical with those in the New Testament, they would not prove the existence of our Four Gospels, for there were many Gospels in circulation in the early ages of Christianity, which contained passages identical with those now in our four, and the quotations might have been made either from one of those or from tradition.

You will observe that when the different writers quote the words of Jesus or another person, they generally agree; but that in the narration of the story they differ. This shows that there may have been and probably was a manuscript in existence in those early days, containing the sayings of Jesus and others, and that this was made use of by later writers in composing their narratives. But the fact that the Apostolic Fathers use phrases or quotes sayings, with the prefatory explanation, "It is written," or "The Lord Jesus says," which agree more or less with the passages in our Gospels, does not prove the existence then of the Gospels. Dr Westcott admits this:

"No evangelical reference in the Apostolic Fathers can be referred certainly to a written period. It appears most probable, from the form of the quotations, that they were derived from oral tradition (Canon, 62).

IRENAEUS' REFERENCE TO THE GOSPEL OF MATTHEW IN 200 A.D: WAS IT REALLY TO THE GOSPEL OF THE HEBREWS?

Guess what? The Gospel of Matthew was not the Gospel of Matthew we have today!

While there is no trace of our Four Gospels previous to the year 150 A.D., and while we do not know who it was after that time that wrote or compiled them, or exactly when they did it, the testimony of the early Fathers as to one of them may throw some light on the subject. Long before our Gospel of Matthew was known, Papias spoke of the "Gospel According to the Hebrews," and said that it contained a history of a woman accused of many sins before the Lord (Euseb., Eccl. Hist., iii. 39). Coming down later in time we find that both Eusebius and Irenaeus agree in saying that the Ebionites used only one Gospel; but Eusebius said it was called the "Gospel According To The Hebrews" (Eccl. Hist., iii. 27), while Irenaeus said it was the "Gospel According to Matthew" (Adv. Her., i 26). Moreover, both Epiphanius (403 A.D.) and Jerome (420 A.D.) say that the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" and the "Gospel according to Matthew" were the same book under different names. As the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" was in existence and in use first, the deduction is quote plain that some one subsequently forged Matthew's name to it. So you should understand that when you read that the Ebionites used only one Gospel and one Gospel only, and read that it was called "The Gospel of Matthew" then it in reality does not mean the Gospel of Matthew that we are familiar today, but the "Gospel of the Hebrews."

THE NEW TESTAMENT....THE EARLY CONTROVERSIES SURROUNDING IT

While little is known of the history of the Jewish Canon, of the Christian, fortunately, considerable has been preserved, and the progress of its formation can be traced, step by step, down the centuries. Sadly few Christians know this history and few ever inquire into the development and canonization of the document they stake their Eternal Life upon. Growing up as a Christian, and after attending Southwestern Seminary in Ft.Worth, Texas, where I received an M.Div. I must admit to you I accepted pretty much what was told to me for the most part. Usually I was on two tracks at once; fulfilling my Seminary responsibilities as well as my Pastorate responsibilities. This left little time to study out things in-depth when questions begged answering. Usually I was consumed with preparing for tomorrow's classes and tests as well as the ministry in which I had an active part. It would be a couple years into full-time pastoring following Seminary before I could find the time to investigate the Canon of the New Testament for myself. Up to that time I like most Christians accepted "by faith" what I had been told. Upon researching the Canon in-depth I was startled to discover what was omitted in my Seminary training; and I understand today why it was omitted! Such facts as I will share with you was either not known, or the consequences of such knowledge being made public would impugn the integrity of the Christian Faith!

WHAT YOU HAVE FAILED TO SEE....THE TRUTH WITHIN THE NEW TESTAMENT

Most preaching involves homiletical sermons based on this passage or that passage. Seldom is one confronted with the "big picture;" such seldom is recognized unless conscientious in-depth study is undertaken for some time. Some people possess the ability to see the "forest" in spite of the "trees." In other words, some people, sadly the minority, can read a document like the New Testament and see things that are obvious which the vast majority of people overlook. This is not accomplished by intellect alone for the Holy Spirit certainly illuminated past revelation. Some see it; some do not. I find this the case almost all the time. Two people can look at the same passage or passages at the same time and one can see something the other cannot; even after excessive explanation the "blinded" one sometimes cannot see no matter what is done. Such is the revelation of God. Understand because one has not seen or does not know of a "truth" does not invalidate such truth; truth is truth no matter if it is recognized by one or by all. Truth is primary and must the goal of our study of the Word of God.

THE TWO CONFLICTING GOSPELS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

In what follows I will share and hopefully show you that within the New Testament are two competing and conflicting "gospel." Understand that this fact is not of my creation just I say that this exists, but competent scholars dating back centuries have discussed this issue in detail. So this is not my "personal interpretation" for volumes of books have been written upon this. The problem is that your Church book store or corner Christian book store has not carried such informative literature.

After the death of Jesus, his followers increased in numbers for a quarter of a century before having any literature. Sects formed, and antagonisms arose. Then Paul wrote his Epistles to strengthen his adherents against the assault of other Christian fractions. This is nothing more than "in-house in-fighting." The most violent altercations occurred, each sect endeavoring to prevail over others. East side was determined to best the other.

Answer for yourself: What avenue was chosen to win the debate?

Epistles and gospels and revelations were manufactured and in almost all instances fictitious names of supposed writers would be later fixed upon them to give them greater credibility. The names of Apostles or other persons high in Christian piracy were not looked upon in those days as they are now. Writings were being falsified consistently by fraction after fraction; all trying to promote their particular point of view. Unity was out of the question.

Dionysius of Corinth (170 A.D.) complained that his writings were falsified, but consoled himself by saying that the same thing (falsification) was done with the "Scriptures of the Lord" (Euseb., Eccl. Hist., iv. 23).

Answer for yourself: Did you hear that? The Christian historian Eusebius records for us that the New Testament Scriptures "were falsified"? Which ones? Can you tell when you read the New Testament?

There is a way, but that is not our discussion at present.

Mosheim, the Christian historian, says:

"There were a number of commentaries filled with impositions and fables on our Savior's life and sentiments, composed soon after his ascent into heaven, by men who, without being bad, perhaps, were superstitious, simple, and piously deceitful. To these were afterwards added other writings, falsely ascribed to the most holy apostles by fraudulent individuals" (Euseb., Eccl. Hist., Book i, century I., pt. ii., ch. ii.).

He also says that the early Christians fell into the "pernicious error" of "deeming it not only lawful, but also commendable, to deceive and lie for the sake of truth and piety."

"This vice early spread among the Christians. Of this no one will doubt who calls to mind the numerous forgeries of books under the names of eminent men, the Sibylline verses, and I know not what besides, a large mass of which appeared in this age (the second century) and subsequently. I would not say that the orthodox Christians forged all the books of this character: on the contrary, it is probable that the greater part of them originated from the founders of the Gnostic sects. Yet that the Christians who were free from heterodox views were not wholly free from this fault is too clear to be denied" (Ibid., Book i., century II., pt. ii., ch. iii.,).

We should understand that "eye witnesses" to this forgery and falsification of New Testament documents, many in the first and even the second century, attest to such being done long before the canonization of the New Testament. We have first hand evidence that forgeries were being written promoting this and that fraction's views in the names of the Apostles, who in reality, had nothing to do with such writings. That means they did not believe such things quite often; neither did Jesus. Yet these are passed off in Apostolic names as if these teachings were accepted and espoused by Jesus and his Apostles. Sadly, many of these forgeries exist in the Canon of the New Testament today and you never knew it. That is one reason why there are conflicting "gospels" in the New Testament along with many doctrines which the historical Jesus and the Apostles never believed or taught. Non-orthodoxy becomes orthodoxy and you never knew it!

Answer for yourself: Is such falsification of documents in the Apostle's names along with other attested forgeries that ended up in the New Testament the work of the Holy Spirit? Can these teachings be trusted? Is there "truth" mixed up within them and how can one discern the difference? Do you even want to?

DOCTRINES, DOCTRINES, DOCTRINES EVERYWHERE WHAT IS THE TRUTH?

Besides the current Gospels bearing the Apostle's names in the New Testament at present, the following is a partial list of the books fabricated and in circulation in that age, in addition to the ones now in the New Testament. Many listed are presented in The Apocryphal New Testament (contains all the existing Gospels and Epistles of the early Christian Church), and many are no longer in existence but referenced in early Church documents. The Gospel of Paul, The Gospel of Peter, the First Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, Ignatius' Epistle to the Romans, his Epistle to the Ephesians, his Epistle to the Ephesians, his Epistle to Polycarp, the Gospel according to the Egyptians, the Epistle of Polycarp to the Phillipians, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Sibylline Oracles, the Gospel according to the Hebrews, the Gospel of Perfection, the Gospel of Philip, another Gospel of Matthew, the Gospel of Judas Iscariot, the Gospel of Basilides, the Gospel of Thaddaeus, the First Gospel of the Infancy of Jesus Christ, the Gospel of the Birth of Mary, the Gospel of Scythianus, the Gospel of Tatian, the Gospel of Life, the Gospel of Thomas, the Gospel of Andrew, the Gospel of Bartholomew, the Gospel of Eve, the Gospel of the Encratites, the false Gospels of Hesychius, the Gospel of Jude, the false Gospels published by Lucianus, the Gospel of Barnabas, the Acts of Peter, the Acts of Paul. the Acts of Peter and Andrew, the Acts of John, the Acts of Mary, the Acts of Andrew, the Acts of the Apostles made use of by the Ebionites, the Acts of the Apostles by Leucius, the Acts of the Apostles used by the Manichaeans, the Acts of Paul and Thecla, the Preaching of Paul, the Preaching of Peter, the Doctrine of Peter, the Acts of Philip, the Acts of Thomas, the Acts of Barnabas, the Judgment of Peter, an Epistle of Christ to Peter and Paul, and Epistle of Christ produced by the Manichaeans, the Epistle of Themison, the Epistles of Paul to Seneca, the Epistles of Seneca to Paul, the Revelation of Peter, the Revelation of Paul, the Revelation of Bartholomew, the Revelation of Cerinthus, the Revelation of Stephen, the Revelation of Thomas, the Revelation of Moses, the Revelation of Esdras, the Protevangelion or Gospel of James, Thomas' Gospel of the Infancy of Jesus Christ, the Acts of Pilate or the Gospel of Nicodemus, the Epistle of Barnabas, the Epistle to the Magnesians, the Epistle to the Trallians, the Epistle to the Smyrnaeans, the Epistle to the Philadelphians (forgeries under the name of Ignatius), the Epistle to the Laodiceans (a forgery under the name of Paul), the Pastor of Hermas, the Gospel of Cerinthus, the Gospel of Marcion, the Gospel of Truth, the Gospel of Apelles, the Second Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, the Gospel of Longinus, and Epistle of Jesus Christ to Abgarus, King of Edessa, and an Epistle of Abgarus to Jesus Christ.

Understand that the above is not all of the books of that time. Of many we have not even the names. I have mentioned, for examples, but thirteen books of Acts, whereas Fabricius made a collection of thirty-six (McClintock and Strong, Acts of the Apostles, "spurious"). It was from such forgery and falsification as this, with its Gospel of Judas Iscariot, Gospel of Eve, and Epistles ascribed to Jesus, that our Four Gospels (which are themselves forgeries and but a part of the common stream) came. Most of the books of that age were written to uphold or oppose particular doctrines, as when our Gospel of John is said to have been written to refute the views of Cerinthus and the Nicolaitans (Irenaeus, Adv. Haer., iii. 11. 1). Paul had to warn the Thessalonians not to be troubled or misled by letters falsely purporting to be from him (2 Thess. 2:2), and cautioned them that every genuine letter would bear his signature. Those that do not carry his signature most likely are not his.

THE HIDDEN CONFLICT BENEATH THE PAGES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT...THE PETRINES VS. THE PAULINES VS. THE JOHANNINES

Answer for yourself: Did you know before now that the collection of writings called the New Testament contains conflicting views from three theological camps that existed in the first century; each of which denied the other?

The sad fact is without this knowledge one reads the New Testament and tries to fit each "puzzle part" into the big picture so to speak. The result is a distortion of the picture and of truth as some of the "pieces" of theology simply don't fit into the truth about Jesus of Nazareth or his followers or what they both believed to be "truth." But without a prior and substantial knowledge of Second Temple Judaism one reads the New Testament as if everything in it belongs to the story of Jesus. Simply said Jesus and his Apostles could not believe much that is taught in the New Testament and would consider it blasphemous.

As stated before just because something might be "new" to you and that you have never heard it taught before in your church, or never read of such, does not invalidate it as "truth." Before one says "I don't agree" one needs to evaluate what is being said and give such a fair hearing. That means you have to read and study yourself to see beyond your comfortable experience. To do otherwise makes one an authority based only upon his experience, and I dare say our experiences are often quite lacking as a validator of truth. To admit that a man or woman has 1% percent of all knowledge is ambitious to say the least. Quite often in that 99% of knowledge unknown to such a one can be opportunities unlimited to learn truth he at present does not possess. Humility is a vital part of learning and helps balance the natural instinct to defend what we currently know. We may think we have the "truth" because we have emotions tied to beliefs, but these beliefs can and often be shown to be erroneous. We must have faith in "truth" not our experience. Emotional validation is a poor substitute for "truth."

Not to the point at hand. While there was a great number of sects dueling for authority in the first century among "believers", three principal ones command the attention of the student, the Pauline, the Petrines, and the Johannines, or the followers of Paul, of Peter, and of John; a division which is maintained, in a measure, to this day. The Eastern or Greek Church preferred John (Soxomen, Eccl. Hist., vii. 19), and the Western, Peter. The later divided at the time of the Reformation, and the Roman Catholic body maintained the authority of Peter as the only lawful head, while the Protestants now follow Paul. The doctrines which Protestant clerymen preach so much (predestination, foreordination, sanctification, and similar ones) are Paulisms, Jesus never having taught them. The contrast between Peter and Paul raged fiercely in the early days immediately following Jesus, and each was vigorously supported by factions. Paul was the apostle of uncircumcision, and of the Gentiles; Peter, of circumcision and of the Jews. Paul wished to "carry Christ" to the Gentiles and still allow them them to be Gentiles. Peter said if they become Christians they must also become Jews, be circumcised, and do as the Jews did in the ceremonial. In those days Paul was not recognized as a lawful teacher of Christianity, nor was he for more than a hundred years (Bronson C. Keeler, A Short History of the Bible, Kessinger Pub. Co, Montana, USA., p. 40). In those days, if Peter should come back to earth and advocate circumcision, baptism before every Sabbath and Festival, continuance of Temple sacrifice, and the strict observance of the Jewish ceremonial, he would not be permitted to preach in any Christian church, Catholic or Protestant. People do not realize how far from primitive Christianity and the real beliefs and teachings of Jesus and the Apostles they have gone.

Paul said, if any one, even an angel from heaven, preached any other gospel than he did, that person should be accursed (Gal. 1:8). You may not know this but Paul, in writing this verse, was writing against the Apostles and the Jerusalem Church! He claimed authority as an apostle equal to that of the apostles at Jerusalem. But they had been appointed by Yeshua in person, or, eleven of them had been, and they had elected a twelfth to fill the place of Judas (Acts 1:15-26). Peter superintending the process; while Paul had appointed himself; and for him to claim to be their equal was something to which they could not submit. That is why Paul defends his self-appointed Apostleship continually in his Epistles. Paul asked, "Am I not an apostle?" (I Cor. 9:1). And James and the other Apostles said he was not. Revelation (a Johannine and therefore an anti-Pauline work) says, referring to Paul, "And thou has tried them which say they are apostles, and are not, and has found them liars" (Rev. 2:2). Paul claimed that he and his followers were still Jews, even if they did not practice circumcision (2 Cor. 11:22 ff.), but Peter and his friends denied it, and Revelation, again thrusting at Paul, says, "I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not, but the synagogue of Satan (Rev. 2:9); and "them of the synagogue of Satan, which say they are Jews and are not, but do lie" (Rev. 3:9).

Answer for yourself: Hard to believe? Well you need to study something other than the biased and forged New Testament if you want the truth about the Early Church.

Paul conceded that he had caught some of his followers by being crafty and using guile (2 Cor. 12:16):

2 Cor 12:16 16 But be it so, I did not burden you: nevertheless, being crafty, I caught you with guile.

The Strong's Number for guile is #1388 dolos- craft, deceit, guile

In an Epistle generally acknowledged of Pauline authorship we find his self-admission of being deceitful in teaching Christ.

Answer for yourself: In Paul spreading "his gospel" do you think the Holy Spirit approved of his "deceit"?

Paul though that if he had misrepresented as to his apostolic authority, since good had come of it, no harm had been done. I wonder if God believes the end justifies the means?

"For if the truth of God had more abounded through my lie unto His glory, why yet am I also judged a sinner?" (Rom. 3:7).

Paul's early spirit as a persecutor appears when he wishes that those anti-Paulines who troubles the Galatians were cut off (Gal. 5:12). He once met Peter in Antioch, and an open conflict occurred (Gal. 2:11-21). Contrary to redactions history in the New Testament Peter was right and Paul wrong! Paul was teaching against the Covenant stipulations for non-Jews and when the men from James appeared the Church disbanded and left Paul alone.

The Ebionites, one of the most powerful of the early sects, rejected Paul, and said he was an apostate from the law (Irenaeus, Adv. Haer., i. 26). The Clementine Homiles attach him bitterly under the name of Simon Magus. They reject his Epistles entirely. Justin Martyr rejected him, and scarcely made notice of his writings. Hegesippus would not use his Epistles, and said, substantially, that he had falsified Scripture (Davidson, Canon, 115). Whether you know it or not Paul consistently misquotes the Old Testament for his advantage. Those not well versed in the Jewish Scriptures seldom notice this since the Septuagint is a purposeful mistranslation of the Jewish Masoretic Text by the Greek-Jewish Phythagorean and Buddhists of Alexandria, Egypt, and the Septuagint served as the base for Paul's quotes. Rather strange that Paul would misquote the Jewish Scriptures that Jesus used as taken from the Hebrew don't you think? The Paulines, on the other hand, rejected the Epistles to the Hebrews, which Christians now attribute to Paul, and they also rejected Revelation (Ibid., 118).

The followers of Valentinus were Paulines (Clem. Al., Strom., viii. 17), as were those of Marcion; those of Basilides were Petrines (Ibid.,). The Cerinthians opposed St. John (Westcott, On The Canon Of The New Testament, p. 273) as well as Peter and Paul (Epiph., Haer., xxviii. 2-4).; the Simonians opposed Peter (Westcott, On The Canon Of The New Testament, p. 273), the Ophites rejected St. John and St. Paul (Ibid., p. 282). They were snake worshippers (Webster's Unabridged Dict., "Ophite"), and claimed to have derived their doctrines from James the brother of Jesus (Hipp. Haer., v. 7). Another sect, the Donatists, held that there were no virtuous people in the Christian church except such as belonged to their sect, and required all who joined them to be re-baptized (Webster's Unabr. Dict., "Donatism"). Jerome was bitterly hostile to Origen's views, even accusing the latter, substantially, of heresy (Ency. Brit., "Rufinus"). Rufinus adopted Origen's theories, and Jerome, who had been Rufinus' dearest friend, loaded him with the most terrible reproaches, until the quarrel became the scandal of the Church in that time (Ency. Brit., "Rufinus").

It sounds strangely to hear persons in these days express a desire to "return to primitive Christianity, when all was peace and love." There never was such a time. Therefore, understanding the above, one must understand that within the New Testament are competing and conflicting sect's beliefs all rolled into one and the average Christian reads the "whole" of the New Testament as if this was given by God and tries to fit the conflicting pieces in one whole theological system. Thus many current beliefs held by Christians are simply wrong and unfortunately one's conduct is often determined by such false beliefs and forgeries and you never know unless you study. We have fallen that far from the faith of the early Jewish believers who knew Yeshua personally and what he truly taught.

THE BOOKS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT WHICH AT FIRST WERE NOT CONSIDERED INSPIRED

As in the case of the Old Testament, so in that of the New Testament, when the books composing it came into the world they were not considered inspired. They were looked upon the same way other books are. No one thought of calling them the word of God. The Old Testament was considered by the early Christians as inspired, and for two or three centuries after Jesus it was their only Bible (Westcott, Canon, 55). The first instance of the canonization of any of the New Testament books was about 170 A.D., when, in the Second Epistle of Peter (2 Peter 3:16), Paul's epistles are regarded by some as if Scripture, and that was simply a bothersome recognition of Paul after the long quarrel between the friends of himself and of Peter (Davidson, Canon, 134). For a century and a quarter after the death of Jesus the New Testament was not recognized to be as authoritative as the Old Testament (Westcott, Canon, 179; Davidson, Canon 122). And when Paul said, "The Holy Scriptures are able to make wise unto salvation through faith which is in Jesus Christ" (2 Tim. 3:15), he meant exclusively the Old Testament (Westcott, Canon, 55.) Previous to the year 170 A.D., wherever the early Christian Fathers used the phrase "Scripture" or "It is written," they always meant the Old Testament (Davidson, Canon, 119). The name "New Testament" was first given to the collection by Tertullian (Adv. Prax. 15), about the year 210 A.D., and the collection then laced many books which are in it now. The word canon, as signifying a list of authoritative Scriptures, was not used till Origen's time (Davidson, Canon, 4). The word "canonical" was used first in the decree of the Council of Laodicea (Ibid., 5), about 363 A.D. The word "Bible" was first applied to the books collectively by St. Chrysostom in the firth century (Westcott, Canon, 438). New Testament copyists felt at liberty to change the language to suit their own ideas by taking out texts and inserting new ones (Tischendorf, "When Were Our Gospels Written?" Religious Tract Society's authorized edition, London, 1869, p. 15). Prof. Davidson says:

"Papias (150 A.D.) knew nothing, so far as we can learn, of a New Testament Canon…He had no conception of canonical authority attaching to any part of the New Testament. His language implies the opposite, in that he prefers unwritten tradition to the Gospel he speaks of. He neither felt the want nor knew the existence of inspired Gospels" (Davidson, Canon, 123).

"It is clear that the earliest Church Fathers did not use the books of the New Testament as sacred documents, clothed with divine authority, but followed for the most part, at least till the middle of the second century, apostolic tradition orally transmitted" (Ibid., 136).

"One thing appears from the early corruption of the sacred records spoken of by Irenaeus, Origen, and others, that they were not regarded with the veneration necessarily attaching to infallible documents" (Ibid., 161).

"The conception of a Catholic canon was realized about the same time as that of a Catholic Church. One hundred and seventy years from the coming of Christ elapsed before the collection of the New Testament books assumed a form that carried with it the idea of holy and inspired" (Ibid., 136).

During the first half of the second century "the New Testament writing did not stand on the same level with the Old, and were not yet esteemed sacred and inspired like the Jewish Scriptures" (Ibid., 122).

"Justin Martyr's canon (150 A.D.), so far as divine authority and inspiration are concerned, was the Old Testament….In his time none of the Gospels had been canonized, not even the synoptics, if, indeed, he knew them all. Oral tradition was the chief fountain of Christian knowledge, as it had been for a century. In his opinion this tradition was embodied in writing, but the documents in which he looked for all that related to Christ were not the Gospels alone. He used others freely, not looking upon any as inspired" (Ibid., 129).

"It is certain that they (the early Christians) believed the Old Testament books to be a divine and infallible guide. But the New Testament was not so considered. The latter collection was not called Scripture, or put on a par with the Old Testament as sacred and inspired, till the time of Theophilus of Antioch (180 A.D.)" (Ibid. 5).

Now the conditions are reversed. People in this age of the world believe the New Testament is inspired, but they do not believe the Old Testament is.

"Two things stand out most clearly-the comparatively late idea of a canonical New Testament literature, and the absence of critical principles in determining it. The former was not entertained till the latter part of the second century. The conception of canonicity and inspiration attaching to the New Testament books did not exist till the time of Irenaeus" (Ibid. 163).

"Not until the latter half of the second century (180 A.D.) did the present Gospels assume a canonical position, superseding other works of a similar character and receiving a divine authority" (Davidson, Intro. N.T., ii 520).

"Along with this process (the union of Paulines, Petrines, and the other fractions, about the middle of the second century), and as an important element in it, the writings of the apostles and apostolic men were uncritically taken from tradition and elevated to the rank of divine documents. It was not the rise of new dissensions "within the church" which led to the formation of a Christian canon; rather the idea of a "Catholic Church" require a standard of appeal in apostolic writings, which were not invested with an authority that did not belong to them from the first" (Ibid., 168).

Tischendorf, the great orthodox scholar, in speaking of the period of canonization, says:

"It was at this time….that the Church…began to venerate and regard as sacred the writings which the apostles had left behind them" (When Were Our Gospels Written?" The Religious Tract Society's edition, London, 1869, p. 95).

The phrase "began to regard as sacred" indicates that before that time that regard had not existed. Canon Westcott says:

"It can not, however, be denied that the idea of the inspiration of the New Testament, in the sense in which it is maintained now, was the growth of time" (Westcott, Canon, 55).

One of the most curious intellectual phenomena presented to the student of religious history is that of men admitting that the idea of inspiration in a growth, and still not perceiving the absurdity of supposing that inspiration is a fact. And yet, thousands of Christian theologians present it.

We find, then, that, among the early disputing sects, it became necessary to have some authoritative court of appeal, and when the Catholic Church began to establish itself and to require such an authority, its officials, the Christian Fathers, asserted that these new books were inspired, and the word of God. But it was said simply to have authority for the new doctrines. The Fathers did not limit themselves to the books now in the New Testament, but selected such as agreed with their adopted views. The restrictions in the number of books were made later, and thus our present Bible was formed. But the Bible did not form the beliefs. The beliefs formed the Bible. Only such books were accepted in the New Testament as advocated the previously entertained dogmas. And the idea of inspiration passed over from the Old Testament to the New, by reason of associations, proximity, and similarity of use.

WERE THE CHURCH FATHERS COMPETENT TO DECIDE THE BOOKS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT?

Answer for yourself: Have you ever stopped and considered the competency of the early Church Fathers especially in light of the fact they you trust them today to have selected and preserved the Word of God in the New Testament for you which you are staking your eternal life upon? Have you ever studied out what they wrote or said in their writings? Were they competent for the task? Can we see the Holy Spirit in what they said and did?

Answer for yourself: Have you ever invested your time to personally inquire into these issues, or have you like most just taken the New Testament as handed down from these men for millennia and accepted it without question because of "church tradition?"

Most likely you haven't. Few have I find out as most Christians have implicitly been taught to accept that the Holy Spirit led these men in the selection of the books in the Christian New Testament. Maybe you are beginning to doubt somewhat; especially since reading these articles you have seen that most likely the apostles of Jesus had little if anything to do with the writing of the Gospels which carry their names.

It never ceases to amaze me how the Protestant, who refused to be a Catholic and disbelieves Catholic dogma and doctrine, readily accepts the Catholic Bible as it was these same men who were given these "doctrines" supposedly by the Holy Spirit who put together, added to, and deleted from the New Testament supposedly by the same Holy Spirit. Thank goodness that the New Testament is correct but the doctrines of the men who put it together are wrong. It just seem ridiculous does it not?

QUALIFIED FOR THE TASK?....YOU MUST DECIDE...BUT KNOW THE FACTS FIRST

Since the early Christian Fathers originated the theory that the books of the New Testament are inspired, the question arises, "Where they competent to do so?" The popular idea is that they were learned, profound, venerable men, worthy of the highest respect; and so vigorously has this been enforced, that one of the charges on which Servetus was burned to death by John Calvin was that he had spoken disrespectfully of the Fathers ("Servetus and Calvin," by R.Willis, M.D., London, 1877, p. 308). The facts are quite the reverse. The early Christian Fathers were extremely ignorant and superstitious; and they were singularly incompetent to deal with the supernatural. The men who laid the foundation of the canon were Irenaeus (200 A.D.), Clement of Alexandria (210 A.D.), and Tertullian (220 A.D.)., and of them Prof. Davidson says:

"The three Fathers of whom we are speaking had neither the ability nor inclination to examine the genesis of documents surrounded with an apostolic halo. No analysis of their authenticity and genuineness was seriously attempted….The ends which they had in view, their polemic motives, their unclerical, inconsistent assertions, their want of sure data, detract from their testimony.

Their decisions were much more the result of pious feeling, biased by the theological speculations of the time, than the conclusions of a sound judgment. The very arguments they use to establish certain conclusions show weakness of perception" (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, 156 ff).

"The infancy of the canon was cradled in an uncritical age, and rocked with traditional ease. Conscientious care was not directed from the first to the well-authenticated testimony of eye-witnesses. Of the three Fathers who contributed most to its early growth, Irenaeus was credulous and blundering. Tertullian passionate and one-sided, and Clement of Alexandria, imbued with the treasure of Greek wisdom, was mainly occupied with ecclesiastical ethics….(Their) assertions show both ignorance and exaggeration" (The Canon of the Bible, 155).

LOOKING AT EXAMPLES OF THE ABOVE….

Some citations will illustrate for you the mental characteristics and competency of those who selected and chose for you a "new" Bible that replaced the one Jesus used.

You should be familiar with the fable of the phoenix, which was said to renew its life every five hundred years.

Clement of Rome (100 A.D.) thought it had an actual existence, and he asserted that it was typical of the resurrection (Ep. Ad Corinth, xxv. P. 123). Tertullian believed the same thing (De Resurrect., 13, vol. 2., p 236). Celsus, the noted anti-Christian writer, used this fact to illustrate the credulity of the early Christians, and Origen defended the fable rather than accept the just criticism (Contra Celsum, iv. 98). The writer of the Epistle of Barnabas believed an ancient superstition that the hyena changed its sex every year, being alternately male and female (Ep. Barnabas, ch. x), that a hare had as many young as it was years old, that a weasel conceived with its mouth, that the reason why men should eat only animals with a cloven hoof was because the righteous people lived in this world, but had expectations in the next through reincarnation (Ep. Barnabas, ch. x). Justin Martyr (150 A.D.) believed in demons. He said that they were the offspring of angels who loved the daughters of men (Apol. ii, 5), that insane people (demoniacs) were possessed and tortured by the souls of the wicked who had died in their sins (Ibid., i. 18), and that this was a proof of the immortality of the soul.

Answer for yourself: Did you catch that? For Justin Martyr, one of the most important of the Greek philosopher-Apologists in the early church, whose writings represent the first positive encounter of Christian revelation with Greek philosophy and laid the basis for a theology which we have been taught today, believed that mental illness was proof of the immortality of the soul?

And we accept the religious doctrines and replacement religion set forth by this man without question Sunday after Sunday. It look like his judgment is off quite considerably to me.

He even said angels eat manna (Dial., 57). Has he ever had lunch with them?

Athenagoras (168 A.D.) declared that the strong belief of Christians that angels have been distributed by the Logos throughout the universe, and that they were kept busy regulating the whole (Legatio pro Christ., x). Some of the angels loved the daughters of men, and fell, and thus were begotten giants, or demons (Ibid., xxiv). These last roamed about the world, performing the evil deeds peculiar to their natures (Ibid., xxv.).

Theophilus (180 A.D.) said that the pains of women in child-birth and the fact that serpents crawl on their bellies were proofs that the account of the fall, as given in Genesis, was true (Ad Autol., ii 23).

Tertullian believed that the hyena changed its sex (De Pallio, 3), and that the stag renewed its youth by eating poisonous snakes (Ad Scap., 3), and that eclipses and comets were signs of God's anger and forerunners of national disasters (Ad Scap., 3), and that volcanoes were openings into hell (De Penitentia, 12), and that the volcanic condition was a punishment inflicted on the mountains to serve as a warning to the wicked (De Penitentia, 12), that demons sent diseases upon the bodies of men (Apol., 22), blighted apples and grain (Apol., 22), and produced accidents and untimely death (De Anima, 57). He said that a corpse in a cemetery once kindly moved to make room for another corpse to be placed beside it (Ibid., 51).

Answer for yourself: Did you catch the above? We have been talking about the "big shots" in the history of early Christianity and it seems they were highly steeped in superstition more than truth. I don't know about you but how can you trust such a one with such judgment and beliefs for anything of a spiritual nature? This sounds more like X-files than the Holy Spirit.

Clement of Alexandria (220 A.D.) said that hail storms, tempests, and plagues were caused by demons (Strom., vi. 3), that credulity was necessary to render faith easy (Strom., ii. 6), and that events in the life of Abraham were typical and prophetical of arithmetic and astronomy (Ibid., vi 11). He kindly allowed that Jews and Gentile would have the gospel preached to them in hell thus accepting another sun-myth (Strom., vi. 6). Clement's imagination was naturally lascivious. His chapter on the immodesty of Pagan women in the bath (Paedag., iii. 5) betrays his hatred for the upper classes and shows that if a bishop in the Church could use such language, the early Christians of Alexandria must have been from the very lowest grades of society. While this indignant at the supposed wickedness of the heathen, he wrote a book so unseemly (Strom., iii) that the English editors did not venture to translate it, and in it he quotes probably more from the Bible than in any of his other books.

Origen (254 A.D.) said that the sun, moon, and stars were living creatures, endowed with reason and free will, and occasionally inclined to sin (De Princip., i. 7). He was not certain if the celestial orbs and their "souls" were created at the same time as their initial creation. The light emitted by them was not the reflection of the sun, but light from knowledge and wisdom as reflected from the Eternal light. He maintained the stars and planets had "free will" and that they were rational creatures because they moved in the sky (De Princip., i. 7). The sun, moon, and stars, according to him, were "subject to vanity" (De Princip., i. 7), and they prayed to God through his only begotten Son (Contra Celsum, v. 11).

Answer for yourself: Did you catch that? Again, I don't know about you but how can you trust such a one with such judgment and beliefs for anything of a spiritual nature? This sounds more like X-files than the Holy Spirit.

Famine, the blighting of vines and fruit trees, and the destruction of beasts and men, were all the work of demons (Contra Celsum, viii. 31).

Lactantius (325 A.D.) believed that demons entered men and injured them through the viscera, producing diseases and mental distempters (Epitome of the Divine Institutes, 28), but that the sign of the cross (from sun worship) would drive them away (Divine Institutes, vi. 27). Well, that makes me feel better.

Cyril of Jerusalem (386 A.D.). quoted from Clement the story of the phoenix, and declared that God had created the bird expressly to enable men to believe in the resurrection (Catech., xviii. 8). He said it was a wonderful bird; and yet it was irrational-it did not sing psalms to God, and it knew nothing of His only begotten Son (Ibid., 244).

Answer for yourself: Did you catch that? Again, I don't know about you but how can you trust such a one with such judgment and beliefs for anything of a spiritual nature? Of course the bird would not know of the Son of God had it existed in the first place; it was a bird in the first place!

St. Chrysostom (407 A.D.) believed the air was filled with angels (In Ascens., J.C.). Jerome (430 A.D.) believed just the opposite; that the air was filled with demons (Epis. To Ephes., iii.6).

St. Augustine's (430 A.D.) New Testament was the same as ours today. Now we begin to see conformity of New Testament texts after the influence of St. Augustine. The influence of St. Augustine in establishing the Bible was greater probably than any other Father or than any council. People now attribute to God what was really the work of one man. But when we really study the man his judgment is not to be trusted in anything let alone the selection of the canon or the creation of Christian doctrine of which he is credited. Just read this and think.

The incredible and very ridiculous stories related by Christian Fathers and ecclesiastical historians, on whom we are obliged to rely for information on the most important of subjects, show us how untrustworthy these men were. We have, for instance, the story related by St. Augustine, who is styled 'the greatest of the Latin Fathers,' of his preaching the Gospel to people without heads. In his 33d Sermon he says: 'I was already Bishop of Hippo, when I went into Ethiopia with some servants of Christ there to preach the Gospel. In this country we saw many men and women without heads, who had two great eyes in their breasts; and in countless still more southly, we saw people who had but one eye in their foreheads'" (Taylor, Syntagma, p. 52).

Answer for yourself: How can you trust such a man to determine for you what books are to be in your New Testament let alone the Bible? Did the Holy Spirit have an off day when St. Augustine preached to people with one-eye in each breast or when he preached to people without heads or who had only one eye in their foreheads, but yet led St. Augustine into all truth concerning the canon for us today? Is this man trustworthy and what about the vast other stuff he said, or does this information impugn every thing he ever said and wrote?

St. Augustine (430 A.D.) likewise believed in demons. They tried to deceive men by persuading them that they were gods (De Civit. Del., viii. 22). They were called demons from the Greek "daimones" on account of their knowledge. To the early Fathers exact learning was devilish. Reading this web-page would make you a candidate for being declared "possessed."

Answer for yourself: Can you imagine that after reading what you just read?

St. Augustine also believed that there was also a class of satyrs and fauns called "Incubi," to whose lascivious attacks and sexual rape women were constantly subject. Hollywood would have loved this and in fact has made several movies about this phenomena. As if that was not enough he also believed that demons termed by the Gauls "Dusii" perpetrated daily the same uncleanness. He maintained that there was so much trustworthy evidence that to deny it was an impertinence (Ibid., xv. 23). So real and so universal was the belief in these lewd spirits that, in 1894, Innocent VIII issued a Papal bull against these spirits. Incredible!

I THINK YOU GET THE POINT

The erroneous and grotesque beliefs of the Christian Fathers could be quoted until they filled a large volume, but these few will illustrate the intellectual condition of the ages which originated and transmitted the New Testament to us. It will be said that the Fathers were as good as their times. That can not be maintained. They were not even as good. In short, the sum of the charge against the Fathers is that they were not competent to tell what was evidence of a fact and what was not. They cited as evidence of a theory things which are not in the slightest degree such, and they would look directly into the face of evidence which established theories they did not endorse, and would still be unable to see that it was evidence. Now, if the Fathers were great scholars, like you have been led to believe, they would not have been so persistently in the wrong. They should have see the truth at least as easily as the others did; like the Jewish scholars and Rabbis for instance. What has become of the names and the memories of the men in those day who had the truth and stood up for the truth against such absurdity? Are they even yet called great? The Christian Church has been honoring the wrong persons.

Admitting, for the sake of argument, that these Christian Fathers were as great as their time, I deny that they or their age were competent to form a Bible for their age.

STUPID...BUT SPIRITUALLY INSIGHTFULL?...OH...COME ONE NOW!

But one apology has ever been made for these remarkable errors of the Fathers, and that is "spiritual insight." Christian defenders say that, while the Fathers were ignorant, stupid, limited in intelligence, and even superstitious, they were yet "gifted with great spiritual insight." This term signifies the possibility of perceiving something which does not exist and where it does not exist. It is synonymous with "unlimited credulity."

Not alone in nature, but also in literature, the Fathers were ignorant and unscholarly. Jerome and Origen were the only ones who could read Hebrew (Davidson, On The Canon, of the Bible, p. 170). Justin Martyr quotes from Jeremiah and calls it Isaiah (Apol. i. 54). Clement of Alexandria quotes as Scripture passages which are not in the Bible at all (Strom., ii 6). He quotes as Paul's, words which are not in Paul (Strom., vi. 5). In quoting from an opponent he would insert words not in the original (Strom., ii. 4), and he even does the same in quoting from the Bible (On Chastity, vii). Tertullian quotes as in Leviticus a passage not in that book (On Monogamy, vi.). He misquotes history (Strom., iv. 26). Tertullian cites as Isaiah a passage not in that book, but in Revelation (On Modesty, vi). Besides that he is frequently inaccurate in a great number of his quotations.

The Gospel writers, supposedly under the anointing of the Holy Spirit, committed the same blunders. The man who wrote the Gospel of Matthew attributes to Jeremiah (Matt. 27:9) a passage which is in Zechariah (Zech. 11:12-13). The writer of the Gospel of Mark attributes to Isaiah (Mark. 1:2) a passage which is in Malachi (Mal. 3:1). The early manuscripts insert the name of Isaiah as the authority but the later ones omitted it because it was such a clear error.

One curious illustration of this, and of how sacred books are formed, is seen in the excess of the Catholic over the Protestant Bible. The former has quite a number of books which are not in the latter; such as the two of Maccabees and the Song of the Three Children-which Protestants call the apocryphal Old Testament, but which Catholics consider as much the word of God as any other books. The ancient Jews did not consider these authoritative, and the Palestinian Jews did not include them in the sacred collection. The Greek Jews, however, thought more of them, and the Alexandrian Jews placed them in an appendix to the Greek canons as the end of their Bibles, the same as they used to be printed in our old Bibles. The early Christians of Africa could not read Hebrew; they had to use the Greek manuscripts, and as they saw the apocryphal books in the collection, they supposed they were a part of it. The result was that the early Bible-makers in the African church included the apocryphal books because they were not intelligent enough to leave them out (Davidson, On The Canon of the Bible, p. 83). St. Augustine included them because he found them there, and the Catholic Church retained them because St. Augustine did.

So, there you have a rather quick over-view on the competency of those who chose the books for the New Testament, added and subtracted books, added to them as well as took from them, edited them, and were responsible for the New Testament as we have it today. Honestly, these accounts do not foster confidence. The years of study invested by me has shown me the utter unreliability of the New Testament for one's faith and practice of such faith; let alone a plan of salvation for the world to come. It is my hope after your examination of our other web-sites where we detail the multiple errors, the purposeful misquotations, mistranslations, and verses lifted out of context from the Old Testament and show you how they where used completely in a different way in the New Testament along with supposed prophetic authority, that you are coming to see how the faith of Jesus was perverted by the early Gentile Church. This article is just another puzzle part for surely after reading this you should have many doubts about the competency of those who chose for you what was and was not God's Word, and those affiliated with the movements these men represented. Hopefully you are becoming more serious in your study into why we were given a New Testament in the first place; let alone be given a Bible that replaced the one Jesus read. Shalom.

THE CRITICAL AND CHRONOLOGICAL STUDY INTO THE CANONIZATION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT...CAN THIS BE THE FRUIT OF THE HOLY SPIRIT?

INTRODUCTION

Now we come to the formation of the Christian canon; to the process by which it evolved. Again I bring to your attention what very distinguished men, like Brooke Foss Westcott D.D., D.C.L., honorary fellow of Trinity and King's College, at Cambridge, had to say to help us today understand how one should approach the New Testament writings let alone determine what kind of authority we should attach to such documents, especially in light of the prior existence of the Torah and the Tanakh, the Scriptures used by Jesus. As you read this information balance what you learn with the prior held beliefs "from Roman Church tradition" as to the importance of such documents.

Beginning with the first two centuries of the Christian Church, we find that there was no New Testament as we now understand that term.

More than forty Gospels and a much greater number of Acts, Epistles, and Revelations were in use by the Church corporate. The writer of the Gospel according to Luke says, "Forasmuch as many have taken to hand to set forth in order a declaration of these things," etc., showing that when he wrote many Gospels were already in existence. From the mass writings then in circulation, the books in our New Testament were taken, and the other books out of use (Westcott, On The Canon Of The New Testament, p. 183).

Origen says:

"And that not four Gospels, but very many were written, out of which these we have were chosen and delivered to the churches, we may perceive" (In Proem. Luc., hom. I, vol 2. P. 210).

The selection of books, and the formation of the list, was a very slow process, and it is "impossible to point to any period as marking the date at which our present canon was determined" (Westcott, On The Canon Of The New Testament, p. 496).

"This result (the formation of the canon) was obtained gradually, spontaneously, silently. There is no evidence to show that any time the claims of the apostolic writings was to be placed on equal footing with the Old Testament, which formed the first Christian Bible,...this was deliberately discussed and admitted…Step by step the books which were stamped with apostolic authority were collected from the other works which contained the traditions of less authoritative teachers" (Westcott, On The Canon Of The New Testament, p. 345).

Answer for yourself: Did you understand that those who first collected such writing admitted among themselves and have passed down their own thoughts that these collection of writings were not intended to replace the Old Testament in authority...let alone be considered another "Bible?" But yet it regrettably has happened! We have added to the Word of God whether we want to admit it or not! It seems ridiculous to me today that we consider documents as the "Word of God" then those who originally collected them did not!

What should immediately strike you is the fact that those who decided we need a "new book" were fully aware that such a collection was never to have the same authority for one's religious beliefs as did the existing Jewish Scripture...the Old Testament!

This is a very damaging quote from a most renown New Testament scholar that impugns the integrity and the authority of the whole of the New Testament.

RELIGIOUS IN-FIGHTING OF THE VARIOUS EARLY CHRISTIAN SECTS WHOSE VIEWS WERE TO BE "INSPIRED" AND WHOSE NOT?

When the Catholic Church began to be formed, about the year 170-180 A.D., the tendency was to use fewer books, and the ones accepted as authoritative began to be called "divine".

Answer for yourself: Do you know what is the meaning to the word "divine?" There is a big difference between deity and divine. According to Webster's Dictionary the word "divine" means:

1. Pertaining to God, or to a heathen deity or false god,

2. Partaking the nature of God; godlike; heavenly; sacred; holy; excellent in the highest degree; apparently above what is human; relating to divinity or theology.

You should have noticed the glaring absence of any mention that "divine" means originated with God or comes from God. Nowhere in such understanding is room for a concept of "infallible, inerrant, or even inspired." Thus being so, and upon serious study, and in-depth analysis, one can quickly see how these documents which appear "godly and sacred" are exposed in their true colors....conflicting documents relating to theologies of various sects and their conflicting and competing dogmas...each intended for mastery over each other. The early church Fathers knew this; it is we who have approached these documents with false suppositions about their value and authority for our lives.

You should understand that the early Fathers originated the theory that these books were divinely inspired, and in another place that the heretics did so. There is no contradiction here. Both the Fathers and the heretics were Christians! They simply belonged to different sects. In the contest for the mastery it so happened that the sects to which the Fathers belonged…the Petrine…gained the supremacy, and from them arose the present Christian Church. Had the other sects gained the victory, their Fathers would now be the orthodox authorities and the others would be the heretics. Now, it is true that in the so-called heretical sects originated the theory that the New Testament was divine and of equal authority with the Old, but that doctrine would not have been accepted by us had not the orthodox Fathers of that time adopted it into their sects. We are the descendants of the orthodox sects, and so far as we are concerned the early Fathers originated the theory. They did it to have authority for the new and unusual doctrines coming into use, just as the heretics were using the same theory to support their doctrines. The books were, in those days, mainly in the hands of the bishops (Davidson, On The Canon Of The Bible, p. 164). The laity had nothing to do with them. Not one in ten thousand of the laity could read. The recognition of the authority of the New Testament was brought entirely by ecclesiastical usage (Westcott, On The Canon Of The New Testament, p. 185).

As you read the next sentence fully understand the impact of such a fact. Each Father included in the newly forming New Testament what books he liked and which promoted his positions, and excluded what he did not like. Sounds like God to me! The consequence were to be expected; there were as many Bibles in those days as there were Fathers engaged in making them. In their differences of opinion as to what constituted the canon, the Fathers made no attempt to compare the books by a critical investigation into the history of the records themselves (Ibid., p. 406). Dr. Westcott says the canon was "formed by instinct and not by argument" (Ibid., p. 386). Instinct is not a good thing to form a Bible by. The Fathers contended for centuries as to what should go into the list until they found they could not agree, and then the church held councils and voted on it, and the books which polled the most votes went into this "divine collection."

St. Augustine was a great advocate of this plan. He thought that the books which were received by all the churches should be in the Bible, and that in the case of books on which there was a difference of opinion, the majority voice of the churches should decide it (De. Doct. Christ., ii. 8). So in other words, according to St. Augustine, according to which fraction or sect that had majority power would come the determination which was "of God and what was not." This sounds right to me, how about you? In other words, what ever group had dominance and political, economic, and military power would flow the "divine oracles." I hope you have sense to understand the ludicrousness of such folly. Let me share another thing that was said by this distinguished man, St. Augustine. We have, for instance, the story related by St. Augustine, who is styled "the greatest of the Latin Fathers," of his preaching the Gospel to people without heads. In his 33d Sermon he says:

"I was already Bishop of Hippo, when I went into Ethiopia with some servants of Christ there to preach the Gospel. In his country we saw many men and women without heads, who had two great eyes in their breasts: and in countries still more southly, we saw people who had but one eye in their foreheads" (Rev. Robert Taylor, Syntagma, p. 52).

Now I ask you, is it wise to follow anything from such a man as this? Surely this should be enough for you to want to seriously begin a study into the men who decided what you believe today for your Eternal Life!

An exact parallel to this is found in the manner of making changes in the recent New Testament revision. On the first reading of a disputed text a majority vote authorized the amendment, but on the second and final reading a two-thirds vote of all those present was necessary (Revised New Testament, Preface, II. fifth rule of May, 25, 1879). But even this plan did not work satisfactorily in the church, for the councils whom you were taught to believe were led by the Holy Spirit in the selection of these books differed continually for centuries! Quite often such disagreements on Heavenly things ended in wholesale murder of bishops by bishops. It seems like God cannot make up His mind let alone infill those making such monumental decisions for all mankind with the fruit of the Spirit. One council as led by the Holy Spirit would adopt a list inserting books which another rejected, and rejecting books which another had inserted, and this continued over and over and over again until the church held one great council which adopted a summary final list which even contradicted itself. The ultimate capstone of such religious bickering and folly was summed-up by the the final ecclesiastical order that has poisoned all of Christianity even to this day:

"This is the Bible. Believe it or be damned."

Thus Christianity has become an exclusive religion that is ingrained by such a tenant which mandates belief in these conflicting and contradicting documents for one's Eternal life; such documents which can be shown to be paralleled to Gentile paganism no less. Why not find out what Jesus really believed about Eternal Life and what was really the Bible for him, and adopt his religious belief system as yours? I would think that as a Christian you would want to do that. Well, this is but the introduction to what I will show you as we begin a serious study into the formation of the New Testament and the role of the Holy Spirit within it...if He had one at all. You will have to be the judge, but you need to know the facts in order to make an intelligent decision on the matter.

THE INFLUENCE OF MARCION UPON THE FORMATION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

THE FIRST COLLECTION OF NEW TESTAMENT BOOKS….MARCION

The first collection of New Testament books ever made was by Marcion, called "the heretic," about the year 145 A.D. (Westcott, On The Canon Of The New Testament, p. 308). It consisted of one Gospel and ten of Paul's Epistles (Tertullian, Avd. Marc., v.), and they were not then considered the word of God.

"Faith is the divine authority or inspiration of current books had not yet arisen…[Marcion] did not consider Paul's Epistles inspired or of divine authority (Davidson, Intro. N. T., ii. 516-517).

You need to realize that this was seventy-five years after Paul was dead. The Epistles which Marcion accepted were Galatians, First and Second Corinthians, Romans, First and Second Thessalonians, Ephesians, Colossians, Phillipians, and Philemon (Davidson, Intro. N. T., ii. 516-517). He omitted First and Second Timothy, Titus, and Hebrews, which we have since called genuine and placed in the Bible. His Gospel has been the subject of much controversy, the orthodox people asserting that it was Luke's mutilated; and the unbelievers denying this, and asserting that it was the manuscript from which Luke's Gospel was subsequently made up. The facts are these: Marcion's Gospel had no name (Tert., Adv. Haer., iv. 2). Indeed, as St. Chrysostom observes, none of the apostles affixed their signatures to the Gospels now bearing their names (Hom. I. in Epis. Ad. Rom.). That was the work of the church long afterward, and we have simply the church's word that they are genuine. And thus we find that in Marcion's time, more than a century after Jesus was crucified, even if a Gospel by Luke were in existence, his name had not yet been attached to it.

Answer for yourself: If Marcion's Gospel was Luke's Gospel the question arises: "How does it happen that a heretic was in possession of a genuine Gospel before the church itself was?" That's a good one. The inference is plain. It was the Luke we would later have "re-worked" by the Catholic Church how would later add the first three chapter which were missing in Marcion's Gospel. That explains all the errors and mistakes in these three chapters.

Answer for yourself: Marcion was considered later by the Catholic Church (when they were in authority) a heretic. Can you see that such branding of people as "heretics" was little more than saying that they disagrees with you? This is important when you read early church history because many who had the truth, like the Ebionites, are branded by the Catholic Encyclopedia and early Catholic Fathers as "heretics." Understand this is nothing more than Gentiles disagreeing with Jews. The Jews automatically are deemed "heretics." These Jews, the Ebionites, just happened to be the first followers of Yeshua in the first century. Should such ones who knew him personally be called "heretics" by those who replaced the religion of Jesus with one of their own making?

Marcion's Gospel was identical, word for word, with about three-fourths of the present Gospel of Luke, and it was shorter than Luke. Now, you should know how annotations made on the margin of a manuscript find their way into the text in the process of coping, and this in time increase the length of a work, so that of two manuscripts of the same book, one shorter than the other, the shorter is generally the older. As I have said, Marcion's Gospel was the shorter. The charge has been made that Marcion purposefully mutilated Paul's Epistles and Luke's Gospel to suit his doctrinal needs. It originated with Irenaeus, and was repeated with great violence by Tertullian and Epiphanius, and has been reiterated by theologians ever since, until very recently orthodoxy itself began to admit that it is not true (Davidson, Intro. N.T., ii. 517). So far from Marcion being a "heretic," he included in his canonical list all that he considered to be genuine Christian books (Westcott, On The Canon Of The New Testament, p. 311), and he gives indications of having been a much more careful scholar than his accusers. This is the irony of redactionist history by those who come to power and rewrite history to their own liking. The Epistle which we now call "to the Ephesians" Marcion called "to the Laodiceans" and prided himself on restoring its true name (Tert. Adv. Marc., x. 17). He omitted from his Gospel the parable of the prodigal son (Westcott, On The Canon Of The New Testament, p. 312), and from the Epistle to the Romans chapters 9-11 as well as the last two chapters (Origen, Comm. In Rom., xvi. 25), either because they were not there in his time, or because he was satisfied they were interpolations. Either way they were to be rejected. That means, Paul did not write them, because Marcion being pro-Pauline, would have included them for his advantage against the Jews if they existed. That also means that favorite memorized passage by most Christians, Romans 9:10-11 was not in the earliest Romans and never written by Paul:

Rom 10:9-11

9 That if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. 10 For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. 11 For the scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed. (KJV)

The passages were simply not in the original Romans in 150 A.D.!

Take a minute and let that sink in. This "easy believeism" and be saved passage was never in the original Romans written by Paul? So, who added it later? Are we believing doctrines that God never gave us or spoke? Does this bother you?

EXAMINING THE CHARGES AGAINST MARCION

Understand that Marcion has to be called a heretic today, or else we might seriously investigate his New Testament, or the omissions in it which we think today are given by God and which we live by instead of the Torah! THINK! One only needs to read Tertullian and see how he blasts Marcion. So again, the Catholics are right. Might makes right; it has for a long time. It will soon be time for the Catholic Church to fill in the blanks of Marcion's New Testament. Their anti-Semitic doctrines will become New Testament Scripture in less than fifty years from Marcion's New Testament. So understand, when you pick up an old history book or a current theology book, like I did in Seminary, and read that "so and so" is a "heretic," don't be surprised and understand that most likely they had the "truth" once. You need to read and study to see for yourself. Dear ones, "orthodoxy today" is "unorthodoxy in the first century;" and "unorthodoxy today" is quite often found to be the beliefs of Jesus and the original church. May God forgive us for changing and then neglecting His true Word; the Jewish Palestinian Masoretic Text...the Tanakh. Now before you say you have it in your Old Testament in your Christian Bible, you need to set down for this. It is a blatant and purposeful mistranslation full of hundreds of misquotations affecting doctrine which was done by Greek-Jews of Phythagorean/Buddhist persuasion in the second century B.C.E. More on that elsewhere in this web-site. You need to see the evidence for yourself. I have and provide it for you. It is time to get back to the Bible Jesus used!

Some of the illustrations of the charges against Marcion will indicate their worthlessness character. In Seminary we were enamored with the early Church Fathers. When their names came up you could hear the "oohs" from those who revered them, yet had never read them. At one time that was me included. Such is power of tradition! Well, a lot of time and little reading will enlighten the blind!

We trust these men's doctrines and their writings; all the while believing they knew what they were doing under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. Tertullian will do great damage to Marcion in his writings. He will almost single-handedly convict Marcion for all time of editing "out" much of the "supposed existing New Testament." Tertullian (220 A.D.) says Marcion eliminated from Luke's Gospel the sayings of Jesus that he came not to destroy the law and the prophets, but to fulfill (Adv. Marcion, iv. 7).

Answer for yourself: Did you see a problem with that?

That passage is not in Luke, but in Matthew (Matt. 5:17), yet Tertullian actually repeats this charge on three subsequent occasions (Adv. Marcion, iv. 2, iv.12, iv. 36). Maybe Tertullian should read the Gospels before he comments on them or corrects another about them. Tertullian goes on to say that Marcion must have expunged "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel," and "It is not meet to take the children's bread, and give it to the dogs" (Ibid., iv. 7). These also are not in Luke, but in Matthew (Matt. 15:24-26). The charge that he mutilated the canonical list, and those books which he accepted, will not stand.

There is another noteworthy thing to note: No writer before Marcion's time makes mention of the Gospel according to Luke, and no writer after him does so till Irenaeus, nearly fifty years later. These are the facts.

Many think these facts are sufficient to give ground for suspicion that some one after Marcion took Marcion's "unnamed Gospel" and forged Luke's name to it. Yep! You will have to decide for yourself.

THE INFLUENCE OF IRENAEUS UPON THE FORMATION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

Irenaeus was the true founder of the New Testament canon. His date is from 180 to 200 A.D. Understand that before Irenaeus we find no mention of the Gospels by name by those who quote or reference passages which would later be included in them. Of our Gospels Luke was probably compiled or written about 170 A.D., Mark about 175 A.D., John about 178 A.D., and Matthew about 180 A.D. Irenaeus began to use them within a very short time after their origin, though it was probably not until the year 200 A.D. that he knew of them all. He used them exclusively, and his canon consisted of the Four Gospels, Acts, thirteen Epistles of Paul (rejected Hebrews), First John, and Revelation (Davidson, The Canon Of The Bible, p. 138. In an appendix he placed as of less authority, Second John, First Peter, and the Shepherd of Hermas (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, 138). The Epistle to the Hebrews, Jude, James, Second Peter and Third John he ignored (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 138). You should take note that this is the first time we meet with anything like a recognition of our present canon; and Irenaeus rejected several books which we not call divine. As he is the earliest writer to mention the Four Gospels, orthodox theologians now assert that they must have been in use before, and recognized as sources of authority; because, they say, it would not have been possible if, as unbelievers assert, other Gospels had been in use before, to discard those others that to substitute a new series in their place. Ha! The reply to this is, that it was not only possible, but it is what occurred, as history testifies. Long before we received the "Four Gospels" hundreds of different "gospels" were in wide circulation through the empire. The intense rivalry between the different sects in the first two centuries, and especially between the Paulines, the Petrines, and the Johannines, had taught them that neither could master the other, and neither could hold exclusively to its sacred books, and insist on their adoption. The result was compromise, just as in a presidential convention, when the friends of the leading candidates find that neither of the favorites can be nominated, they unite on an entirely new man, one who before has hardly been mentioned. The Catholic Church was just forming (about 170 C.E.), by the union of the small sects and churches into one great body, and the necessity of some written source of authority, of a Bible recognized by all, was apparent; and it was this need which formed the canon (Davidson, The Canon Of The Bible, p. 134, 136, 164). The old books were discarded or suppressed, and the new ones took their place. In case you missed, it political necessity was the reason for the New Testament; to give credibility and authority for the new religion what was to go by the name of Jesus which would be centered in Rome. Sounds like God to me!

Previously no two sects had used entirely the same books, and many used only one; and this was true even for a long time after our Four Gospels came into use, and after the effort was made to form one universal canon. Diversity and confliction doctrines and dogma was everywhere. The Holy Spirit really had a problem to deal with. But did he?

CANONS, CANONS EVERYWHERE

Thus the Ebionites (Iren., Adv. Her. 1.26) and the Cerinthians (Epiph., Her., xxvii, 5; xxx, 3, 14) used only the St. Matthew; the Cordonians only Marcion's Gospel (Pseudo-Tert. Adv. Om. Her., vi). The Marcionites used, of course, only their own Gospel. The Theodotians rejected St. John, as did also the Alogi (Blunt, "Dictionary of Sects," Alogi); and the Petrine Christians naturally preferred Mark's Gospel, which was Petrine (Tert. Adv. Marc., iv. 5), just as the Paulists preferred Luke, which favored Paul (Tert. Adv. Marc., iv. 5). In the midst of these facts church strength could come only in union and in the adoption of books which should be acceptable to all. Unity was necessary at all costs. That the New Testament is such a compromise its contents attest to the critical eye (or should at least if you read deeply and with a critical eye). The Gospel according to Matthew is Petrine, it being there that Jesus is represented as saying to Peter, " Upon this rock will I build my church" (Matt. 16:18). Mark is also Petrine and Luke is Pauline, as the early Christian Fathers testify (Tert. Adv. Marc., iv. 5). The Epistles of Peter are Petrine, the Epistles of Paul are Pauline, and the Gospel according to John, the Epistles of John, and Revelation are, of course, Johannine. You should take note that history at this time records the suppression of the old Gospels and the substitution of the new.

Thus, Serapion, Bishop of Antioch (190 A.D.), while on a visit to the church of Rnossus, in Cilicia, found them using the Gospel of Peter. Being appealed to, he permitted them to read it, notwithstanding the controversies it produced. Later he wrote: "But when I came to you I had supposed that all held to the true faith; and as I had not perused the Gospel presented by them under the name of Peter, I said, 'If this be the only thing that creates difference among you, let it be read.' But now having understood, from what was said to me, that their minds were enveloped in some heresy, I will make haste to come to you again" (Euseb., Eccl. Hist., vi. 12). Eusebius has preserved this extract, and though he does not say in so many words that the Gospel was suppressed, he intimates it, and it is conceded by eminent writers that that was done (Lost and Hostile Gospels, S. B. Gould, p. 245).

THE TESTIMONY FROM THE FIFTH CENTURY

Again, early in the fifth century there was a man named Theodoret who was actively engaged in superintending the establishment of churches. In his travels he found the Diatessaron, or Gospel of Tatian, in used in orthodox churches, and he wrote:

"I found also myself more than two hundred such books in our churches which had been received with respect; and having gathered all together, I caused them to be laid aside, and introduced in their place the Gospels of the Four Evangelists" (Theod. Haeret. Fab., i. 20).

Answer for yourself: Did you notice that in the fifth century he refers to "churches" (plural) which, in place of the Four Gospels we are acquainted with as if written by the Apostles, had hundreds of others? Is there a message from God in these that the earliest believes understood that we have been deprived of today?

These churches had over two hundred different books and gospels which we don't have at present and were content with reading them instead of what we have today

Answer for yourself: What does that tell you? Evidently the Holy Spirit had not witnessed to them as well as thousands and thousands of others that they needed "new books" and were missing the only "four" gospels that really mattered! Oh by the way, they also had the Bible Jesus used....the Old Testament!!!!

As late as the fifth century one whose commission was the oversight and establishment of churches makes mention that there were over two hundred competing gospels accepted by the churches (plural) and they were at this time without the Four Gospels we think were from the beginning of the Apostolic movement. We could not be further wrong in our beliefs about the acceptance of the Canon even as late as the fifth century. Evidently the Holy Spirit had not witnessed this to all as of yet as we suppose!

Answer for yourself: Were these people "saved" without this New Testament message from these "new" books which we feel preach is crucial for salvation?

Dr. Westcott says that "from this statement it is clear that the Diatessaron was so orthodox as to enjoy a wide ecclesiastical popularity" (Westcott, Canon, p. 320).

Answer for yourself: Did you church read or study from the Diatessaron last Sunday as the early churches did?

The fact of displacement is also recognized by Prof. Davidson:

"Not until the latter half of the second century did the present Gospels assume a canonical position, superceding other works of a similar character, and receiving a divine authority" (Davidson, Intro N. T., ii. 520).

I should be quick to add such authority was attested to those who promoted these "Four Gospels" over all others which were then accepted and read in the vast majority of churches at that time. There was no standard at this time for everyone decided what was to be accepted as "divine oracles" and this varied by location and city. Everyone and every group was an authority unto themselves.

When, therefore, the orthodox clergy asks if it were possible that other Gospels could have been long in use in the early church and then have been suppressed and succeeded by our present Gospels, the reply is, "That is exactly what occurred."

WHY FOUR GOSPELS.....?

Answer for yourself: But why should there be just four Gospel? Why not five, or six, or a dozen, or a hundred?

Irenaeus, who was, as I have said, the real founder of the canon, and who spent his life in endeavoring to establish the Catholic Church and the New Testament determined this matter for all, and the church has followed one man and his decision in this matter. Whatever reason he gives, therefore, for the present number of Gospels, will be the reason why we have that number. Fortunately, he is very explicit on this point, and we know exactly what decided him. As you read his answer again I wish to prompt you to ask yourself is this sound like the work of the Holy Spirit in determining for the church for all time the number of Gospels.

Believe it or not, Irenaeus said that there was four quarters on the earth, and four universal winds (north, south, east, west), and that animals were four-legged, or four-formed, and therefore there should be four Gospels. His words are exactly on this matter:

"It is not possible that the gospels can be either more or fewer in number than they are. For, since there are four quarters of the earth in which we live, and four universal winds, while the church is scattered throughout all the world, and the 'pillar and ground' of the church is the gospel and the spirit of life, it is fitting that she should have four pillars breathing out immortality on every side, and vivifying men afresh….Therefore the gospels are in accord with these things…For the living creatures are quadriform and the gospel is quadriform…These things being so, all who destroy the form of the gospel are vain, unlearned, and also audacious; those (I mean) who represent the aspects of the gospel as being either more in number than as aforesaid, or, on the other hand, fewer'" (Adv. Haer., iii. x. 8 & 9).

Answer for yourself: Do you now feel comforted in knowing that the Holy Spirit led Irenaeus to determine for all mankind the number of the Gospels of Divine revelation in relation to the number of feet that animals possess?

Answer for yourself: What if he wind was not out of the South but South-East…could we add another Gospel?

And Irenaeus has the audacity himself to call us "unlearned." That is like the pot calling the kettle black. It has never ceased to amaze me as to the superstition and darkness possessed by those who today are revered as spiritual giants like the early Gentile Church Father are in many circles. The more you read them and how they conflicted and disagreed with each other it is almost impossible to find the Holy Spirit's tracks in anything they did. A quick look at the doctrines they created that run parallel to their Council which determined the Canon is an eye-opening exercise to say the least. After reading the doctrines the these men created that run parallel with their selection of the Canon one find it almost to incredible to believe the Holy Spirit could have led them into all truth concerning the Canon but at the same time led them to develop and create blasphemous religious doctrines which Jesus neither believed nor his hand-picked followers taught.

There is no sadder spectacle in the intellectual world, than that of men possessed of really great mental possibilities, frittering away their time and their self respect in trying to make a superstition appear reasonable by explaining its absurdities in an illogical manner such as Irenaeus just did. He would have been better served by walking in the dignity of rational intellectualism rather than staggering alone in a blind stupor propelled by ignorant mysticism.

Those modern theologians who quote Irenaeus as a learned and great man, do not take kindly to his argument for the number of the Gospels; nor to the fact that he said that the ministry of Jesus lasted twenty years (Ibid., ii. 22). And at the same time he was endeavoring to establish as of divine authority Gospels which said that Jesus' ministry lasted but three years?

Answer for yourself: Was the Holy Spirit asleep in Irenaeus' case? Can we believe anything he said?

We will pick up study concerning the formation of the Canon of the New Testament with the Muratorian Canon in the next article.

THE MURATORIAN CANON

The canon of Muratori is also called the Muratorian Fragment, after the name of the discoverer and first editor, L.A. Muratori (in the "Antiquitates italicae", III, Milan, 1740, 851 sq.), the oldest known canon or list of books of the New Testament. The manuscript containing the canon originally belonged to Bobbio and is now in the Bibliotheca Ambrosiana at Milan (Cod. J 101 sup.). Written in the eighth century, it plainly shows the uncultured Latin of that time. The fragment is of the highest importance for the history of the Biblical canon. It was written in Rome itself or in its environs about 200; A.D. and probably the original was in Greek, from which it was translated into Latin. This Latin text is preserved solely in the manuscript of the Ambrosiana. A few sentences of the Muratorian Canon are preserved in some other manuscripts, especially in codices of St. Paul's Epistles in Monte Cassino. The canon consists of no mere list of the Scriptures, but of a survey, which supplies at the same time historical and other information regarding each book. The beginning is missing; the preserved text begins with the last line concerning the second Gospel and the notices, preserved entire, concerning the third and fourth Gospels. Then there are mentioned: The Acts, St. Paul's Epistles (including those to Philemon, Titus and Timothy; the spurious ones to the Laodiceans and Alexandrians are rejected); furthermore, the Epistle of St. Jude and two Epistles of St. John; among the Scriptures which "in catholica habentur", are cited the "Sapientia ab amicis Salomonis in honorem ipsius scripta", as well as the Apocalypses of St. John and St. Peter, but with the remark that some will not allow the latter to be read in the church. Then mention is made of the Pastor of Hermas, which may be read anywhere but not in the divine service; and, finally, there are rejected false Scriptures, which were used by heretics. In consequence of the barbarous Latin there is no complete understanding of the correct meaning of some of the sentences.

As stated above, the date of this canon is entirely unknown, but orthodoxy places it at the time of Irenaeus (200 A.D.), again simply it recognized the Four Gospels, Acts, thirteen Epistles of Paul, First John, Second John, Jude, and Revelation. It mentions the Wisdom of Solomon which is no longer in the Bible, among the New Testament books; speak approvingly of the Shepherd of Hermas, and says that the Revelation of John and the Revelation of Peter were accepted by the writer, although many were unwilling at the Revelation of Peter should be read in the churches. It does not mention either First Peter, Second Peter, First John, or James (Westcott, On The Canon of the New Testament, p. 527), all of which are not in the Bible.

As to the author, many conjectures were made (Papias, Hegesippus, Caius of Rome, Hippolytus of Rome, Rhodon, Melito of Sardis were proposed); but no well founded hypothesis has been adduced up to the present. It speaks of the Epistle to the Laodiceans, calls the Epistle to the Hebrews the Epistle to the Alexandrians (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 225), and says both were forgeries, passing under the name of Paul-a fact of which modern theologians are discretely silent, when they cite, as they do with so much exultation, this manuscript as "early evidence of the canon." You can judge for yourself how desperately the church was is in need of support when, after a tremendous conflict, it is willing to accept as "early evidence" a manuscript whose date is at least one hundred an fifty to two hundred years after Jesus was crucified.

These facts are disconcerting if you ponder them. We are 170 years removed from the Great Commission issued by Jesus. We find that almost 200 years later we have not the finished book that one would think necessary for such a noble endeavor as the Great Commission. I challenge you to imagine for a moment Jesus commanding his Apostles to go into all the world with this "New Testament" message of salvation but ill equipped due to not having the manual yet ready. What of those that perished without accepting the necessary messages of these books which we deem divine today?

I can just hear Jesus saying:

Matt 28:18-20

18 …"All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth.

19 Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost:

20 Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world"…but look guys…I don't have the new Bible ready yet…. the Father and I will not be able to agree on what to give you guys as the new manual for salvation for well over 200 years yet."

Answer for yourself: Have you ever stopped to think that Jesus was incompetent for his role if he expected his followers to go without the proper message or the necessary books?

Answer for yourself: How were these disciples and Apostles to teach the nations, better yet what were they to teach if they could not agree on what to teach with so many conflicting Gospels and Epistles circulating in the first centuries of the Gentile Church?

Answer for yourself: Were the people deprived of these books "damned" without hope automatically because they did not have a New Testament with all is necessary beliefs contingent upon one's salvation?

Answer for yourself: Is this inability to decide upon what was "inspired" by the early church the work of the Holy Spirit, and if so, what does that do to our image and understanding of a perfect God who cannot make up His mind and speak to his people?

Hopefully your reason and intellect is such that you can see the folly of such inability to decide which books God had determined necessary for the salvation of the world. The investigation of the sequence of books being deemed "in" and "out" and "in" and "out" over the centuries does little to bolster the image of a God who leads a people let alone speaks to them.

13 Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will shew you things to come.

Well the Holy Spirit is evidently not guiding very good for several centuries. If you take the above passage from the New Testament seriously then God is out of His mind because He is evidently speaking one thing to one group at one time and a completely different and contradicting thing to another group at another time; even at the same times. We call that schizophrenia today and prescribe mind-altering drugs to cure such conditions.

A MUCH MORE SERIOUS QUESTION AWAITS YOUR CONTEMPLATION

Preserving the honor of God hopefully the Holy Spirit had little to due with this confusion in the canonization of the New Testament. What should trouble you is the inclusion into this "New Testament" of the various sects conflicting and competing theologies which today, not knowing the origin or the identity of them, one is relegated to reading the New Testament under the false notion that all is "inspired" and accepting such "beliefs" if they came from God. Let me give you a parallel. You go to the store and buy four puzzles consisting of a thousand pieces. You quickly go home and empty the pieces together into one jumble and then begin to fit and force them into a frame that was meant to only handle one puzzle. You read the instructions on the box and they inform you that these pieces are "inspired" so with utter confidence you begin to force the pieces together and make them fit even when they won't. Needless to say the picture come out distorted and is not true to the original. This is what has happened by the continual jockeying for authority by sect after sect over hundreds of years as they got "their views and ideas" recognized as the Word of God through successive Church Councils. These "ideas" became literally Holy Scripture! You failure to understand the history of the Canonization of the New Testament and the selection of books by sect after sect has robbed you of the truth in understanding what validity and authority such a document might possess today. To stake your Eternal Life upon such a "power struggles" for supremacy by those fractions within the Gentile Church is not wise; especially in light of the knowledge you are now acquiring let alone a honest comparison of the teachings of the Jewish Bible vs. The New Testament. You might have never noticed by the New Testament contradicts the Eternal Word of God as found in the Jewish Tanakh in multiple places. Dear one, this means that the "jots" and "titles" that Jesus said were forever were nullified many places in the New Testament. You lack of awareness does not negate such; only study on your part will reveal this to you.

THE TESTIMONY OF THE THIRD CENTURY CHURCH FATHERS CONCERNING THE NEW TESTAMENT

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (210 A.D.)

Clement of Alexandria who lived in the early third century placed in his deutero-canon, as having inferior authority, Hebrews, Second John, Jude, which are not in the Bible, and the Revelation of Peter but not the Revelation of John. He also included the Shepherd of Hermas, the First Epistle of Clement, the Second Epistle of Clement, and the Epistle of Barnabas (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 139), which are not in the Bible. He thus placed the Epistle to the Hebrews, Second John and Jude, which are not in the Bible, on a level with the Shepherd of Hermas and the Epistle of Barnabas, which are not in the New Testament today. He recognized no distinct canon as of supreme authority (Ibid., 116), and he did not attach our idea of "uncanonical" as opposed to "canonical" to either of the Four Gospels or to any other books of the New Testament (Ibid., 139). Let us take time to see other information concerning Clement of Alexandria which helps explain his theological positions today in his writings and which explain his deviation from the "faith of the Jewish church."

TERTULLIAN (220 A.D.)

Tertullian included in his canon the Four Gospels, Acts, Epistles of Paul, First John, and Revelation (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 139). He placed in an appendix, as not authoritative, Hebrews, Jude, Second John, and First Peter (Ibid., p. 139), which are in the Bible now, and the Shepherd of Hermas, which is not; and he said nothing of James, Second Peter and Third John (Ibid., p. 139), which today are in the canon. Notice he is not in agreement with the Muratorian Canon established twenty years or more before his time. Again, every man was a "canon" unto himself.

THE PESHITO...OR PESHITTA

The Peshitta, that is, the "simple" (translation). This version has had such a complex literary history that its origin has long been a matter of debate. As far back as it can be traced, it has been a Christian version, since it contains the NT as well as the OT, and the extant copies of it have come from Christian hands. Yet the OT shows such a strong Jewish influence that many scholars hold that it was, at least in part, of Jewish origin, though some explain it as of Jewish-Christian origin. It may have been produced at Edessa, though Kahle states that it came from the region of Adiabene, lying east of the Tigris, where King Isates and his mother Helena became Jewish proselytes in the 1st cent. a.d. There are passages in the OT that are little more than transliterations of western Aramaic Targums into the Syriac script. While the text agrees in the main with the Masoretic Hebrew, it seems to have been revised on the basis of the LXX. Originally this Syriac version lacked Chr, Ezr, Neh, and Est, as well as the Apocrypha, all of which were added at a later date. The most valuable Syriac manuscript is the Codex Ambrosianus from about the 6th cent., now in Milan. A manuscript of Gen, Ex, Num, and Deut, from the monastery of St. Mary Deipara in Egypt, bears a date corresponding to a.d. 464, and is thus the oldest copy of the Bible in any language bearing a definite date

According to the Encyclopedia Britannica, the Peshitta (Syriac: "simple," or "common") is the Syriac version of the Bible, the accepted Bible of Syrian Christian churches from the end of the 3rd century AD. The name Peshitta was first employed by Moses bar Kepha in the 9th century to suggest (as does the name of the Latin Vulgate) that the text was in common use. The name also may have been employed in contradistinction to the more complex Syro-Hexaplar version. Of the vernacular versions of the Bible, the Old Testament Peshitta is second only to the Greek Septuagint in antiquity, dating from probably the 1st and 2nd centuries AD. The earliest parts in Old Syriac are thought to have been translated from Hebrew or Aramaic texts by Jewish Christians at Edessa, although the Old Testament Peshitta was later revised according to Greek textual principles. The earliest extant versions of the New Testament Peshitta date to the 5th century AD and exclude The Second Letter of Peter, The Second Letter of John, the Third Letter of John, The Letter of Jude, and The Revelation to John, which were not canonical in the Syrian church.

Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 139, also attests that the Peshito, the Bible of Ancient Syriac Christians, omitted Second Peter, Second John, Third John, Jude, and Revelation, all of which are not in our Bible (Ibid., 146).

THE OLD LATIN VERSION

The Old Latin. The Latin rendering of the Bible probably originated in North Africa as early as a.d. 150. It is even possible that the Christians of North Africa adopted a translation of the OT from Latin-speaking Jews. Tertullian (c. a.d. 160 – c. 230) knew the Old Latin Bible at least in part, and Cyprian (c. 200–258), bishop of Carthage, quotes frequently from both Testaments of this Bible. Only fragments of the Old Latin of the OT have survived. Several of the Apochryphal books were incorporated unrevised into the Vulgate. As for the the rest of The Bible, scholars have been able to piece together manuscript fragments covering a considerable portion of the OT. These, together with quotations in the early Latin Fathers, are our sources for the reconstruction of the Old Latin text of the OT. Scholars distinguish 2 types of text: the African and the European. The Old Latin of the OT was made from the Greek LXX, and its chief value today is as an aid in recovering the text of the LXX as it was before Origen's revision of it.

What is important for us to notice is that the Old Latin version, the Bible of the early African Church, omitted the Epistle to the Hebrews, Second Peter, and James. The Epistle to the Hebrews was added subsequently as an anonymous book (Westcott, On The Canon of the New Testament, p. 254). Again we see no unity or agreement with those who came before and their "opinions" as to what was "God-breathed."

THE ABYSSINIAN CHURCH AND ITS CANON

The Abyssinian Church was a church that believed in "monophysitism." This was a Christian schismatic sect of the 5th and 6th centuries that maintained that Christ had only one (divine) nature, thereby opposing the orthodox doctrine that he was both divine and human. The Monophysites were mainly confined to the Eastern church and gained little strength in the West. At the directive of Pope Leo I, the Council of Chalcedon in 451 attempted to steer a middle course between the orthodox and Monophysite views. The resulting edict did not satisfy the Monophysites, and the controversy continued, the Monophysites being supported by the Copts and the Eutychian sect. The Eastern church, in an effort to suppress the heresy, in the first half of the 6th century excommunicated the Monophysites, who thereupon formally seceded from the parent church. The Monophysites split into two factions over controversies regarding the incorruptibility of Christ's body. After 560 a third faction, the Tritheists, arose; they interpreted the three persons of the Deity as three separate gods and hence were regarded by the other factions as heretics. In Egypt, Syria, and Mesopotamia the Monophysite congregations remained strong throughout the controversy. Although finally condemned in 680-81, at the sixth ecumenical council, Monophysitism continues in some churches to this day. The modern Abyssinian church, Armenian church , Coptic church , and Jacobite church are all Monophysitic bodies.

The Canon of the Abyssinian Church included at first, Enoch (of course since it taught an Angel-Messiah and not a human messiah), Fourth Esdras, the Ascension of Isaiah, the Jubilees, and Asseneth (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 206), books which are not now in the Bible and of several of which the world now never hears. The list was changed frequently, and many books were eliminated or inserted, but, generally speaking, it contained Judith, Tobit, First Maccabees, Second Maccabees, Wisdom of Jesus, Wisdom of Solomon, and even a book called the Apocalypse of Isaiah (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 206), none of which are not in our Bible.

UPPER AND LOWER EGYPT...AND ITS CANONS

The Bibles of upper and lower Egypt are called "Coptic" as in the Coptic New Testaments. Of some 5 known Coptic versions, the most important are the Sahidic and the Bohairic.

(1) The Sahidic.

This version is the older version and was used in Southern (Upper) Egypt. It was formerly designated Thebaic, after the city of Thebes. Only fragments of this version are extant, but these fragments are of sufficient quantity to reconstruct the major part of the NT. The earliest manuscripts originate from the 4th cent. a.d..

(2) The Bohairic.

This version was current in Northern (Lower) Egypt and eventually replaced the other dialects. It is the Coptic used to this day in the church services, and the complete NT has been preserved in it. Both the Sahidic and Bohairic versions of the NT contain principally an Alexandrian (again we find the Alexandrian influence) type of text, similar to a text such as is found in the Codex Vaticanus.

The two canonical lists of upper and lower Egypt, called the Thebaic version, or version of Thebes, and the Memphitic version, or the version of Memphis, omitted Revelation (Westcott, On The Canon Of The New Testament, p. 266).

ORIGEN

Origen (250 A.D.) included in his Old Testament list the Epistles of Jeremiah, First Maccabees, and Second Maccabees, which are not in our Bible, and he makes no mention of Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, which are in our Bible (Euseb., Eccl. History, vi. 25). The omission of these twelve books is very singular, and Rufinus' Latin version (400 A.D.) kindly inserts them. Even if they were omitted by mistake, the error shows how careless and indifferent the Fathers were in stating what books were in the Bible. Origin did not formulate a consecutive list of the New Testament books, but passages gathered here and there from his works indicate what his opinion was (Ibid., 261). He apparently divided the New Testament books into three classes, authentic, unauthentic, and uncertain. The first included the Four Gospels, Acts, fourteen Epistles of Paul, First Peter, First John, and the Revelation of John. The second included the Shepherd of Hermas, thought he was rather inclined to place it in a higher class, the Epistle of Barnabas, the Acts of Paul, the Gospel according to the Hebrews, the Gospel ;of the Egyptians, and the Preaching of Peter (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 146). The third class included the Epistles of James, Jude, Second Peter, Second John, and Third John (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 146), all of which are in the Bible today.

As you can see again over the next one hundred years there was little unity or agreement on "what" was the Word of God among the early Church. Now, let us continue.

THE TESTIMONY OF THE FOURTH CENTURY CHURCH FATHERS CONCERNING THE NEW TESTAMENT

EUSEBIUS

Eusebius, the ecclesiastical historian (340 A.D.), divided the books of the New Testament into three classes, the "acknowledged," the "disputed," and the "heretical" (Euseb., Eccl. Hist., iii. 25). The "acknowledged" books included the Four Gospels , the Acts, thirteen Epistles of Paul (omitting Hebrews), First John, and First Peter. They were the books concerning which there was no controversy. The "disputed" books he divided into two subordinate classes; the "generally known and recognized by most," namely, James, Jude, Second Peter, Second John, and Third John., none of which are disputed now, so far as the laity ever hears; and the "spurious," including the Acts of Paul, the Shepherd of Hermas, the Revelation of Peter, the Epistle of Barnabas, the Teaching of the Apostles, and the Revelation of John, which last is in the Bible today, and the Gospel according to the Hebrews. The "heretical" books included the Gospel of Peter, the Gospel of Thomas, the Gospel of Matthew (not the one now in the Bible), the Acts of the Apostles by Andrew, and the Acts of the Apostles by John. The Epistle of James, which is not in the Bible and which he here classes as generally recognized, in another place he calls "spurious" (Euseb., Eccl. Hist., ii. 25), and of Revelation he says that possibly it should be among the acknowledged books, but that some rejected it. The idea as to what composed the Bible was in the minds of the Fathers vague and indefinite. Such a strict and unalterable rule as we now have they did not possess. Eusebius was a bishop of the Eastern church, and the reader will observe as we progress that the church uniformly discarded Revelation.

CYRIL, BISHOP OF JERUSALEM

Cyril, the Bishop of Jerusalem (356 A.D.), is a member of the Eastern church, made a catalogue which included the books now in our New Testament except Revelation, and he adds, "But let all the rest be excluded. And all the books which are not read in the churches, neither do thou read by thyself" (Catech. Lect., iv. 35).

THE COUNCIL OF LAODICEA…[150 YEARS LATER…LOCAL BUT NOT GENERAL AUTHORITY]

More than three hundred and fifty years passed away, and it became apparent that the Fathers could not agree as to what books should be in the Bible, and councils began to deal with the matter. The first Christian assembly at which the canon was made the subject of a special ordinance was held at Laodicea in 365 A.D. Tertullian indeed mentions the fact that synods had acted upon the canonicity of books in his time (Dr. Pudic, 10), but their authority much have been local and not general. Jerome also says that the council of Nicea included Judith in a list which it adopted (Pref. In Judith, i. p. 1169, Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 171), but I can find no good evidence that the council of Nicea acted on the canon at all, although there is a very general impression that it did. The current tradition is that the books were placed under a table at Nicea, and that after prayer the canonical ones leaped out from under, and the others remained behind. It is said that this story is told by Pappus, a Lutheran divine (1549-1601) in his "Epitome Historiae Ecclesiasticae de Conversionibus Gentium," etc. It is, of course, fabulous, and probably originated from the fact that at the council of Chalcedon the Gospels were placed in the midst of the assembly (Westcott, Canon, 426).

The synod of Laodicea was not a general council of the church, but its list was afterwards adopted by the church, so that virtually that was the first general action on the contents of the Bible. It was a gathering of twenty-four to thirty-two (the number is variously stated) of the clergy of Lydia and Phrygia. Whatever the number, the so-called heretics had a majority of the votes present (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 173). Its decree was as follows:

"Psalms composed by private men must not be read in the church, nor uncanonical books, but only the canonical books of the New and Old Testament. How many books must be read::

Then follows the list as we have it today, except the omission of Revelation. This council is of importance because for the first time the tone of authority as to what much and must not be read is established.

ATHANASIUS

Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria, (365 A.D.), was at enmity with Eusebius and the clergy of Laodicea (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 234), and when Laodicea declared that Revelation was not in the Bible, Athanasius immediately promulgated a list in which he declared that it was. In his canon he names, he says, the books in which alone were proclaimed the doctrines of godliness, and which no man must take from, and no man add to. Yet he omitted Esther, which the church as since added, and he also inserted Baruch and the Letter of Jeremiah, which the church has since taken away (Athanasius, Festal Epistle XXXIX, Liberty Of The Fathers, Oxford, 1954). He expressly declare that Esther was not a part of the Bible, and place it on a level with the Pastor Of Hermas, and a book called The Doctrine of the Apostles. He closed by saying: "Let there be no mention of apocryphal writings." He had become tired of the controversy.

AMPHILOCHIUS, BISHOP OF ICONIUM 365 A.D.

Amphilochius, Bishop of Iconium (365 A.D.), in his New Testament, accepts the Four Gospels, Acts, and fourteen Epistles of Paul, and adds, "But some maintain that the Epistle to the Hebrews is spurious; not speaking well, for the grace is genuine. To proceed: What remains? Of the Catholic Epistles some maintain that we ought to receive seven, and others three only, one of James, and one of Peter, and one of John…The Revelation of John again some reckon among (the scriptures); but still the majority say that it is spurious. This will be the most truthful canon of the inspired scriptures" (Lambi ad Seleucam). One cannot decide from the above what he considered "the most truthful canon," but it shows again how entirely unsettled was the question as to what was to be considered the New Testament and what was not, and that the question was purely a matter of individual opinion. His closing words show that in his time no list was universally accepted.

OPATATUS, OF MELA (370 A.D.)

Opatatus of Mela omitted Hebrews (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible,p. 193)

GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS (389 A.D.)

Gregory of Nazianzus (389 A.D.), gave as the New Testament the Four Gospels, the Acts, fourteen Epistles of Paul, and the seven Catholic Epistles, and he adds, "In these you have all the inspired books; if there be any book besides these, it is not among the genuine (scriptures)" (Carm., xii. 31). He belonged to the Eastern church, and he likewise rejected the book of Revelation.

By the "seven Catholic Epistles" is meant always James, First Peter, Second Peter, First John, Second John, Third John, and Jude. Why they are called Catholic Epistles no one knows (Kitto, Cyclo. Bio. Literature, "Epistles, Catholic,"). Any explanation of the name is an assumption.

ST. AUGUSTINE (390 A.D.)

St. Augustine's New Testament was the same as ours today. Now we begin to see conformity. The influence of St. Augustine in establishing the Bible was greater probably than any other Father or than any council. People now attribute to God what was really the work of one man. While councils decided upon the canon, and their decision became embodied sentiment of the entire church, the expression was really that of but one man, the leader in the council, and when doubts arose as to the authority of a book, scholarship was not involved to decide it, for the members possessed almost none. They simply asked: "What did the Early Fathers say of it?" Prof. Davidson says:

"In relation to the New Testament, the synods which drew up lists of the sacred books show the opinion of some leading Father like Augustine, along with what custom had sanctioned. In this department no member of the synod exercised his critical faculty; a number together would decide such questions summarily. Bishops proceeded in the track of tradition or authority" (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 172).

In 393 A.D. a council met in Hippo, in Africa, discussed the canon, and adopted St. Augustine's list. St. Augustine himself was present, and was the ruling spirit.

In 397 A.D. was held the third council of Carthage. St. Augustine was again present. It adopted a decree as follows:

> "It was also determined that besides the canonical scriptures, nothing be read in the church under the title of Divine Scriptures. The Canonical scriptures are these:"

Then follow the names of the books of the Bible as we have them now, except some variations in the order

DIDYMUS OF ALEXANDRIA (392 A.D.)

Didymus of Alexandria tells us that Second Peter in his time was accounted spurious and was not in the canon, yet it was publicly read (Westcott, Canon, 444). In the early days books were read in the churches which were known at the time to be spurious and which were not in the canon. In time most of these books were to find their way into the New Testament. Today Second Peter is not only read in the churches, but is accounted genuine and is in the Bible. And if any modern orthodox minister, believing as the ancients did, that it was spurious, desired to say so, he would not dare to, since it would "unsettle the faith of his congregation." For this he would be dismissed, and his livelihood would cease as a minister and the support of his family through the ministry would stop. It is thus that ecclesiasticism compels men to play the hypocrite, and teach as true that they believe to be false. The same is done today; many times ministers know more than they let one and for the sake of their "check" play the party-line.

Let us continue.

THE TESTIMONY OF THE FIFTH CENTURY CHURCH FATHERS CONCERNING THE NEW TESTAMENT

ST. CHRYSOSTOM (407 A.D.)

St. Chrysostom (407 A.D.) did not use Second John, Third John, Second Peter, Jude, and Revelation (Westcott, Canon, p.438), all of which are in the Bible now. He included the Wisdom of Jesus (Westcott, Canon, p. 438), a book which is not now in the Bible.

THEODORE, OF MOPSUESTA

He rejected the Epistle of James, Second Peter, Second John, Third John, Jude, and Revelation (Westcott, Canon, p. 438), all of which are now in the Bible.

THEODORET, BISHOP OF CYRUS

He rejected Second John, Third John, Second Peter, Jude and Revelation (Ibid., note 2).

MANUSCRIPTS OF THE GREEK BIBLE

There are three great manuscripts of the Greek Bible extant, the Sinaitic, the Vatican, and the Alexandrine. They are the high courts of appeal in all cases of disputed texts, and their lists are, therefore, very important.

The Sinaitic manuscript is one found by Tischendorf in a convent of St. Catherine, Mount Sinai, in 1859, and is probably the oldest of the New Testament codices in existence, dating back to the fourth century. It has the Four Gospels, the Fourteen Epistles of Paul, Acts, the Seven Catholic Epistles, Revelation, the Epistle of Barnabas, and a part of the Shepherd of Hermas (Westcott, Canon, p. 426), the last two of which are not in the Bible now.

The Vatican manuscript, in the Vatican Library at Rome, belongs to the middle of the fourth century. ; It ends by mutilation at Hebrews 9:14. Up to that point it agrees substantially with the Alexandrine manuscript (Ibid., note 2). What other books it may have contained one cannot say.

The Alexandrine manuscript, belongs to the fifth century, and written probably in Egypt, included in the New Testament the two Epistles of Clement (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p.10; Westcott, Canon, p. 544), none of which are in our Bibles at present.

CLERMONT CODEX

The Clermont Codex is a Latin manuscript now in the Imperial Library at Paris, and dating from the fifth to the eighth century, contains a list of the books read in the African Church in the third century (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 145). The New Testament omits Philippians, First Thessalonians, and Second Thessalonians, which are not in the Bible, and inserts the Shepherd of Hermas, the Acts of Paul, and the Revelation of Peter, which are not now in it (Westcott, Canon, 555). The Epistle which is now called "to the Hebrews" is there called the Epistle to Barnabas (Ibid., 557).

In 419 A.D. another council was held at Carthage., and St. Augustine's list was again ratified (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 199)

ON THE CHURCH'S COUNCILS...WHAT YOU WERE NEVER TOLD

The reader would err greatly did he suppose that in these assemblies one or two hundred gentlemen sat down to discuss quietly and dignifiedly the questions which had come before them for settlement. On the contrary, many of the bishops were ignorant ruffians, and were followed by crowds of vicious supporters who stood ready on the slighest excuse to maim and kill their opponents. The most shocking scenes that occur in the political conventions in the worst districts of our great cities and other nations are as nothing compared with what history tell us was common in these Christian councils. Dr. Phillip Schaff says:

"Together with abundant talents, attainments, and virtues, there were gathered also at the councils ignorance, intrigues, and partisan passions, which had already been excited on all sides by long controversies preceding and now met and arrayed themselves, as hostile armies, for open combat" (History of the Christian Church, by P Schaff, D.D., ii. 346).

Dear ones, this is who these supposed "Divine Revelations" were later canonized and today we are told the "Holy Spirit" decided for us what books were to be "authoritative" for faith and practice. It seems more likely "might made right!"

Dean Milman, the celebrated historian says:

"It might have been supposed that nowhere would Christianity appear in such commanding majesty as in a council, which should gather from all quarters of the world the most eminent prelates and the most distinguished clergy; that a lofty and serene piety would govern all their proceedings, and profound and dispassionate investigation exhaust every subject; that human passions and interest would stand rebuked before that awful assembly; that the sense of their own dignity as well as the desire of impressing their brethren with the solemnity and earnestness of their belief would at least exclude all intemperance of manner and language… History shows that melancholy reverse. Nowhere is Christianity less attractive, and if we look to the ordinary tone and character of the proceedings, less authoritative, than in the councils of the church. It is in general a fierce collision of two rival factions, neither of which will yield, each of which is solemnly pledged against conviction. Intrigue, injustice, violence, decisions on authority alone, and that the authority of a turbulent majority, decisions by wild acclamation rather then by sober inquiry, detract from the reverence, and impugn the judgments, at least of the later councils….rejoicing at the damnation imprecated against the humiliated adversary….the degeneracy is rapid from the council of Nicea to that of Ephesus, where each party came determined to use every means of haste, maneuver, court influence, bribery, to crush his adversary; where there was an encouragement of, if not an appeal to the violence of the populace, to anticipate the decrees of the council; where each had his own tumultuous foreign rabble to back his quarrel; and neither would scruple at any means to obtain the ratification of their anathemas through persecution by the evil government. (H.H. Milman, D.D., History of Latin Christianity, New York, 1871, p 226).

Gregory of Nazianzus, the Christian father, speaks of them as "assemblies of cranes and geese" (Schaff, History of the Christian Church, ii. 347). Utterly disgusted, he decline to have anything to do with them, saying:

"To tell the truth, I am inclined to shun every collection of bishops, because I have never yet seen that a synod came to a good end, or abated evils instead of increasing them. For in those assemblies (and I do not think I express myself too strongly here) indescribable contentiousness and ambition prevail….Therefore I have withdrawn myself, and have found rest to my soul only in solitude" (Ep. Ad. Procop., 55 old order, Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, ii. 347).

The third general council of the church, which was held at Ephesus in 431 A.D., was marked by "shameful intrigue, uncharitable lust of condemnation, and coarse violence of conduct" (Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, ii. 348). Both factions came with armed escorts, as if going to battle (Ibid., ii. 723-725), and were followed by great mobs of the ignorant rabble, slaves and seamen, the lower populace of Constantinople, peasants, and bathmen, and hordes of women, prepared for violence; the city was patrolled by troops (Ibid., i. 242), and Nestorius and John of Antioch had armed body guards to protect them from the violence of Cyril's party (Ibid., p. 242). The two bands fought in the streets and much blood was shed (Ibid., p. 242). At the reading of the imperial decree such a tumult arose that all the contending bishops were ordered under arrest (Ibid., i. 242).

An effort was made immediately after to hold a council in Constantinople, and such was the fear of a riot that it had to be adjourned to the suburban district across the Bosporus (Ibid., i. 242).

In August 449 A.D., there met in Ephesus a synod which occupies a notorious place in the scandals of church history, and which, from the fraud and violence by which everything was carried, and the odious character of its proceedings, has received the name of the "Robbers Council." Dioscorus presided with brutal violence (Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, ii. 738), protected by soldiers. The fear of personal injury was so great that Flavian and his friends, composing one faction, hardly dared to open their lips, while Theodoret was excluded entirely. A communication, presented from Eusebius, was received by the crown with cries of "Let Eusebius be burnt; let him be burned alive. As he has cut Christ in two, so let him be cut in two" (Ibid., p. 738). Three delegates from Rome were so terrified, that they did not venture to read an epistle which they bore from Leo (Ibid., p. 738 ff.). The subject of the canon was, of course, not the only one discussed by councils. In fact, in many councils it was not referred to. Dioscorus and his party wished Flavian and his friends to sign a confession of that that Christ had but one nature. Flavian refused to do so. At a given signal the doors were thrown open, a band of soldiers and an armed mob rushed in, and the terrified bishops of the Flavian party were compelled, by blows and at the point of the sword, to sign (Mosheim, Eccl. Hist., Bk. 2, Cent. 5, pt. 2, ch. v). Where before there had been two parties there was now not alone a majority, but almost unanimity (Milman, Hist. Latin. Christ., i. 288). The decree having been signed, Dioscorus was no longer able to control his anger, and he struck the vanquished Flavian (Ibid., i. 289). Thus encouraged, a crown of infuriated monks set upon the unfortunate bishop of Jerusalem, crying "Kill him! Kill him!" and they beat and kicked him, and inflicted such injuries that death ensued shortly after (Ibid., i. 289, Scaff, Hist. Christ. Church., ii. 739). Dean Milman remarks, significantly, that this was not the last council defiled by blood (Milman, Hist. Latin. Christ., i. 289).

Another council, called to meet in Nicea in 451 A.D., was so unruly that it had to be summoned to Chalcedon, across the straits from Constantinople, where the emperor could reach it with his troops and compel order (Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, ii. 742). It is known as the Council of Chalcedon. The proceeding were continually interrupted by yells and tumult (Ibid., ii. 743), and even the laymen were compelled to remind the bishops of their clerical dignity (Ibid., ii. 743). "At Chalcedon," says Dr. Philip Schaff, "the introduction of the renowned expositor and historian Theodoret provoked a scene which almost involuntarily reminds us of the modern brawls of Greek and Roman monks at the holy sepulchre under the restraining influence of the Turkish police. Theodoret's Egyptian opponents shouted with all their might: 'Away with him, this teacher of Nestorius.' His friends replied with equal violence: 'They forced us (at the Robber Council) by blows to subscribe, away the Manichaeans, the enemies of Flavian, the enemies of the faith. Away with the murderer Dioscorus. Who does not know his wicked deeds?' The Egyptian bishops cried again: 'Away with the Jew, the adversary of God, and call him not bishop.' To which the original bishops answered: 'Away with the rioters, away with the murderers! The orthodox man belongs to the council.'" The military had to interfere to quell the proceedings (Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, ii. 348).

At the council held at Constantinople in 785 A.D., the soldiery burst into the chamber and dispersed the affrighted bishops because they did not approve of the bishop's enactments (Milman, ii. p. 345); and the second council of Nicea (787 A.D.) denounced this council of Constantinople as a synod of fools and madmen (Ibid., ii.

There is one curious fact to which I can not refrain from calling attention. No Christian historian, whether Mosheim, Milman, Schaff, or any other, has ever perceived, apparently, the grotesque absurdity of an assembly attempting to decide by vote a fact in the past. Men vote on questions which have yet to be decided, and thus make them facts; as whether this man or that man shall be president, or this law or that shall be in force; but not on those which are already decided. The reader needs to understand that this is just a small representation of the character of the Church councils. If one is honest with oneself then it is almost impossible to read these proceedings and pretend that the Holy Spirit had anything to do the the results of such violent proceedings let alone believe the decisions made as to what was "inspired" have any credibility whatsoever!

JEROME

Jerome (420 A.D.) included in his New Testament Hebrews and Revelation on the authority of the ancient writers, and not of the existing custom (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 190 ff., showing that in his time these books were frequently rejected. That seems almost ridiculous in light of what you have learned by reading the above accounts. In another work he gave the Epistle of Barnabas at the end of a canonical list, and he expresses the doubts in existence to Philemon, Second Peter, Jude, Second John, and Third John (Davidson, p. 190 ff.), of which, today, no doubts are entertained. The First Epistle of Clement, which is not now in the Bible, was, he says, read in some churches ().

Jerome and St. Augustine were the men most influential in determining the canon of the New Testament (Davidson, Canon, p. 233). The Catholic Church has followed the latter, and Luther and the reformers followed the former. As to their qualifications for deciding the canon Prof. Davidson has said:

"Both were unfitted for critical examination of such a topic. Augustine was a gifted spiritual man, lacking learning and independence. Tradition dominated all his idea about the difficult or disputed books.....His judgment was weak, his sagacity moderate, and the absence of many-sidedness hindered a critical result. Jerome, again, was learned but timid, lacking the courage to face the question fairly or fundamentally and the independence necessary to its right investigation. Belonging as he did to both churches, he recommended the practice of one or the other. He, too, was chiefly influenced by tradition" (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 200).

APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS

The Apostolic Constitutions are a collection of rules, mainly for the guidance of the clergy. They date from the firth century, and are not to be attributed to the Apostles, their names being another of the many similar endeavors to give authority to books by foreign great names to them. The canons in the Apostolic Constitutions (Apostolic Constitutions, II, 57) omit from the New Testament James, First Peter, Second Peter, First John, Second John, Third John, Jude and Revelation (Ibid., VIII, xlvii. 85). This is the more remarkable from the fact that the canon prescribes with great particularity and minuteness how services in church should be conducted, and what books be read! It also omits Revelation, and included the First Epistle of Clement, the Second Epistle of Clement (an acknowledged forgery), and the Clementine Constitutions (Ibid.). No one ever hears of these books being included in the New Testament now. It is a noteworthy fact that this and the preceding list, contradictory as they are, are both in the same book no less!

It would seem to me than "any thinking believer" would have a hard time accepting the decisions of such men as shown about anything, but let us continue for we have yet much to share before we can draw any concrete conclusion.

THE TESTIMONY OF THE SIXTH CENTURY CHURCH FATHERS CONCERNING THE NEW TESTAMENT

This will be a very quite century regarding the Canon of the New Testament.

COSMOS INDICOPLEUSTES (535 A.D.)

Cosmos Indicopleustes never mentions James, First Peter, Second Peter, First John, Second John, Third John, Jude, or Revelation (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 200).

JUNILIUS, AN AFRICAN BISHOP (550 A.D.)

Junilius divided the books of the Bible into three classifications: "Perfect, intermediate, and no authority." Ironically those he considered "perfect" contained the Wisdom of Jesus, which is not now in our Bibles. Those he considered "intermediates" contained the collection of James, Second Peter, Jude, Second John, and Third John, all of which we consider as authoritative as any. Within the classification of "no authority" he included the book of Revelation because it was doubted by man in the East (De. partibus divine legis, i. 2).

THE TESTIMONY OF THE 7TH THRU THE 10TH CENTURY CHURCH FATHERS CONCERNING THE NEW TESTAMENT

THE SIXTH COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE (629 A.D.)

By the year 629 A.D. so diverse and jumbled had become the views as to what was "God breathed" and "inspired" and "what should be in the New Testament and the Bible," and so great was the need of harmony and unity in these fractions sects which all had different documents to vouch for their authority or the authority of each "sect" against the other, that the sixth general council of Constantinople, otherwise know as the Quinisextine or Trullan council, with a desire apparently to please all parties, ratified the catalogues of Laodicea and Carthage, the Apostolic canons, and those of Athanasius, Gregory of Nazianzus, Amphilochius of Iconium, Cyril of Alexander, and every other one of which they had any knowledge, seemingly indifferent to the absurdity of indorsing the contradictions between them.

Answer for yourself: Cannot God decide what is or what is not to be included, and would he agree to multiple contradictions and call it "Divine"?

You need to understand that no two of these various "canons" were alike. It must be added that the Clementine Constitutions, though in the Apostolic catalogues, and recognized by the assembly as authoritative, were declared to be no longer canonical, on account of the interpolations which they had received (Westcott, Canon, p. 434).

One would think that after such a majestic gathering of the Church that all would be settled. No way! Men continued to disagree even after such a noble endeavor as the Sixth Council of Constantinople which "ratified and canonized everything even if it did conflict with itself."

Answer for yourself: Is this God's Word?

THE FOURTH COUNCIL OF TOLEDO (632 A.D.)

At the fourth council of Toledo Augustine's list was again ratified (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 237).

JOHANNES DAMASCENUS (750 A.D.)

Johannes Damascenus gives as the New Testament all the books now in it as well as the Apostolic Constitutions (De. Fide Orthodoxa, iv. 17).

NICEPHORUS (810 A.D.)

Nicephorus excluded from the New Testament Revelation, and placed it on a level with the Revelation of Peter, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Gospel according to the Hebrews (Westcott, Canon, p. 552).

PHOTIUS, CECUMENIUS AND THEOPHYLACT

They all rejected Revelation (Ibid.).

ALFRIC, ABBOT OF CERNE (989 A.D.)

He said that the Four Gospels should be included along with the Seven Catholic Epistles, fifteen Epistles of Paul including Hebrews and the Epistle to the Laodiceans, the Acts, and Revelation (Westcott, Canon, p. 452). The Epistle to the Laodiceans here mentioned has a curious history. Paul says in his Epistles to the Colossians (chap. 4:16) that he had written a letter to the the Laodiceans, and an Epistle claiming to be that one was in circulation in the second century (Westcott, Canon, p. 552). The one now under discussion, which is a different book from that one, begins as all the genuine Epistles do, "Paul, an apostle not of men, nor by-men, but by Jesus Christ, to the brethren that be at Laodicea." etc. The earliest trace of it is at the beginning of the sixth century. Gregory the Great, at the close of that period, declare it was written by Paul. Haymo, Bishop of Halberstadt, (853 A.D.), did the same. So did John of Salisbury not long after. The opinion of Africa confirmed these, and the Epistle passed into the early translation of the New Testament. It is in the manuscript of the Vulgate Bible at La Cava. It is in the manuscript of the Latin New Testament which is still preserved at Fulda; in very many western manuscripts of the Bible, as in the great Gothic Bible of Toledo (8th century), in the Book of Armagh (807 A.D.), in the so-called Charlemagne's Bible of the British museum (9th century), in the great Bible of the king's library in the British museum, apparently designed for church use, and in many other magnificent Bibles. Fourteen editions of one or more German versions of it are said to have been printed before Luther's time; it is in the first Bohemian Bible (1488), and it is in the Albigensian Bible at Lyons, where it has its usual place after the Epistle to the Collosians (Westcott, Canon, p. 454).

From the sixth to the sixteenth century, a thousand years, this Epistle was in the Bible of a large share of the Christian people; and yet we now never hear of it, much less do we hear it called the "Word of God".

We are not through yet. Let us continue.

THE TESTIMONY OF THE 16TH CENTURY CHURCH FATHERS CONCERNING THE NEW TESTAMENT

REFORMATION & THE COUNCIL OF TRENT

For thirteen hundred years the church had been endeavoring to harmonize on a Bible by permitting the bishops and ecclesiastics to settle the matter generally among themselves, and it had resulted only in violent clashing of opinion. An ominous revolt was breaking out in the North. Luther was pushing the claim of the right of private judgment to its utmost. And as the Bible was the key of the situation, the church, which had been growing more and more restrictive and had thus accumulated precedent for its proposed step, took the whole questions of the canon in hand, fixed it once for all, and forbade any individual to have anything further to do with it.

The council of Trent met Dec. 13, 1545, and on Feb. 12, 1546, the question of the canon was brought forward. Luther had declared that the Bible alone was the source of authority. Luther declared that the universally accepted books of the Old and New Testament, without any of the apocryphal or disputed books, should alone constitute the Bible. The church wanted the apocrypha admitted. The questions were discussed in the council by about thirty ecclesiastics in four sessions. For the second time in the history of the book came a compromise. Four fractions were contending for the adoption of different views. All were agreed that tradition, hearsay, and rumor was of equal authority with written records. The grotesque misnomer of calling such men "great," or "scholars," is quite apparent. On the subject concerning which there should have been division, there was unity; and on the one on which there should have been unity; there was division. One party desired two classes of books, St. Augustine had divided them, the canonical and the uncanonical; the second party desired three classes, the acknowledged books, the disputed books of the New Testament, and the apocryphal books of the Old Testament, in each case, of course, the uncanonical books to be thrown out; the third party desired the list simply to be named without anything being said as to the authority of the books, as had been done at the third council of Carthage; and the fourth party demanded that all the books, acknowledged, disputed, and apocryphal, should be classed together, and the whole called of divine authority. As is generally the case in a religious council where "spiritual insight" is permitted to rule, stupidity gained the day. The first and second parties combined about March 8th, but notwithstanding this, on the 15th the third party secured a majority, and the following decree was adopted:

" The holy ecumenical and general council of Trent,...following the examples of the orthodox Fathers, receives and venerates all the books of the Old and New Testaments, ...and also traditions pertaining to faith and conduct,...with an equal feeling of devotion and reverence...The synod though proper, therefore, to annex to this decree a catalogue of the sacred books, lest any doubt might arise concerning those that were approved of. They are the following: [Then are given the names of the books exactly as they stand in the Catholic Bible today, and the decree proceeds.] Now, if any one reading these books in all their parts, as they are usually read in the Latin Vulgate edition, does not hold them for sacred and canonical [observe "canonical," not "inspired"] and, knowing the aforesaid traditions, does industriously condemn them, let him be anathema" (Westcott, Canon, p. 472; Schaff's Creeds of Christendom, ii. p. 79).

This is where the doctrine originated that we must believe the New Testament or be damned. More than one thousand five hundred years after Jesus Christ was crucified, the superstition arose. And the Catholic Church does not yet insist on inspirations, for it hold to the authority of tradition, and gossip and inspiration do not always agree. But who were the men that established this damnation theory of the Bible?

"This fatal decree, in which the council, harassed by the fear of lay critics and 'grammarians,' gave a new aspect to the whole question of the canon, was ratified by 53 prelates, among whom were not ...one scholar distinguished for historical learning, not one who was fitted by special study, for the examination of a subject in which the truth could alone be determined by the voice of antiquity" (Westcott, Canon, p. 474).

That was the character of the men who said that their work was the work of God. For, let us remember, the books in the Catholic Bible are not what God said should be there but what these men said should be. God had nothing to do with it! Furthermore, this was the first time in the history of the church that anything which had been before simply a matter of custom and opinion, was made a belief to be accepted on pain of eternal damnation (Ibid.), and it has been the unfortunate parent of a most numerous and hideous progeny. Having once a precedent for declaring endless punishment a penalty for non-belief in dogmas not taught in the Bible, a whole brood of superstitions followed and have been current to this day.

This practically settled the question of the canon in the Catholic Church (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 237). A few men, later, protested, and endeavored to revise the list (Westcott, Canon, p. 475), but the struggle was useless.

What I find amazing is that the absurdity of the Eastern Church, which had for one thousand three hundred years declared persistently that the book of Revelation was not written by John and was not entitled to a place in the Bible, wheeled squarely about, and in a council held in Jerusalem in 1672 A.D., adopted the decree of Trent (Davidson, The Canon of the Bible, p. 246). Today the Easter Church considers Revelation as much the word of God as any other book (Westcott, Canon, p. 487).

THE WORSHIP OF A BOOK...INSTEAD OF GOD

The Protestant Church today is a book-worshipper. It makes a fetich out of a book. The Catholics are little for the Bible, and ever have. The say, "Take away the whole book if you like, and the church will still remain in all its power. The book is the creation of the church, not the church the creation of the book." The Protestants, finding themselves confronted with an infallible church, had to oppose it with an infallible book. And they made a book infallible, which before had not been considered so. And well they might for they were compelled to. It is commonly the case that the overthrow of one superstition is only accomplished by the establishment of another in its place. The Catholics had the prestige of antiquity, and of being considered the only true Church of God, and they threatened with eternal damnation every man who followed Luther. The masses of the people of the North, ignorant and superstitious, were naturally terrified by the awful threat, and the only wonder is that they ever challenged this religious juggernaut. To meet the challenge, Luther, Calvin, and others said that the Bible was "supernaturally inspired." The origin of the books having been forgotten (as most Christians today do not possess such knowledge as well), men, credulous and in trouble, came to think that because the books were written of God they were written by God. The reformers declared that the Bible and not the church was the sole source of authority. This succeeded, and the decrees of the Vatican were answered by such reasoning by the Protestants. The doctrine of the divine and infallible inspiration of the New Testament spread as did the military advances through Europe.

That this is so, and that the idea arose with men who were deluded, is illustrated by the following ridiculous decree, adopted by the Calvinistic council of Switzerland in 1675 A. D.:

"Almighty God not only provided that His word, which is the power of every one who believes, should be committed to writing through Moses, the Prophets, and Apostles, but also has watched over it with a fatherly care up to the present time, and guarded it lest it might be corrupted by the craft of Satan or any fraud of men...The Hebrew volume of the Old Testament, which we have received from tradition of the Jewish church, to which formerly the oracles of God were committed, and retain at the present day, both in its contents and in its vowels, the points themselves, or at least the force of the points, and both in its substance and its words is divinely inspired, so that, together with the volume of the New Testament, is the single and uncorrupted rule of our faith and life, by whose standard, as by a touchstone, all versions which exist, whether Eastern or Western, must be tried, and whenever they vary, be made conformable to it" (Neimeyer, Collection Confessionum, p. 730). Nothing could be further from the truth!

THE PROBLEM WITH SUCH A BELIEF IN DIVINE INSPIRATION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

Three things indicate the grim ferocity of this dogma:

1. It says the God has guarded the Bible from corruption; yet Griesbach collected one hundred and fifty thousand various readings in the New Testament manuscripts alone (B. A. Hinsdale, M.A., Genuineness and Authenticity of the Gospels, Cincinnati, 1872 ,p. 130), the greater part of which must, of course, be corruptions, since there can be but one correct reading for any passage.

2. It says the vowels were inspired, whereas the ancient Hebrew literature had no vowels.

3. It says that the vowel-points were inspired; whereas they did not come into use until the seventh century after Jesus, and were not perfected until four centuries later. This last article is a relic of that ancient belief that the translators, the copyists, and all the men who had aught to do with the transmission of the Bible from century to century, were inspired.

THE BELGIAN CONFESSION (1561-1563 A.D.)

The Belgian Confession is just another curious illustration of the highly wrought mental condition of that time. It says: "We embrace the Holy Scripture in those two volumes of the Old and New Testament, which are called the canonical books, about which there is no controversy" (Neimeyer, Collection Confessionum, pp. 361-363, Art. 3-7).

What do they mean by saying "about which there is no controversy?"

Then follows a list of the books of the Bible as we receive them now, including also the books which, as you have seen, had been in controversy for 1500 years and were even then. And notwithstanding these facts the italicized words were subsequently changed to read "about which there never was any controversy" (Ibid.). What a lie!

The creed proceeds, "And we believe these things contained in them...because the Holy Spirit witnesses to our consciences that they emanated from God" (Ibid., pp. 361-363). We are told by theologians that we cannot trust our reason, that we must "experience the testimony of the spirit" to believe the doctrines of the church, and that this testimony can be relied upon. Yet here we find a people offering the "testimony of the spirit" to the truth of a thing which we now know to be false!!! The "testimony of the spirit" is a mental delusion. The Christian no doubt thinks he has it. He is honest in it, but he mistakes. There is no such thing. His imagination supplies the facts, just as it the case with a man suffering from delirium tremens, who thinks he sees various hideous creatures. Righteous enthusiasm, such as says that "every word in the blessed New Testament was inspired by God", is a mental and moral delirium tremens.

The Protestants, however, through convinced that the Bible was infallibly inspired, had their difficulties in determining what the Bible really was. And the fierceness with which they insisted on their views ended in the suppression of all historical criticism (Westcott, Canon, p. 465). Erasmus (1467-1536 A.D.) said that Hebrews was not written by Paul, nor Second John and Third John by the Apostle, but by another John; nor Revelation by John (Westcott, Canon, p. 467). He was the literary leader of the Reformation. While he was still a Catholic, an attack was made upon his views by the Sarbonne, the theological faculty of Paris; censure was placed on his doubts, and it was declare that, no matter if the genuineness of certain books had been disputed in ancient times, the fact that the church has since accepted them made it wrong for any Christian to dispute them (Westcott, Canon, p. 470).

BODENSTEIN, OF KARLSTADT (1520 A.D.)

Bodenstein, the reformer, and great friend but finally the persecuted enemy of Luther, divided the books of the Bible into three classes. In the first he placed the Four Gospels; in the second of "less authority" he placed the "acknowledged" Epistles of the New Testament (i.e., thirteen of Paul, First Peter, and First John); and in the third class, as of least authority, Hebrews, James, Second Peter, Second John, Third John, Jude, and Revelation. He omitted the book of Acts entirely.

LUTHER

Luther said that Hebrews was written by neither Paul nor an apostle but did not place it on equality with the epistles written by the apostles. He thought it was a compilation for pre-existing records, and while it had much in it that was good, it also had "wood, straw, or hay" in its composition. James was, he said, an epistle of straw, with no character of the Gospel in it; it was not written by any apostle, and was not a true Bible book (Pref. Epis. Jacobi). The Epistle of Jude was, he declared, a reprint from Second Peter (compare the second chapter of Second Peter and the first part of the third chapter of the Epistle of Jude, he will see that they closely resemble each other) and therefore it did not, in his opinion, belong among the canonical books (Pred. Epis. Judae). Revelation he considered neither prophetic nor apostolic, and though that it was almost on a level with the fourth book of Esdras, which last he proposed to throw into the river Elbe (Davidson, p. 216). He modified this view twelve years later so far as to say that it was a dumb prophecy, and that there was no objection to any one believing it to have been written by the Apostle John, who desired to do so (Westcott, p. 479). As for himself he did not believe it. He placed Hebrews, James, Jude and Revelation in an appendix to his New Testament, as of inferior authority (Westcott, Canon, p. 477).

ZWINGLI (1531 A.D.)

Zwingli declared that he took no account of Revelation, for it was not a book of the Bible (Works, ed. Schuler II, i. 169). CEcolampadius (1531 A.D.) said that the Protestants of Switzerland did not compare James, Jude, Second Peter, Second John, Third John, and Revelation, with the other books of the Bible (Epis., i. 3, c., ed. 1548). Calvin, on the other hand, said that though Hebrews was not written by Paul, it was through a Satanic device that its authority had been questions (Pref. Heb.), and that Second Peter, though not written by Peter, was written by some disciple at his command (Pref. Epis. as Heb.). He passed over Second John, Third John, and Revelation, without any notice in his commentary.

Luther and his successors, it will be seen, made the same distinction between the New Testament books that had been made between those of the Old Testament, classifying them according to the "generally received" and the "controverted." It was the council of Trent which obliterated the distinction between the books of the Old Testament, and the Calvinists who obliterated it between the books of the New (Davidson, Canon, p. 217). The Lutherans also discarded subsequently Luther's views, and accepted all the books as of equal authority, and thus all over the Protestant world the books of the canon were placed on the same level.

We are almost done. Let us continue.

WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY (1647 A.D.)

Finally, the Westminster assembly in 1647 adopted a list which has since been accepted by the Presbyterians of England, Ireland, and America, the Congregationalists of both countries, and, in short, by the Protestant evangelical and orthodox churches with which we come in contact in our daily life in the United States. It is in the famous Westminster Confession that we find the authority for the current books in our Christian Protestant Bibles, and is the same as the Catholic list except that it rejects the Old Testament apocrypha (Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, iii. 601). The latter was, however, for a long time printed in an appendix, and some who read this, especially elderly persons, can remember seeing the apocrypha in the old family Bibles. But in 1827 the British and Foreign Bible Society decided that it would no longer circulate those books (Lange, Comm., xv. 56ff., Am. ed., 1880), the American Bible Society followed its example (Schaff, Bible Dict., "Apocrypha"), and thus it was that our Bible received its finishing touch, as we have been accustomed to see it.

Now let us finish.

THE INESCAPABLE CONCLUSION CONCERNING THE NEW TESTAMENT

I have attempted to give you, the reader, a brief review of the subject at hand:

- We found without question that the greater number of books of the New Testament are anonymous.
- Of these books no one knows who wrote them, and no one knows when they were written. They are, in the case of the most important books, of those most relied on for doctrinal support, compilations from pre-existing records. But who wrote those records, and who made the compilations, are entirely unknown.
- We have seen repeatedly that when the books of the New Testament came into use they were not considered inspired or the word of God as we esteem them today.
- Many Gospels, Epistles, and Revelations, not now in use in Christianity, were read in the churches in the early centuries for edification.
- About the close of the second century or the beginning of the third century, when the Gentile Roman Catholic Church was forming, a source of authority for appeal in case of dispute over new doctrines was necessary, and the Fathers instituted the theory that certain books were "inspired" in hopes of bolstering their political, economic, and theological positions as one "sect" fought another "sect" for supremacy. But the books which they said were divine were not always the same books which we have now. They declared many books to be inspired which we do not think to be; and they ignored and rejected books which have since been invested with divine honors.
- The contentions of the sects made it impossible for the new church to unite on the Gospels, which had been first in use, and they were, therefore, discarded, and our present Four Gospels were substituted. To give them greater authority, the names of the Apostles who had been with Jesus were forged to them, literary forgery in those days not being considered a crime as today. The Fathers in asserting that the books were inspired, were guided not by critical ability nor by the Holy Spirit, but by ignorance and gross superstition. Instead of being great scholars, they were extremely superstitious, ignorant, and credulous, and in general very inferior intellectually.
- After much controversy, and even bloodshed, it became apparent that they could not agree as to what books should form the New Testament; and councils took the matter in hand, and for nearly twelve centuries they argued and discussed it. And finally, the Gentile Roman Catholic Church in the council of Trent, and the Greek Church in the council of Constantinople, decided once for all what the list should be for their adherents; and the Westminster Assembly gave the English-speaking Protestants their catalogue of current books as well.

There you have it. It is not pretty, but that is because the Holy Spirit was not behind it and had nothing to do with such confusion. The New Testament, as we have it today, is hardly more than three centuries old.

SO WHAT ARE YOU GOING TO DO NOW KNOWING THIS?

Well you can choose to do nothing, or you can do what I did when I ran across such information years ago; I began a serious study of the New Testament and the origins of the religious doctrines within it. Since most of our readership looks to Jesus as the greatest example of Godliness, then why don't we let "this mind be in you that was in Christ Jesus." I recommend that, but sadly, that mind is not always accurately portrayed in the New Testament. Now only do we have a problem of what books, or who wrote them, but the doctrines contained within them are often diametrically opposed to what Jesus and the earliest Jerusalem church believed let alone expected non-Jews to believe as part of "believing Israel."

This paragraph as I write it is one of the most important statements I have ever made. On the surface it seems so simple but I assure you that the dynamics involved in its contemplation are explosive. I ask that you give serious attention and thought to what I will say and share with you in these articles that follow in this web-site as we look at the problems and contradictions of religious doctrines in the New Testament when compared with the Jewish Scriptures read and believed by Jesus. What you read in the next days and weeks as delineated on this web-site, as well as http://paganizingfaithofyeshua.netfirms.com has the ability to change your life and deliver you from the most darkest and vilest idolatry of which most of your are not yet aware. In these articles I will disclose the substantial identity of Gentile Christianity as known and practiced today with the most popular and widespread "Pagan" religion of all time, Sun worship. Such religious doctrines, of which now you are not aware, are scattered throughout the New Testament and put into the mouth of Jesus and the Apostles, even Paul. You may be more familiar with such Sun worship by the term of Mithraism, or the Persian Zoroastrian religion. You might not be aware, and I find that the vast majority of Christians are not, but Mithraism was the closest and all but successful rival of Christianity in the Roman world, and which might indeed have been successful, but that, soon after Constantine prostituted the Empire to the Church,—"with the triumph of Christianity Mithraism came to a sudden end. The laws of Theodosius signed its death warrant." (Catholic Encyclopedia. x, 402.) That there may be no suspicion that the recital of these remarkable identities of Christian "revelation" on the pages of the New Testament line up identically with Pagan religious doctrines in many ways. If you look to Jesus for "Divine Revelation" or even to Christianity as a "Divine Revelation" then once you see this information then it is beyond any question that God had anything to do with giving the Christian much of what he believed today; let alone believes about Jesus.

You should ask yourself, especially in light now after having seen how this document touted as the Word of God, the New Testament, was gathered and put together, one simple question: WHAT IS REVELATION…AND IS CHRISTIANITY BUILT UPON DIVINE, UNIQUE, AND GODLY REVELATION? "

"When Pagan myths already current and long known to everyone for hundreds and thousands of years can be later found to be foundational to many dogmas and doctrines held sacred in Christianity because they are held and believed to be unique revelations from God and as found on page after page of the New Testament, then Divine revelation and inspiration cannot be appealed to for the origin of the Christian Faith and its teaching and such incriminating evidence must bring serious doubt to such doctrines and dogmas within Christianity as stemming from God… sadly these once held "sacred" doctrines must now understood as pagan copies."

You have seen the history of the documents (New Testament) espousing such "Divine Revelation;" now it is time for you to begin such a study into these doctrines of the New Testament as compared with the beliefs of the Jewish Bible Jesus used.....to see the changes, the misquotations on purpose, the purposeful changing of the Jewish Scriptures in order to replace the religion of Jesus intended for all the world with one of Rome's making.

The Catholic Encyclopedia states: "The existence of revelation (as in the New Testament) is as reasonably established as any historical fact"! (C.E. xiii, 607.). I would think that the evidence I just submitted to you says otherwise without a doubt. It is time to wake up! These above statements are the most incredible lies ever uttered in the history of mankind. And I will quickly prove them so. Lets get back to truth, shall we. "Divine Revelation is thus of things not previously known and which the revelationless mind of man is incapable of acquiring or inventing by its own efforts." So exactly with "revelation": if some impostor or deluded person (e.g. Mohammed or Joseph Smith) claims that he has received a personal—and therefore necessarily private —"revelation" from some god, the only way whereby he can get a valid patent of authenticity and credibility for his "revelation," is to prove that its subject-matter has never before been known and in credulous circulation; the moment that from the search of the records—of other, or comparative religions,—it is shown that the same proposition has been previously known and current, in use and practice among some other priestcraft and its devotees—the thing is no revelation at all: the claim is a fraud!!!

PUTTING GENTILE CHRISTIANITY AND ITS DOCTRINES UNDER THE MICROSCOPE OF COMPARATIVE RELIGION

Let us see how this indisputable rule works when applied to Gentile Christianity. In doing so we will either prove beyond any doubt that the Christian Faith is Divine unique revelation to mankind and worthy of trust and faith for the world to come or else is but the reiteration of prior pagan beliefs and is not to be trusted for truth or preparation for the world to come. The answer to such inquiry will either prove Christianity uniquely Divine and God breathed as is attested for it; or expose it as anything but Divine but rather pagan whereby then you would be better served to return to the faith once given the Saints; Biblical Judaism where the Gentile believer, as a Godfearer, has a place both within Biblical Judaism and the Israel of God and not apart from it. Let us see what we can find, shall we?

WHY THE MESSIANIC PROPHECIES WERE NOT FULFILLED BY JESUS

Having demonstrated fully one our other websites that what is represented as "fulfilled New Testament prophecies" is in reality anything but that now I wish to explain why the true Jewish Messianic Prophecies were not fulfilled during the life of Jesus. As one reads the other site and its materials and studies them out for themselves to see the truth of the matter, then one will without questions ask himself why such a deception was purpurtrated upon unsucpecting believers. The answers you seek are found in these series of articles. When one finishes this study he will first of all see that the failure of the fulfillments of these Old Testament prophecies lie not with Jesus but with a first century Israel whom had failed to rise to its Spiritual Calling to be a Holy Nation and a Royal Priesthood. The information in the following articles explains to much to those who might look at Jesus as a failed Messiah. Nothing could be further from the truth. This is something both the Christians and our Jewish brothes and friends need to understand in their reclaiming Jesus as one of their own. Shalom.

ISAIAH 53....THE TRUTH ABOUT THE PROPHECY YOUR CHURCH NEVER TAUGHT YOU

In these next pages and articles I have demonstrated beyond any doubt that the original and only logical interpretation of Isaiah 53 as originally held and handed down by the first readers and hearers of this passage was that the "suffering servant" referred to by Isaiah the prophet is the corporate nation of Israel and was never intended or understood by its first hearers to single out one particular individual apart from the corporate nation. As you read these articles you will see that for yourself. To approach this passage "an agenda" in order to read "Jesus/Yeshua" into the passages whereby you separate him out and apart from the corporate suffering of Israel is not exegesis and does great damage to the intended meaning of the passage as both God gave it and as Isaiah intended his readers to understand it when he gave it to them. Yet it is my firm belief that within the "corporate suffering" of Israel as the "Servant" of YHWH we find Yeshua as possibly the greatest example if not the greatest example of the proto-typical Jewish Servant, who unfortunately like most Jewish people through history, has suffered at the hands of non-Jews in their calling as a "light to the Gentiles". Yeshua is a perfect case in point, for only after his passion did a movement arise to take his message of hope and salvation to the non-Jewish nations of the world. I hope these pages help you better "rightly divide" the Word of Truth where by you come to see the big picture.

In the following articles I will show you how the Isaiah 53 in the Jewish Scriptures reads completely different from the Isaiah 53 in the Christian Bibles. The Massoretic text has been corrupted and the vast majority of the Christian world does not know this. The facts of the matter can be seen at: http://geocities.com/faithofyeshua.The reasons for this is many as you are coming to see as you read this website. My blessings to you as you recover truth long held from you by the purposeful mistranslation of the Jewish Scriptures and the further corruption of them by the non-Jewish church. Shalom.

JESUS IS RECOGNIZED AS THE DIVINE CHILD & PRESENTED WITH GIFTS AT HIS BIRTH...TRUTH...SUN-MYTH RETOLD?

The next in order of the wonderful events which are related to have happened at the birth of Christ, Jesus, is the recognition of the divine child, and the presentation of gifts.

We are informed by the Matthew writer, that being guided by a star, the Magi from the east came to where the young child was. The original word here is "magoi" from which comes our word "Magician." The persons here denoted were philosophers, priests, or astronomers. They dwelth chiefly in Persia and Arabia. They were the learned men of the Eastern nations, devoted to astronomy, to religion, and to medicine. They were held in high esteem by the Persian court; were admitted as counselors, and followed the camps in war to give advice (Barne's Notes, vol. i. p. 25).

Matthew relates in 2:2:

"And when they were come into the house (not stable) they saw the young child with Mary his mother, and fell down and worshipped him. And when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts, gold, frankincense, and myrrh."

The Luke narrator, who seems to know nothing about the Magi from the east, informs us that shepherds came and worshipped the young child. They were keeping their flocks by night when the angel of the Lord appeared before them saying:

"Behold, I bring you good tidings, for unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, which is Christ the Lord."

After the angel had left them, they said one to another:

"Let us go unto Bethlehem and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known to us. And they came with haste, and found Mary and Joseph, and the babe lying in a manger" (Luke 2:8-16).

The Luke narrator evidently borrowed this story of the shepherds from the "Gospel of the Egyptians," or from other sacred records of the biographies of Chrishna or Buddha.

It is related in the legends of Chrishna that the divine child was cradled among shepherds, to whom were first made known the stupendous feats which stamped his character with marks of the divinity. He was recognized as the promised Savior by Nanda, a shepherd, or cowherd, and his companions, who prostrated themselves before the heaven-born child. After the birth of Chrishna, the Indian prophet Nared, having heard of his fame, visited his father and mother as Gokool, examined the stars, etc., and declared him to be of celestian descent (Higgins, Anacalypsis, vol. i. pp. 129-130; Maurice, Hist. Hindostan, vol. ii. pp. 256, 257, 317; Vishnu Purana).

Not only was Chrishna adored by the shepherds and Magi, and received with divine honors, but he was also presented with gifts. These gifts were "sandal wood and perfume" (Oriental Religions, pp. 500-501).

Similar stories are related of the infant Buddha. He was visited, at the time of his birth, by wise men, who at once recognized in the marvellous infant all the characters of the divinity and was hailed god of gods (Higgins, Anacalypsis, vol. i. p. 157).

Viscount Amberly, speaking of him, says:

"He was visited and adored by a very eminent Rishi, or hermit, known as Asita, who predicted his future greatness, but wept at the thought that he himself was too old to see the day when the law of salvation would be taught by the infant whom he had come to contemplate" (Amberly, Analysis, p. 177; Bunson, Angel-Messiah, p. 36).

"I weep (said Asita), because I am old and stricken in years, and shall not see all that is about to come to pass. The Buddha Bhagavat (God Almighty Buddha) comes to the world only after many kalpas. This bright boy will be Buddha. For the salvation of the world he will teach the law. He will succor the old, the sick, the afflicted, thy dying. He will release those who are bound in the meshed of natural corruption. He will quicken the spiritual vision of those whose eyes are darkened by the thick darkness of ignorance. Hundreds of thousands of millions of beings will be carried by him to the "other shore" and will put on immortality. And I shall not see this perfect Buddha, that is why I weep" (Lillie, Buddha and Early Buddhism, p. 76).

Now contrast that with Luke 4:18-19-18:

The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, 19 To preach the acceptable year of the Lord. (KJV)

Answer for yourself: Coincidence?

He returns rejoicing, however to his mountain-home, for his eyes had seen the promised and expected Savior.

Now contrast that with Luke 2:25-27:

And, behold, there was a man in Jerusalem, whose name was Simeon; and the same man was just and devout, waiting for the consolation of Israel: and the Holy Ghost was upon him. 26 And it was revealed unto him by the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death, before he had seen the Lord's Christ. 27 And he came by the Spirit into the temple: and when the parents brought in the child Jesus, to do for him after the custom of the law, (KJV)

Answer for yourself: Coincidence?

EXAMINING THE EVIDENCE

Painting in the cave of Ajunta represent Asita with the infant Buddha in his arms (Bunsen, Angel-Messiah, p. 36). The marvelous gifts of this child had become known to this eminent ascetic by supernatural signs.

Buddha, as well as Chrishna, was presented with "costly jewels and precious substances" (Beal, History of Buddha, p. 58).

Rama, the seventh incarnation of Vishnu for human deliverance from evil, is also hailed by "aged saints" who die gladly when their eyes see the long-expected one (Oriental Religions, p. 41).

How-tseich, who was one of those personages styled, in China "Tien-Tse," or "Sons of Heaven," and who came into the world in a miraculous manner, was laid in a narrow lane. When his mother had fulfilled her time: "Her first-born son (came forth) like a lamb, there was no bursting, no rending, no injury, no hurt, showing how wonderful he would be."

When born, the sheep and oxen protected him with loving care (Prog. Relig. Ideas, vol. i. p. 200; Amberly, Analysis of Religious Belief, p. 226).

The birth of Confucius (551 B.C.), like that of all the demi-gods and saints of antiquity, is fabled to have been attended with allegorical prodigies, amongst which was the appearance of the Ke-lin, a miraculous quadruped, prophetic of happiness and virtue, which announced that the child would be "a king without a throne or territory." Five celestial sages, or wise men, entered the house at the time of the child's birth, whilst vocal and instrumental music filled the air (Thornton, History of China, vol. i. p. 152).

Mithras, the Persian Savior, the mediator between God and man, was also visited by "wise men" called Magi, at the time of his birth (King, Gnostics and their Remains, pp. 134, 149). He was presented with gifts consisting of gold, frankincense, and myrrh (Inman, Ancient Faiths, vol. ii. p. 353).

According to Plato, at the birth of Socrates (469 B.C.) there came Magi from the east to worship him, bringing gifts of gold, frankincense, and myrrh (Higgins, Anacalypsis, vol. ii, p. 96).

AEsculapius, the virgin-born Savior, was protected by goatherds (shepherds present), who, upon seeing the child, knew at once that he was divine. The voice of fame soon published the birth of this miraculous infant, upon which people flocked from all quarters to behold and worship this heaven-born child (Taylor, Diegesis, p. 150).

Many of the Grecian and Roman demi-gods and heroes were either fostered by or worshipped by shepherds. Amongst these may be mentioned Bacchus, who was educated among shepherds (Higgins, Anacalypsis, vol. i. 398), and Romulus, who was found on the banks of the Tiger, and educated by shepherds (Bell, Pantheon, vol. ii. p. 213. Paris, son of Priam was educated among shepherds (Ibid. vol. i. p. 47), and AEgisthus was exposed, like AEsculapisu, by his mother, found by shepherds and educated among them (Ibid., p. 20).

Viscount Amberly has well said that:

"Prognostications of greatness in infancy are, indeed, among the stock incidents in the mythical or semi-mythical lives of eminent persons."

Answer for yourself: If you remember we stated earlier that if Christianity is to be believed to be a "Divine and unique revelation from God" then we should not expect to find the same things which make up it's core of "Divine Truth" existing prior to it. What are we to think now about not only this doctrine, but others as well?

Answer for yourself: Don't you think that if you desired the "truth" about Jesus you need to start looking elsewhere?

I have a suggestion. Try Second Temple Judaism and learn what was believed by this man before it is too late and then mould your life around Jesus the Jew, and not Jesus the Gentile's Sun-god.

JESUS' BIRTH FORETOLD BY A STAR...TRUTH...OR A SUN-MYTH RETOLD?

The evidence is extensive. One has only to look.

"The pathway of sacred history and literature reveals that all the systems of worship which have existed in the past have had a dip in "the halo of the heavenly orbs" so states Kersey Graves (Sixteen Crucified Saviors). This means that the heathen pagan nations and their religions are heavenly influenced by the cosmos and the personifications of it over the history of mankind.

He is so true. Over the years my research has found numerous examples of stars playing significant roles in "marking" and "announcing" the births of several of the false "Crucified Sun-god Saviors" of the nations enmeshed in Sun Worship, besides figuring in some cases by marking important events in their subsequent history. Mr. Higgins, the author of an incredible book entitled Anacalypsis, remarks that:

"Among the ancients there seems to have been a very general idea that the arrival of Gods and great personages who were expected to come, would be announced by a star."

The stars have a clear role at the births of several of the saviours and to mark important events in their subsequent history. The ancients thought the arrival of gods and great people would be announced by a star. A star figured either before or at the birth of Abraham, Caesar, Pythagoras, Yu, Krishna, and Christ. The astrological practice of calculating destinies by the stars had long been popular in the East at the time of Christ's birth.

We have seen his star in the east, and have come to worship him (Mt 2:1).

Note, it was his star not just a star or even the star, suggesting an astrological meaning.

Zoroaster, about 1000 BC, prophetically announced to the wise men of that country that a saviour would be born, attended by a star at noonday. Similarly when Nared had examined the stars, having heard of Chrishna's fame, he declared him to be from God—the Son of God. The Roman Calcidius speaks of it as a wonderful star, presaging the descent of a God amongst men. A star foretold of the birth of the Roman Julius Caesar. The Chinese God Yu was not only heralded by a star, but conceived and brought to mortal birth by a star.

Numbers 24:17 is the famous passage: There shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Seth. This is a text often quoted by Christian writers as having a prophetic reference to the Christian Messiah. The same text goes on to say, It shall destroy the children of Seth, a prophecy which is plainly false, if it is meant like the rest, to apply to Jesus Christ.

The star of Jacob or Judah, both being the same, is shown on astronomical maps as prominent in the constellation Virgo, the Virgin, called by the Hebrews, Ephraim. When this "star" was positioned in the "belly" of the constellation Virgo...the virgin was immaculately made pregnant by the Sky God and she would bring forth the Son of God. It was known in the Syrian, Arabian and Persian Systems of astronomy as Messaeil, suggestive of Messiah, and was considered the ruling genius of the constellation It seems to have been the star, Spica. The star of Jacob was evidently a figure from astrology in which the virgin is shown rising with an infant Messiah (Messaeil) in her arms. Messaeil is, when analyzed, Messaeh-el (Messiah-God), and is found in the constellation Virgo, which commences rising at midnight, on the 25th of December, with this star in the east in her arms—the star which piloted the wise men. According to Albertus Magnus, in his Book on the Universe, the sign of the celestial virgin rises above the horizon, at the moment we find fixed for the birth of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Sir William Drummond adds in OEdipus Judaicus: The anointed of El, the male infant, who rises in the arms of Virgo, was called Jesus by the Hebrews... and was hailed as the anointed king or Messiah.

Early people thought a star was alive, because it appeared to move, and acted as though controlled by a living spirit. In Job 38:9 the morning stars join in a chorus and sing together. An astrological interpretation of the star of Bethlehem makes more sense than the notion of a star leaving the firmament and travelling untold light-years to stand over the young child Jesus, as he lay amongst the oxen and asses in a stable (Mt 2:7). To those who like to see God grossly violating his own laws of nature, they might as well believe, since it would have been much easier, even for God, that the star was a large electric light bulb suspended on a wire from heaven. All nations once believed that the planetary bodies or their inhabitants controlled the affairs of men, and even their births. Such astrology still holds sway over many gullible people today.

We find a counterpart to the story of Matthew's travelling star in Virgil (60 BC) who has a star guiding AEneas westward from Troy. Pliny in his Natural History records that the people of Rome fancied they saw a man they took for a god in a star or comet. The apocryphal book of Seth relates that a star descended from heaven and lighted on a mountain, in the midst of which a divine child was seen bearing a cross. To Jews, pagans and Christian the stars might as well have been flies on a ceiling. They could have had no idea that they were immensely bigger than the earth and even the nearest was untold millions of miles away.

And the cases of Abraham, Caesar, Pythagoras, Yu, Chrishna, and Christ, may be cited in proof of this declaration. We find such phenomena in all of them plus many more. A star figured either before or at the birth of each, according to their respective histories and "legends." The "star" in question is the bright "morning star" which originally heralded the birth of the god Sol, the Sun-god, the beneficent Savior.

What is very interesting is that a knowledgeable glance at a geography of the heavens will show the "chaste, pure, immaculate Virgin, suckling an infant," preceded by a Star, which rises immediately proceeding the Virgin and her child. This can truly be called "his Star," which informed the "Wise Men," the "Magi," who were the Astrologers and Sun-worshippers of their day. Let us not also forget the "shepherds who watched their flocks by night," who by noticing this "announcing star," knew that the Savior of Mankind was about to be born. Such a story makes a Christian think of "Jesus," but the sad fact is that although such stores are recorded in a Christian's "infallible and inerrant New Testament," they can be found told about the pagan's god-men since time immemorial. And it is a historical fact that should be noted here that the practice of calculating nativities by the stars was in vogue in the era and country of Christ's birth, and had been for a long period previously in various countries: "We have seen his star in the east, and have come to worship him." (Matt. 2:1)

Now mark, here, it was not the star, nor a star, but "his star;" thus disclosing its unmistakable astrological features.

In the history of the Hindu Savior Chrishna, we are told that "as soon as Nared, who, having heard of his fame, had examined the stars, he declared him to be from God; i.e., the Son of God.

Mr. Faber (Origin of Idolatry, vol. ii. p. 77) reports Zoroaster (600 B.C.) as prophetically announcing to "the wise men" of that country that a Savior would be born, "attended by a star at noonday."

The Roman Calcidius speaks of it a wonderful star, presaging the descent of a God amongst men." (Maurice, Indian Skeptics Refuted, p. 62.)

SO WHY IS THIS IMPORTANT?

The prevalence of such "star" stories announcing the births of pagan Savior-gods laid the foundation for the wise men of Jesus' birth. Such a "star "apprised the wise men of Christ's descent from above. But such "an announcing star" was previously said to have foretold the birth of the Roman Julius Caesar. The Chinese God Yu was not only heralded by a star, but conceived and brought to mortal birth by a star.

It is stated in Numbers 24:17, that there is a star..."The star out of Jacob" which is to come out of Jacob." This is a text often quoted by Christian writers as having a prophetic reference to the Christian Messiah.

Answer for yourself: Have you read the passage for yourself, of have you let your Pastor use scissors on it before he quoted it to you?

You need to look at the context to determine if it applied to Jesus or not. But the same text declares further, "It shall destroy the children of Seth," a prediction which no rational interpretation can make apply to Jesus Christ.

Upon study one finds that such nonsense originates with astrology. What should be of importance to you is that such "copying of lies and fables" is written in a document touted by millions to be "God-breathed." Hardly!

We find this "star of Jacob" or" Judah" (the same) represented on astronomical maps as a prominent star in the constellation Virgo (the Virgin), fancifully termed by the Hebrew "Ephraim" no less . Remember that the prophecy given to Ephraim means he was to become "a multitude of Gentiles" (captivity and assimilation of Norther Tribes) and it is from these mass of non-Jews who lost their Biblical heritage that they also incorporated Sun-Myths due to the pagan influence upon them.

Gen 48:19 19 And his father refused, and said, I know it, my son, I know it: he also shall become a people, and he also shall be great: but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude of nations. (KJV)

The Hebrew word for "nations":

1471 gowy rarely (shortened) goy- as a noun, masculine: nation, people a) nation, people 1) usually of non-Hebrew people 2) used of descendants of Abraham (remember Abraham was a non-Jew) 3) Goyim? = "nations"

Answer for yourself: Has that happened to you as well?

Answer for yourself: Do you think that there is any remote chance since reading of the "Virgin" and the sign of "Virgo" that a "star" in the constellation Virgo would be in the slightest way connected to the birth story of "Virgo" or the "Virgin?"

Answer for yourself: Is this a coincidence that the star in the constellation Virgo would be connected with birth of the Virgin?

Even a blind man could see this; excuse the pun. It was known in the Syrian, Arabian and Persian Systems of astronomy as Messaeil (suggestive of Messiah), and was considered the ruling genius of the constellation.

The "star of Jacob," then, was simply a figure borrowed from the ancient pagan systems of astronomy, in which they fancifully represent a virgin rising with an infant Messiah (Messaeil) in her arms. Messaeil is, when analyzed, is nothing more than the bright "morning star" which originally heralded the birth of the god Sol, the Sun-god, Messaeh-el (Messiah-God), and is found in the constellation Virgo, which commences rising at midnight, on the 25th of December, with this "star in the east" in her arms -- the star which piloted "the wise men."

As you can see it was standard and established practice among all ancient people to use the changing positions of the stars as a means of predicting (prophesying) the change of the seasons. The positions of the starts in the night sky changed by approximately one degree every twenty-four hours. This is caused by the difference in the stellar year (366 1/4) days) and the solar year (365 1/4 days). The ancients measured the shift of the seasons by tracking the stars and the time they (stars and constellations) crossed the meridian at night. The position of the circumpolar stars (in the night sky, at a particular time) was also a standard method of tracking the seasons.

Therefore the Biblical statement that the birth of the Sun (Son) was predicted by the appearance of a star, was actually quite commonplace. It was the standard method of the Era.

The constellation of Orion has for millennia been recognized as a group of stars which herald the coming of winter, on Dec. 22, and the birth of the Sun (Son) God, three days later. It is the most glorious constellation in the sky! The legend of the three wise men has, for ages, been connected with the three stars in the Belt of Orion, Mintaka (the belt), Alnilam (string of pearls), and Alnitak (the girdle). These three stars (three wise men) sit proximate to the celestial equator and are easily recognizable, by all.

IF YOU ARE A CHRISTIAN....THIS SHOULD REALLY BOTHER YOU!

The whole thing, then, is evidently an astronomical legend. What gets me is that the New Testament is purported to be a Divine Revelation; a unique Revelation from God. Evidently it is not! Any thinking believer can see that there is severe problems with such a belief.

What is even worse is when one contemplates what other "errors" are presented as "truth" in the New Testament which goes without one's detection.

When we die I guess we all find out, right? I prefer to know now! Do you?

Albert the Great, in his Book on the Universe, tells us, "The sign of the celestial virgin rises above the horizon, at the moment we find fixed for the birth of our Lord Jesus Christ." Sir William Drummond, (CEdipus Judaicus, p. 27), states:

"The anointed of El, the male infant, who rises in the arms of Virgo, was called Jesus/Yeshua by the Hebrews, ... and was hailed as the anointed king or Messiah"

This is further proof of the astrological origin of the story.

Dr. Hales, (Chronology) calls Christ "the star of our salvation, the true Apollo, the sun of righteousness" -- all of which are astronomical terms.

This is not as strange as it may look when we factor in the fact that the early inhabitants of the earth regarded a star as a thing of life, because it appeared to move, and therefore was believed by them to to move and act though the animation of a living spirit. And this idea we observe lurking amongst the borrowed orientalisms of the Jewish Old Testament.

The representation of the morning stars joining in a chorus and singing together (Job 38:9), is an instance of this kind. And then we find a much stronger and more conclusive case in the New Testament, where Matthew represents a star as breaking loose from its orbit, and traveling some millions of miles, in order to stand over the young child Jesus, as he lay amongst the oxen and asses in a stable (Matt. 2:7). It is as if the "star had a mind of its own and was alive;" thus explaining its defiance of the laws of science.

"All nations," says Mr. Higgins, (Anacalypsis), "once believed that the planetary bodies or their inhabitants controlled the affairs of men, and even their births." Hence the states, "My stars," "He is ill-starred," etc., in use then, and still in use at the present day. The good or ill luck of a person was attributed to the good or evil stars which it was believed ruled at the hour of his birth. Astrology today is a big business. Nothing new under the sun. (forgive the pun).

We find a counterpart to the story of Matthew's traveling star in Virgil's writings, who declares (60 B.C.) that a star guided AEneas in a journey westward from Troy. In the days of Pliny (Pliny, Natural History, Book II.), the people of Rome fancied they saw a God in a star or comet in the form of a man. The Apocryphal Book of Seth relates that a star descended from heaven and lighted on a mountain, in the midst of which a divine child was seen bearing a cross. Now when you understand that "crosses" are a big part of Sun-Worship then such a comment is not surprising.

LET US NOT MAKE JESUS "STUPID"...BUT THE WRITER OF MATTHEW DOES

The writers of the Gospel of Matthew paints Christ in a bad light when they portray him with profound ignorance of astronomy, when he speaks of "the stars falling from heaven to the earth." (Matt. 24:29) For if there could be any falling in the case, the falling would be in the other direction and the earth would fall to the stars, as larger bodies always attract smaller ones.

As shown above, the stupendous orbs of night were represented by Jew, Pagan and Christian as breaking away from their orbits, and running hither and thither. Today we benefited by the vast progress of science which teaches that the stars are stupendous orbs, some of them a thousand times larger than the planet on which we live, and that they could not depart one rod from their accustomed orbits without breaking up the whole planetary system, and destroying the universe. God gave us illusions to himself in the stars and planets, but not prophecy. Early man knew the planets were all circular, they all moved in circular orbits, and even today we understand that our universe is moving in a circular orbit as well. Geometry teaches us that there is no more "perfect creation" than a "perfect circle." Thus, in this God reveals to us Himself; perfection. The "cosmic designer" give order to the universe and it, properly understood it pictures the "perfect God." This was understood by early man as we find in the Assyrian Triad which has as its center the "perfect circle," representing to them God is the center of all things.

Now read the Gospel of Matthew again with understanding. Observe the absurdity in Matthew's story, which teaches that the wise men followed the star in the east, when they, coming from the east, were, as a matter of course, traveling westward, which would place the star to their backs. That must be a pilot or guide which follows after, instead of going before. Omitting further citations from history, we will only observe further that the ancient Hindus, Egyptians, Chaldeans, Syrians, Mexicans, etc., took great account of stars, and employed them on all important occasions, especially on long journeys and at the births of Gods and great personages -- a circumstance which aids in explaining the star chapter in the gospel history of Christ.

IN CLOSING

Another absurdity in Matthew's story, is that the wise men followed the star in the east, when they were coming from the east. Unless they circumnavigated the world or walked backwards so that they pretended they were travelling East because that was the way they faced, they must have been travelling westward, which would place the star to their backs.

But as we close this article, although a lot of data is presented, understand that the New Testament, touted to be a "Divine and unique revelation" is anything but that. Star stores are not important, but if other things can be found within it just as suspect as this "star story" then we at Bet Emet hope your love for God will drive you to know the truth about a Jewish Jesus and his real message before you die and meet God face to face. Shalom.

THE HEAVENLY HOST SANG PRAISES AT JESUS' BIRTH...TRUTH...OR A SUN-MYTH RETOLD?

Luke 2:13-15 13 And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying, 14 Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men. 15 And it came to pass, as the angels were gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us. (KJV)

Let us not also forget the "shepherds who watched their flocks by night," who by noticing this "announcing star." The writer of the Gospel of Luke would have us believe that these shepherds likewise were awakened to the asupicious time of the birth of the Sun-King. This star had alerted them of his birth and they knew that the Savior of Mankind was about to be born. These shephreds were attendants to a "free Heavenly concert." It makes a beautiful picture.

Such a story makes a Christian think of "Jesus" and his birth. But the sad fact is that although such story of a "heavenly choir announcing the births of Jesus isrecorded in a Christian's "infallible and inerrant New Testament," similar storiescan be found told about the births of pagan god-men since time immemorial.

In the Sanskrit Dictionary, compiled more than two thousand years ago, we find a full account of the incarnate deith Vishun, who appreard in human form as Chrishna. Vishnu, being moved to relieve the earth of her load of misery and sin, came down from heaven, and was born of the virgin Devaki, on the 25th of December. Chrishna's birth was announced in the heavens by his star, and a chorus of Devatas celebrated, with sone, the praise of Devaki (Morris, Aryan Sun-Myths And The Origin Of Religion, p. 37). Morris relates:

"The spirits and numphs of heaven danced and sang; and at midnight, when the Suppor of All was born, the clouds emitted low, pleasing sounds, and poured down rain of flowers" (Morris, Aryan Sun-Myths And The Origin Of Religion, p. 37).

The immortals of the Tusita-heaven decide that Buddha shall be born when the Flower-star makes its first appearance in the east. At his birth a host of angelic messengers descend and announce tidings of great joy: "A hero, glorious and imcomparable, has been born, a savior unto all nations of the earth" (Morris, Aryan Sun-Myths And The Origin Of Religion, pp. 50-51).

The Aryan Sun-Myths, as has been mentioned, went with the Aryans when they peopled Persia, and became the religion of the ancient Pasees. Mithras was the name which the Persians gave to the Sun. After ages had passed, it was utterly forgotten that Mithra was the Sun, and it was believed that he was the Only Begotten Son of God, who had come down from Heaven to be a mediator between God and man, to save man from theri sins. The 25th of December was said to be the day on which this God-man was born, and it was celebrated with great rejoicings. The legend was that the wondrous infant was visited soon after his miraculous birth, by wise men called magi, who brought gifts of gold, frankincense, and myrrh. It was cutomary for the magi to ascend a high mountain, at early dawn on the 25th of December, and there, with their faces turned to the east, to wait anxiously for the first rays of the Sun, which they hailed with incense and prayer. The shepherds, also were in the habit of prostrating themselves and praying to their god, the Sun.

All nature smiles at the birth of the Heavenly Being. "To him all angels cry aloud, the heavens, and all the powers therein." "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men." "The quarters of the horizon are irradiate with joy, as if moonlight was diffused over the whole earth." "The spirits of the nymphs of heaven dance and sing." For the Lord Savior is born, "to give joy and peace to men and Devas, to shed light in the dark places, and to give sight to the blind."

Truly, there is nothing new under the sun.

THE ESSENES AND THEIR INFLUENCE ON THE NEW TESTAMENT

It never ceases to amaze me in my studies the overall failure of Christian commentators to be acquainted with the evolution of the Essenes and their religious doctrines, dogmas, philosophies from generation to generation. It seems as if the vast majority of writers on the Essenes read Josephus, Philo, or Pliny and believe these accounts are a realistic view of this theologically complex group of apocalyptists. An unbiased study of the Essenes will show that this group grew by gradual stages, from a Judaizing program at the beginning into an esoteric cult of celibate-communist apocalytpists at the end which had repudiated Judaism to a wide extent. Serious investigation into these Essenes will reveal how they were able to create in secrecy the elements, which, according to accepted Christian history, were proclaimed for the first time to an astonished public by John the Baptist and Jesus of Nazareth. Their secret doctrines were now for the first time being publicly proclaimed to the masses. The story of the Essenes is in reality the story of the origin of Christianity.

Many writers, including Martin Larson, Dupont-Sommer, Edmund Wilson, John M. Allegro, Robert Eisenmann, L. Schiffman, M. Burrows, G. Vermes, and many others, have given vivid intimations of this. The knowledge gleaned from these men and their research into Essene history as well as their religious doctrines, gives unsuspected light upon the origin of Christianity and the career of its founder, as well as that of a predecessor, the Teacher of Righteousness.

THE HISTORY OF THE EVOLUTION OF THE ESSENES

The Qumran sect's origins are postulated by some scholars to be in the communities of the Hasidim, the pious anti-Hellenistic circles formed in the early days of the Maccabees. The Hasidim may have been the precursors of the Essenes, who were concerned about growing Hellenization and strove to abide by the Torah. Archeological and historical evidence indicates that Qumran was founded in the second half of the second century B.C.E., during the time of the Maccabean dynasty. A hiatus in the occupation of the site is linked to evidence of a huge earthquake. Qumran was abandoned about the time of the Roman incursion of 68 C.E., two years before the collapse of Jewish self-government in Judea and the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem in 70 C.E. The chief sources of information for the history of this fateful time span are the Qumran scrolls and the excavations, but earlier information on the Essenes was provided by their contemporaries: Josephus Flavius, Philo of Alexandria, and Pliny the Elder. Their summary accounts are continuously being borne out by the site excavations and study of the writings. The historian Josephus relates the division of the Jews of the Second Temple period into three orders: the Sadducees, the Pharisees, and the Essenes. The Sadducees included mainly the priestly and aristocratic families; the Pharisees constituted the lay circles; and the Essenes were a separatist group, part of which formed an ascetic monastic community that retreated to the wilderness. The exact political and religious affinities of each of these groups, as well as their development and interrelationships, are left relatively obscure by these three accounts and more investigation is needed to come to the truth about this group in light of the widely disparate scholarly views that exist today.

The crisis that brought about the secession of the Essenes from mainstream Judaism is thought to have occurred when the Maccabean ruling princes Jonathan (160-142 B.C.E.) and Simeon (142-134 B.C.E.) usurped the office of high priest (which included secular duties), much to the consternation of conservative Jews; some of them could not tolerate the situation and denounced the new rulers. The persecution of the Essenes and their leader, the teacher of righteousness probably elicited the sect's apocalyptic visions. These included the overthrow of "the wicked priest" of Jerusalem and of the evil people and, in the dawn of the Messianic Age, the recognition of their community as the true Israel. The retreat of these Jews into the desert would enable them "to separate themselves from the congregation of perverse men (IQ Serekh 5:2).

The Essenes persisted in a separatist existence through two centuries, occupying themselves with study and a communal way of life that included worship, prayer, and work. It is clear, however, that large groups of adherents also lived in towns and villages outside the Qumran area.

By 143 B.C.E., the Zadokites had become known definitely as the Sadducees; and the Chasidim, splitting into two parties, had become known as the Pharisees and the Essenes. The Essenes could be looked upon as "ultra-strict" Pharisees. The Sadducees became identified with the rich and successful; the Pharisees became the popular leaders; and the Essenes gradually evolved into an esoteric communion of celibate communists.

As stated above, it is a shame that so few have endeavored to trace the evolution of these Essenes (Holy Ones) from their pristine, pre-Chasidic beginnings as a Zadokite reaction against Hellenization among the Jews, into the frozen, rigid, esoteric, and celibate-communist mystery-cult which they had become in the days of Philo and Josephus. Until this is done then it is very difficult to look at the writings left from this group of individuals and discern that many of their "religious doctrines" originated outside of normative Judaism and find their points of origin in the Pythagorean, Buddhist, and Iranian religious culture.

There is evidence which indicated that, about 70 B.C.E. or soon thereafter, an Essene prophet known as the Teacher of Righteousness had been put to death by the Jewish authorities because of doctrinal, ritualistic, and organizational heterodoxy; that, in due course, his followers declared that he was God himself, appearing as a man in Jerusalem, and that his death was an atoning sacrifice for the elect; that he arose from the grace and returned to heaven; and that he would send a representative in a few years who would be precisely the kind of Messiah that was proclaimed for Jesus by his followers. There is a strong indication that if Jesus was not at one time affiliated with the Essenes, that he was strongly influenced by them and their doctrines; yet at times we find Jesus' individuality and diversion from some of the Essene tenants. Many feel that Jesus was persuaded that he was himself the Messiah expected by the Essene Community, that he left it and preached the Gospel to the public; and that finally, in a revised concept of his own mission, re-enacted the role and the passion of the slain Teacher, and proclaimed that in his eschatological role he would appear as the last judge and the all-powerful Son of Man.

The book of Acts attests that the core of the pristine Christian communion consisted of individual Essenes who defected to it soon after Jesus' crucifixion; that soon after the destruction of Jerusalem these Essene Priests came over in large numbers and constituted the Christian-Essene communion known as the Ebionites; and, finally, that many of the multifarious primitive Gnostic communions, which flourished during the early centuries of this era, bear the indelible imprint of Essene origin and influence.

Those who speak of "our Judeo-Christian tradition or culture" are laboring under a serious misconception. Ours is not the social, political, or economic system reflected in the Mosaic Law or the Yahweh prophets, which existed in Palestine following David and Solomon; and western life is separated by an even more impassable gulf from the ethics, political economy, and religious discipline set forth in the Essene and Synoptic Scriptures. Our culture is based substantially upon Graeco-Roman antecedents. The Essenes absorbed their basic ideology originally from Zoroastrianism and later from Greek-mystery sources, particularly Pythagoreanism. The Essenes group, originally a return to Torah movement, would evolve into a group that would reject Judaism in toto; and except for certain Buddhist accretions, Jesus and the pristine church reproduced the Essene pattern faithfully. Since, however, this form of Christianity was wholly unacceptable in the pagan world, it was Hellenized in the Pauline literature and the Fourth Gospel, both of which reflect Stoic influence; these eventually became the essential foundation for that reconstruction or restitution of Christianity known as the Protestant Reformation. Ancient Hellenized Christianity itself did not long survive; for the soon-to-be victorious Catholic Church, in order to establish itself as a theocracy, absorbed their most salient elements from the great pagan cults which were its competitors.

It should be obvious to almost any reader or disinterested observer that very few indeed believe and fewer still practice the Gospel as proclaimed in the New Testament, especially the Synoptics. A dwindling minority profess to embrace one or two of its elements, while ignoring the remainder. It is safe to say that not one American in a thousand would accept the Gospel if he were required to live according to its commandments.

Answer for yourself: Why, then, does it continue as the dominant religion of the western world?

Neither inertia or surrender to the past nor yet the power of vested and venerable institutions can explain the power of the Christian religion. For the dominance of Christianity in the western world finds its momentum from the fact that Paul and the writer of the Fourth Gospel Hellenized the pristine Essene evangel, then it was paganized by Catholicism, and then the Protestant Reformation revolutionized, not only the religious, but also the political and economic structure of northern Europe. The broad appeal of Christianity stems from the fact that it is a synthesis of the most important doctrines which had already been developed in the great pre-Christian cultures over a period of centuries. Had this not been so, it would simply have been a restrictive creed and would, like many others, soon have vanished from the stage of history.

The central elements in the Synoptic Gospels are:

- The divine, atoning, and sacrificial savior, who gives his own life to redeem that of his communicants and who, by rising from the grave, is empowered to confer divinity and immortality upon them also
- An ethical system which makes every one economically and politically equal in a social order where want and injustice are forever abolished, and in which the family, based on sex and procreation, is replaced by the larger family of the celibate saints
- An eschatological doctrine, according to which the redeemed will enjoy everlasting happiness in communion with each other in a kingdom of righteousness, from which all others will be banished into everlasting torture
- The promise of an imminent Parousia when the savior will reappear in power to conduct the Last Judgment and institute the everlasting celibate-communal kingdom of heaven on earth, which will then belong to the saints in perpetuity.
- The redeemed were to be healed of all their physical and other maladies for time and eternity

What escapes the understanding of 99.9 % of all Christians is that the immediate source of these concepts for Christianity was the Essene society. Behind the Essenes lie the ultimate origins of these above religious concepts must can be traced down through history from Egypt to the Essenes of Judaism as we see the involvement of the mystery-cults infused into Essene Judeo-Christianity along with the major religions of the pre-Christian world pagan world...such as:

- 1. Egypt and the Original Saviour God...Osiris
- 2. Adonis and Aphrodite
- 3. The Greek Dionysus
- 4. Attis and Cybele
- 5. Demeter and Persephone
- 6. The Orphean Reconstruction of Dionysus
- 7. The Zoroastrians

- 8. Brahmanism-India
- 9. Buddhism
- 10. Pythagoras
- 11. Isis and Serapis
- 12. Mithraism

The Essenes of Jesus' day had evolved into a syncretistic religious group that contained all of the above religious beliefs mixed in with normative Judaism...and out came Christianity after the death of Jesus as some or all of the beliefs from the above varieties of pagan religions was applied to him by the Essenes.

THE TRADITIONAL AND POPULAR MISCONCEPTION CONCERNING THE ESSENES

Most believe, judging by the recent publicity concerning the Dead Sea Scrolls since their discovery, that the casual inquirer might conclude that the existence of the pre-Christian Essene cult was revealed for the first time after a Bedouin boy, following his goat, discovered a cave near the Dead Sea in 1947. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The truth is that many scholars and historians had dealt with this religious organization at length in articles, essays, and even in elaborate scholarly works long before the discovery of the caves. Every competent student of western religion knows well of the celebrated passages in Pliny, Philo, and Josephus describing the Essenes and most take for granted this is all that is needed to be known to describe this religious sect and their beliefs. Again nothing could be further from the truth and far too many Christian writers and "supposed" authors of the Dead Sea Scrolls have failed to look beyond these three "summary statements" in writing upon the pre-Christian Essenes.

Enough material to fill a small library has now been produced concerning the Essenes; and yet, in spite of all the advantages available to modern scholarship, one of the most accurate analyses of them yet today was published in 1889 and was authored by Frederick William Evans. He maintained that Jesus was heavily influenced by Essene theology and was most likely a member of the order at one time (Larson, The Essene Heritage, p. 21). John Allegro also stated: "The Essenes were, many of them, converted on the day of Pentecost, and formed the body of the Jerusalem Church, with its spiritual origin" (John Allegro, The Dead Sea Scrolls, p. 161). Allegro goes on to say: "the members of the first Christian Church 'were Essenes. They loved one another so that they sold their possessions and had all things in common. They forsook the generative life, with its wives and husbands, for Christ's sake and the Gospel's…" Jesus then, taught celibacy and communism; and the first Jerusalem Church consisted largely of Essenes who came over to Christianity.

As stated in another article, the Essenes of Jesus' day were a far cry from the Essenes who began a separatist movement from the Temple and corruption of the Priesthood in roughly 150 B.C.E. Warren Felt Evans, who died in 1889, makes mention of the "method of healing practiced by Jesus, and perhaps also of the mystic Pythagorean sect of the Jews called the Essenes…to which sect Jesus himself unquestionably belonged" (Ibid.). Evans states that the writer of the Gospel of Luke was an Essene (Esoteric Christianity, Boston, 1886, p. 100), and he adds: "Jesus came to do for the world at large, by revealing the sublime wisdom of the ancient mystical sects and brotherhoods, what had been done only for the chosen few in the sacred privacy of the inner recesses of the temple" (Ibid., p. 79). "Jesus, then, according to this was an Essene; the Essenes were Pythagoreans; and the unique mission of Jesus was to reveal the esoteric doctrines of the Essene-Pythagoreans to the world at large" (Larson, The Essene Heritage, p. 21-22).

The surprising this is not that the Essenes have been well known, but that very little has been understood concerning their esoteric nature and doctrines. Even more amazing is the fact that although several of their most important documents have long been extant and widely circulated, not even the most acute scholars ever suspected the true origin of these before 1947; and that to this day a great deal of confusion persists concerning them.

THE NATURE OF THE ESSENE FAITH

Among a people totally dedicated to religion, the Essenes, from their proto-beginnings to the end of their career, were the most fervent, pietistic, and dedicated. Furthermore, after the consolidation of Yahwism, the Essenes alone were able to absorb the essence of other religions and so create a new and powerful synthesis of their own. It is for these reasons that several Jewish scholars have found it difficult to accept the Essene documents. J. L. Teicher, agreeing with various other writers, maintains that the Essenes were none other than a cult of Christians (Larson, The Essene Heritage, p. 25). Upton C. Ewing believes that all the Christological and Messianic references in Essene literature point only to the founder of Christianity, that they are, therefore, genuinely prophetic, and that there was only a single cult of this kind in Palestine, which might be called Essene-Christian (The Prophet of the Dead Sea Scrolls, p. 132-133).

But before we call this religious sectarian group "proto-Christian" we need to look at the religious beliefs they held; both in the beginning of their conception as well as their demise.

Like many other cults, the Essenes began by accepting the dominant religion of Judaism and its Scriptures; before very long they were creating new and divergent revelations, which to them in time became superior to the orthodox or to the writings of Moses. Every successful prophet builds upon, but remakes, the doctrines and practices accepted by his prospective converts. Thus, almost every new faith possesses in reality two related but also disparate scriptures: first, the established and conventional; and, second, the new revelations, the distinctive possession of the avant-garde. Thereupon, the cult takes the next step; it claims also a unique power to interpret the old canon. Thus, the new communion become independent. Almost from the beginning the Essenes began the creation of new scriptures; and they believed with realizing certainty that their leader, known in successive generations as the Teacher of Righteousness, the Master of Justice, the Man Who Reneweth the Law, etc., alone could reveal the esoteric and prophetic meanings of the orthodox Jewish canon (Larson, The Essene Heritage, p. 26-27).

THE ESSENE METHODOLOGY IN CREATING NEW SCRIPTURE

Answer for yourself: What is the pseudepigraphic technique as used by the Essenes?

The Essenes were certain that their scriptures, especially the Book of Enoch, possessed unquestionable priority and supremacy. The unparalleled authority of such works lay in their exact prophecies, accurate to the date of composition, which the amazed communicant could easily understand. These already-accomplished predictions were then followed by others for which similar and imminent fulfillment was confidently expected. This is known as the pseudepigraphic method; and behind it lies a long and interesting story.

When the Jewish priests consolidated their power after the return from Babylon, they outlawed all prophecy (Zech. 13:3-6), since that could disturb the public tranquillity and discredit the incumbent priesthood. The purpose of this proscription was to freeze the existing canon. The ingenuity of man, however, is not so easily thwarted; and effective techniques were developed by which new revelations could be promulgated. The ban against prophecy gave rise to the literary form known as the pseudepigraphic apocalypse, which was to play so large a role for several centuries in Jewish life.

The method is daring: a fervent prophet with an irrepressible message composes a "revelation" which he attributes to some ancient personage, provides a suitable historical setting, delineates history up to his own day under an easily understood symbolism, and the, relying on the credit established for the immediate future, especially an eschatological cataclysm. The Chasids, the Essenes, and the Pharisees became masters of this pseudepigraphic method and, by its use, composed an entire corpus of extraordinary literature, edited by R.H. Charles and published in 1913 as the Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE ESSENE CULT

THE ZADOKITE PERIOD 195-175 B.C.E.

For want of a better description, we can refer to the earliest anti-Hellenizing reaction among the Jews as the Zadokite movement: it began and ended during this period.

THE CHASIDIC PERIOD 175-145 B.C.E.

This period is best described as the "proto-Essenism" period. These thirty years were crucial for the formation of the ultimate Essene theology. The Chasids (Chasidim, Hasidaeans) came into existence about 175 B.C.E. and had split away from the more conservative Zadokites. These Chasids formed a fervent and militant organization dedicated to the establishment of a purified Judaism. The immediate objective was the total defeat of the Syrian Hellenizers and the Jewish apostates who cooperated with and supported them. For some reason, an extraordinary event seems to have occurred during the first decade of this period, without which there would probably never have been any Essene communion; the Chasidim split into two divisions., of which one remained in Judea while the other exiled itself, or was driven, into the Syrian desert, not far from Damascus, shortly before or about the year 170 B.C.E.

However, the evidence indicates also that these exiles returned soon after Mattathias and his sons wet up their standard at Modin in 167 B.C.E. During the struggle against the Syrians, the two fractions submerged their differences and became militant co-patriots. Precisely what Chasidic developments occurred from 160-145 B.C.E., remain obscure. However, we believe that the two divisions not only remained distinct but that the gulf between them probably deepened.

The thirty years following 175 B.C.E. were prolific in literary production. The oldest extant writing is the Damascus Document, composed before 170 B.C.E.. This was followed by the first portion of Enoch, to which is assigned the date 170-168 B.C.E. The third scripture consists of Chapters 7-12 of the canonical Daniel; this was not produced by the Essene movement proper, but by the more conservative Chasids, who never left Judea; the date is probably 164 B.C.E. The fourth scripture is the second portion of Enoch, composed about 162-161 B.C.E. The fifth work, The War of the Sons of Light, written about 163, is quite different. Following this, there seems to be a literary interruption, for no extant documents reflects a date following 160 and preceding 142 B.C.E.

ESSENISM AS A PUBLIC CULT 145-105 B.C.E.

About 145 B.C.E., as we learn from Josephus, the three great Jewish sects or political parties emerged as well-known and definite entities (Antiq., XIII, v9). The old right-wing Zadokites became the Sadducees; the more conservative wing of the Chasids emerged as the Pharisees; and the radical Chasids, the People of the Covenant, became the Essenes. Allegro states that from "the Pious Ones," or Hasidim…we can almost certainly trace the origins of the Essenes, and the Pharisees (Dead Sea Scrolls, p. 97). The Sadducees were rich, educated, successful, powerful Jews; and they absorbed the Epicurean philosophy. The Pharisees became the popular leaders of the people; in due course, they elaborated the Mosaic Law into an extraordinarily elaborate code; and they were probably influenced by the Stoic school of thought. The Essenes became more and more dedicated to the holy life of religious separation, which drew them finally into the Pythagorean way of life. The Essenes of 140 B.C.E. were quite different from the esoterics of 75 B.C.E., and even more from the rigid celibatecommunists described by Philo, Pliny, and Josephus. One can, upon personal investigation, observe the gradual trajectory of their development way from traditional Judaism and toward a synthesis of Pythagorean-Buddhist-Iranian apocalyptic beliefs.

During and following the years beginning at 145 B.C.E., the People of the Covenant continued for some time as a public organization which required no novitiate or secret indoctrination and which lived a fairly conventional existence. They developed a corpus of literature which gradually supplemented or supplanted the canonical; they had undoubtedly already revised the calendar. The revised calendar was probably one of the first Essene deviations from orthodox Judaism because the Damascus Document refers to The Book of the Divisions of the Times According To Their Jubilees and Their Weeks, which probably contained a system connected with their novel calendar (Larson, The Essene Heritage, p. 30). This calendar placed their feasts and holy days on date diverging from those celebrated by the orthodox; and, although we cannot be sure just when they ceased to offer burnt sacrifices, this deviation may have begun about 125-120 B.C.E., and it is certain that such ritual were proscribed when they became Pythagoreans (Ibid.). This conclusion is supported by the fact that Jubilees (140 B.C.E.) reflects the common practice of burnt sacrifices in many passages; but the Testaments (130-125 B.C.E.) has only a single reference to such a ritual (Levi 9). There is no reference at all to such sacrifices in the subsequent documents; and they are condemned in The Manual of Discipline (104 B.C.E.).

Although there was no new apocalypse, several scriptures of high order were produced during this period, probably including many of the Thanksgiving Psalms. To the great doctrinal composition known as the Book of Jubilees as well as the third portion of Enoch, we assign the approximate date of 140. The fourth major production is the substratum which constitutes the bulk of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, probably written about 130-125 B.C.E.

THE CELIBATE-COMMUNIST CULT EMERGES 105-60 B.C.E.

The continual evolution of the religious theology of the Essene cult, which began in 195 B.C.E., take a turn again before or about the year 105 B.C.E. This conclusion is reinforced by the fact that it was never necessary for the cult to discard or even to revise its own previous literature; and still more by the fact that modern scholarship has often failed to distinguish between pre- and post-Pythagorean documents among the Essene collection. We cannot know all the factors which brought about the transformation of a separatist movement within Judaism that ultimately culminated in a Pythagorean-Buddhist cult that elevated their own writings above the Tanakh, but we know that late in his career, John Hycranus ("the Wicked Priest") went over from the Pharisees to the Sadducees and began to persecute the Pharisees (Antiq., XIII, x, 5-6). Along with this he persecuted the dissident Essenes who were "super scrupulous Pharisees" in many regards and they suffered in double measure. We know that the Essenes gave allegiance to John Hycranus while he was opposed by Antiochus VII and when he assumed the triple crown (Prophet, Priest, King); but they must have turned against him during the cruel aggressions he perpetrated upon his neighbors after 125 B.C.E. And they would certainly never have condoned the savage sadism of Aristobulus I during his one year reign of terror.

Around 104 B.C.E. the Essenes established their headquarters at the Dead Sea; and we consider it certain that about this time they gravitated even more toward Pythagorean religious beliefs in rejection of the Temple cult and all that Judaism personified. Basically you, at this time, could consider them a Pythagorean mystery cult.

Some of the most influential and important scriptures date from this period! The Manual of Discipline summaries the laws and organization of this Pythagorean Essenic cult. It contains a large amount of information that was apparently unknown to Philo Judeaus and even to Josephus. In this period also belongs possibly some of the most important literature of the Essene collection; ENOCH FOUR and FIVE, which reflect a totally altered social philosophy. The Habakkuk Commentary is very important, because of the story which details the Wicked Priest in Jerusalem (John Hycranus who usurped the position deserved by the Zadok priesthood) who, because of "the wrong done the teacher of righteousness and the men of the party, God delivered into the hands of his enemies." The final Essene composition, and perhaps the most important of all, consists of additions to the Testaments which re-create in vivid term the ministry, sacrificial death, resurrection, and ascent to heaven of the last Teacher of Righteousness.

THE LAST OF THE ESSENES 60 B.C.E. TO 70 A.D.

What is said next is very important that you understand. When the Essenes became known to Philo and Josephus, they had long been in their state of rigid maturity. Never has there existed a more secretive or thoroughly disciplined organization. They expected their Messiah (Angel-Messiah) within two or three decades following 60 B.C.E.; and if so, they must have found means of rationalizing the delay in his coming after 30 B.C.E. Also, what had probably been intended as an interim or preparatory morality and organization became for them not only a permanent but also a highly desirable way of life. By selling all that they had and giving it to themselves collectively, by turning over to the Order all that they earned during many years of industry, and by living always in the strictest frugality, the members had made their community wealthy. The hope of a supernatural kingdom was, therefore, no longer the sole attraction: for the Society could practically guarantee life-long security from the ills and buffetings of a cruel and uncertain life.

While the Pharisees, who were already the rabbis of the Diaspora, assumed spiritual leadership over the scattered nation, the Essenes, like their opposites, the Sadducees, vanished as an independent cult; and there is evidence that soon after Christianity burst upon the Judean scene, a majority of the Holy Ones came over, forming the first Jerusalem Church; and then, after the destruction of the Jewish capital in 70 C.E., reorganized themselves into the Christian sect known as the Ebionites. (Larson, The Essene Heritage, p. 20-32).

THE INFLUENCE OF THE ESSENE LIBRARY

The collection of writing recovered in the Qumran environs has restored to us a voluminous corpus of Jewish documents dating from the third century B.C.E. to 68 C.E., demonstrating the rich literary activity of Second Temple-period Jewry. The collection comprises documents of a varied nature, most of them of a distinct religious bent outside what would be considered normative Judaism. The chief categories represented are:

- 1. Biblical
- 2. Apocryphal or pseudepigraphical
- 3. Sectarian writings.

The study of this original library has demonstrated that the boundaries between these categories is far from clear-cut. The biblical manuscripts include what are probably the earliest copies of these texts to have come down to us. Most of the books of the Bible are represented in the collection. Some books are extant in large number of copies; others are represented only fragmentarily on mere scraps of parchment. The biblical texts display considerable similarity to the standard Masoretic (received) text. This, however, is not always the rule, and many texts diverge from the Masoretic. This presents a serious problem for the Christian whether he knows of it or not. Analysis of these discrepancies yields more than simple alternate readings; we have divergent and conflicting theologies that confront us in such comparisons. We find readings that conflict theologically with the Received Masoretic Palestinian text and which substantiate the sect's unique theological persuasions as taken from the pagan religious mentioned above. In other words, we find variant readings where the Masoretic text has been changed to reflect the Essene's theology as it had evolved under Pythagorean, Buddhist, and Iranian influences. These changes began with the Essenes in Alexandria, Egypt, with the translation of the Jewish Scriptures into Greek; for it was then that such pagan religious concepts made their way into the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures. Copies of these altered Greek texts existed at Qumran alongside the Masoretic Jewish texts.

They disagreed theologically in no small way!

CONCLUSION

When reading the New Testament it must be kept in mind that what we are reading are the religious concepts of these Essenic believers which converted as a group to the Jesus Movement following the crucifixion of Jesus. With them came their unique religious beliefs that had separated themselves from the Jewish mainstream. Many of their religious beliefs, affective everything from Messiah to salvation, can be found to be a compromise with normative Jewish teaching as coming from Moses and the Prophets. If one looks deeply then he finds what the facts show: that the Essenic religious beliefs of 30-70 C.E. are almost completely different from what the group in its inception in 170 B.C.E. held and cherished. In place of the fulfillment of the Torah and the Tanakh we find a unique synthesis of religious beliefs gathered from many pagan nations to which mention was made above. This unique synthesis had produced a unparalleled theology regarding their Angel-Messiah and his role in the redemption of mankind. Instead of preserving for mankind the truths concerning the Davidic Messiah promised by YHVH, we find a Pythagorean, Buddhist, Iranian, Egyptian, Greek, and Mithraic godman and these concepts were applied to Jesus by this group and their influence and legacy can be seen in writings of the New Testament which portray Jesus in such a manner. Your further study into this area is encouraged that you see these things for yourself. THE FACTS AWAIT YOUR DISCOVERY!

THE OSIRIS MYTH....TRACING IT IN ITS MANY FORMS DOWN THROUGH HISTORY

"A Christian's religious belief system, when tested and exposed to contradictory facts from Biblical languages, Biblical history, Biblical culture, and archeology, must in the Spirit of Truth and Repentance, be flexible enough to change"...Craig M. Lyons M.Div.

TRACING THE ORIGINS FOR ESSENE RELIGIOUS BELIEFS

The following articles and information will be new to the vast majority of our readership, and that being so, it is very important when reading the following information concerning world religions that you take careful note as to the various religious doctrines that you encounter. It won't take long before you begin to recognize the repetition of the vast majority of these different "religious beliefs" that were connected to the Osiris Myth as we look its evolution down through history. This will become apparant to you as you follow the chronology of various world religions as they were influenced by Egypt down through history. What is of major interest to us is that many of these "core" religious beliefs can be shown to have originated from the original faith of Egypt and it later corruption as seen in various forms of Sun-Worship in one way or the other. These "core" religious beliefs that find their root in Sun-Worship of the Gentile nation will later be synthesized into a concise set of beliefs by Pythagoras and others and will ultimately finds their home in the Essene religious community owing to their rejection of Biblical Judaism in the first century.

That being so then it becomes very problematic when these same religious beliefs again surface as Divine and unique revelations in Christianity which is just another form of Essene religious expression. So, take a note pad and read carefully and look for repetitions of religious doctrines involving soteriology (salvation), redeemers (godmen), Eucharists (eating the body and drinking the blood of gods), etc. One you compile your notes then it will come in handy for a quick reference when we enter our Essene studies. One familiar with these "core" religious doctrines we will deal with Sun-Worship later in the web-site where you can see the origin for most of the world religious thought.

SUN-WORSHIP AND ITS INFLUENCE UPON WORLD RELIGIONS

It is assumed that you have acquainted yourself quite thoroughly with the above information as it will be of great benefit as we continue our serious study of the influence of Sun-Worship on world religions. This will be a consuming study that is very necessary if you intend on fully understanding how pagan concepts have become the foundation for the vast majority of cherished Christian beliefs, doctrines, and dogmas. It is not my intention to hurt anyone or destroy anyone's faith; rather, it is my purposeful intention to help others recover Divine truth lost and thereby help the restoration of Divine knowledge whereby our worship of the Creator be in both Spirit and Truth as it should. I wish this was not necessary, but the deceptions and conspiracies of the history of mankind by powerful priesthoods have blinded mankind to the truth. In the information which follows you find the culmination of over 15 years of serious inquiry in religious studies. Let us be fully aware that the New Testament consists of four basic components:

- Soteriology And The Savior Concept [which will now, having acquainted yourself with the above information, be seen to have come from Sun-Worship and the Mystery Religions]
- Ethics [which came primarily from India/Brahamanism/Buddhism]
- Eschatology [which is largely derived from Persia/Zorastrianism]

THE SUMMER SOLSTICE...LITHA...(AROUND 21ST JUNE)

Jer 10:2 2 Thus saith the LORD, Learn not the way of the heathen, and be not dismayed at the signs of heaven; for the heathen are dismayed at them. (KJV)

ALTERNATE NAMES

Midsummer, Celtic 'Oak Festival'

DRUIDIC NAME

Alban Hefin or Alban Heruin (Light of the Shore)

CHRISTIAN EQUIVALENT

Saint John the Baptist's Day (24th June)

PLACE IN THE NATURAL CYCLE

Litha is the solar festival that marks the longest day of the year, with the sun rising and setting at its most northerly points. The summer quarter of the year runs from Beltane to Lughnassadh, so Litha stands at the midpoint of summer.

OSIRIS AND THE SUMMER SOLSTICE

Osiris was the Egyptian God of the earth and kingship, and by association with vegetation in general and in particular grain. The yearly drought in Egypt and the regular yearly flooding of the Nile were personified in the life of Osiris as seen in his death and resurrection which coincided with both celestial and agricultural events.

There are two solstices each year. The winter solstice, the shortest day of the year, occurs when the sun appears farthest south in the sky. The summer solstice, the longest day of the year, occurs when the sun appears farthest in the north. Egyptians were especially interested in the summer solstice because it marked the beginning of the Nile's flood season. Accurately predicting the floods was of such vital importance that the appearance of Sirius, which occurs around the time of the summer solstice, was recognized as the beginning of the Egyptian new year. The brightest star in the night sky, Sirius was the embodiment of Isis, sister and consort of the god Osiris, who appeared in the sky as Orion. Sirius first appeared in the dawn sky each year around the time of the summer solstice and just before the Nile's flood season. Ancient Egyptians learned to predict the summer floods by the disappearance of Orion from the night sky, followed by the first appearance of Sirius, the brightest star in the night sky, at dawn. In ancient theology, Egyptians saw Orion and Sirius as the heavenly embodiment of Osiris and Isis, two of their most important gods, who were believed to bring the life-giving floods each year. Egyptians believed Sirius was responsible for the rains, so it was vital to accurately predict its arrival. Sirius was the centerpiece of Egypt's 365-day solar calendar, and its appearance marked the beginning of the new year. The three bright stars forming the belt of Orion ,the hunter, were the celestial embodiment of Osiris, god of the dead, whose resurrection from the dead was pictured in the flooding of the Nile at the summer solstice which was a picture to them of God's salvation for the people of Egypt.

Orion, the picture of Osiris, was of dual importance to Egyptians. The constellation was believed to be the final resting place of pharaohs, where they joined forever with the gods of the sky. Orion also appeared in the night sky shortly before Sirius, which in turn heralded the arrival of the life-giving summer floods. Sirius represented Isis, Osiris' sister and consort, who trailed him across the sky just as she searched the land for his body in the most famous of Egyptian myths. Known as the Lord of Everything, Osiris symbolized the birth, growth, death, and rebirth of the natural world. In Egyptian mythology, Osiris was murdered and dismembered by his jealous brother, Seth, then briefly brought back to life by his sister and consort Isis to father the god Horus. Egyptians saw Osiris in the Moon, whose phases caused the all-important Nile to rise and fall each month, and in the constellation Orion, whose appearance was connected with the annual flood. As god of the dead, Osiris welcomed the recently deceased to their new world. King Khufu, eager to join Osiris as quickly as possible after his death, had a shaft constructed in his burial chamber pointing directly to Orion, which was considered to be the final resting place of the pharaohs.

Orion was Osiris, the green god who died and was reborn, and Sirius was Isis, his beloved. Its annual appearance just before sunrise near the summer solstice marked the rise of the Nile River. It was said that when the Nile flooded, Osiris and Isis were making love, and their sexual union fertilized the land. The archaeo-astronomer E.C. Krupp writes: "After disappearing from the night sky (for 70 days) Sirius eventually reappears in the dawn, before the sun come up. The first time this occurs each year is called the star's heliacal rising, and on this day Sirius remains visible for only a short time before the sky gets too bright to see it. In ancient Egypt this annual reappearance of Sirius fell close to the summer solstice and coincided with the time of the Nile's inundation. . . Sirius revives the Nile just as Isis revives Osiris. Her time in hiding from Seth is when Sirius is gone (70 days) from the night sky. She (Isis) gives birth to her son Horus, as Sirius gives birth to the new year, and in the texts Horus and the new year are equated. She is the vehicle for renewal of life and order. Shining for a moment, one morning in summer, she stimulates the Nile and starts the year."

The elements of the Osiris story was seen as symbolic of real events that happened in Egypt. With his original association to agriculture, his death and resurrection were seen as symbolic of the annual death and re-growth of the crops and the yearly flooding of the Nile which were signaled by Sirus and the Summer Solstice. This was interpreted as the resurrection of Osiris. The sun too with its daily re-birth and death was associated with Osiris.

The elements of his story was seen as symbolic of real events that happened in Egypt. With Osiris and his original association to agriculture, his death and resurrection were seen as symbolic of the annual death and re-growth of the crops and the yearly flooding of the Nile. The sun too with its daily re-birth and death was associated with Osiris.

Osiris rivalry with his brother Seth, the god of storms and the desert, was symbolic of the eternal war between the fertile lands of the Nile Valley and the barren desert lands just beyond. His death at the hand of his brother Seth represented the yearly Egyptian drought, while his miraculous rebirth, at the summer solstice, represented the flooding of the Nile Valley and its nourishment by the silt left on the land after the flood.

Several festivals during the year were held in Egypt, in celebration of Osiris. One, held in November, celebrated his beauty. Another, called the "Fall of the Nile" was a time of mourning. As the Nile receded, the Egyptians went to the shore to give gifts and show their grief over Osiris' death. When the Nile began to flood again, another festival honoring Osiris was held whereby small shrines were cast into the river and the priests poured sweet water in the Nile, declaring that the god was found again.

FURTHER DETAILS

The Summer Solstice is the longest day of the year and brings us to the zenith of the Sun god's power. He is celebrated and honored in order to ensure a large harvest. He is thanked for the Life-Giving Light that He brings.

This is also the time of the Great Battle of the Oak King and His twin, the Holly King. It is during this Battle that the Holly King, representing the darker, colder half of the year, slays the Oak King, who represents the lighter, warmer half of the year, in order to keep the wheel of the year spinning. The cycle of Life, Death and Rebirth is constantly flowing, always changing...never static. Such tradition honors the Green Man in all His masculinity. He is at the height of His reign and roams through the fields playing harmless pranks and games. Many celebrate this time with games and competition. It is a time for growing strong. The harvest is coming soon and the Winter months will be harsh. Many usually re-enact the Battle of the Oak and Holly Kings, more as a form of competition than a religious aspect. Honoring the Green Man is the main focus on this Sabbat.

Litha celebrates the height of the sun's power and the abundance of summer. Nature is alive, and fields and fruits are growing towards harvest, but the blessing is mixed, for once light reaches its apogee it can only decline. Litha is a fairly modern term for the summer solstice, and it may be derived from an Anglo-Saxon word for 'moon' that referred to the sixth and seventh months of the year. The Druidic name for the festival, Alban Heruin or 'Light of the Shore', is very appropriate for this turning point of the year, lying at the midpoint between "Light of the Earth" and "Light of the Water" (the Druidic terms for the equinoctial celebrations).

In the past, midsummer fires were lit for purification, protection and in the hope that the sun could be kept powerful for long enough to ensure a good harvest. People would leap over these fires in the belief that the crops would grow as high as they could jump. Drumming, dancing and singing were common, making this festival a noisy and social time. The full moon in June is known as the Mead or Honey Moon, and mead is a traditional drink for Litha, just as June is a popular time for weddings and hence honeymoons.

Litha honors the apex of Light, sometimes symbolized in the crowning of the Oak King, God of the waxing year. At his crowning, the Oak King falls to his darker aspect, the Holly King, God of the waning year (days grow shorter after Litha). In terms of the God and Goddess cycle, the God is made King through his marriage to the Queen at Litha.

Just as the winter solstice festival was appropriated by the Christian church to celebrate Christ's birth, so the popular summer solstice festival was taken to mark the birth of one of the church's most important saints: the cousin and baptizer of Jesus, John the Baptist. Other saints' days correspond to the supposed dates of their deaths, but John's is unusual in marking his birth. Saint John's Wort is a flower of traditional importance to midsummer celebrations.

Now let us understand in the Summer Solstice as being when the North Pole is pointed most toward the sun, the longest day and shortest night. The Summer Solstice, Midsummer, is linked with fertility and sexuality. June is the most popular wedding month.

6,000 years ago, people began to form into groups or communities. Food, clothing, and shelter were essential. Man learned that certain foods grew during certain times of the year - the solar year. So keeping tract of time became necessary in order to know when to plant and when to harvest. The time and season of the migration of animals became equally important. When the work was done and things went well, people celebrated (early holidays). Many of the ways (traditions) we celebrate during holidays which can be traced back to early civilization.

Not many solar holidays were celebrated at this time. (1) People were busy working the fields (2) People knew that for the next six months, daylight would be less and less each day (3) As stated before, this was a time for fertility and sexuality. Work and mating occupied most of the people's time.

ever wondered why the gentiles picked december 25th for the birthday of their gods?

netfirms | Web Hosting by Netfirms | Free Domain Names by Netfirms

EVER WONDERED WHY THE GENTILES PICKED DEC. 25 FOR THE BIRTHDAY OF THEIR GODS?

Among some of the intellectuals, we may surmise that they viewed the myths as ascending from a true core, that was perverted and over time became legend. Again, this type of attitude is present in contemporary society. All of the Saviors of the Gentile nations, including Jesus who originally was a Jew, can be referred to as Solar Gods, Gods of the Sun. In other words, their births, lives, and deaths can be correlated to the Transit Cycles of the Sun. When the ancients formulated their religious beliefs, they used the Image of the creator God (that is to say the Cosmos) as their pattern. They personified the elements of the Cosmos, and recorded the movements of the stars and planets as personified deities and demons. They conjured fables and tales that hold exact correlation to the planetary (includes all elements of the universe) movements within the celestial heavens.

SO WHY PICK DEC. 25TH AS THE BIRTHDAY OF GOD?

We are now ready to explain why all of the ancient saviors mentioned earlier were alleged to have been born on December 25th and there are quite a few to which this event was described.

In astronomy/astrology, the beginning of cycles, that is to say, the Conception of a cycle is determined by a Conjunction, the point where elements of the universe Intersect (form a CROSS), or Pivot, or Join, or Come together, or Cross paths, or Occult each other. This is very important and will have a major impact upon the later creation of the crucifixion of the Sun-Gods.

This might be alarming for you to even consider, but within the New Testament is recorded the stories of these pagan solar-myths and the crucifixion of the sun as personified and applied to Jesus and his crucifixion.

The moon cycle begins at the new moon, the point at which the path of the moon around the earth intersects between the sun and the earth. This point of Conjunction commences a new moon cycle.

The summer cycle begins when the Sun reaches it's highest point in the celestial heavens at 23 1/2 degrees north declination, and pivots so as to retreat southward toward it's Fall. Thus, a Pivotal point commences a new cycle.

The Fall cycle (autumn) begins when the ecliptic of the sun crosses the celestial equator in the west. This point of intersection is the Genesis for fall type weather, a seasonal change. Thus this "Crossing" commences a new cycle.

The Winter cycle takes control when the sun bottoms out at it's lowest point south of the celestial equator and pivots so as to return to it's former position. Thus, the struggle of the sun to regain that (position) which was lost is the dawn of a new cycle.

CYCLE OF THE NEW YEAR....VIRGIN BIRTH AND IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

And the Cycle which the Ancients saw as the greatest of all, was the cycle of the new year. The point and time at which the ecliptic of the Sun, rising northward in the sky from its winter position, intersects the celestial equator at the Vernal Equinox.

This date March 21, was traditionally the commencement of the New Year. In ancient times, as well as today, they celebrated the victory of the Sun over the forces of the nether world (darkness). The ancient Gentiles, lacking the understanding of the laws of Science, foolishly believed that the Sun was emerging into it's glory since defeating the powers of the great Typhon, that evil serpent that lurked and prowled in the perilous celestial waters (the ancient writers often used the terms "waters and seas or rivers" in reference to regions of Space or the Cosmos), beneath the celestial equator (the winter with longer dark days). This point of the Sun's crossing the earth's equator in rising northward in the sky at the vernal equinox was the forecaster of new life, of Spring, fresh vegetation, greenery and relief from the oppressions of winter. It was the time, or beginning of the time (season) to plant new seed under the bosom of the earth, to Impregnate mother earth so that she may bring forth new life in her time. But not only did man Impregnate the soil of the earth by implanting her with his seed, the ancients surmised that the SUN, on this date of March 21, was indeed Impregnating the Cosmos with the Seed of Life for a New Sun, an Heir to His Throne of Glory (get ready for an immaculate conception). Remember in the Sun's northward track in the heavens the ancients were soon to expect Spring and Summer when the "dead" vegetation would bloom again and be "birthed anew."

On this date, March 21 (the beginning of spring), the ancients saw (perceived) the celestial Sun (God the Father) Impregnating the Cosmos (Virgin Mother) with the Sperm of Life (Rejuvenating Element) that would one day produce a New Sun (A Savior, A Christ) to replace and Renew the Kingdom of the Sun, once this present Sun's time had passed. We now have a virgin birth and this same story was told about one Sun-god after another from nation to nation for thousands of years. Christians believe it today.

The fact that so many nations had these same beliefs in vastly scattered locations of the world, throughout thousands of years of history, indicates a worldwide dissemination of a common mythology.

LOVING TRADITION MORE THAN THE WORD OF GOD...AND IT CONTINUES TODAY IN CHRISTIANITY

The early Greek-Jews of Alexandria, Egypt, even altered the Old Testament when they changed the word used by Isaiah ("young woman") the prophet and used "virgin" instead in their translation, or should I say, mistranslation, of the Septuagint (LXX). To sell a Jewish Rabbi to the world, since Judaism was a world religion at that time, it was necessary to recast Jesus in the form of the Gentile godmen if they had any hope of "selling" a Jewish Rabbi to the nations as a new godman.

This date, March 21 (the beginning of spring), marked the commencement of the period of Gestation for the future Savior (Sun) of the World. Now watch this!

We know that human gestation last for 280 days so it is also, with the Sun God. Most people think that human pregnancy lasts for 9 months, but that is an approximation. Check your encyclopedia or medical book, and you will discover that the actual term is for 280 days.

The period of Gestation for the Macrocosm (Celestial Sun-God) is the same as his Microcosm (Created Image) i.e., the Son Of God, as well as the human species in total. Let us Count the days leading from March 21 (the vernal equinox when the Sun crosses the equator in its northward track in the heavens) to see where 280 days will take us:

- 11 days (Including March 21) brings us to the end of March

Now we must add 30 days for April, 31 for May, 30 for June, 31 for July, 31 for August, 30 for September, 31 for October, 30 for November, and guess how many we need in December? That's right, let's try 25 for December (remember Jesus' birthday is taught by your Christian leaders as Dec. 25th).

That adds up to 280 days!

Now, we can easily see that Jesus Christ and all of the Gentile Saviors referred to in these articles were Born Right On Time, three days after the winter solstice, at the stroke of midnight on December 25th The evidence is clear that the Prophecy of the Birth of a Coming Savior was Astronomical, in Origin. The ancient Sages personified (gave human names and characteristics) the elements of the Cosmos, in order to produce a Theology (Mythology) that was intellectually compatible to every level of human society, preservable throughout history, because of it's Esoteric quality, and soundly based on Natural (Godly) Truth.

Answer for yourself: Do you really want the truth before you die? But we cannot end here.

Answer for yourself: Are there other doctrines taught by Christianity and contained in their documents that God never gave you and belief and action based upon them is sin and you might possibly not know it?

Sadly, that is the case and Bet Emet Ministries is devoted to help you see these in hopes of helping spread the unity of the Faith of Jesus and correct the false faith preached in his name today. Shalom.

THE VISIT OF THE MAGI...TRUTH...OR A SUN-MYTH RETOLD?

In several of the previous articles we have made mention of several "magi" accounts. We add to these now. As soon as the God-begotten saviours were born into the world they were adored by shepherds from near by. In some cases they were also visited by wise men, or Magi, as the Persians and Brahmins called them, from far away. Sometimes the visitors were from even farther away, even angels leaving their heavenly ranks to wing their way to this rude tenement to adore its new born saviour.

We are informed by the Matthew writer, that being guided by a star, the Magi from the east came to where the young child was. The original word here is "magoi" from which comes our word "Magician." The persons here denoted were philosophers, priests, or astronomers. They dwelth chiefly in Persia and Arabia. They were the learned men of the Eastern nations, devoted to astronomy, to religion, and to medicine. They were held in high esteem by the Persian court; were admitted as counselors, and followed the camps in war to give advice (Barne's Notes, vol. i. p. 25). Matthew relates in 2:2: "And when they were come into the house (not stable) they saw the young child with Mary his mother, and fell down and worshipped him. And when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts, gold, frankincense, and myrrh."

The visit by "Magi" to the newly born incarnate Sun-god is very natural, for after all the Magi were Sun worshippers, and at early dawn on the 25th of December, the astrologers of the Arabs, Chaldeans, and other Oriental nations, greeted the infant Savior with gold, frankincense and myrrh. They started to salute their God long before the rising of the Sun, and having ascended a high mountain, thy waited anxiously for his birth, facing the East, and there hailed his first rays ;with incense and prayer (Dupis, Orig. Relig. Belief, p. 284; Higgins, Anacalypsis, vol. ii. pp. 96-97; Prof. Relig. Ideas, vol. i. p. 272).

In an earlier age we find what seems strange to man today was anything but that to the primitive Gentiles of antiquity. I am speaking of the birth of their god-men or Avatars. Such events were numerous in country after country, at least as far as legends go. The birth of a God or Messiah was, as a matter of course, regarded as an event of sufficient importance to attract the attention of the great ones of the earth, and even the creatures of heaven also. "And hence we find it related in the history of several of the God-begotten Saviors of antiquity, that as soon as they were born into the world they were visited by "wise men from a distance" (or Magi, as they were called by the Persians and Brahmins). And in some cases they were likewise waited upon and adored by the neighboring shepherds; and even celestial spirits are reported in some instances as leaving their star-gilt homes to wing their way to the humble mansion, the rude tenement, containing a new-born God, that they might honor and adore "the Savior of men, the Savior of the world" (Graves, The Sixteen Crucified Saviors).

One only needs to look at the sacred biographies of both Confucius and Christ because both provide examples of the angel host forsaking their homes in the skies to pay their adoration and worship to a Deity-begotten god-man at his birth. Such a godman was always sent down by the "Father of Mercies" to save a guilt-laden world. And in both cases the Magi are reported as assembling to present their offerings to the infant God.

In the case of Confucius (born 598 B.C.), it is declared, "Five wise men from a distance came to the house, celestial music was heard in the skies, and angels attended the scene" (Five Volumes). Strikingly similar to this ancient legend, in each of the several characteristics, is the Christian story.

Matthew in chapter 2 verse 1 which speaks of "wise men from the east" journeying to Jerusalem to visit the infant Christ, soon after his birth, amongst the mules and oxen in a stable, though he omits to state the number of itinerant adorers who presented themselves on the occasion.

The Persian story is more specific, as it gives the number of Magi who visited the young Savior of that country as five. Luke 2:13 speaks of "a multitude of the heavenly host praising God," in gratulation of the birth of the Judean Savior.

Now, when we bear in mind that one method of praising God, with the orientals, was by music, we quickly understand this is only another mode of proclaiming, as in the case of Confucius, that "celestial music was heard in the skies." And "angels attended the scene" of Confucius' birth. So, likewise, Luke 2:15 relates that the angels, after rejoicing with the shepherds on the occasion of the birth of Christ, "went away into heaven."How complete the parallel! and, but for the digression, and monopoly of space, we might trace it much further, and show that Confucius, like Christ, had twelve chosen disciples; that he was descended from a royal house of princes, as Christ from the royal house of David; that he, in like manner, retired for a long period from the noise and bustle of society into religious contemplative seclusion; that he inculcated the same Golden Rule of doing to others as we desire them to act toward us, and other moral maxims equal in importance to anything that can be found in the Christian Scriptures, etc.

Other Saviors at birth, we are told, were visited by both angels and shepherds, also "wise men," at least great men.

Chrishna, the eighth avatar of India, 1200 B.C., (so it is related by the "inspired penman" of their pagan theocracy) was visited by angels, shepherds and prophets (avatars). "Immediately after his birth he was visited by a chorus of devatas (angels), and surrounded by shepherds, all of whom were impressed with the conviction of his future greatness." We are informed further that "gold, frankincense and myrrh" were presented to him as offerings. The well-known modern traveler, Mr. Ditson, who visited India but a few years since, uses the emphatic declaration, "In fact, as soon as Chrishna was born he was saluted by a chorus of devatas, or angels." In the evangelical narrative of the Christian Savior an angel is reported to have saluted his mother thus: "Hail, thou that art highly favored; the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou among women" (Luke 1:28)

Answer for yourself: Can these facts be relegated to the bin of "coincidence?"

And in the next chapter the angel is reported as joining with "the heavenly host" "in praising God."

A similar report is found in the Hindu bible (the Ramayana), appertaining to the mother of the eighth Savior, of whom it is declared "Brahma and Siva, with a host of attending spirits, came to her and sang, 'In thy delivery, O favored among women, all nations shall have cause to exult.'" And when the celestial infant (Chrishna) appeared (it is related in a subsequent chapter), "a chorus of heavenly spirits saluted him with hymns; the whole room was illuminated by his light, and the countenance of his father and mother shone with brightness and glory (by reflection), their understandings were opened so that they knew him to be the Preserver of the world, and they began to worship him." The last text here quoted brings to mind Luke 24:45, which declares, "Then he (Christ) opened their (his parents) understandings."

Answer for yourself: Can these facts be mere "coincidence?"

The ninth avatar of India (Sakia) furnishes to some extent a similar parallel. According to the account of an exploration made in India, and published in the New York Correspondent of 1828, "There is on a silver plate in a cave in India an inscription stating that about the time of the advent of Buddha Sakia (600 B.C.), a saint in the woods learned by inspiration that another avatar (Messiah or Savior) had appeared in the house of Rajah of Lailas. Learning which, he flew through the air to the place, and when he beheld the new-born Savior he declared him to be the great avatar (Savior or prophet), and that he was destined to establish a new religion" -- the New Covenant Religion.

Answer for yourself: Can these facts be relegated to the bin of "coincidence?"

This should make you sick. Look at what we have we inherited in the Gentile Christian Church.

Answer for yourself: Is it any wonder that Jews, the true people of Jesus, won't accept what we so readily hold as "sacred?"

We next draw on the history of Greece. It is authentically related of Pythagoras (600 B.C.) that his fame having reached Miletas and neighboring cities, men renowned for wisdom (wise men) came to visit him. (Progress of Religious Ideas, vol. i.) In the Anacalypsis we are told that Magi came from the East to offer gifts at Socrates' birth, bringing gold, frankincense and myrrh," the same kind of offering as that presented to the two divine infants Chrishna and Christ, according to their respective "inspired" biographers. (Matt. 2:4, and the Ramayana).

And the legend of Mithra, of Persia, might also be included in our category of comparison, if we had space for it. All the four Saviors last named (if Socrates may be called such) are reported as having been honored and enriched with aromatic offerings at their respective births. And we have the statement from Mr. Higgins (Anacalypsis), that the same assortment of spices (with the gold) constituted the materials offered as gifts to the sun, in Persia more than three thousand years ago; and likewise in Arabia near the same era.

And it may be stated here, that an ancient historic account of Zoroaster of Persia (6,000 B.C., according to Pliny and Aristotle), speaks of his having also been visited by Magi, or "Magia," at the period of his earthly advent. And it is, perhaps, well to note in this place, that "Magi" is the term used in the Apocryphal Gospels, to designate the "wise men" who visited Christ at birth; and that Magi, Magic and Magician are but variations of the same word, at least derivations from the same root, all suggesting a wisdom correlated to the Gods. Osiris, an incarnate deity of Egypt, we may cite as another case of an infantile God receiving signal honors and eclat at birth, as he was visited while yet in the cradle by a host of admiring adorers. "People flocked from all parts of the world to behold the heaven- born infant." Such a world-wide fame must have had the effect to attract, with the numerous crowd who thronged to see and worship him, no small number of "wise men."

Answer for yourself: Now ask yourself: "Is Christianity a Divine and unique religion from God?

Answer for yourself: Does it make sense at all that the divine Father, in his infinite wisdom, should have chosen to reveal the intelligence of the birth of his son Jesus Christ to a set of nomadic heathen idolaters hundreds of miles distant (though known as "wise men" because of their skill in astrology) before he made it known to his own "chosen people" (the Jews)?

Answer for yourself: Does it make sense that God would call such pagans "wise men," while men of God's own election, the Jews, according to the Christian bible, were often stigmatized and denounced as "fools," a "generation of vipers," etc?

Let us not forget that it was at the moment of the winter solstice (25th December), precisely when the Persian magi drew the horoscope of the new year, the the "morning star" was positioned in the heavens as being in the bosom of the Virgin (Virgo) rising heliacally in the eastern horizon. On this account he was figured in their astronomical pictures under the form of a child suckled by a chaste virgin (Volney, Ruins, p. 155; Dupuis, Origin of Religious Belief, p. 236).

Answer for yourself: If you have been keeping up, is there little doubt that so far the telling of the story of Christ in the New Testament is nothing but the "re-telling" of the Sun-Myths?

GNOSTICISM AND THE MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD #1

Before we can adequately deal with the information in this article some background information and commentary is necessary in order to understand the mindset of the writer of the Book of Hebrews who was himself a Gnostic.

A SHORT PRIMER IN GNOSTICISM...A THREAT TO BIBLICAL FAITH

We saw some rather incredible pieces of information in the prior article. Let us summarize. We saw that before the establishing of the Covenant of Moses and the Laws of Moses that many Commandments and Laws that were once thought to apply only to the Jews can be shown to exist prior to the giving of the Laws of Moses and the establishment of the Covenant of Moses. We saw only briefly that the writer of the Book of Hebrews tries to nullify God's Laws as binding any longer after the coming of Jesus whom was believed by him to be the "redeemer." But we saw, maybe for the first time that the writer of the Book of Hebrew was Gnostic and not Jewish. Yeshua has already taught that the Law would never pass away: Matt 5:18 18 For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. (KJV). Yet the writer of the Book of Hebrews has, in his mind, replaced the Laws and the Covenant given by God with one of his own making [Melchizedek] which contradicts the teaching of Yeshua/Jesus and the example left for us of the Jerusalem Church in the book of Acts. We will see that shortly.

What Christians fail to understand is that the concept of Melchizedek and the Melchizedek Priesthood is a "pattern" used by Gnostics who reject Biblical Judaism, the Temple, the Law, the Mosaic Covenant and the Davidic Messiah. Without a background in Gnosticism and its many varieties that it is really hard to understand let alone "spot" it in the texts. In a nutshell Gnosticism believed that all flesh and all matter is evil; a creation of an inferior Deity of the Jews named YHWH. Thus YHWH and His Law are evil in that they try to remold and remake a creation full of evil and suffering. Gnostics believed that this earth and mankind are evil and a perfect God would neve have made such a mistake in creating such evil and suffering. The Gnostics believed that this sad condition we find in life and in mankind is the result of a flawed creation; a mistake by a sub-deity and not the Highest God. Thus, according to the Gnostics, all attempts to control this evil through obedience to Laws [Laws of Moses and the Laws of Noah] that train human nature to do good are useless. Escape from this evil world is the answer; not redeeming it through repentance and obedience to the Commandments of YHWH. This evil world and mankind are not salvageable. Thus the negative attitude to YHWH'S Laws and Covenants consisting of Laws and Commandments. The Gnostics believed that they needed a "NEW" Covenant without such Laws. One such Covenant and Priesthood existed PRIOR to Moses and the giving of the Laws and Commandments. That was the Priesthood of Melchizedek. No examples by the Gnostics, who hated YHWH'S Laws, was used from the time of Moses onward since they could not have anything to do with Moses or the Laws of God. All that the Gnostics exampled in their teachings were examples of pre-Moses figures: Abraham, Shem, Melchizedek, etc. Thus the need for a Melchizedek Priesthood to replace the Aaronic Priesthood and the need for a "NEW" Covenant.

Heb 7:12 12 For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law. (KJV)

They Gnostics knew of the prophecy of the coming destruction of the Temple and the Priesthood. We saw in the prior article the failure of the Priesthood and its causes. That being so the Gnostics, not valuing the Laws of YHWH or the Covenant that commanded them since originating in their opinion from a God that created the world less than perfect containing evil, looked to create their own "NEW" Priesthood and displace the old Aaronic Priesthood. Along with that was the rejection of the Covenant that created this Aaronic Priesthood and gave the Laws of YHWH. Along with this these Gnostics recast the Jewish Messiah in the form of their "descending Cosmic Gnostic Redeemer" and in so doing applied such concepts to Yeshua who many in that time hoped was the Jewish Messiah. In so doing we lost the very essence and message of Yeshua in the writings we inherited from them.

When Yeshua was asked in Matt. 19: Matt 19:16-17 16 And, behold, one came and said unto him, Good Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life? 17 And he said unto him, Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is, God: but if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. (KJV). It is these same Commandments that the Gnostics like the writer of the Book of Hebrews saw no purpose in and rejected them along with the Covenant that prescribed them. We find the Gnostics in their writings detesting God's Laws and His Covenant given to the Jews through Moses and the destruction of the Priesthood was what they awaited. Since the Priesthood and the Temple stood in jeopardy and was possibly going to be destroyed according to Daniel then the Gnostics used this opportunity to promote a Priesthood of their own making. This was the Melchizedek Priesthood that was before the giving of these Laws to Moses and Israel. According to these Gnostics a change in the Priesthood (Aaronic to Melchizedek) was to be accompanies by a change in the Law and this was necessary in their minds. This "change" was the doing away with the Law entirely. But dear ones the change in the Law was no slight change; it was the total denial and abolition of the Law and the Torah. Salvation to the Gnostics was not faith in God and repentance when one sins which culminates in the return to God but rather salvation through secret knowledge which they only possessed. This Gnostic tendency is seen later in Paul's life as well as he becomes very Gnostic in sharing "my gospel" instead of Yeshua's gospel. We see glimpses of Paul's setting aside the Torah in Acts 21: Acts 21:21 21 And they are informed of thee, that thou teachest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs. (KJV). I rest my case!

In closing this summary let me say something and please pay attention:

In order for the alteration and replacement of Biblical Covenants and Laws by the Gnostics they of necessity had to change the Jewish Messiah as well and they did that. The Jewish Messiah is the culmination of Biblical Judaism; not the starting of a new religion as the Gnostics tried to accomplish. The sad fact is that the Gnostic and Essene religious ideas were later attached to Yeshua by them and were later popularized in the wake of the lack of fulfillment of the Messianic Kingdom in the first century and the failure of the Jewish Messiah to appear. These "fringe" groups left their writings which we have today and we, not possessing enough information and knowledge of the religious pluralism of First Century Judaism, sadly accept them as if they are the "norm" of what was believed about the Jewish Messiah let alone Yeshua. When undertakes a serious study into First Century Judaism and the host of religious beliefs that circled in those days then one can begin to see for himself that there were many competing "theologies" in that epochal time. Not all were right. I find it rather amazing that these splinter groups all avowed that "we are right" yet failed to emerge from the destruction of Israel in 70 A.D. The only group that emerged and continued were the Pharisees; the same group that Yeshua had prophesied would "set" in Moses' seat right before his death [in the Greek it meant 'inherit a kingdom' which just prior to this statement Yeshua has said was "removed" from the Sadducees]. The lack of this knowledge is our downfall in understanding the New Testament properly and the many voices clamoring their divisive theologies within it. Now having this background let us continue with this article.

THE LEVITICAL PRIESTHOOD

Prior to the addition of the sacrificial law God had sanctified every firstborn (see the chart in the prior article).

"Sanctify unto me all the firstborn, whatsoever openeth the womb among the children of Israel, both of man and of beast: it is mine." Exo 13:2 (KJV)

At the sin of the Golden Calf everything changed. At the establishment of the Levitical Priesthood God choose Aaron and his descendants to replace the "first born" because of the sin of the Golden Calf where the first born Israelites had defiled themselves. Only the Levites had remained apart from such idolatry and they were to be rewarded by God by remaining close to Him when the others were to be separated from Him.

"Now behold, I Myself have taken the Levites from among the children of Israel instead of every firstborn who opens the womb among the children of Israel. Therefore the Levites shall be Mine, -- Numbers 3:12

The Levites were set apart to minister in behalf of the children of God unto God and to offer sacrifices and to minister in the temple. This again was imposed because of the sin of the Golden Calf. This has been alluded to before along with the fact that there is no mention or command of any sin offering until AFTER the incident of the Golden Calf. The Aaronic priesthood was only meant to last throughout the generations of the one nation that God used as his example to the Gentile world. The Temple and the religion of Israel was to be an example to the world that God receives repentant sinners and restores them into renewed relationship Him. This was the message of the Temple and the Sacrificial System in spite of what you might have been previously taught by Gentile Christianity. Few if Christians let alone Christian writers that have read and are influenced by the Greek and Latin Church Fathers understand the Temple let alone the Sacrificial System. The simple reason was that these Greek and Latin Fathers were heavily influenced by the Essenes in their day (Gnostics in their own right) which had already forsaken the Temple and the Sacrificial System. Now you know why Gentile Christianity grew up with such influences and concepts.

The survival of the Levitical priesthood was dependent on the existence of the Tabernacle (or Temple) and the Nation of Israel. When the Jews were dispersed throughout the world in 70 A.D. the temple service of the Levitical priesthood ceased temporarily (see Hebrews 8:13 for Paul understood that the Temple and Priesthood was soon to be destroyed according to Daniel 9…in 70 C.E.). Now that you understand a little about how the Sacrificial System worked then now you better understand that atonement was still available to the Jews even when in captivity when they were deprived of their Temple (the physical demonstration of one's right standing with God by placing one's soul by proxy on the Temple in lieu of his own soul following his repentance). Ask for the articles if you lack this understanding as they are "life changing."

Now we come to some hard things that deals with the theology of the writer of the Book of Hebrews. I am referring to Gnosticism. We will allude to some things reflective of Gnosticism that is reflected in the thought process of the writer of this Book of Hebrews. First of all the Gnostics never used any references to Biblical personages that were in the time of Moses and the Mosaic Law. Of special importance to Gnostics was the figure of Melchizedek which we find in many of their writings and the Book of Hebrews as well. Understand that Gnosticism despised anything material and anything having to do with our earthly existence and any attempt to perfect it or improve it or bring correction to it [the Torah]. Now understand as well that the Laws of Moses and the Laws of Noah were such attempts to subject the flesh to the spirit. For obvious reasons the Law of God was despised by most Gnostics as well as the Priesthood which only manifested one's submission to the Laws of God as seen in the sacrifices which was but a picture of one's life/soul being symbolically put on the altar following one's repentance through the blood of the animal. Such a return to the Laws of God and the Torah of the Jews was seen by the Gnostics as worthless since it involved flesh/matter that was in this evil world created by an inferior God. I hope you understand this and read it again until you see the connection or ask for our articles on true Biblical atonement. Below we will see the replacement of the Priesthood with one similar to Melchizedek....an obvious signpost for Gnosticism. This means the writer of the epistle of Hebrews was Gnostic as seen in his Melchizedek references let alone his theology in this epistle regarding the replacement of the Covenant along with a replacement Priesthood. This same theology is found with Marcion...the man who first collected and produced the First New Testament [THAT SHOULD MAKE YOU THINK]! Understand this is not the fulfillment of Biblical Judaism..but a replacement for it!

According to this Gnostic writer as seen in the Book of Hebrews before the dispersion and the destruction of the Temple in 70 A.D. God ordained another Priest to make atonement in God's House forever. For them this was their "Cosmic Redeemer" whom they thought was Yeshua. But at the same time understand the Gnostic's "Cosmic Redeemer" was not a flesh and blood human but a "man of the Heavens" possessing no fleshly body. This is the Messiah they looked for and pictured as Jesus. Jesus was for then not a real person but a "phantom" or a "ghost" or an "apparition." This needs to be shouted.

I Jn 4:2-3 2 Hereby know ye the Spirit of God: Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God: 3 And every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God: and this is that spirit of antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it should come; and even now already is it in the world. (KJV)

The above passage is a valiant effort to stop such Gnostic teachings of their "false Messiah." We read today their theologies in our New Testament never understanding that the New Testament is a compilation of many differing and conflicting theologies all rolled together in one book. Our failure to have studied and mastered our Christian Faith has left us gullible to everything and unable to spot anything. These Gnostics thought Jesus was a "bogey man."

Answer for yourself: Did God really replace the Priesthood of Aaron with one like Melchizedek? Is He going to in the future? The undeniable answer will come later...keep reading.

Let us look at what the Gnostic writer of the Book of Hebrews has to say as he spreads his deviate theology:

Therefore, if perfection were through the Levitical priesthood for under it the people received the law...(the laws that were added only after the Golden Calf), what further need was there that another priest should rise according to the order of Melchizedek, and not be called according to the order of Aaron? For the priesthood being changed [according to the writer of the Book of Hebrews], of necessity there is also a change of the law. For he of whom these things are spoken belongs to another tribe (this is a reference to Jesus as the Gnostic redeemer], from which no man has officiated at the altar [none from Judah ever officiated at the altar...only those from the tribe of Levi]. For it is evident that our Lord arose from Judah, of which tribe Moses spoke nothing concerning priesthood. And it is yet far more evident if, in the likeness of Melchizedek, there arises another priest who has come, not according to the law of a fleshly commandment, but according to the power of an endless life. For He testifies: "You are a priest forever According to the order of Melchizedek." For on the one hand there is an annulling of the former commandment because of its weakness and unprofitableness, for the law [sacrificial law] made nothing perfect; on the other hand, there is the bringing in of a better hope, through which we draw near to God." Heb 7:11-19 (NKJV)

Now our study will slow down and get more difficult. Understand because of the belief in Yeshua's resurrection the Gnostic Jews believed him, as their Gnostic redeemer, to have supplanted the Priesthood of Aaron and assumed the Melchizedek Priesthood which was to them Eternal. In so doing the writer of the Book of Hebrews looked to Psalm 110 to substantiate his view that Yeshua had inherited an Eternal Priesthood like that of Melchizedek.

PSALM 110...WHAT DOES THE HEBREW REALLY SAY?

Psalm 110 has long been a key messianic 'proof text' for Christian apologists, which is now also used by missionaries to the Jews as further testimony from within the Hebrew Scriptures to validate Christian beliefs, including the doctrine of the Trinity. Of course, upon close examination of the claim vis-a-vis the Hebrew text of the Psalm, it becomes clear that the Christian claims are based on mistranslations from the Hebrew and false assumptions about Judaism.

I suggest that you open your KJV and turn to Psalm 110 for we will constantly compare the English KJV and its translation of the Hebrew with the actual Hebrew of Psalm 110 throughout the rest of these articles.

The Hebrew of Psm. 110 states:

1. Of David a psalm. The word of the L-rd ["YHVH"] to my master ["adoni"]. "Sit at/[Wait for] My right hand, until I make your enemies a footstool at your feet."

2. The L-rd ["YHVH"] will send the staff of your might from Zion; rule in the midst of your enemies!

3. Your people will volunteer in the majesty of their holiness, on the day of your battle; when still the dew of your youth was upon you, fresh from the womb of dawn.

4 The L-rd ["YHVH"] has sworn, and will not change His mind, "on my word, you are to serve for ever, my righteous king." [or, alternatively, "you are a priest [used as allegory] for ever, in the manner of Melchizedek."]

5. The L-rd ["A-donai"] is at your right hand, He crushes kings in the day of His wrath.

6. He will execute justice among the nations: their land is filled with corpses; he crushes heads of many countries.

7. He will drink from a stream on the way; therefore he will lift up his head.

Verse 4 is the key verse in question and holds the answers to which we seek.

GNOSTIC & LATER CHRISTIAN PERSPECTIVE & INTERPRETATION OF PSALM 110

The major disagreement between the above Jewish translation and the English KJV translation and, in general, between Christian and Jewish renditions of this Psalm occurs in the opening verse. In that verse, the Hebrew term transliterated as "adoni" (pronounced "a-do-nee"), meaning 'my lord/master' is mistranslated in the KJV and many other popular Christian Bibles as 'my Lord', allegedly, a reference to Jesus, 'God the Son'. The Tetragrammaton, the ineffable title of the Creator that is written in the Hebrew in terms of the four-letter sequence "yod-heh-vav-heh" ("YHVH"), appears in vs. 1,2, & 4, and is punctuated with vowels to be pronounced as "a-do-na-i", and is translated in the KJV as 'The LORD' ('God the Father') to distinguish it from 'The Lord' ('God the Son'). The actual word "A-donai", another common title for the Creator found in the Hebrew Bible appears in v. 5. It should be noted that in the Hebrew, both "adoni" and "A-donai" are spelled identically, but are punctuated with different vowels. The KJV, having committed to the 'my Lord' mistranslation in v. 1, was now forced to render "A-donai" in v. 5 as 'The Lord' ('God the Son').

Christians view Psalm 110 as a messianic Psalm fulfilled by Jesus as both the Messiah (who is greater than King David, his ancestor) and a divine being (for Trinitarians, the 'Son' person of the Trinity).

In other words, the Christian view is that, when the L-rd God speaks of the Messiah, and with David prophetically referring to the Messiah, who is his descendant, as 'my Lord' in v. 1, it clearly means that this cannot refer to an ordinary person. Rather, it can only refer to the one who fulfills this verse in both ways – as a divine being and Messiah - Jesus of Nazareth who is, according to Christian theology, also God manifested in the flesh, the one who gave his life for the sins of mankind.

The two key verses in this Psalm on which the Christian interpretation is based are vs. 1 & 4. Verse 1 allegedly refers to Jesus as being invited to sit on the right hand of God in glory, and he will wait for God to judge the earth and bring all things into subjection under him [Jesus]. Verse 4 speaks of a priest of the Most High God, Melchizedek who came to Abraham, who gave him one-tenth of all his goods. Thus, Melchizedek was greater than Abraham was, because he received tithes from Abraham (who was Levi's great-grandfather). Consequently, the Melchizedek priesthood, having preceded the Aaronic/Levitical priesthood, is seen as superior to it and, thus, supersedes and replaces it [this is the Gnostic view].

Now please pay close attention. Since in Judaism the royal office (which was the domain of the Tribe of Judah) and the office of the priesthood (which was the domain of the Tribe of Levi) are separated, none of the kings could be priests and vice versa. Said another way: If Messiah is to be King he cannot be a Priest! But, for Christianity, this Psalm celebrates the exaltation of Jesus to the throne of an eternal and increasing kingdom, and a perpetual priesthood that will see the subjugation of his enemies and the multiplication of his subjects, and rendered a certainty by the word and oath of the Almighty.

JEWISH PERSPECTIVE AND INTERPRETATION OF PSM. 110

The overall theme of Psalm 110, regardless of its author, is that it speaks of David's legendary power, which came through divine favor that was earned through his righteousness. The author of the Psalm assures King David of victory over the enemies of his people, the Jewish people.

Regarding the interpretation of this Psalm, as is often the case, there are several interpretations of this Psalm by the Jewish sages. The two most common interpretations are that this Psalm is about either King David or our Patriarch Abraham. There is yet another interpretation that combines the two. Moreover, with the understanding that the name of King David is also often associated with the future King/Messiah (e.g., Jer 30:9; Ezek 37:24; Hos 3:5), this could also possibly be interpreted as being messianic.

The interpretation of this Psalm by Ibn Ezra (and adopted also by Rabbi David Qimkhi [RADAQ]) as being about King David is according to the "pshat", i.e., the simple/literal reading, maintaining that thesuperscription is "A Psalm for/concerning David". It entails David's ordeal with King Saul (a Benjaminite which, in Hebrew, is "yemini", a word that is identical to the Hebrew term for 'my right hand'). He is asked to wait a while until his enemy (Saul) will be brought down.

The interpretation by Rabbi Shlomo Yitzhaqi (RASHI) uses the possible allusion to Melchizedek to relate this Psalm to Abraham and his battle with Amraphel, and his subsequent victory over the four enemy kingdoms (see Genesis14).

A melding of the two interpretations is possible when one reads this Psalm as a prayer by an aging King David as his soldiers went to battle without him. In his prayer, King David refers to images of God's dealings with Abraham during his battle with the four kings, and he asks God to help him as He helped Abraham to prevail over his enemies.

Finally, since King David was also a prophet, and there is use made in this Psalm of the future tense, it makes it also plausible that there is reference here to the future King/Messiah. As such, this Psalm confirms some of the basic requirements the Messiah must meet – he will be of the seed of David (not virgin born), victorious over all his enemies, a Torah scholar and a world leader.

IS A GENTILE PRIESTHOOD COMING?

The Christian interpretation of Psalm 110 is plagued with many problems, all of which appear to be connected to the most common Christian renditions of the first verse.

Christian renditions generally do not number the superscription at the head of a Psalm. Yet, the Christian perspective on this Psalm depends on the assumption that King David is the author. Jewish interpretations can go either way.

In the Hebrew text, the (transliterated) superscription reads – "l'David mizmor", where "l-" is a preposition, "David" is obvious, and "mizmor" means 'a psalm'. The Hebrew preposition "l-" could mean 'to'/'for', 'by', and 'in'/'into', so that, eliminating the last pair for obvious reasons, this superscription could indicate thePsalm as being either composed by David or composed for David; in other words, one cannot say with certainty that King David was the composer of this Psalm.

Answer for yourself: Are there other examples where, in Psalms, "l-" means 'for' and not 'by' in the superscription? Of course, and there are quite a few of them. First is the set of 11 Psalms and Songs for the Sons of Korah – Psalms 42, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 84, 85, 87, and 88, in each of which the superscription contains the following type of phrase, e.g.,

Psalm 48:1 - A Song and Psalm for the sons of Korah ["shir mizmor li'vnei korah"].

And there is Psalm 72 by King David (see v. 20) for his son Solomon (v. 1), Psalm 72:1,20 - A Psalm for Solomon ["li'shlomoh"]. Give the king your judgments, O God, and your righteousness to the king's son. (20) The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended.

This example demonstrates that the assumption required for the Christian view of this Psalm to hold, namely, that David is its author, isn't necessarily a valid one; certainly not the only possibility. The Psalm could have been composed by someone else, perhaps someone who served under David.

Note also that, in Psalm 72, King David speaks about himself in the 3rd-person in the opening and closing verses. The same is found in other Psalms written by David, e.g.,

Psalm 144:1,10 – (1) A Psalm of David ["l'David"]. Blessed be the L-rd my strength, who teaches my hands to war, and my fingers to fight; (10) It is He who gives salvation to kings; who saves David His servant from the harmful sword.

So it is plausible that King David authored Psalm 110, writing about himself in the 3rd-person, or prophetically about the future King/Messiah. This, then, allows for any of the Jewish interpretations to be valid.

When all is said and done the Hebrew consulted there is only one answer. Though there are several possible Biblically supportable Jewish interpretations of this Psalm, none of the Jewish interpretations of Psalm 110 support the Christian perspective, since it is centered on a clear mistranslation and concepts that are anathematic to the teachings of the Hebrew Bible.

WHO IS SPEAKING IN VERSE 1?

The KJV and many other common Christian translations render the opening verse in the following way,

Psalm 110:1 (KJV) - The LORD ["YHVH"] said unto my Lord ["la'donee"], Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool.

The common Jewish translation of the opening verse is,

Psalm 110:1 - Of David a psalm. The word of THE L-RD ["YHVH"] TO MY LORD/MASTER ["la'donee"]: "Sit at/[Wait for] My right hand, until I make your enemies a footstool at your feet."

1 ¶ A Psalm of David. The LORD saith unto my lord: 'Sit thou at My right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool.'

In the above two renditions, the equivalent transliterated Hebrew terms are shown in brackets following the corresponding translated terms. Since both renderings cannot be correct, let us take a closer look at this verse, with particular attention to the underlined phrases.

The first phrase is rendered as 'The LORD' in the KJV, and as 'The L-rd' in the Jewish translation; it appears in the Hebrew text as the Tetragrammaton ("YHVH"). Both Christian and Jewish interpretations agree on that term representing the Creator. So far so good.

The next term is rendered in the KJV as 'UNTO MY LORD' (note the capital 'L'), and as 'TO MY LORD/MASTER' (note the lower case 'l'/'m') in the Jewish translation. In the Hebrew text this word is (in transliterated form) "ladoni", pronounced as "la-do-nee". The Hebrew word "ladoni" consists of two components – "l-", which is the preposition and which can only mean 'to' in this case; and "adoni", which is the 1st-person, singular conjugation of the noun/title "adon". There are four different applications for "adon", of which there are 334 instances in the Hebrew Bible, as follows –

- (a) 'a ruler/governor/head of state' – 6x
- (b) 'appellation for addressing God' – 26x [none are "adoni"]
- (c) 'a title for a superior' – 202x [includes ALL "adoni"] (
- d) 'master/owner of …' – 103x [includes 3 from (b)]

There are 184 instances of "adoni" in the Hebrew Bible, both with and without attached prepositions, and these break down as follows -

- "adoni" – 'my lord/master' - 162x
- "ladoni" – 'to my lord/master' - 24x
- "vadoni" – 'and my lord/master' - 6x
- "badoni" – 'at my lord/master' - 2x
- "madoni" – 'from my lord/master' - 1x

Since our focus here is "Iadoni", here are the actual 24 citations from the Hebrew Bible – Gen 24:36,54,56, 32:5,6,19[4, 5, 18, respectively, in Christian Bibles], 44:9,16(x2),33; I Sam 24:6*, 25:27,28*,30*,31(x2); II Sam 4:8, 19:29; I Kgs 1:2(x2), 18:13*, 20:9; Ps 110:1*; I Chron 21:3*. Of these, those identified with an asterisk (*) are 9 cases where both the Tetragrammaton ("YHVH") AND "Iadoni" appear in the same verse. It is, of course, interesting to note that on 23 occasions, "Iadoni" was correctly translated by the KJV as 'to/unto my lord/master' [small "l"], and only in one case, in Ps 110:1, it was translated differently as shown above, 'upon my Lord' [large "L"], with the obvious Christological implication of the capital 'L'.

Answer for yourself: Is this "creative theology" by Gentile Christians and a denial of the laws of the Hebrew language? I will let you figure that out.

The fact is that, according to the Hebrew Bible (as is also the case in Modern Hebrew), there is no connection between "adoni" and 'The L-rd', since the appellation "adoni" is NEVER used to address God; it is used only when addressing a human being. On the other hand, the term "adon", as can be seen from (b) above, has such an application.

So now, with this information at hand, it becomes rather obvious that the Christian rendition with its Christological implication is impossible.

It is interesting to speculate about where this mistranslation in the KJV and other widely used Christian Bibles originated.

Here is how some ancient translations of the Hebrew Bible render the two adjacent terms "YHVH"/"adoni"

- Targum: "YHVH"/"li" (Said the L-rd in words to me, master over all of Israel, …)
- Christian LXX*: "o kurios"/"kurio mou" (Said The Lord to my Lord [capital "L"]…)
- Latin Vulgate*: "Dominus"/"Domino meo" (Spoke The Lord [to] my Lord …[capital "L"])

 This is Psalm 109 in both the Christian LXX and Jerome's Latin Vulgate.

We see that originally when the Hellenized Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt, translated the Prophets and the Psalms from the Hebrew into the Greek that took great liberties with the texts and inserted their own views of their "Cosmic Godman" into these texts to bolster their own theology among the nations. These Greek translations and all subsequent English and Latin translations taken from them for FORGERIES and mainline Christianity and the vast majority of Christian popular writers have not got a hint that the Bibles they carry are filled with out and out lies. The sad fact is that we grow up with such religious beliefs that oppose what the Jews believe about God and their Messiah and we attach our emotions to idolatry and blasphemy and never know it; that is until we die!

Then, in their original Greek, the 'quotations' of this verse in the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke, all have the same usage as appears in the Christian LXX [which I just showed you is forged]! Upon reading the relevant passages in the three Gospels, the root of the problem – the erroneous translations in Christian Bible – becomes clear. Each of the Gospel's rendering utilizes the same Greek word "kurios", meaning 'lord', twice in the same sentence, and Christian translations into English capitalize the initial letter of the word to read 'Lord' in both instances. The exegetical problems that the Gospels' Jesus refers to are only apparent in the Greek rendering and, consequently, in renderings from the Greek into other languages.

- In the Greek text, the first "kurios" (actually, "o kurios") translates the Tetragrammaton as a reference to 'The Lord', that is, 'God' (HaShem).

- The second "kurios", renders "adoni" as 'my lord/master' which, according to the authors' understanding, it refers to 'the Christ', i.e., Jesus the Messiah.

In other words, the single Greek word "kurios", is used in the Greek translation for two separate and distinct Hebrew words...how can that be?

Consequently, the resultant confusion this creates in Greek does not exist in the Hebrew original and, therefore, Jesus' discourse is only possible if he and those with whom he spoke were conversing in Greek - his exegesis in the Gospels is non-existent in the Hebrew and incorrect in its understanding of the Greek rendering. Again I am not trying to say Jesus spoke Greek for he spoke Aramaic/Hebrew. But this only goes to show us the great lengths that the writers of these New Testament documents and the translators of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek went to create and promote their own theologies instead of accurately rendering what the Hebrew Scriptures actually said and what the Jewish Revelation from God was understood to be by them.

On the other hand, there is no problem with David accepting that the Messiah will be greater than he is, though there is nothing in the Hebrew language of this verse to indicate that David is referring to the Messiah when he writes "adoni", 'my lord/master'. Moreover, there is nothing in David's words to indicate that the individual he refers to as 'my lord/master' is a divine entity. If he authored the Psalm, David is either referring to himself (writing the Psalm in the 3rd-person for someone else to chant about him), or the author (other than David) refers here to King David. There is nothing in the text of this Psalm to support the Christian claim that this is a reference to Jesus.

So, in response to the question in the heading of this subsection, "Who Is Speaking to Whom in Verse 1"? It should be clear that the Christian interpretation doesn't work, while any of the Jewish interpretations is plausible. It cannot be Jesus telling us what God said to him. It could be King David telling us what he was promised by God, or some other, anonymous author from the King's court relating the promises God made to his master, King David.

Now we continue in the 3rd article in this series where we will look to verse 4 and if there is to be a Melchizedek Priesthood that has come to replace the Aaronic Priesthood of if one is coming.

Let us continue our study into the Melchizedek Priesthood in the second article in this series.

WHO ARE THE EBIONITES AND WHAT SHOULD IT MEAN TO THE CHRISTIAN?

The doctrine of Trinity, which is one of the fundamental constituents of Christian dogma, was absent from Christianity during the lifetime of Jesus Christ. The maximum one can grant is that this doctrine started taking shape after the Crucifixion. It took many centuries for it to reach its final well-defined but inexplicable form. It went through a long process of extremely bitter and controversial debates between Christian theologians and philosophers representing different religious, cultural and traditional backgrounds.

It was greatly influenced by the myths and the traditions of various lands which hosted "Christianity" in its early period. The main stem of Christianity, however, which took care of and nurtured the development of "Christian beliefs" and philosophy in its early formative part was of Jewish stock. Jewish influence remained predominant throughout the early part of Christian history. The disciples of Jesus who learned and understood Christianity directly from Jesus and witnessed it in the form of his life, belonged to this stock. They were the primary custodians of Christianity with deeply embedded roots in the holy soil of Jesus' instructions and way of life. It was they who witnessed the Crucifixion and had seen Jesus after thecrucifixion.

THE FIRST FOLLOWERS OF JESUS

Early Christians (Jew and Gentile) appear to have been fundamentally divided over both the nature of Jesus and whether to adhere to the Mosaic Law or not. In the second phase of Christian development (after 50 C.E.), St. Paul became the most pivotal character in giving Christianity a new philosophy and ideology. There were fundamental differences of opinion between Paul and James the Righteous. While James looked after the Jerusalem Church, Paul was preaching in the West, particularly to the Gentiles. The Western Church evolved along Pauline doctrinal lines, whereas the Church in Jerusalem developed along monotheistic teachings.

One offshoot of James' ministry were the Ebionites, a sect whose name derives from the Hebrew "ebionim" meaning 'the meek' or 'the poor'. They were the Jewish Christians, for whom Jesus took on the mantle of Messiah and not that of the 'Son of God'. They followed the Mosaic law with great zeal, and had their own "Gospel" known in various contexts as the 'Gospel of the Hebrews', 'Gospel of the Ebionites' or the 'Gospel of the Nazarenes'. Here is a description of the Ebionites drawn from various sources.

In his book The History of the Church written in the 4th century AD in Caesarea, Eusebius mentions the Ebionites in the book Vespasian to Trajan. Eusebius, the most renowned church historian, mocks the Ebionite views (remember he is a Gentile in the Western Church), saying that their name comes from their poor and mean opinion of Jesus. According to Eusebius, the Ebionites regarded Jesus as mortal (human and not divine) and esteemed him as righteous through the growth of his character. As Jews, the Ebionites observed the Sabbath; every detail of the Law, and did not accept the Pauline idea of salvation through faith alone. Eusebius also talks of another group of Ebionites who accepted the virgin birth and the Holy Spirit, but refused to accept Jesus' pre-existence as "God the Word and Wisdom". They followed a 'Gospel of the Hebrews' which could possibly have been St Matthew's Gospel (written in Hebrew but lost to us today). They observed the Sabbath and the Jewish system, but celebrated the resurrection.

In his book describing the background of the Ebionites, R Eisenman in The Dead Sea Scrolls Uncovered writes that James (the 'Zaddik' or 'Zadok', meaning Righteous) was the leader of the Jerusalem Church in the middle of the first century (40-60 AD approx.) The branch which was retrospectively called Jewish Christianity in Palestine. The Ebionites developed from this branch.

The Community who followed James were known as 'the Poor', (Galatians 2:10, James 2:3-5) a designation mentioned both in the Sermon on the Mount and in the Dead Sea Scrolls. In many ways, Eisenman feels that the Ebionites were similar to the authors of the Dead Sea Scrolls. They honored James the Righteous, and believed Jesus to be their mortal Messiah, while Paul had become an "Apostate from the Law". They observed the Law and the Sabbath with great zeal.

They held James in the highest regard, while Paul was considered 'The Enemy' as spoken and warned of by Yeshua (Matt 13:24-43):

Matt 13:24 (KJV) Another parable put he forth unto them, saying, The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field: 25 But while men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat, and went his way. 26 But when the blade was sprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also. 27 So the servants of the householder came and said unto him, Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field? from whence then hath it tares? 28 He said unto them, An enemy hath done this. The servants said unto him, Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up? 29 But he said, Nay; lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. 30 Let both grow together until the harvest: and in the time of harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them: but gather the wheat into my barn. 31 Another parable put he forth unto them, saying, The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard seed, which a man took, and sowed in his field: 32 Which indeed is the least of all seeds: but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof. 33 Another parable spake he unto them; The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened. {measures: the word in the Greek is a measure containing about a peck and a half, wanting a little more than a pint} 34 All these things spake Jesus unto the multitude in parables; and without a parable spake he not unto them: 35 That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, I will open my mouth in parables; I will utter things which have been kept secret from the foundation of the world. 36 Then Jesus sent the multitude away, and went into the house: and his disciples came unto him, saying, Declare unto us the parable of the tares of the field. 37 He answered and said unto them, He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man; 38 The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked [one]; 39 The enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. 40 As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world. 41 The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; {things...: or, scandals} 42 And shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. 43 Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear.

This idea of Paul is definitely different from the light of the redactionist history we find in the New Testament but ample evidence exists which throws a completely different light upon Paul and history. If you would like to see this for yourself it is detailed at our website: http://faithofyeshua.faithweb.com as well as at http://paulproblem.faithweb.com. Thus according to the Jewish Christians, or Yeshua's church, Paul was one who deviated from the Mosaic Laws and Commandments and was as far as they were concerned the "adversary" (devil). This may be hard for Christians to understand, yet believe considering what you have heard taught from pulpits Sunday through Sunday your whole life, but what you have heard does not change the facts that have surfaced from both archeology and in-depth Bible study as well as a detailed examination of the extra-biblical documents that exist today for your inspection. Somewhere you have to come to terms with James and the early church's view of Paul as handed down to us for those who wish to inquire. One cannot discount their extra-Biblical writings that have come down to us that severely impugn the "Gospel" Paul preached to Gentiles, and this explains his resentment to the apostles in Jerusalem as recorded in the epistles (reputed pillars...note the sarcasm in his tone when addressing the leadership of Jesus' church).

According to Baigent, Leigh and Lincoln in The Messianic Legacy, the source of the original teachings of the Ebionites, Gnostics, Manicheans, Sabians, Mandeans, Nestorians and Elkasites has been described as the Nazarene philosophy. They refer to Nazarene thought as: `An orientation towards Jesus and his teachings which derives ultimately from the original Nazarene position, as articulated by Jesus himself, then propagated by James, Jude or Judas Thomas and their immediate entourage.' Their beliefs were:

- strict adherence to the Mosaic Law
- recognition of Jesus as Messiah
- belief in the normal human birth of Jesus
- hostility towards Pauline views

There is a collection of Arabic manuscripts kept in a library in Istanbul which contains quotes from a 5th or 6th Century text ascribed to the `al-nasara', written in Syriac and found in a monastery in Khuzistan in south-west Iran near the Iraq border. It reflects the views of the Nazarene hierarchy escaping from Jerusalem after the destruction in 66 AD. It refers to Jesus as a human being and stresses the Judaic Law (notice that this is the belief of the first century church and those closest to the historical Jesus).

The inescapable conclusion of the scrupulous student of history, language, and Scripture is that Paul's followers "abandoned the religion of Christ and turned towards the religious doctrines of the Romans."

Of all the various doctrines which evolved during the formative stages of Christianity, only those who believed in the Nazarene philosophy can justifiably be given preference. These early Christians were taught the meaning of Christianity by Jesus himself.

THE ROLE OF PAUL

From the time of St Paul onwards, as Christianity spread to alien lands and pagan faiths within the Roman Empire, it began to be powerfully influenced and bent by the cultures and mythologies prevalent in those lands and went further away from its nascent purity. St Paul did his bit in influencing the deterioration of the "original Christian thought" by introducing his own brand of mysticism. He was neither of Jewish stock nor did he have any direct contact with Jesus, except through his claimed vision. He was already, it seems, under the powerful influence of the alien cultures.

Apparently there were two options available to St Paul, either to fight the strenuous battles against a world of superstitions, myths and legends prevalent in the lands of the Roman Empire from times immemorial or to give in to them and let Christianity change to suit their requirements and ambitions. This gave the Gentiles the message that Christianity was not essentially different from their legends and myths. Paul only recast Judaism in terminology which was already familiar to the Gentile to whom he preached. Thus Paul found the adoption of the second option far more profitable and convenient and let Christianity change to suit the ambitions and philosophies popular in the gentile world.

This strategy worked well in as much as it gained a great number of converts to the new faith which otherwise would not have been easily available. But at what cost. Unfortunately, it ended up only in an unholy competition between noble Christian values and pagan myths. What St Paul changed was only the names of the pagan gods and replaced them with Jesus, God the Father and the Holy Ghost. It was not him in fact who invented the myth of Trinity and introduced it to the pagan world in the name of Christianity, on the contrary he borrowed the myth of the Trinity from pagan mythology and bonded it to Christianity. From then on it was the same old paganism but with new names and new faces.

Pauline Christianity, therefore, did not succeed in changing the doctrines, myths and superstitions of the pagan world but only ended in changing "original Christianity" (Messianic Judaism) in accordance with them. If the mountain did not respond to his call, he decided to go to the mountain.

THE REALITY OF A JEWISH JESUS

Of course it is anybody's prerogative to choose between Pauline Christianity and that of James the Righteous and other early leaders of Christianity who were the disciples of Jesus Christ himself. But here we want to establish the point that the main stock of Christianity continued to develop along Jewish lines and kept itself aloof from the later innovations which generated the rigmarole and complexities of Christian dogmas we see today for Gentile imaginations such as the godhead of Jesus as the Son, the Trinity, Inherited Sin, Redemption, the rejection and replacement of Israel by the church, etc. The views of the early leaders of the original Church, among whom James the Righteous is prominent, were simple and honest and had no internal contradictions or paradoxes hiding behind a smoke screen of mystery as we confront today in the Pauline churches of our land. A study of the history of Judaism in Christianity establishes beyond question the fact that the Unity of God, uncomplicated by the slogan of Trinity, remained the official doctrine of the true Church of Christ in its pristine purity. The faith of Yeshua was Jewish, is Jewish, and will always remain Jewish. It is us who need to reevaluate what we have been taught and believe in light of fact and reason.

Please remember that this short treatise is not an attempt to convert Christians to any faith other than that of the faith both held and practiced by Yeshua (Jesus). It is simply a genuine effort to invite the Christians back to the pure unadulterated faith and practice of Jesus himself. It is a sincere attempt to revert the fiction back to the facts of Christianity. Facts that are certainly as beautiful as they are realistic and satisfy both the head and the heart.

For almost two thousand years, it is not the legends woven around the reality of Jesus Christ that has kept Christianity together and has helped it to survive the challenges of reason and ever growing enlightenment borne out of scientific progress, nor is its survival due to the mystic belief of Trinity. What has held the truth and essence of Christianity together is the beauty of the person and the teachings of Jesus Christ. It is the divine conduct and not the divine person of Jesus that has been so beautiful to adhere to. It was the suffering, patience and perseverance for the sake of noble ideals and his bold upright rejection of all despotic attempts to make him change his principles that is the real backbone of Christianity. It is still as beautiful and as lovable today as it was ever before. It has influenced so powerfully the Christian minds and hearts that they remain bonded to Jesus.

His real greatness lies in the fact that he transcended and conquered the forces of darkness that had conspired to vanquish him despite being a frail human being and no more than a human being. That victory of Jesus is something to be shared with pride by the children of Adam. As we see it from the vantage point of in-depth scholarship, he is one of the most noble progeny of Adam who taught humanity by his example of perseverance in the face of extreme suffering and pain. Not to surrender but to remain steadfast in the teeth of extreme trial was the noblest achievement of Jesus. It was his life of suffering and pain that redeemed humanity and made him conquer death.

To share suffering in life is far better than to escape suffering through death. Hence the concept of the supreme sacrifice of Jesus is magnified not only by his death, but by his life lived in total obedience to his Father. Today, we Christians share in his grace.

The greatness of Jesus, we again insist, lay in his supreme sacrifice during his lifetime. All his life, he defied the temptations to compromise, give in and exchange a life of suffering with that of ease and comfort. The same cannot be said for Paul, when in-depth analysis of his teachings as paralleled with those of Jesus and Judaism often diverge. Day in, day out Yeshua confronted death but refused to give in and lived for the sake of the sinful to bring them to life. He conquered death not by surrendering himself to death, but by refusing to bow down to it. He defeated it roundly and emerged from its clutches where a lesser man would have perished. Thus he proved his truth and the truth of his word and message beyond a shadow of doubt. That is how we see Jesus and that is why we love him so. His voice was the voice of God and not the voice of his own ambitions. He said what he was commissioned to say, neither more nor less than what God had told him to say. He worshipped God throughout his life and worshipped Him alone and never did he require any mortal to worship or bow before himself or before his mother. This is the reality of Jesus to which we at Bet Emet Ministries invite the Christians of all denomination and faiths to return.

LOOKING AT JESUS AND THE FAILURE OF THE MESSIANIC PROPHECIES TO BE FULFILLED #1

Christianity is rooted in Palestine in a Jewish environment and in the historical circumstances of a plainly dated period. This assuredly requires no argument. To this time and place we are therefore bound to go for the elucidation of Christian Origins. What we find is not only surprising to most Christians but is diametrically opposite to many of their "beliefs" about the concept of the Jewish Messiah.

But it is by no means easy to relate the life of Jesus and the activities of his original followers, known as Nazoreans (Nazarenes), to the contemporary situation as modeled by Gentile Christianity and its teachings. This is largely due to the character of the New Testament and the lack of external evidences about the beginnings of Christianity. To reach conclusions which can fairly be regarded as corresponding as nearly as possible to the reality entails a vast amount of analysis and comparison, the patient piecing together of a host of hints and scraps of tradition, and in particular a sympathetic involvement in the affairs of the Jewish people and detachment from considerations of Christian theology. This I have done! Because of what the Church has taught for so many centuries it has been extremely difficult for Christian scholars to undertake such an investigation objectively.

Let us begin our investigation by reiterating that the term "Christ" is the Greek translation of the Hebrew term Messiah, meaning the Anointed One. The term "Gospel" is from the Greek "Evangel", translating the Hebrew word for "Good News."

WHAT WAS THE "GOOD NEWS" TO THE HEARERS OF YESHUA?

What important for us to distinguish right from the beginning was that Israel was well familiar with how to "obtain" salvation and the "Good News" was not to be understood in any such way in the first century by the hearers of Yeshua. Atonement was possible in many different ways as taught by the Jewish Tanakh (Law, Prophets, and Writings). What the Christian needs to understand out right is that Israel was not waiting to be saved "spiritually"; she was waiting for the "Good News" that her "Messiah" that was expected by the Jews had appeared. The difficulty we have in Christianity today is that the picture presented to identify "the Messiah" by the Christian Church is completely different from the "Messiah of the Jewish Scriptures. Such a "metamorphosis" is accomplished in the New Testament by the numerous misquotations from the Jewish Palestinian Masoretic Text along with the hundreds of mistranslations and scriptures lifted out of context for "theological purposes" by the Gentile Fathers of the Church.

It makes all the difference to our understanding of Christianity if we are enabled to apprehend that it did not begin as a new religion but as a movement of monotheistic Jews who held Jesus to be their God-sent king and deliverer from the various political and religious tyrannies inflicted upon the them by the non-Jewish nations. Rome just happened to be the latest in a long line of such persecutors.

Here, in a sentence, is what it is imperative to know about the origins of Christianity. Here we have the essential clue to the activities of Jesus and his first followers which helps to compensate for many material facts which are beyond recovery. Armed with this information we can get Christianity in correct perspective, and trace clearly and simply what is ascertainable to the student of the Bible today. What is interesting is how this concept of "the Jewish Messiah" was transformed into what it become afterwards under the influence of Gentile religious domination.

MESSIANISM…WHAT IT REALLY WAS IN SPITE OF WHAT YOU HAVE BEEN POSSIBLY TOLD

It is often said that Christianity is founded upon a person. That is true. But it is only part of the historical truth. What, so to speak, was the person founded upon? The answer is that he was founded upon an idea, a strange idea current among the Jews of his time, an idea alien to Western thought which many non-Jewish theologians still find very inconvenient, the idea of Messianism. It was Messianism which made the life of Jesus what it was and so brought Christianity into being. It was Messianism, as accepted and later altered by Gentile believers, which contributed towards making the deification of Jesus inevitable. It was Messianism which provided the spiritual impulse behind the Jewish war with Rome which broke out in A.D. 66, resulting in the destruction of much authoritative testimony and records about Jesus and the substantial separation of Gentile from Jewish Christianity. The fundamental teaching of Christianity, then, was that in Jesus the Messiah (the Christ) had come. There can be not the shadow of a doubt about this. It is the ultimate conviction on which the whole edifice of Christianity rests, the historical fact on which all the Gospels are agreed. This teaching was the gospel, underlying all the Gospels, the one thing which gave them the right to be so called. The faith of the earliest believers in Jesus was that which voiced itself in the declaration of Peter, as recorded in Mark, "You are the Messiah" (Mk. 7:29), simply this without any qualification. The persuasion they had was built upon what Jesus had said and done. It was he who had given them cause to conclude that he was the Messiah, and he had done so quite deliberately. But what the Gospels do not tell us is what in the first instance had persuaded him. Unless we can discover why Jesus held himself to be the Messiah, what current teaching about the Messiah he applied to himself, we are not in possession of the key to the mystery of his life and death.

We have no right to say that while Jesus accepted the designation of Messiah he did so in a sense quite different from any expectations entertained in his time. We must stop and reflect upon this in detail. The Jewish People had been promised their Messiah and were given signs to look for that confirmed that he "that is King of the Jews" had come. Simply said these things never materialized before Yeshua's death; nor afterwards for that matter. The Jewish await today the fulfillment of the "Messianic Scriptures" found in their Bible. It would be unthinkable for Yeshua to be other than what was promised, firstly because being the Messiah meant answering to certain prophetic requirements which for him were divinely inspired, and secondly because he would consciously have been depriving his people of any possibility of acknowledging him: he would be inviting them to reject him as a false Messiah. This he did not do.

DID JESUS BELIEVE HIMSELF TO BE "THE APPOINTED MESSIAH" OF THE LAST DAYS?

Yes! I believe he was to be the long awaited Messiah but sadly something went wrong. We need to look into this and understand why the Messianic Kingdom did not materialize as prophesied.

We have to take the view that Jesus believed it to be his calling and destiny to fulfill the Messianic Hope, and to do so in a manner which would conform with the predictions he accepted as authoritative. Our business is to find out the conditions with which Jesus felt he had to comply, and on this basis to follow the course of his actions. Obviously we have to divorce the issue altogether from the paganized doctrine of the incarnation of the Godhead. Scriptural expectation did not identify the Messiah with God, and, indeed, the nature of Jewish monotheism wholly excluded such an idea! This might be hard for the Christian to accept, but Jesus as much as any other Jew would have regarded as blasphemous the manner in which he is depicted, for instance, in the Fourth Gospel which is a very "Hellenized" document. Jesus is a Jew, not a Greek-god-man. Lack of study on the part of the Christian prevents him from realizing this.

Taking the Gospels together, and these are the chief source of our information about Jesus, we have in them an epitome of the process by which the traditions about him grew and expanded with the changing needs and fortunes of succeeding generations of believers, Jewish and Gentile, so that Jesus as he appears in them is a composite and somewhat contradictory figure.

Answer for yourself: Have you ever seen this for yourself yet? It exists and your failure to see it does not mean it does not exist; only that your level of perception is not deep enough yet to see it.

Yeshua's image in the Gospels is like the idol of Nebuchadnezzar's dream in the book of Daniel, part gold, part silver, part bronze, part iron and part clay. The gold is there to be extracted, but we cannot take hold of it unalloyed without knowledge of the influences and circumstances to which Jesus himself had responded. It is not enough to look back to him through the minds of much later believers not of Jewish origin. This might surprise you, but scholars today will easily refute that the Gospel writers were the Jewish Apostles of Yeshua; in fact strong evidences remain to make one strongly believe that Gentile authorship is behind such documents. If you seek the truth about Yeshua then you must look for him through the pre-Christian development of Messianism and not through the alterations of history and facts handed down to us by the Gentile Church.

THE SETTING FOR THE UNVEILING OF THE MESSIAH OF ISRAEL

The coming of the Messiah was not something fortuitous: it was closely linked with a period of history prophetically anticipated, the Last Times or End of the Days, which would precede the inauguration of the Kingdom of God. Now pay close attention to what is said next: The Messiah could NOT appear at any time, but only at the End of the Days, which would precede the inauguration of the Kingdom of God. The Messiah could not appear at any time, but only at the End of Days, at a time of testing and great tribulation for Israel. This is calculated by understanding Daniel chapter 9 in the Palestinian Masoretic Text and not the Old Testament in Christian Bibles which most, but not all, have altered the Rabbinical interpretations by changing the punctuation in order to explain away the lack of the appearing of the Kingdom of Heaven and the lack of fulfillment of the Messianic prophecies by Yeshua (Selah)!

The conception of the Last Times drew upon Biblical predictions relating to the Latter Days and the Day of the LORD, which became combined with Babylonian and Persian ideas of a succession of Ages. During the Ages the forces of Good and Evil would contend with one another, and the struggle would reach its climax in the penultimate Age, being followed by the final Age of peace and bliss, the Kingdom of God. The Last Times would thus be the closing period of the old order, when the assaults of Evil would reach their most malevolent intensity, bringing great misery to humanity and persecution and suffering to the Elect of Israel. When these signs of the "Last Days" appeared then the Messiah was to be expected to appear.

According to those who studied these matters, it could not be known how long the Last Times would endure, but it could be known approximately when "The Last Days" would begin. For this a basis of calculation had to be available, and it was found in the book of Daniel in the prophecy of the Seventy Weeks (Dan. 9:24-27), later understood to mean seventy weeks of years (490 years). The Last Times could be expected to begin after the lapse of 490 years 'from the going forth of the commandment [of Cyrus] to restore and build Jerusalem, that is to say, the Messiah was to become manifest no later than 70 C.E.

If you have never read Daniel chapter 9 in the Stone Edition Tanakh or the JPS Tanakh I suggest you do so and then compare with your Old Testaments in your Christian Bibles to see if the punctuation of the "weeks" is the same. What is paramount for you to understand is that the Hebrew manuscripts contained no punctuation; therefore often the understanding of the passage was handed down through oral tradition which the Rabbis preserved. Later punctuation was added to the printed texts to reflect the proper interpretation held sacred by the Rabbis. Later you need to know that theological necessity caused Christians to alter and add punctuation in certain places to the "weeks" prophecy which differed from the Rabbinical interpretation. Remembering who is a "light to the nations" then understand this: "the light to the nations" was rejected by the Gentile Christian authorities as they altered the texts to suit their theological persuasions. They felt the need to explain away why Jesus, their Messiah, had not fulfilled the Jewish Scriptures. These Christian authorities needed reasons to respond to the Jews' claim that Jesus had not fulfilled the prophecies and could not be considered their Messiah. Literally these Gentile Fathers "created" theology explaining away the lack of manifestation of the Kingdom as expected by Yeshua and the Jews along with the failure of Yeshua to fulfill the prophecies that was expected of "the Messiah" when he appeared. The seventy weeks of Daniel were separated through creative punctuation in Christian texts and the last seven years postponed into the future. Dispensational theology holds strong sway in Christianity yet today. The Jews have always understood this and their theological works reflect such an understanding and oppose traditions Christian positions that most are familiar with today. As a Seminary graduate I had never read a Tanakh and was unfamiliar with alternate readings and punctuations which is no longer the case. I always wondered why in Seminary I had a "rubrics cube" theology; as one thing was made to fit then "opps" another problem surfaced which required tinkering to make it fit the scheme of things. In Seminary I realized one day that my "theology" was not pure; it contained a little bit of this and that and nothing was pure. I was taught whatever was necessary to validate the "current" accepted beliefs of the denomination. This was so convenient. This is not necessary with the Jewish texts in the Tanakh…they all lay perfectly as seen in their interpretation of Daniel 9. But at that time in my life I did not know this until I became very familiar with the Tanakh and did laborious comparisons with my Christian Bibles.

Those Jews who believed in this interpretation as found in their Tanakh, and were living in the reign of Herod the Great (37-4 B.C.), could accept that the Last Times had now begun, and that therefore before very long the coming of the Messiah was to be expected. They could count the years from the going forth of the decree of which Daniel spoke. The end of the time period was rapidly approaching and the Messiah was expected soon! This explains why a strong messianic excitement manifested itself among the Jews from this time onward, and why no one before this had claimed to be the Messiah. Some were thought by the people to be "Messiahs in waiting" but events proved them wrong.

More later. Shalom

THE ESSENES...THE STORY OF CHRISTIAN ORIGINS

The religious faith of the occident, or the western world, consists substantially of a synthesis of beliefs and doctrines which had their origin in many lands and among various peoples and which were combined and proclaimed in what we may call the New Testament. Dispersed among the New Testament is this synthesis of religious beliefs amidst Biblical Judaism. The creeds, disciplines, and dogmas on which almost all the churches of Europe and the Americas and many of those in Asia are based, purport to derive their authority from these Gospels and Epistles; and all these multifarious communions proclaim that theirs is the religion established by Jesus, whom they revere as the Christ.

The principal concepts of the Christian Gospels, which have played so crucial a role in occidental life, can be traced to their ultimate sources. Over the last 15 years scores of old as well as modern books and hundreds of articles in encyclopedias were first read by way of orientation; but, since recondite knowledge is to be had only by a minute study of the sources, this soon became an industry. More than four years were consumed in the intensive study of ancient Egyptian, Persian, Brahmana, Gaina, Buddhist, Judaistic, Essene, and Christian literature. Quotations were copied and organized for easy reference. All the major streams of thought were then carefully analyzed. Important elements from various ancient cultures were discovered to have converged, first, in the Pythagorean thiasoi and then in the Essene Order, whence the Christian Gospel emerged, which, in turn, proceeded to penetrate the emotions and to achieve dominion over the Graeco-Roman world.

THE ESSENE RELIGIOUS SYNTHESIS

The Essenes, lately the object of so much attention, play a central role in our drama. They were an extraordinary group of Jewish communist-celibates who, in their formative stage about 170 B.C.E., absorbed the metaphysics and the eschatology of the Zoroastrians, and then, some sixty-five years later, by becoming Pythagoreans, incorporated into their system much of the discipline and soteriology of the mystery-cults of Greece and Asia Minor. Upon all this, they engrafted a Christology which combined a Persian with a Messianic Judaic concept, which, in a period of crisis, they personalized in their martyred Teacher of Righteousness, whom they expected to return upon the clouds about 35-30 B. C., accompanied by myriads of angels to conduct the Last Judgment. If you were to invest study into these areas it would be your conclusion, based on the evidence and facts available for your inspection, that Jesus was an Essene who, convinced that he was himself the incarnate Christ destined to redeem and judge mankind, left the Order of the Essenes (strict Pharisees) for the purpose of creating a mass-movement.

The certainty finally emerges that Christianity was a highly composite doctrine which combined many of the age-old religious concepts first developed by Egyptians, Babylonians, Assyrians, Persians, Buddhists, and Greeks, as well as by Jews, Phrygians, Syrians, and other inhabitants of Asia Minor. It was congenitally related to all of these; and when any of them accepted Christianity, they were simply recovering what was, at least in part, originally their own. This explains the ease at which Gentile Christianity became a world religion, yet had its roots in a Jewish movement. In the light of worldwide anti-Semitism this is amazing to say the least.

We at Bet Emet feel that the realization of this fact must induce among all sectarians a definite humility, which should in turn, contribute toward eliminating those doctrinal differences which divide our society into a multiplicity of groups shut off from each other by ideological barriers, as if we all lived in hermetically sealed compartments, incapable of fellowship or communion.

THE CORE OF ESSENE TEACHING IN RELATIONSHIP TO SALVATION

Mature Essenism taught the following concepts as synthesized from Egyptians, Babylonians, Assyrians, Persians, Buddhists, and Greeks, as well as by Jews, Phrygians, Syrians:

- That the human race is divided into two groups which are forever separated, the Elect and the unrighteous, the Children of Light and the Children of Darkness
- That the former may be redeemed for everlasting glory in heaven, but only through divine intervention; that a god-man (Angel-Messiah) must appear as a human being on earth, and, in fact, had appeared, to bring salvation to humanity
- That all of the Elect who accept him and become his disciples will be redeemed; that all others are doomed to super eternally in hell fire
- That the Children of Light are made manifest through their celibacy, saintly brotherhood, and communal poverty and equalitarianism
- That the god-man is the Soter, i.e., the divine sacrifice who gives his life for many and whose flesh and blood are consumed by his communicants so that they too may become divine and immortal
- That in his first manifestation the savior proclaims his revelation; that after his death, he returns to the Father for a period while his followers preach his gospel; that before the end of the then existing generation he would certainly return in a grand Parousia to judge all mankind and establish the kingdom of heaven.

This was the Essene-Christian faith, which is also the religion of the occident.

This gospel consists primarily of four basic elements: soteriology, eschatology, ethics, and the Messianic concept. If one is to be honest with the material available in relationship to Christian doctrine and dogma, he must first consider the sources of this Essene soteriology, that is to say, its doctrine concerning the incarnate godman who dies for humanity and whose body and blood must be consumed sacramentally so that the Elect may become divine and immortal. As you see salvation did not come from faith and obedience, but though mystic rituals involved in the eating allegorically the flesh of a godman and the symbolic drinking of the blood of this godman. The trail leads us first to the Nile, where civilization and organized religion began in the dim reaches of tile prehistoric past.

The first officially authentic Essene scriptures were published shortly after an Arab goatherd, following one of his animals, stumbled into a cave near the Dead Sea, where a treasure-trove of ancient documents was found, several of which were virtually intact. By a strange succession of fortunate incidents, these were quickly published, and that made available to the world.

This set off one of the most intensive archeological hunts in history; scholars and scientists hastened to the Judaean desert in search of additional Scrolls. In this, they were signally successful: remnants, large and small, of hundreds of Essene scriptures were recovered, all of which had been secreted in sealed jars about 69 A.D. Material was found in at least five caves, of which that in Cave 4 alone constituted a corpus of original Essene scripture sufficient, should it be translated and published, to fill two volumes the size of the King James version of the Bible.

Then, however, strange things began to occur. In the beginning, and for several years, no portion of this treasure, deposited in the Jordanian Museum in Jerusalem, has been published, or even made available to scholars. Of the 8 men, appointed to collate, arrange, publish, and translate these documents, 4 were Roman Catholics; and only John Marco Allegro, the English researcher, was without denominational affiliation. When he quickly translated and published the Copper Scroll and the few fragments entrusted to him; and then when he declared that the Essene Teacher of Righteousness, executed by the Jewish priests about 70-68 B.C., may have been crucified, he was denied all further access to the Scroll material.

As year after year passed away without the appearance of any more Essene scripture, although from time to time elaborate promises were made that they would soon be available, many began to question the reasons for the delay and the concealment.

Since then, ample time has elapsed for the preparation and publication of all Essene material. But not one line of the hundreds of pages found in the caves has been released until the last few years.

Although additional Essene scriptures failed to appear, there was a plethora of books and articles dealing with the cult and its Scrolls during the years following 1950. Dozens of books and hundreds of articles, expressing every conceivable point of view, have appeared. It is probable that a complete bibliography of all material printed in this field might comprise somewhere between 1,500 and 2,000 titles.

During the Six-Day War of 1967, the Jewish force overran Jerusalem and captured the Jordanian Museum. To the best of our knowledge, nothing has been published concerning the fate or the whereabouts of the Essene Scrolls—the most precious concentration of ancient literature ever discovered in modern times.

Until recently no outsider, of course, knew the contents of these documents; but it seems difficult to doubt that there was a constructive conspiracy to conceal them and to prevent their publication. All discussion concerning the Scrolls seems to have been silenced for years and only recently all the contents of the scrolls have been made public.

The motive for this concealment, we believe, is not far to seek. Although the evidence linking pristine Christianity to the Dead Sea Covenanters is already very substantial, there are still men of stature who deny the existence of such a relation. ship. With the release of the later documents, it was established beyond all doubt that Christianity grew out of Essenism.

The concealing the Essene scriptures for years was an concerted effort by Christian religious authorities in hopes of preventing or forestalling the the verification made from them that pristine Christianity developed from an esoteric Jewish cult which had forsaken Judaism as we understand it and gravitated toward a Pythagorean, Buddhist, Iranian apocalyptic sect. We believe, secondly, that the whole orthodox or so-called Christian world, with its material assets worth hundreds of billions of dollars, wishes to preserve the myth of its unique origin, founded on the inspired message of a god-man whose only source of doctrine or inspiration was the creator of the universe. The Dead Sea Scrolls prove otherwise!

The vested interests of those religious communities are therefore at stake; they will not, if they can prevent it, permit the publication of authentic materials which may eventually reduce their influence and credibility and, more importantly, cause a decline in their wealth and income. Thankfully, they forestalled the publication of these scrolls but could not prevent it.

Since most people read only what reinforces the persuasions they have already accepted, we realize that few indeed among those already committed to some creed will be motivated to read these articles. Edwin Franden Dakin once remarked that the greatest miracle in the world is the capacity of humanity to believe—without evidence. Most people are nurtured by their delusions. However, true education or enlightenment cannot exist except among those who follow St. Paul's dictum to try all things and in the end retain the good.

In these articles and web-pages, therefore, we have sought the truth concerning Gentile Christianity and how it borrowed from all religions by examining their own sacred scriptures: our position being that if these are internally unassailable, they probably constitute a solid foundation for faith. However, if they are filled with discrepancies, contradictions, and presentations which are mutually exclusive; if they are patently false or even ridiculous on their face, how can those who rely on them for ultimate truth confirm themselves in their belief except by refusing to examine the most obvious facts? How can divine infallibility be claimed for "revelations" which bear every earmark of forgery or folk-myth?

We have submitted the evidence and conclusions found in the following pages to critics everywhere who would assuredly be delighted to demonstrate their error or fallacy; but, since they cannot deny the words of their own official Scriptures, no one has been able to impugn anything we have written. It is one thing to deny something; but it is entirely another thing to refute it. Emotion and zeal is a poor substitute for facts and evidence!

We are well aware of how desperately suffering humanity craves the consolation of religion, and we do not for a moment deny that millions obtain this from delusions which are as unfounded as they are irrational and untruthful. Again, what we don't know will not hurt us...until we die and find out we were wrong!

We believe, however, that it is possible for an increasing number of men and women to develop and embrace a system of ethics and intellectual superstructure which will create a happy and successful life without the fear of imagined specters or a dependence upon false dogmas. Many are they who have done so. We at Bet Emet look forward to a time when a large portion of the human race will obtain the moral and intellectual elevation which will enable them to live according to truths revealed by God and not by the false religious beliefs of men desiring power and authority over the people. Shalom.

THE SOURCE FROM WHICH MOSES DREW THE TEN COMMANDMENTS AND THE LAWS OF NOAH

If I were to tell you that of all the people to have ever lived on this planet that the Sumerians and Egyptians knew God best I am sure most would thing that such a statement is totally foolish. Before you jump to that conclusion I would hope might be curious enough to look the the evidence that substantiates it. Let us begin with our understanding of Moses being an Egyptian. We saw in this website previously that the Laws of Noah were the bedrock upon which the Ten Commandments or "Categories" were constructed later. Now let us look a little deeper if we could.

MOSES THE LAWGIVER....AN EGYPTIAN PHARAOH

Ancient Egypt had a formative influence on the ancient world that no other nation had and it sadly goes almost unrecognized today. Egypt's influence was through its stability and links with is own remote past, and Egypt's reputation for secret wisdom was due to the peculiar geographical and climate features of the country. The Nile River Valley and the Nile Delta comprised approximately 12,000 square miles of fertile land, the villages and towns of which were situated along its length. The Mediterranean Sea lay to the north, vast deserts to the east and west and dense jungle to the south, making unsuspected invasion near impossible, and its virtual isolation allowed Egyptian civilization to develop unthreatened by its neighbors. Because of this, the ancient Egyptian culture was very static, and it existed virtually unchanged for millennia, its origins going back beyond 3000 B.C.E.; some records indicated 20,000 yrs or more. This kind of information sure sinks the boat of Bishop Usher's chronology of mankind existing only 6000 yrs or so which Roman Catholicism gives the world today. Archeology today is making a joke out of much that Rome forced down the throats of people now going on for almost 2000 yrs.

Much of the knowledge concerning ancient Egypt is based on complex rituals related to death and the afterlife. Since Egyptian civilization was a product in many ways of the natural forces that surrounded it, the people looked to Nature to explain the unexplainable. Understand that Nature was influenced by the Heavens and the Cosmos; thus they are intertwined and inseparable. The three main elements of the Egyptian religion were:

- 1. A solar monotheism--one god as the creator of the universe who manifested his power in the sun and its operations.
- 2. A belief in the regenerative power of nature which expressed itself in the adoration of ithyphallic gods, fertile goddesses and a series of animal and vegetation deities.
- 3. A perception of anthropomorphic divinity, the life of whom existed in this world and in the world beyond.

THE EGYPTIAN PERCEPTION OF GOD

The Egyptian word for God is NTR or Neter which is illustrated by the hieroglyph of an axe-head supported by a wooden handle, a strong and formidable weapon in skilled hands. The use of this sign as an emblem of God is probably very ancient and based on prehistoric man's belief that God was a mighty and formidable warrior, which conception they carried through even in their most sophisticated philosophies. While it is quite possible that the word means "strength" and "power, " other attributes are "renewal" or "renovation," as if the fundamental idea of God was one who had the power to perpetually renew itself and was self-creating. Above all else, the ancient Egyptians believed in one God, who was self-existent, immortal, eternal, and invisible--the Creator of heaven and earth. Their principal religious theology was based upon this belief and no matter how far back we trace its history, there is no time when this belief was not predominant. If examined closely, the gods are found to be nothing more than forms, manifestations, phases or attributes of the god Ra who was, in turn, the outward manifestation or symbol of the One God of whom it was not their custom to address.

UNDERSTANDING THE GODS OF EGYPT AND THEIR RELIGIOUS CONCEPTS

The word Neturu means "gods" and refers to beings which in some way partake of the nature or character of God. They were referred to as intermediaries between God and man, and the word has also been translated as "Those who from Heaven to Earth came." They are spoken of in the Bible as the Anakim, and in Chapter 6 of Genesis they are also called Nephilim, which in Hebrew means the same thing, "Those who have come down from the Heavens to Earth." Close examination of the following gods will give the reader an adequate conception of the Egyptian attitude regarding the multifaceted aspects of God and the religious concepts at the heart of the Egyptian Religion:

THE EFFECT OF EGYPTIAN THOUGHT AND THEOLOGY ON THE ANCIENT JEWS

The Jews, having come from Chaldea as a group of nomadic tribes under Abraham, moved down into Egypt during the time of the great famine, and the duration of their residence was a period of some 400 years. As a result of this residence, the religious and philosophical concepts which made up the heart of Egyptian culture were absorbed and woven into the framework of their belief system. It may be significant that this period coincides with the rule of a pharaoh named Akhnaton (believed by many scholars today to have been the Biblical Moses), who tried to introduce a religious revolution in Egyptian thought and practice. During his reign, he attempted to replace the traditional Egyptian gods by a form of monotheism based on the worship of the disc of the Sun which for him was the ideal representation of the Incorporeal/invisible Creator/Energy which we call God. It is interesting to speculate what interaction may have occurred between the Hebrews and the court of the pharaoh. It can be questioned whether this Egyptian monotheistic experience was the result of Jewish influence, as the story of Joseph implies, or whether it was Akhenaton's religion that played a positive role in bringing monotheism to the Jews. That is a valid question but if you study this for yourself you will see that the second scenario is the more correct.

The Laws of Moses were to a great extent derived from the laws of ancient Egypt. The early history of the Jews was influenced by an Egyptian religious background, not only by their residence within its borders but also under the guidance of Moses, who was well versed in Egyptian philosophy and theology. Upon close examination, the ancient doctrines of Egyptian religion can be easily discerned within the teachings of the Old and New Testaments.

THE MANY FACES....ATTRIBUTES OF GOD

The names the Egyptians applied to their gods (manifestations of the one true God) bear testimony to their conceptions of God, for these names represented some quality or attribute which they would have applied to Him. From the appellations by which the gods are known, in texts from all periods, it is seen that Egyptian concepts of God were almost identical with those of the Hebrews, Muhammadans and Christians of later periods.

When classified, some of these names can be read as:

- "God is One and alone, and none other existeth with Him…the One Who hath made all things."
- "God is life, and through Him only man liveth…He breatheth the breath of life into his nostrils."
- "God is a spirit, a hidden spirit...the Divine Spirit."
- "God existed when nothing else existed, and what existeth He created after He had come into being."
- "God is the eternal One...infinite; and endureth for ever and ever...He shall endure to all eternity."
- "God is the hidden being and no man hath known his form...He is a mystery unto His creatures."
- "His name remaineth hidden...His names are innumerable...and none knoweth their number."
- "God is truth, and He liveth by Truth...He resteth upon truth…"

For consideration, the following is presented:

- Ra as Almighty God, the Creator, but also the Invisible God (the Sun was only his symbol).
- Thoth as the Mind of God, the Wisdom of God and the Word.
- Isis as Aima Elohim, the Great Mother; as Mary, the Mother of God; and also the Love of God.
- Maat as the Truth of God and the Justice of God.
- Horus as the God of Battles or the Vengeful God.
- Osiris as God Made Manifest in the Mind of Man, the Son of God.
- The "Company of Gods" as the God of Hosts.

THE GODS BECAME ANGELS

The gods of Egypt, like the angels of biblical lore, can be broadly described as personified powers meditating between the Divine and the human. Even in its devotion to monotheism, ancient Israel was able to embrace the image of a council of gods by turning all of them into angels that serve the One God. This acceptance of a belief in angels was a development made relatively easy because lesser gods and angels could be referred to as "sons of God." This type of development naturally led to a kind of monotheism whereby all the many gods and goddesses would be seen, at least philosophically, as aspects of One God. Later development in both Judaism and Christianity shows a remarkable growth of angelic folklore as a result of continuing this ancient practice of absorbing the gods of polytheistic religions by turning them into angels.

Just as the gods of Egypt represented aspects of Ra, the angels of the Old and New Testaments likewise represent aspects of God.

- Tzaphqiel - Righteousness of God
- Raphael - Healer of God
- Michael - Perfection of God
- Khamael - Severity of God
- Haniel - Glory of God
- Gabriel - Strength of God

THE SOUL

The ancient Egyptians saw man as consisting of nine parts which could be simplified into the threefold division of man along the lines of Spirit, Soul and Body, which accords with the New Testament views of St. Paul, and can be summarized as follows:

- The body (Khat) and its double (Ka) constitute the physical part of man;
- the soul (Ba) was comprised of the mind and feelings which had its seat in the heart (Ab) with a vehicle of its own called the shadow (Khabit);
- the spirit (Khu) was the divine/immortal part of man which had its seat in the name (Ren) and a conceptual body (Sahu) which derives its manifestation from the power (Sekhem) which provided vitality for the lower vehicles.

Therefore, later Egyptian belief was that man had three parts--a body, soul and spirit. The soul and spirit of the righteous passed from the body and then resided for eternity in heaven, but the physical body did not rise again and was believed never to leave the tomb. As stated in the Vth dynasty, about 2400 BCE: "The soul to heaven; the body to earth."

Genesis 3:19: ...till you return to the ground, for out of it you were taken; for dust you are and to dust you shall return.

I Corinthians 15:40-53: There are also celestial bodies and terrestrial bodies, but the glory of the celestial is one and the glory of the terrestrial is another...However, the spirit is not first, but the natural and afterward the spiritual

…Now I say brethren that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God…for this corruptible must put on incorruption and this mortal must put on immortality…then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written: "Death is swallowed up in victory."

John 3:6-7 That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit if spirit. Do not marvel that I said to you, "You must be born again."

JUDGMENT AND THE AFTERLIFE

The gods that lived in the Hall of Judgment with Osiris were forty-two in number. As the deceased passed each, he addressed him by his name and declared that he had not committed a certain sin. After pronouncing the name of each god, the deceased always said, "I have not done…" and the whole group of addresses has been called the "Negative Confession." The fundamental ideas of religion and morality which underlie this confession are exceedingly old, and from it can be discerned the ancient Egyptians' duty toward God and neighbor. The following is the soul in the Hall of Judgment:

Homage to Thee, O great God, Lord of Maati! I have come to unto thee, O my Lord, and I have brought myself hither that I may behold thy beauties. I know thee, I know thy name. I know the names of the forty-two Gods who live with thee in the Hall of Maati...I have not committed sins against men...

For consideration, the following are some of the negative confessions compared with the Ten Commandments from The Second Book of Moses --Exodus: THIS IS ALL THE MORE IMPORTANT WHEN WE REMEMBER THE TEN COMMANDMENTS GIVEN TO US BY PHARAOH AKHENATON/MOSES WERE BETTER UNDERSTOOD AS "CATEGORIES" OF LAWS:

- Negative Confession: I have not uttered blasphemies against God. Commandment #3: You shall not take the name of the Lord your God in vain.

- Negative Confession: I have not opposed my family and kinfolk. Commandment #5: Honor your father and mother.
- Negative Confession: I have slain neither man nor woman. Commandment #6: You shall not murder.
- Negative Confession: I have not committed fornication. Commandment #7: You shall not commit adultery.
- Negative Confession: I have not committed theft. Commandment #8: You shall not steal.
- Negative Confession: I have not uttered falsehood. Commandment #9: You shall not bear false witness.
- Negative Confession: I have invaded no man's land. Commandment #10: You shall not covet your neighbor's house...nor anything that is your neighbor's.

Let us remember that on this Noahide website the exegesis of all of these "CATEGORIES" are given to the student which now we see really finds its true origin in Egyptian Religion; the first monotheistic religion of mankind. We are beginning to get a glimpse of how well the Egyptians knew God and their moral and ethical responsibilities to Him as well as others created in His image.

The belief that the deeds done while in the body would be subjected to analysis by the divine powers after death belongs to the earliest period of Egyptian civilization. All the evidence shows that each soul was judged individually and was either permitted to pass into the kingdom of Osiris or was destroyed. The Egyptian underworld, or Amentet, also contained a region where the souls of the wicked were punished for an indefinite period of time. It has been said that the judgment of the dead was determined, in the presence of Osiris, by weighing the deceased in the balance against his own heart. As Osiris weighed the heart of the dead, Maat, the goddess of Truth and Justice, balanced the scale. If the heart of the deceased weighed true, he went to his eternal reward in a blessed afterlife. If his heart weighed too heavy, he would be thrown to the animal gods who tore him to shreds. Consider the following:

Romans 14:10-12: ...For we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ...so then each of us shall give account of himself to God.

2 Corinthians 5:10 For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that each one may receive the things done in the body according to what he has done whether good or bad.

I Peter 4:5 They will give an account to Him who is ready to judge the living and the dead.

Matthew 12:36, 37: A good man out of the good treasure of his heart brings forth good things and an evil man out of the evil treasure brings forth evil things. But I say to you that for every idle word men may speak, they will give account of it in the day of judgment.

2 Thessalonians 1:8-9: ...in flaming fire taking vengeance on those who do not know God...These shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of His power.

Matthew 26:46: And these [the unrighteous] will go away into everlasting punishment but the righteous into eternal life.

THE INESCAPABLE CONCLUSION FOR A THINKING BELIEVER

Upon much study of Jewish Roots I stumbled onto this harmony between the ancient Egyptian religion and that of Judaism and parts of Christianity. This literally took my breath away and from this understanding came the dawning and understanding as to the origin and evolution of all religions--the mind of man. Understand that there is big difference in observing the Parallels can be traced between one nations god and another's, and this is because perceptions of Divinity. As long as we stay with the Egyptian understanding that these "gods" and "goddesses" are but pictures of the various manifestations and aspects of the One God then we are in safe ground. However when personification of forces in the Cosmos and Heavens as well in Nature remain as allegory and methaphors describing the incorporealness of the Creator then we are safe from idolatry as we have seen in the articles concerning blasphemy previously on this website. But when these allegories and personifications of forces in the Heaven above and Nature become "literalized" and worship is attached to this "literalization" then we are swallowed by the sin of idolatry. This is the great Sin of Roman Catholicism and its daughter religion Protestantism with what they have done to the human Jesus by making him equal with God. Such are projections of man's own psychic needs but this never can justify idolatry. Humanity casts a reflection of itself onto the backdrop of the unknown and peoples it with the images of its own characteristics. What has been called religion, in the past and in the present, is simply the personifications of the mind's own conceiving and answers only to the desires of the humanity who dreamt it into being. While all religions contain within themselves the seeds of Truth, they are, nonetheless, only man's attempt to interpret the Mind of God.

Upon reflection of what I have written and with your understanding then you should now more clearly understand the role of Law as the manifestation of Whom God is and what God does and what God is not and what God does not do. If so then my effort to communicate these truths to you have been rewarded. Egypt got it right; Christianity sadly gets it wrong since it exists primarily as a "Lawless" faith. This is not what the historical Jesus believed. Jesus surely did not believe what Paul taught in Romans and what is expressed in much of this theology; that we are "not under the law, but under grace (Rom. 6:14).

The Laws of Noah and Moses and the whole Egyptian Divine Revelation correct Paul and Christian theology in this regard.

If you study Egyptian religion, all the more important now as you see the connection with the Mosaic Laws, then you will find that God was recognized by the ancients as the Creator of the Heavens, the Cosmos which includes the Sun, moon, stars, constellations and all that is above. In their understanding of it these Ancient Egyptians saw the sun rise and set which they interpreted as symbolic of God who created life. The Sun was for them only a picture of the true Creator and Lifegiver. They saw in the warmth of the Sun which arranged the seasons the gift of life; beginning with photosynthesis, warmth, light, and the unending cycles of this pattern they saw in this the Sun was but only the image of the God of all creation. The sun would rise and be born as it traveled across the sky. It would live its life and set which was for them a picture of death. Such cycle repeated itself and in this they saw life and death cycling only to be reborn. This was the cycle of God and it had an eternal message to them. God was speaking thought the Sun to them and revealing Himself to them through the Heavens. God was for them the God of birth, life, death, and rebirth. They saw the same cycle of birth, life, death, and rebirth in the Heavens over the years and applied it to other things in the heavens. The stars were born only to die as well. A shooting star was a perfect example. Also the rising and setting of stars on the horizon as they rose above it and set beneath it. This was the same message of birth, life, and death, and rebirth. This was the same message and the same cycle spoken over and over by the Creator over the centuries. There was a message from God the Creator in Heaven and these cycles followed patterns and LAWS. But it does not end here. These ancients saw that the Sun affected Nature. In mother Nature the ancients saw the same cycle and Pattern of Laws since it was likewise affected by the Heavens. The Sun brought the spring's new growth. They saw the emergence of new growth and vegetation in the Spring with the renewing warmth and the the early harvest. From this birth they saw that birth issued in life and growth as well in the later harvests which then was followed by the changing of the seasons with autumn and fall. The Solstices and Equinoxes spoke the same message with their impact upon Mother Nature. The cycle of Laws in the Heavens affected Mother Nature as well and the Pattern continues. The Laws of God continued. Life in the spring was followed by death in the winter which cycled again only to be reborn in the Spring. JUST LIKE THE SAME CYCLE IN THE HEAVENS WE SEE GOD WAS DOING AND SPEAKING THE SAME MESSAGE IN NATURE AS IN THE HEAVEN. Next the ancients noticed the SAME CYCLES AND LAWS OF GOD OPERATING IN THEIR OWN BODIES. The 28 day menses of the woman, like the cycle of the moon spoke to them this SAME ORDER which they had seen in the Heavens and in Nature. The 280 gestation of a baby they saw was the same as the time from the spring equinox to the winter solstice; counting 277 days later where the Sun stood still in the heavens in its southerly setting then only to rise northward again on the 280th day. They saw that this is like the birth of the Sun which spoke to them of new hope again of new life; for the coming life of spring which they found parallels to the birth of the child in this same time frame. Understand that in all these Laws and Cycles and Patterns the Egyptians saw a DIVINE ORDER manifested in these unchangeable LAWS.

These Seasons of Harvest were pictures of God speaking to mankind...that He is the God of ORDER ORDER IN THE HEAVENS...ORDER IN NATURE..ORDER IN MANKIND. The cycles taught the same lesson to all everywhere.....this was the simplest message given to man that God was the Creator of ORDER and man understood that in looking at these same Laws which he saw in the Heavens and Nature which were also operating in his own body that he was CREATED IN THE IMAGE OF GOD; THE IMAGE OF WHICH HE UNDERSTOOD AS ORDER OPERATED BY DIVINE LAW. Understanding that he was created in the image of the God of ORDER then man knew he was was to ORDER himself as God had ordered everything else.

Now we understand more clearly "be ye holy for I am holy.....be like the God you SEE above, around, and within you. We are to be like God and we do that through ordering our own universe and lives. This is the beauty of God and His message to us. This is not difficult to understand or comprehend; that man is to live by God's message or order and Law. This is not difficult theology and there is no man made religion here. The message of Eternal Life and moral responsibility to ORDER our lives by living the LAWS we see operating in the Heavens, in Earth, in our Bodies is the deepest message God ever sent mankind. Mankind has created a lot of theology that opposes this message of God we see here; only only has to look at Pauline Gnostic theology to see a perfect example of this. Change as we may try we can never alter God's voice to us we see and hear every morning, every day, every month, every year, ...ye who have ears to hear...hear what the Spirit of God is speaking to you about true Eternal Life and the responsibilities we have to share in it...to order our lives to the same Laws of ORDER that God is constantly speaking. The Egyptians understood this ORDER and LAWS and we find their example in their Negative Confessions above and the subsequent elaboration of them in Moses' Law Code today called the Torah. God's Torah is the blue print and the pathway to establishing this ORDER and His LAW in our lives and in this world. It is given to us by the Jewish people and protected by them today as well and finds it origin with the Egyptian religion of Moses. Let us learn while the light is shinning in our lives...let us learn the difference between the true message of God and the message of men who have taken these concepts and altered and tried to destroy them.

As a pastor I find it tragic that much of Christian theology has strayed so far from the simple revelation that the earliest Monotheists understood about the Creator. Egypt communicated this to their children the Jews which came into being through Egyptian intermarriage with Semites. Moses/Akhenaton took to the world the Laws of God he learned in Egypt and we are so privileged today to be able to hear them and learn from them when so many attempts have been made by mankind to eradicate this message. Alexander the Great conquered Egypt in the 4th century B.C.E. and Hellenized it and the culture and religion of Egypt was forever changed and altered. From this sad affair the Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt will stray from this Divine Revelation and "literalize" these Divine concepts and out comes their "Angel Messiah" theology that a man is literally God and due worship and other Gnostic thoughts which find its culmination in Paul's Gnostic rejection of the Law. In place of man being able to make himself righteous before God by his repentance and renewed obedience to the Laws of God we have 2.5 billion Christians thinking that such does not matter but rely upon their standing before God on the erroneous teaching that they need only ascribe mentally to a theological concept about Jesus given to us by those who strayed from these Laws in first place. We may have lost the original Egyptian Revelation of God but it should give you pause to thank God right now that all the latter attempts to destroy and eradicate their Jewish children and their religion received from their Egyptian parents have failed. We are truly blessed today to have the ability to study and learn these truths for ourselves in light to Catholicism and its censoring of such truth for over 2000 yrs. Baruch Ha Shem!

THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION....TRUTH...OR SUN-MYTH RETOLD?

Much of the life Jesus Christ, as recorded in the New Testament, are nothing more than allegorical representations of the Sun God. Long before Jesus the Ancients formulated their Mythology (Religion), after the Image of Astronomical Phenomena. They saw this as the best way to connect with the Creator God, that is by patterning their religious rituals in accordance with the most visible and observable aspect of God's creation, the Cosmos. Many of the stories and accounts in the life of Jesus in the New Testament are actually various dramas (metaphorical representations) of Solar Mythology. We are presently focusing on the Solar-Lunar aspects of ancient mythology and modern religion. We shall at this point commence a dissection of the New Testament gospels. As done previously, I wish to evaluate the most salient and popular episodes within these scriptures and show their parallel to the lives of the other mythical saviors that we have already discussed. And we will illustrate that much within the Gospels that is related as truth concerning Jesus' life are analogous to Solar Mythology. Let me say this is done only to separate the lies and falsehoods from the truth about Jesus so those who follow him and his example can do so in truth.

First, we have the miraculous conception of a virgin.

- Mat 1:18 Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost.
- Mat 1:19 Then Joseph her husband, being a just man, and not willing to make her a public example, was minded to put her away privily.
- Mat 1:20 But while he thought on these things, behold, the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a dream, saying, Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife: for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost.
- Mat 1:21 And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name JESUS: for he shall save his people from their sins.
- Mat 1:22 Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying,
- Mat 1:23 Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us.

THE ASTRONOMICAL ANALOGY

The astronomical explanation of the first three points is as follows, The Miraculous Conception, as I explained in a previous article, refers to the Conjugation (Conception) that annually takes place at the vernal equinox. God, the Father, the Sun personified, at this time (the vernal equinox) is joined (the crossing of the celestial equator and the ecliptic of the sun) to commence the Gestation of the Son (Sun) of God (Father Sun), that will be born 280 days later on December 25th.

The ancients felt that an offspring of a god, a son of god, should have a purer maternal origin than mortals, and this was evidence of his supernatural or divine origin. A man, even if he were thought of as a god, had to be born of a woman, and this could not be concealed, but paternal parentage is never so obvious, being known only to the mother, if anyone.

The purity of his maternal parentage required these Gentile Saviors to be born of a pure woman—a maiden. Hence, the Gentile saviours often were born of virgins and this "concept" continued even for the Gentile redactors of the New Testament. Besides normal conception ordinary birth was also too ignominious for a god. It had to be spotless, or immaculate. Jesus Christ in an apocryphal gospel, like Chrishna was born through his mother's side, rather than the impure route. Though not in the canonical works, some of the Christian fathers endorsed this story. I have even read Catholic dogma where it testifies that Jesus was born not through Mary's vagina, the normal birth canal, but through her navel!

Not only saviours but famous men, like Plato, Pythagoras, Alexander, Augustus and others, were thought to have been born miraculously. Plato was born of Paretonia, begotten of Apollo, not Ariston, his father, according to one authority.

The doctrine of immaculate conception is ancient but the manner of the holy conception was different in different countries. Zoroaster was immaculately conceived by a ray from the Divine Reason or Word and this was adopted by medieval artists.

But the idea of being overshadowed by the Holy Ghost seems to have been most current. God, the father of a god was believed to overshadow the mother of a god, to impregnate her. In 550 BC, Pythais, the mother of Pythagoras, conceived by a spectre or ghost of the god Apollo, the Sun-god.

Answer for yourself: Does the ghost of the sun god differ in principle from the Christian Holy Ghost?.

Juno of Rome grew pregnant at the touch of a flower to give birth to Mars. No impregnation could have been purer. So the most immaculate conception of all was that of the god of War! If it sounds absurd, how is it more senseless than conception by a ghost? Botany has shown that, at least, a flower can fertilize other flowers but no science has yet investigated the virility of ghosts.

The Greek Juno, Hera, was immaculately impregnated by the wind to give birth to Vulcan. Here is a close parallel indeed for the word habitually translated as spirit or ghost in the scriptures and continued into the Greek of the New Testament really means breath or wind! So literally the virgin Mary was impregnated by the wind just like Hera. The author of the Perennial Calendar tells us the miraculous conception of Juno Jugulis, the blessed virgin queen of heaven, fell on the second of February, the day of the early Christian festival of the date of the conception of the ever Blessed Virgin Mary.

A Chinese sect worshiped a saviour known as Xaca, who was conceived of his mother, Maia, by a white elephant, which she saw in her sleep, and for greater purity, she brought him forth from one of her sides. In Chinese popular religion, the virgin mother Shing-Mon gave birth to the God Yu from a conception by a water lily. The procreative refinement evinced here is equal to that of Juno. In another story Yu was conceived of a star!

Tamerlane's mother conceived having had sexual intercourse with the god of Day. The mother of Ghengis Khan, being too modest to claim that she was the mother of the son of God, said only that he was the son of the sun.

Osiris of Egypt [the original pattern] and even Julius Caesar were immaculately conceived—the latter being the son of the beautiful virgin Cronis Celestine, and begotten by the Father of all Gods, Jupiter. His heir and nephew, Augustus Caesar, was curiously his half brother, as another son of Jove, by whose divine lust he was immaculately conceived in the temple of Apollo.

Both Buddha and Chrishna, of India, were immaculately conceived. The mother of Chrishna was overshadowed by the supreme God, Brahma, and the Holy Ghost was Naraan. Chrishna's mother had given birth seven times previously but remained a virgin. Philostratus, a disciple of Apollonius of Cappadocia, who was contemporary with Jesus Christ , tells that Damis, the mother of Apollonius, gave birth to this god and rival saviour of Jesus Christ, by being overshadowed by the god, Proteus.

Several of the virgin mothers of gods and great men go ten months between conception and delivery.

Plainly the tradition of the miraculous conceptions of gods, sons of gods, saviours and messiahs was prevalent in the world from ancient times on, beginning long before the mother of Jesus was overshadowed by the ghostly representative of the Most High. The belief in immaculate conception extended to every nation in the world. Grote, referring to Greece, declares that the furtive pregnancy of young women, often by a god, is one of the most frequently recurring incidents in the legendary narratives of the country.

Both the prevalence and antiquity of the idea of immaculate conception among the heathen is conceded by earlier Christian writers in their arguments from precedents of the divinity of Christ. St. Augustine, Origen and Lactanius tried to persuade us of the immaculate virginity of the mother of Jesus Christ by the example of similar pagan events. The doctrine of immaculate conception is, then, conceded as long anterior to Christ and therefore not unique in his case.

PROBLEMS WITH THIS DOCTRINE

- The gospels show that Christ himself did not claim to have a miraculous birth. He did not once allude to it, though as the principal evidence of his divinity, as Christians claim, he would have done so.
- His paternal genealogy, as made out by Matthew and Luke, completely confounds his virgin birth. They both trace his lineage through Joseph, which they could only do if Joseph was his father.
- His own disciple, Philip, declared him to be the son of Joseph, and several texts show that it was the original belief.
- The story of the virgin birth rests on the slender foundations of an angel and a dream. Mary got it by an angel, and Joseph by a dream, and thereby we have the whole of the story of the divinity of Jesus Christ.
- However, we have neither Joseph's nor Mary's report of these things, but only Matthew and Luke's. We do not know that either of them ever saw or spoke with Joseph or Mary on the subject.
- If Christ were a miraculously born god, would his mother would have reproved him for misconduct when she found him in the temple, as she, if no one else, must have known his nature?
- If Mary conceived miraculously, why was it kept so long from Joseph? Did the concubine of God intend to deceive her lawful husband? An angel had to be sent from heaven to let him into the secret.
- Why did not God inform Joseph by inspiration instead of using the round about way of sending an angel to do it?
- Mary was found with child of the Holy Ghost*, but as we are told nothing more about the circumstances, does it not leave us suspicious?
- Since it all seems to have been based on dreams, was carried on through dreams, and has no better foundation than dreams, why should we give it better credit than similar stories found in heathen mythology? Or is it that Gentile Christianity is just a dreamy religion?
- In an educated and scientific age, should we accept reports of the birth of a God based on no better a foundation than dreams, angels and the legends of oriental mythology? In particular, can any scientist entertain the idea of infinite beings, themselves mere conjecture, actually impregnating human females?
- Ancient Eastern belief was that sexual intercourse was sinful, procreation was impure and human children were born thus contaminated. Human beings were imperfect and any god sent into the world as a saviour had to avoid such contamination. The solution was that incarnate gods entered the world through human virgins to avoid the impurity and the slander that the saviour might have arisen in more normal ways if the mother were not a virgin. Can any unbiased deny that this is the source of the origin of the story of Christ's virgin birth?
- If Christ had to come into the world avoiding the impurity of human conception and birth, why did he not descend directly from heaven in person? If he can descend on the clouds at his—still awaited—second advent, why could he not do the same at his first advent, thereby pre-empting reasons for doubt and saving far more of fallen humanity?

- Could anyone, free of religious guilt and indoctrination, presented with these stories as the truth today, willingly and joyfully accept them as proof that someone was a god? Or would they consider them to be fraudulent inventions, intended to gull the credulous?
- If you have never taken the time as a Christian to study the origins of your faith I highly suggest it. If you would only familiarize yourself with the Council of Nicea in 325 A.D. one can quickly see how under the influence of Constantine, a Sun-worshipper, that in the conversion of the Empire to the Christian faith then its leader, Jesus, had to be moulded into the image of prior Sun-gods. Such was Constantine's wish and whatever the emperor desired was done or else. Check it out!

Answer for yourself: Does this event as depicted in the New Testament now seem "Divine and unique" to you any longer?

VIRGO AND THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION/VIRGIN BIRTH

It might strike you funny but if you want to get to the origin for the virgin birth and immaculate conception teachings and doctrines of Christianity you have to begin by looking up at the stars and the constellations. If you have been diligent to read the previous articles then you are now aware that primitive mankind looked to the stars for their understanding of G-d and His working in the cosmos. These ancients often reflected upon their observations of the Heavens and Nature and developed allegories of what they observed that captured for all time the timeless Divine truths of G-d and His workings in the Cosmos. However over time many of these allegories and metaphors that taught Divine principles were changed into literal understandings of events that involved g-ds and g-desses. Later these mythical g-ds and g-desses were later personified and applied to real people down through history.

And in time along comes this Jewish Rabbi named "Yeshua" and here we go again.

In this article I wish to draw attention to the connection between the constellation Virgo (the virgin) and Mary, the mother of Jesus and how Virgo influenced the creation of religious doctrines about Mary and Jesus.

Until the twelfth century, Christians took it for granted that Mary was conceived in original sin. Pope Gregory the Great said emphatically: "Christ alone was conceived without sin." Again and again, he said all human beings are sinful, even the holiest, with the sole exception of Christ. On the eighth day of December 1854, Pope Pius IX, the first infallible Pope defined the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary in Ineffabilis Deus:

We declare, pronounce and define that the doctrine which holds that the most blessed Virgin Mary, in the first instant of her conception, by a singular grace and privilege granted by Almighty G-d, in view of the merits of Jesus Christ, the Savior of the human race, was preserved free from all stain of original sin, is a doctrine revealed by G-d and therefore to be believed firmly and constantly by all the faithful.

This act of devotion towards the Mother of Jesus was also the most contrived political decision of any pontiff in recent times.

Throughout much of its history, the Christian Church has taught that Jesus was conceived by the Virgin Mary by the action of the Holy Spirit, without sexual intercourse. This doctrine is usually called the virgin birth, although the term virgin conception would seem to be more accurate. This has long been one of the church's foundational beliefs, along with other indisputable truth of the Bible like the atonement, resurrection, and the second coming of Jesus.

- Liberal Christian churches typically teach that Jesus was conceived by Mary and Joseph normally.

- Other Protestant churches generally believe that Jesus was conceived by Mary and the Holy Spirit she and Joseph later had additional children.
- The Roman Catholic church teaches that Mary remained a virgin at the conception of Jesus, after his birth, and throughout her life. The "brothers" were in fact step-brothers fathered by Joseph in a previous marriage.
- The Eastern Orthodox churches generally teach that Mary remained a virgin; Jesus' "brothers" were in fact his cousins.
- The Baha'I World Faith and the faith of Islam believe that Jesus was conceived by the Holy Spirit, and that Joseph and Mary had additional children later in their marriage.
- The Temple of the Christos teaches that Mary was based on the constellation of Virgo, Mother of the Universe, who births the light of the Sun on December 25th. The Virgin Mary is the soul of the world diffused through all nature which Plato called, the Anima Mundi, the only vital force in the universe.

Answer for yourself: What is the truth of the matter?

BIBLICAL REFERENCES OF THE VIRGIN BIRTH:

- Isaiah 7:14 "Therefore the Lord Himself shall give you a sign: behold, the young woman shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel." Jewish Tanakh

Understand that from this Hebrew text all other texts will be "translated."

- Isaiah 7:14 "Therefore the Lord himself will give you a sign. the virgin will be with child and will give birth to a son, and will call him Immanuel." (NW)
- "Therefore the Lord himself will give you a sign: behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel." (ASV) Matthew 1:23
- "The virgin shall be with child, and will give birth to a son, and they shall call him Immanuel which means, 'G-d with us". Luke 1:26-27
- "In the sixth month, G-d sent the angel Gabriel to Nazareth, a town in Galilee to a virgin pledged to be married to a man named Joseph, a descendent of David The virgin's name was Mary." (NIV)
- "Now in the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent from G-d unto a city of Galilee, named Nazareth, to a virgin betrothed to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David, and the virgin's name was Mary." (ASV)

Answer for yourself: Why does the Jewish Scriptures, from which all Greek, Latin, and English versions were supposedly to be taken, say "young woman" and not "virgin" and most if not all of the Christian translations render it incorrectly as "virgin" down throughout history until rather recently? That sure is a good question. The answer is that the Hebrew Scriptures were altered in translation in order to accommodate prior Gentile religious beliefs connected with their virgin-born Sun-g-ds and Sun-g-dmen. You will see that in a moment.

Now if we logically look at the allegories and origins of Virgin Births in all myths and religions we discover that the prototypes of Mary, Jesus' mother, are the sister-wives of Sun-g-ds. It is in this context that we must understand certain virgin g-ddesses such as the Egyptian Isis, and the Greek Artemis, who are both sisters of the Sun-g-ds Osiris and Apollo respectively.

THE VIRGIN MARY AND THE CONSTELLATION VIRGO

The Virgin Mary of Roman theology is often fashioned after the Constellation of Virgo and the story of virgin births down through history as connected to pagan Sun-g-ds and Sun-g-dmen is the timeless allegory of Virgo giving birth to the Sun on the darkest night of the year, the 24th of December. If we follow the path of the Sun we discover that the ancients noticed that towards the end of August the radiant Sun enters the celestial Virgo (considered her midsection) and places the seed of the new Sun in her to germinate the embryo of the new Sun which were called by many names; the least of which were Horus, Apollo or Christ. The early Church Fathers recognized this truth, and realized that the story written in the heavens had a definite relation to humanity and to the evolution of human souls. Clement of Alexandria, a very important and influential early Church Father, tells us that "the path of souls to ascension lies through the twelve signs of the zodiac," and the church festivals today are based, not upon historical dates in connection with the outstanding religious figures to which they refer, but upon the celestial and terrestial times and the seasons.

Answer for yourself: Did you find it somewhat surprising that Clement of Alexandria would be teaching astrology and yet a Christian?

If you have done any prior study into Biblical astrology and its influence in the New Testament then you might have already seen how in the Birth of Jesus at Bethlehem the date was fixed astronomically nearly four centuries after Christ was born. The combination of Virgo with the Star in the East (Sirius), and the Three Kings (symbolized by Orion's belt and its three stars) was the determining factors in the miraculous conception and virgin birth story of Jesus. The Virgin [the constellation Virgo] was seen in the east, with the line of the horizon passing through her center [womb], and this is one of the factors determining the doctrine of the Virgin birth (Alice Bailey, From Bethlehem to Calvary, p. 184). The intersection of the horizon of Mother Earth with Virgo in the Heavens was understood by the ancients as the impregnation of the Virgin [the constellation Virgo]. Such was the superstitions of primitive mankind. Virgo was known by them as the Virgin mother: "She that is the natural mother of all things, mistress and governess of all the elements, the initial progeny of worlds, chief of the powers divine, queen of all that are in hell, the principal of them that dwell in heaven." The astrological significance of Virgo's brightest star rising due east on the horizon can be gauged from the work of Aratus who wrote about this constellation prior to the birth of Jesus. Spica, Alpha Virginis, is recognized as the brightest star in the constellation Virgo and it symbolizes an ear of corn held by the celestial virgin g-ddess, the corn maiden or maiden of the harvest. The Latin word Spica means "an ear of corn" and in numerous celestial myths the star Spica represented the fertility of the virgin [ear of corn] who, by tradition conceived a divine child. In beliefs that prevailed prior to Jesus' birth the star Spica also symbolized the divine seed of a celestial g-d nurtured by the celestial virgin mother. Now you should understand how this g-d's Divine seed impregnated the virgin and the result was the immaculate conception of a Divine Son of this g-d. This myth was applied to man g-ds and g-dmen down through history; Jesus is just the last in a long list of them! This star only appears due east on the earth's horizon at intervals of approximately 13,000 years in history, on the last occasion Jesus was born and the Magi reported seeing "his star in the east".

THE MEANING OF EAST

Now we must go back to Egypt and beyond to understand concepts that affect religious beliefs yet today. In astrological tradition the point due east on the horizon was associated with "birth," or "re-birth" and to this day still retains this symbolic association with the "birth" of astrological "Ages" in "The Great Year" and the birth of Spring at the March Equinox (March 21) in the normal year. The Sun always rose from the dead in the East after having died when descending below the Western horizon. So now you see how East, especially at the Vernal/Spring equinox was so important for the ancients especially because it coincided with the new greenery of Nature in the Spring. It just oozed life. So such things like the Vernal Equinox as the Sun rose in the East played a very important part in fashioning religious beliefs; especially religious doctrine concerning life, rebirth, and resurrection! The tree containing the secret of immortality was planted in the EAST in the Biblical Garden of Eden and since that time divine birth (re-birth) of Mother Earth was celebrated at the Spring Equinox when the Sun appeared due east on the horizon, birth, rebirth, and resurrection and the Sun rising due east on the horizon were therefore equated long before Jesus Christ was born.

More to our point in this article at the Spring Equinox in the year Christ was born [Spring, blooming of Nature, East understood at birth and rebirth] the star Spica [brightest star in the constellation Virgo-the Virgin] rose due east while the Sun disappeared due west on the horizon. Picture this in your mind if you can. Remembering that this star stood for fertility of the virgin and the seed (sperm of the celestial g-d) and coupled with the constellation Virgo being intersected by the horizon in her middle [womb of a woman as the personification of Virgo] then the ancients understood this to mean a Divine impregnation of Virgo by the Celestial G-d. This the the immaculate conception at it's beginning and all theology concerning immaculate conceptions, virgin conceptions, and virgin births will come from this astronomical event!

THE TIME OF JESUS' BIRTH

We know that according to Christianity Jesus is supposed to have been born December 25 but we have already investigated why Dec. 25th was the chosen day for the birth of all the Sun-g-ds as well as Jesus so we know that is false. We just learned the genesis of the idea of the Virgin Birth and Immaculate Conception finding their origin at the Vernal/Spring Equinox. Now we turn our attention to the Autumn of the year. At the Autumn Equinox Spica, the brightest star in the constellation Virgo, and the Sun rose together due EAST. No brighter star has subsequently risen due east at the Equinoxes. Spica was precisely due east in the winter and springtime between 5 B.C.E. and A.D. 1. which scholars tell us is the expected time of Jesus' birth.

Thus we know that the sign of the celestial virgin [Virgo and Spica] rose over the horizon at the moment assigned to the birth of Jesus the Christ. After reading this many Christians may be reluctant to recognize Virgo as the Blessed Virgin and the source for much of the virgin Mary theology invented by Rome but you cannot change the stars and their course in the sky let alone the facts once they are rooted out by intense study.

One last thing needs to be addressed before we close. Virgo and its stars that make up the constellation descend after harvest below the horizon, and the Sun of the winter rises from the same point. The ancients reasoned from this that the infant Sun was in his Mother's arms. From this comes all the pictures and sculptures of the maiden holding the Divine child; whether it be Isis and Horus as first pictured in ancient sculptures or Mary and Jesus which is but another Isis-Horus "knock off." If you look you will find Rome full of such sculptors of Mary holding in her lap the infant Jesus which is another rendition of Isis suckling and holding Horus, the Son of the Sun (Osiris).

The story of the Virgin Mother Isis, giving birth to the Sun-g-d, Horus, which Christianity has so faithfully preserved, is a reminder of the inscription concerning Mary's Egyptian prototype, Isis, which appeared on the Temple of Sais: The inscription reads "The fruit which I have brought forth is the Sun, Horus, son of Osiris, the Sun-g-d, was conceived of even though his phallus had been cut off by his brother Set, the dark, twin, aspect of Osiris."

Answer for yourself: Is it any coincidence that Catholics say: "Blessed art thou among women, and the FRUIT of thy womb...Horus; opps...meant Jesus?

The cult of Isis became enormously popular in the Roman Empire and this is just one of the reasons why the Mary theology would follow in Isis' footsteps. Romans called her the "eternal savior of the race of men. The transfer of part of the Isis myth undoubtedly took place in the 1st century A.D. The image of Isis suckling her child Horus under the sacred tree of Hathor at Denderah, became the archetypal model for images of the Virgin Mary with the infant Jesus.

Ishtar is the Babylonian Mary, called Mother of the Fruitful Breast, Queen of Heaven, Creator of People, Guide of Humanity. As you can see this motif of Virgo and Spica on the Eastern Horizon interpreted as an Immaculate Conception and Virgin Birth was seen by the ancients in every nation [Summer, Egypt, Babylon, etc.,] and mankind, at the same level of consciousness, reasoned the same things owing to a mythology that originated from one single myth. Ishtar was worshiped in Jerusalem where priests staged the time honored death and resurrection of her Sun-g-d lover Tammuz, Innana and Dammuzzi in Sumerian, whose Syrian name was Adonis. This was just the "pattern" that was later applied to Jesus.

Ezekiel 8:14

Ezek 8:14 14 Then he brought me to the door of the gate of the L-RD's house which was toward the north; and, behold, there sat women weeping for Tammuz. (KJV)

Her breast offering pose suggested her function as the g-ddess of all nourishment. Eventually Christian writers belittled her Holy sexual character by calling her the 'Whore of Babylon and Mother of Harlots (Revelation 17:5)

In mythology and later Roman theology Mary, the mother of Jesus became little more than another development of the prior g-ddesses: Isis, Hathor, lshtar, Aphrodite among others as depicted in the works of Plutarch.

In some of her varied depictions her left the foot on land and the other in water shows her dominion over earth and sea. She is shown as the naked g-ddess with all her usual halo of stars, one breast was a moon, which figure was repeated on her pubis. Her right breast was a star, or Sun pouring blessings on the world. Isis and Hathor were the two major g-ddesses in Egypt. Hathor was called the mother of all g-ds and g-ddesses, who brought forth herself, never having been created. She was Queen of Heaven and her name was on every royal list in the earliest dynasties. Isis also existed from the beginning. She was g-ddess from whom all becoming arose. Both were said to have given birth to the Sun, Hathor as the Nile Goose, Mother of the Golden Egg, and Isis as the womb of Horus. Aphrodite is Virgin of the Sea," Mare is Latin for sea is the root name of Mary, the Greek G-ddess of ultimate sexual consummation, Aphrodite, whose primary sacred symbol is the dove, rose naked from chaos and danced on the sea, is worshiped in Syria and Palestine as lshtar or Ashtaroth. The dove was the primary symbol of female sexuality in India, the name of the Dove-g-ddess meant "lust." So vital was the dove symbol that patriarchal cults were constrained to absorb it, in many different ways. The holy Seven Sisters, called the Pleiades, or Doves, were originally born from Aphrodite, the g-ddess of Love, as "Queen of the Sea." In a dream vision Mary sees a white dove descending from heaven and entering her body. The white dove was taken over by writers of the Gospels as a symbol of the Holy Spirit. They were assimilated by the Christian image of the Holy Ghost, a dove with seven rays emanating from it. Seven was the number of the g-ddess Sophia, the original Gnostic conception of the female Holy Ghost who descended on Mary at her impregnation. Sophia was shamelessly made masculine early in the Christian era but her dove, and all doves, were always called "she" even in Christian writings. Christian souls of saints flying to heaven were represented in the canonization ceremony.

The dove symbolizes the perfect purity of the Holy Spirit which the Church calls the "Immaculate" so that it was thought that the Holy spirit was incarnated in Mary's body at the moment of the Annunciation. In this role, the dove was nearly always was shown in a way whose significance could not be mistaken. From the beginning of Christianity, this concept of the femininity of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin as one of its earthly manifestations was found in certain Gnostic sects; and this theme is explicitly stated in the apocryphal Gospel to the Hebrews. Speaking of Jesus' temptation in the desert, this ancient work gives as Christ's words:...* "My Mother, who is the Holy Spirit, lifted me by my hair and took me from the desert to the high mountain in Tabor." The great Christian doctrine of the virgin birth, if looked at logically, is similar to a series of divine births of both Hindu, Egyptian, Persian, Greek and Old Testament g-ds. In the Hebrew scriptures we have stories of the "wondrous births" in connection with Isaac, Samson and Samuel. The Talmudic Moses has a virgin mother; Samuels mother became pregnant after receiving the divine seed.

Impregnation by angels, as the agents of G-d, was deemed holy and desirable. The Immaculate Conception represents such a union. Among the offspring of such human beings are: Buddha, Dionysus, Hercules, Chrishna, Theseus, Melchizedek, Plato, Apollonius of Tyanna, and Merlin the Magician. On the Greek side not only were the heroes of legend, Hercules, Theseus, Perseus, Jason and others believed to be the sons of divine fathers and human mothers, but the same legend reached down to more historical figures like Pythagoras and Plato, both of whom were sons of the Sun-g-d Apollo.

And of course let us not forget the most important myth of them all....Jesus!

Answer for yourself: What other religious beliefs that we were taught in the New Testament are myths and falsehoods?

Yep! Time to do some serious study before we die and meet G-d face to face because Christianity has failed to tell us the truth about Jesus and his faith...Biblical Judaism!

THE OFFSPRING OF THE VIRGIN IS DESCRIBED AS A G-D OR THE SON OF G-D

- Mat 1:18 Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost.
- Mat 1:19 Then Joseph her husband, being a just man, and not willing to make her a public example, was minded to put her away privily.
- Mat 1:20 But while he thought on these things, behold, the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a dream, saying, Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wile: for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost.
- Mat 1:21 And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name JESUS: for he shall save his people from their sins.
- Mat 1:22 Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying,
- Mat 1:23 Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, G-d with us.

THE ASTRONOMICAL ANALOGY

The astronomical explanation of the first three points is as follows,

The Miraculous Conception, as explained in a previous article, refers to the Conjugation (Conception) that annually takes place at the vernal equinox. This was explained as the path of the Sun in the Heavens as it intersects with the constellation Virgo on the Eastern Horizon. To make sure the reader understand this it is beneficial to know a little about the Zodiac or the band of twelve constellations that make a complete circuit every 26,000 years along with the precession of the equinoxes.

The Earth's rotation axis is not fixed in space. Like a rotating toy top, the direction of the rotation axis executes a slow precession with period of 26,000 years for the entire ecliptic of our planetary bodies to travel around our sun, a trip of 360 degrees. Each one of the 12 signs of the zodiac takes about 2100 years for our solar system to pass through. Every 72 years we actually move backward 1 degree. After 2100 years we move out of one age and into another. The precession is like a star clock that helps us date the rotations of earth in our solar system through our galaxy. At the time of the birth of Christ we were moving out of the Age of Aries which was the Roman Empire into the Age of Pisces. That happened around 60 BC. The early Christians were aware of this and used as their symbol the 2 fishes going in opposite directions. Since the rotation axis is precessing in space, the orientation of the Celestial Equator also precesses with the same period. This means that the position of the equinoxes is changing slowly with respect to the background stars. This precession of the equinoxes means that the right ascension and declination of objects changes very slowly over a 26,000 year period. This effect is negligibly small for casual observing, but is an important correction for precise observations.

Each sign of the Zodiac last almost 2,100 years or so and functions as the background constellation behind the Sun when it rises. In so doing the Sun is seen in front of the constellation in question until the illumination of the Sun makes the stars no longer visible. This constellation is connected with the Sun for some 2,100 years. Prior to the time of Christ the Sun had been in Virgo and the ancients understood that the Sun had impregnated the virgin and from this we have the teaching of the virgin birth and the immaculate conception. This became a religious doctrine for the sun worshipping nations and later applied to a host of g-ds and g-dmen including Jesus.

This miraculous conception, as explained above and in a prior article, refers to the conjugation (conception) that annually takes place at the Vernal Equinox (March 21). G-d, the Father, the Sun personified, at this time (the vernal equinox) is joined (the crossing of the celestial equator and the ecliptic of the sun) to commence the Gestation of the Son (Sun) of G-d (Father Sun), that will be born 280 days later on December 25th. If we count from the Vernal Equinox on March 21 through the year past the Summer Solstice on June 21st on through the Fall Equinox on Sept. 22 on through the Winter Solstice on December 22nd we have 277 days. Gestation being 280 days in the human species then it as simple as adding 3 more days to the total of 280 days from the Vernal Equinox through the Winter Solstice and in so doing we arrive at the culmination of 280 days (Gestation) on December 25th...the birthday of the g-ds and g-dmen. The Sun crossing celestial equator on the Vernal Equinox is understood as the conjugal impregnation of the Cosmic Mother Earth. The Period of Gestation is 280 days to the Sun's (Savior's) birth on Dec. 25th when the Sun is long longer motionless in the Heavens in it southerly trajectory but begins to climb north again indicating that spring is coming with new birth and growth of vegetation, food, and warmth. The days no longer have periods of darkness longer than the light but rather the hours of darkness begin to diminish and the hours of light begin to lengthen. The ancients interpreted this as the birth or re-birth of the Sun from it's death and subjection to the darkness which itself was personified as the Devil. The Sun had been dead and motionless for 3 days as he was submitted to the Devil (darkness) but has overcome and destroyed the works of the Devil and was resurrected. Since the time was yet winter the celebration of the resurrection of the Sun (Son personified) was postponed until the Spring Equinox at Easter when the greenery of spring bore the fruit of such resurrection. Religious doctrines abound in such stellar and solar mythology.

The Child G-d is said to be born of a Virgin. This, of course, represents the constellation of Virgo. Virgo had command of the Fall equinox at the time this passage was edited by the Priesthood. And Virgo, as such, represented the fall of the fetus in the third trimester, before it's birth. This refers to the Prices Ear, but the representation of the Virgin actually goes back further, and is not limited to this interpretation. We see each tri-semester of pregnancy correlated with each solar cycle: the first tri-semester being the time between the Verna/Spring Equinox on March 21 to the Summer Solstice on June 21st, the second tri-semester between the Summer Solstice on June 21st until the Fall Equinox on Sept. 22, and the third tri-semester being from the Fall Equinox on Sept. 22 through the Winter Solstice on December 22nd. We have a total of 277 days. Add three more days to complete the Gestation cycle and we have a total of 280 days culminating on Dec. 25th; the birthday of the g-ds and solar g-dmen.

A human fetus enters it's third trimester after 186-187 days. The Fall equinox, September 22 (when the fetus falls toward the vagina, birth) is 186 days from the Conception at the Vernal Equinox (March 21). There you have it as simply as it can be shown.

As you can see the ancients observed the Heavens and their influence upon Mother Earth. In so doing they developed mythos that captured for all eternity what they saw and understood about the G-d of the Cosmos. These observations were understood by them to be allegories concerning the G-d of the Cosmos and His works among them. Their religious myths were never to be understood as literal events in the lives of men. Sadly when this understanding was lost then these myths were applied to Jesus along with the Catholic understanding that belief of such religious doctrines were necessary for salvation and again sadly these beliefs were written into the New Testament and the world believes allegory as a literal truth today as applied to Jesus. No wonder the Jews don't believe in our Christian Jesus.

Before we go on it is probably best we come to a better understanding of personification as used by the ancients in telling of their myths.

THE SKY IN THE ROLE OF DEITIES

In the majority of mythologies the sky is personified as "God the Father." Jupiter, Zeus, Jove, Dyans, Yahweh, Vul, Odin, Ouranus, Texcatlipoca, were all sky-gods. In certain cases, these gods, in a previous or a future existence, were sun-gods. Usually the sky functioned as a god either before the sun or coincidentally and as a superior deity. Plutarch says that the sky or heavens was thought to function as a father and the earth as a mother. So, too, according to Virgil, all things, human, animal, and vegetable, were the result of intercourse between Jupiter (the god of the heavens) and Juno (the earth-goddess). In Assyria, the sky-god Vul was associated with Shala or the queen; Baal, the procreator, wedded Mylitta, the fertility goddess; in Phoenicia, Ouranus, god of heaven, married Ghe, the earth-goddess. Heaven, in primitive mythology, referred not to the abode of everlasting life of the Christians, but to what is now termed the sky or atmosphere. In the Chinese sacred books, heaven and earth are delineated as the father and mother of everything existent. Herodotus says of the ancient Persians that they offered sacrifices to Jupiter who personified the whole of the heavens or sky.

The sun-god, in the older mythologies, was the saviour, usually of virgin birth. "In the Vedic hymns the sun-the Lord and Saviour, the Redeemer and Preserver of Mankind - is frequently called "Son of the Sky" (T.W. Doane,Bible Myths, New York, 1882, p. 478). Zeus, the Greek sky-god, and Vul, the Chaldean sky-god, emanated power as a form of atmospheric influence exercising a generative force upon the earth-gods. In this way, too, Nut and Seb produced the saviour god, Osiris; Odin and Frigga produced Balder; Yahweh and Mary produced Jesus; Jove and Semele produced Bacchus; Seb and Isis produced Horus; Vishnu and Devaki produced Krishna; Zeus and Danaë produced Perseus; et al. More and further, the sky-god Uranus in conjunction with the earth-god Gaea were responsible for the creation of everything, including the god Cronus.

THE CELESTIAL VIRGIN OF SUN WORSHIP.....BECOMES THE VIRGIN MARY OF CHRISTIANITY

This Celestial Virgin was feigned to be a mother. She is represented in the Indian Zodiac of Sr. William Jones, with ears of corn in one hand, and the lotus in the other. In Kircher's Zodiac of Hermes, she has corn in both hands. In other planispheres of the Egyptian priests she, carries ears of corn in one hand, and the infant Savior Horus in the other (Isis and Horus). In Roman Catholic countries, she is generally represented with the child in one hand, and the lotus or lily in the other. In Vol. II. of Montfaucon's work, she is represented as a female nursing a child, with ears of corn in her hand, and the legend IAO. We find "these" stories captured in stone as nation after nation has this same Sun Myth revealed in their architecture. She is seated on clouds, a star is at her head. The reading of the Greek letters, from right to left, show this to be very ancient.

The Virgin of Guadalupe is one of the most revered figures in Mexican Catholicism. Her story in Mexico begins with her miraculous appearance to Juan Diego (Cuauhtlatohuac), a young Aztec man, on December 9, 1531. He was on his way to receive Christian instruction from the Fransciscans at Tlatelolco when he heard heavenly music and a sweet voice calling his name. He saw the Virgin, on this rocky Tepeyac Hilll above Mexico City. It was her wish that the Bishop build her shrine on that spot. This same place was also the site of the shrine to the Aztec goddess of Earth and Corn.

Without a doubt you can see how in Christianity the same concept has been carried over from Sun Worship into the Catholic Christian Church. Again, we have proof positive of the paganization of Christianity where current doctrines are nothing more than the "recopying" of Sun Worship. This applies as well to the teaching of the Christian Church as to the immaculate conception.

BORN IN A CAVE/MANGER...TRUTH...OR A SUN-MYTH RETOLD?

In this respect also, the history of Jesus Christ corresponds with that of other Sun-gods and Saviors, for they are nearly all represented as being born in a cave or dungeon. This is the dark abode from which the wandering Sun starts in the morning (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol.i. p. 153). "As the Dawn springs fully armed from the forehead of the cloven Sky, so the eye first discerns the blue of heaven, as the first faint arch of light is seen in the East. This arch is the cave in which the infant is nourished until he reaches his full strength; in other words, until the day is fully come."

As the hour of his birth drew near, the mother became more beautiful, her form more brilliant, while the dungeon was filled with a heavenly light as when Zeus came to Danae in a golden shower (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. p. 133).

At length the child is born, and a holt of serene light encircles his cradle, just as the Sun appears at early dawn in the East, in all its splendor. His presence reveals itself there, in the dark cave, by his first rays, which brightens the countenances of his mother and others who are present at his birth.

It is recorded in the Protevangelion, Apoc. ch. 14, that when Christ Jesus was born, all of a sudden there was a great light in the cave, so that their eyes could not bear it.

Answer for yourself: Coincidence? You will have to decide.

TEMPTED BY THE DEVIL...TRUTH...OR A SUN-MYTH RETOLD?

The earliest gospel disposes of the forty days in the wilderness, the wild animals, the temptation by the Devil and the ministrations by angels in one verse. Let us not forget what we have already learned about the Darkness be equated with Evil and the word play: D-evil or the Devil. Now understanding this let us continue and see what we shall see.

The gospel writer of the Gospel of John does not mention any of this. Yet Luke and Matthew give details of the fasting and the temptation with Jesus offered the world from the top of a mountain. By coincidence:

- Elijah fasted on Horeb in the wilderness for forty days;
- Moses did the same on Sinai.
- Zoroaster was tempted by the Devil in the wilderness;
- Buddha was also;
- Jupiter was led by Pan (the Devil) to the top of a mountain called the Pillar of Heaven whence he could see the countries of the world;

Forty is one of those mystical numbers that pop up in old religions: there were forty days of sacrifice in the Persian Salutation to Mithras; forty days of mourning in the mysteries of the goddess Persephone; the deluge lasted forty days, etc. The story is introduced to establish Jesus as a great leader, superior even to Moses. Furthermore the offer of the kingship of the world by the devil was intended by Gentile Christians as a rebuttal of the idea that Jesus was a Messiah in the Jewish mould who would become a world ruler - that is what the Devil offered him and he refused it.

The temptation by, and victory over the evil one, the D-Evil, or whether Mara or Satan, is nothing more than primitive man's personification of the Sun and the victory of the Sun over the clouds of storm and darkness. In ancient mythology, all heroes of light were opposed by the "Old Serpent," the Devil, symbolized by Serpents, Dragos, Sphinxes and other monsters. The Serpent was, among the ancient Eastern nations, the symbol of Evil, of Winter, of Darkness and of Death. The Serpents was never understood to be "literal" in these Eastern nations.

The Serpent also symbolized "the dark cloud," which by harboring the rays of the Sun, preventing its shining, and therefore, is apparently attempting to destroy it!

Now, when one personifies the Sun, we have the picture of "evil" (Serpent) trying to destroy the Savior.

The Serpent is one of the chief mystic personifications of the Rig-Veda, under the names of Ahi, Suchna, and others. The Serpents of various nations represented the Clouds, the enemy of the Sun, keeping back the fructifying rays. Indra struggles victoriously against him, and spreads life on the earth, with the shading warmth of the Father of Life, the Creator, the Sun.

Buddha, the Lord and Savior, was described as a superhuman organ of light, to whom a superhuman organ of darkness Mara, the Evil Serpent, was opposed. He, like Christ Jesus, resisted the temptations of this evil one, and is represented sitting on a serpent, as if its conqueror (Bunsen, Angel-Messiah, p. 39).

Chrishna also overcame the evil one, and is represented "bruising the head of the serpent," and standing upon it (Asiaatic Researchers, and vol. ii of Higgins Anacalypsis).

In Egyptian Mythology, one of the names of he god-Sun was Ra. He had an adversary who was called Apap, represented in the form of a serpent (Renouf, Hibbert Lectures, p. 109).

Horus, the Egyptian incarnate god, the Mediator, Redeemer and Savior, is represented in Egyptian art as overcoming the Evil Serpent, and standing triumphantly upon him (Bonwick, Egyptian Belief, p. 158; Monumental Christianity, p. 402).

Osiris, Ormuzd, Mithras, Apollo, Bacchus, Hercules, Indra, CEdipus, Quetzalcoatle, and many others Sun-gods, overcame the Evil One, and are represented in the above described manner (Cox, Tales of Ancient Greece, p. xxvii; Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii, p. 129; Baring-Gould's Curious Myths, p. 256; Bunsen, Angel-Messiah, p. x; Kingsborough, Mexican Antiquities, vol. vi. p. 176).

Growing up in obscurity, the day comes when he makes himself known, tries himself in his first battlers with his gloomy foes, and shines without a rival. He is rife for his destines mission, but is met by the demon of storm, who runs to dispute with him in the duel of the the storm. In this struggle again darkness the beneficent hero remains the conqueror, the gloomy army of Mara, or Satan, broken and rent, is scattered; the Apearas, daughters of the demon, the last light vapors which float in the heaven, try in vain to clasp and retain the vanquisher; he disengages himself from their embraces, repulses them; they writhe, lose form, and vanish.

Free from every obstacle, and from every adversary, he sets in motion across space his disk with a thousand rays, having avenged the attempts of his eternal foe. He appears then in all his glory, and in his sovereign splendor; the god has attained the summit of his course, it is the moment of triumph (Doane, Bible Myths, p. 482-483).

NOW WHAT WAS THE ASTRONOMICAL ORIGIN FOR SUCH STORIES?

To understand this we must regress to what we learned from a prior article.

These "destruction myths" (the life of the Sun/Son was sought by the Darkness which was threatened by the coming Light) find their origin, like most Christian doctrine, in the stars. The new Son (Son) is born in the winter as we have seen. The astrological sign of Capricorn represents the lord of Hades. This is the Cardinal sign of Winter (opposition, Satan, Saturn). Winter takes control (at the Winter Solstice on Dec. 22), and within three days of mounting his throne, he is challenged by the Sun (Son) of the Father (Sun) that he, or some other ruffians captured (at the autumnal equinox) and has finally slain at the winter solstice. So now the king (Winter, Darkness) is worried and knows that he must murder the Sun (Son) before he gains the strength of his Father (Sun). The guardians of the Sun (Son) know that he can not withstand the power of the Winter (Satan, Herod), so they shield him (Son) and hide him till his time of glory approaches (he reaches maturity) (Jabbar, The Astrological Foundation of the Christ Myth, p. 34).

The Sun (Son) will be mature enough to withstand the powers of Satan after he reaches the age of thirty. This Thirty does not mean years, it means degrees of arc. The Sun is born right after the King of Darkness takes his throne, in the sign of Capricorn. This king (Herod) is determined to kill all opposition to his power within the nether world. But Capricorn (Herod) will die after thirty years (degrees), because each zodiacal sign is limited to thirty degrees of arc. Therefore after the death of Herod (Capricorn), the Sun (Son) comes out from hiding to begin his mission, he is thirty years (degrees) old. But even though the chief rival (Herod/Capricorn) of the Sun(Son) has died, the Sun is yet within the domain of Satan, under the equinoxes. He, the Sun, must face more struggles and temptations as he climbs and fights his way to his glory, at the vernal equinox (Jabbar, The Astrological Foundation of the Christ Myth, p. 35).

Now, let us pick up the story.

The guardians were successful in protecting the infant (Sun, Son) but still he has not reached his glory (the vernal equinox) i.e. the resurrection of Spring. The Sun (Son) at this point (the thirtieth degree of Capricorn) has matured (survived to 30 years (degrees) from his birth) but he (Sun, Son) is still within the realm of winter (Satan). Winter (Satan) knows that he cannot kill the Sun (Son) at this point of maturity, therefore he (Satan) seeks to torment the Sun (Son), tempt him, cajole him to prevent the Sun (Son) from escaping his (Satan's/Darkness') domain. The torment, or temptation is described as lasting for forty days. The ancients, in this case, used the term days as a metaphor for degrees. The sign of Capricorn (the birth place of the Sun (Son) lies at minus 16 degrees south declination i.e. sixteen degrees below the celestial equator. The sign of Aries (the vernal equinox, the birth place of spring, where Christ enters his glory and the Sun rises above the equator signaling the coming of Spring and life) lies at plus twenty-four degrees north declination. Add this twenty-four degrees to the sixteen degrees (position of Capricorn below the celestial equator) and you get forty degrees (the ancients told the story as 40 days to the masses). This is the distance, relevant to the position of the two Cardinal signs, Capricorn and Aries, that the Sun (Son) must climb, struggle, suffer, be tempted, before he (The Sun) escapes the clutches of Satan (Winter). This term forty represents the struggle of the Sun (Son) in the wilderness of Darkness, climbing and overcoming torments toward salvation and life of Spring. With Israel, it was forty years in the wilderness, and with Noah, it was forty days of torrential rains, but regardless, the symbology is the same; the plight of the young Sun in the valley of Amenta, the Nether World, fighting his way to cross the forsaken territory (wilderness) between the zodiacal sign of the winter solstice (Capricorn) and the Spring equinox (Aries) (Jabbar, The Astrological Foundation of the Christ Myth, p. 36-37).

The bottom line for you, if you are a Christian, is that there are many "myths" which have been added to the life of Jesus in the New Testament by Gentiles who, because they forsook Biblical Judaism and the Jew's enlightenment, remained in Darkness and they spread this darkness of ignorance, superstition, and falsehoods where ever they went. Now you go to their churches where you inherit such fables as truth.

I hope you have the reason and sense enough to at least see the evidence for yourself and ask yourself if these "harmless" fables are the extent of such error as found in the New Testament. I assure you it is not. Most who read our articles have never investigated such materials for themselves and they simply do not know about such things. It is our hope at Bet Emet that what you see in these articles will cause you to seriously investigate other teachings in the New Testament as well which I assure you affect your relationship with God which you have been taught in error and again at this time in your life are not aware. We stand ready to help those who truly want the truth about God and His revelation before they die.

Answer for yourself: As you step back and examine the evidence, is it not overwhelming that what we interpret literally today is nothing more than a allegory to primitive man? The true religion and faith of Jesus awaits you if you are interested and really hungry for God. Shalom.

JESUS HAD TWELVE APOSTLES...TRUTH...OR SUN-MYTH RETOLD?

It really matters not to me if Jesus had 12 or 10 to 100 disciples or apostles. Not wanting to spend too much time on this I will present just the facts and let them speak to you themselves. Let us not forget what we have already seen however. You be the judge.

Throughout the whole of the legends we have seen, Christ Jesus is the toiling Sun (being made equal with God) laboring for the benefit of others, not his own, and doing hard service for a mean and cruel generation. Watch his sun-like career of brilliant conquest, checked with intervals of storm, and declining to a death clouded with sorrow and derision. He is in constant company with twelve apostles, the twelve signs of the zodiac. The number twelve appears in many Sun-Myths.

It refers to the twelve hours of the day or night, or the twelve moons of the lunar year (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. i. p. 165; Bonwick, Egyptian Belief, p. 175). Osiris, the Egyptian Savior, had twelve apostles (Bonwick, Egyptian Belief, p. 175).

In all religions of antiquity the number twelve, which applies to the twelve signs of the zodiac, are reproduced in all kinds and sorts of forms. For instance, such are the twelve great gods; the twelve apostles or Osiris; the twelve apostles of Jesus; the twelve sons of Jacob; the twelve tribes; the twelve altars of James; the twelve labors of Mars; the twelve brothers of Arvaux; the twelve gods Consents; the twelve governors in the Manichean System; the adectyas of the East Indies; the twelve asses of the Scandinavians; the city of the twelve gates in the Apocalypse; the twelve wards of the city; the twelve sacred cushions, on which the Creator sits in the cosmogony of the Japanese; the twelve precious stones of the rational, or the ornament worn by the high priest of the Jews, etc. (Dupuis, Origin of Religious Belief, pp. 39-40).

Answer for yourself: Now is there any doubt that the account of Jesus' having 12 Apostles might be again a further development from the influence of Gentile Sun-Myths?

DEATH ON A CROSS.....TRUTH...OR SUN-MYTH RETOLD?

First we need to understand that Jesus was crucified on a stake or a pole that had no cross beam. Archeological evidence from that period finds no such "crosses" but instead stone "coffins" often are opened, unearthed by archeologists, to find bodies still nailed to the poles as was the common way of Roman crucifixion of that period. There simply was no cross beams, but if your remember many of these Sun-gods when crucified had arms extended to the whole of the world. A good example is Isis as seen in these images. Thus the need for a like representation of Jesus and his death; thus the like need for a cross bar on such a pole. It simply never happened that way.

When the Sun reached his extreme Southern limit in the sky, then his career was ended and it was assumed by primitive man that the Sun had been overcome by his enemies. The Sun was dead. If you remember in our study on the Winter Solstice that the Sun, for 3 days a year, remains motionless in the sky. It does not move lower on the horizon in its track across the sky nor does it begin its upward journey either. The Sun remains "dead" for 3 days. Again if you remember this was the origin of the "descent into hell" stories as the Sun was submitted to the the "Dark-Evil" or the "D-Evil" (Devil). The powers of darkness, and of winter, which had sought in vain to wound him, have at length won the victory: The bright Sun of summer is finally slain, crucified in the heavens, and pierced by the arrow, spear or thorn of winter. If need be refresh yourself with our articles on the "Son or Sun of God" as you see for yourself how the Sun was submitted to the "cross" of the equinoxes and later personified into the "Son" who was submitted to the same "cross of the equinoxes."

The intersection of the 4 equinoxes is represented as a "cross" by primitive man. As the Sun was placed on this cross it was easily seen and understood by primitive man that the Sun is divided up into 4 parts, or should I say that the Sun divides the year into 4 parts (spring, summer, autumn, winter). Pictured this way the Sun as on the cross was understood to be "crucified." When you then remember how the Sun became the Son then you have the Son on the Cross.

The crucifixion of the Sun-gods is simply the power of Darkness triumphing over the "Lord of Light," and Winter overpowering the Summer. It was at the winter solstice that the ancients wept for Tammuz, the fair Adonis, and other Sun-gods, who were put to death by the boar, slain by the thorn of winter (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. p. 13).

Other versions of the same myth tell us of Eurydike stung to death by the hidden serpent, or Sifrit smitten by Hagene (the Thorn), of Isfendiyar slain by the thorn or arrow of Rustem, or Achilleus vulnerable only in the heel, of Brynhild enfolded within the dragon's coils, of Meleagros dying as the torch of doom is burnt out, of Baldur, the brave and pure, smitten by the fatal mistletoe, and of Chrishna and others being crucified.

In Egyptian mythology, Set, the destroyer, triumphs in the West. He is the personification of Darkness and Winter, and the Sun-god whom he puts to death, is Horus the Savior (Renouf, Hibbert Lectures, pp. 112-115).

Throughout this tale, the Sun-god was but fulfilling his doom as seen in the heavens. This natural laws of the universe were interpreted by primitive man and later personified as we have seen into mythos of his culture. Everyone on the planet saw the same things and this explains the uncanny similarities of the Sun-Myths around the globe from thousands of years ago. The suffering of a violent death was a necessary part of the mythos; and, when his hour had come, he must meet his doom, as surely as the Sun, once risen, must go across the sky, and then sink down into his bread beneath the earth or sea. It was a fate from which there was no escaping.

THE DEVELOPING MYTHS OF THE NATIONS

Chrishna, the crucified Savior of the Hindus, is a personification of the Sun crucified in the heavens. One of the names of the Sun in the Vedic hymns is "Vishnu" and it is very important to know that in the Rig-Veda the god Vishnu is often named a a manifestation of Solar Energy, or rather as a form of the Sun (Indian Wisdom, p. 322).

Chrishna is Vishnu is human form. Chrishna says: "I am Vishnu, Brahma, Indra, and the source as well as the destruction of things, the creator and the annihilator of the whole aggregate of existences (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. p. 131).

In the hymns of the Rig-Veda the Sun is spoken of as "stretching out his arms," in the heavens, "to bless the world, and to rescue it from the terror of darkness." This reminds me of many of the examples of Isis with the Sun-disk on her head as she "stretches out her arms."

Indra, the crucified Savior worshipped in Nepal and Tibet, is identical with Chrishna, the Sun. Indra, who was represented as a crucified god, is also the Sun. No sooner is he born than he speaks to his mother. Like Apollo and all other Sun-gods he has "golden locks (reminiscent of the Sun rays of golden light," and like them he is possessed of an inscrutable wisdom. He is also born of a virgin...the Dawn. Chrishna and Indra are one (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. i. pp. 88, 341; vol. ii. p. 131).

The principal Phenician deity, El, which says Parkhurst, in his Hebrew Lexicon, "was the very name the heathens gave to their god Sol, their Lord or Ruler of the Hosts of Heaven," was called "The Preserver (Savior) of the World," for the benefit of which he offered a mystical sacrifice (Wake, Phallism, p. 55). Notice again the connection between the Sun's (Sol's) sacrifice on behalf of mankind!

The crucified Iao (Divine Love personified) is the crucified Adonis, the Sun. The Lord and Savior was called Iao (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. p. 113).

Osiris, the Egyptian Savior, was crucified in the heavens. To the Egyptian the cross was a symbol of immortality, an emblem of the Sun, and the god himself was crucified to the tree, which denoted his fructifying power (Ibid. pp. 115, 125).

Horus was also crucified in the heavens. He was represented, like Chrishna and Christ Jesus, with outstretched arms in the vault of heaven (Bonwick, Egyptian Belief, p. 157).

The story of the crucifixion of Prometheus was allegorical, for Prometheus was only a title of the Sun, expressing providence or foresight, wherefore being crucified in the extremities of the earth, signified originally no more than the restriction of the power of the Sun during the winter months (Knight, Ancient Art and Mythology, p. 88).

Ixion, who was bound to the wheel (Sun wheel), was none other than the god Sol, crucified in the heavens. The Sun, as climbing the heights of heaven, was sometime interpreted by men as the Sun being "arrogant" since for himself he made exorbitant claims. He was punished by being bound to a "fiery cross." Stories were invented of the Sun revolving daily on a four-spoked cross (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. p. 27). Whatever be the origin of the name, Ixion is the "Sun of noonday," crucified in the heavens, whose four-spoked wheel is seen whirling in the highest heaven. So was Ixion bound on the fiery wheel, and the sons of men see the flaming spokes day by day as it whirls in the big heaven. The "wheel" upon which Ixion and criminals were said to have been executed was a cross, the name of the thing was dissembled among Christians; it was a St. Andrew's cross, of which two spokes confined the arms, and two the legs.

THE ALLEGORICAL REPRESENTATION OF THE GENERATIVE AND DESTRUCTIVE ATTRIBUTES OF THE SUN-GODS

Hercules is torn limb from limb; and in this catastrophe we see the "blood-red sunset" which closes the career of Hercules (Cox, Tales of Ancient Greece, p. xxxii). The Sun-god Hercules cannot rise to life of the blessed gods until he has been slain. The morning cannot come until Eos who closed the previous day has faded away and died in the black abyss of night.

Achilleus and Meleagros represent alike the "short-lived Sun," whose course is one of toil for others, ending in an early death, after a series of wonderful victories alternating with periods of darkness and gloom (Ibid., p. xxxiii). In the tales of the Trojan war, it is related of Archilleus that he expires at the Skaian, or western gates of the eveningg. He is slain by Paris, who here appears as the Pani, or dark power, who blots out the light of the Sun from the heaven

We have the story of Adonis, born of a virgin, and known in the countries where he was worshipped as "The Savior of Mankind," killed by the wild boar, afterwards "rose from the dead, and ascended into heaven." This Adonis, Adonai in Hebrew or "My Lord," is simply the Sun. He is crucified in the heavens put to death by the wild boar (personified Winter). "Babylon called Typhon or Winter 'the boar;' they said he killed Adonis or the fertile Sun" (Muller, Science of Religion, p. 186).

The Crucified Dove worshipped by the ancients, was none other than the crucified Sun. Adonis was called the "Dove." At the ceremonies in honor of his resurrection from the dead, the devotees said, "Hail to the Dove! the Restorer of Light" (Calemt, Fragments, vol. ii. pp. 21-22). This Crucified Dove" is described by Pindar, the great lyric poet of Greece, born about 522 B.C.E.

"We read in Pindar of the venerable bird Iynx bound to the wheel, and of the pretended punishment of Ixion. But this rotation was really no punishment, being, but as Pindar relates, voluntary (compare to Jesus' death), and prepared by himself and for himself; or if it was, it was appointed in derision of his false pretensions, whereby he gave himself out as the crucified spirit of the world." "The four spokes represent St. Andrew's cross, adapted to the four limbs extended, and furnish perhaps the oldest illusion to the crucifixion. The same cross of St. Andrew was the Taw (T), which Ezekiel commands them to mark upon the foreheads of the faithful, as appears from all Israelitish coins whereon that letter is engraved. The same idea was familiar to Lucian, who calls T the letter of crucifixion. Certainly, the veneration of the cross is very ancient. Iynx, the bird of Mautic inspiration, bound to the four-legged wheel, given the notion of Divine Love crucified. The wheel denotes the world, of which she is the spirit, and the cross the sacrifice made for that world" (Pindar, Nimrod: vol. i. p. 278; Higgins, Anacalypsis, p. 503).

This "Divine Love," of whom Nimrod speaks, was "The First-begotten Son" of the Platonists. The crucifixion of "Divine Love" is often found among the Greeks. Ionah or Juno, according to the Iliad, was bound with fetters, and suspended in space, between heaven and earth. Ixion, Prometheus, Apollo of Miletus were all crucified. At Miletus was the crucified Apollo who overcomes the Serpent of evil and the evil principle in the world.

Semi-Ramis was both a queen of unrivaled celebrity, and also a goddess, worshipped under the form of a Dove. Her name signifies the "Supreme Dove." She is said to have been slain by the last survivor of her sons, while others say, she flew away as a dove. In both Grecian and Hindu histories this mystical queen Semiramis is said to have fought a battle on the banks of the Indus, with a king called Staurobates, in which she was defeated, and from which she flew away in the form of a Dove.

Of this Nimrod says:

"The name Staurobates, the king by whom Semiramis was finally overpowered, alluded to the cross on which she perished," and that, "the crucifixion was made into a glorious mystery by her infatuated adorers"

Make no mistake about it. This Oriental story has had unbelievable impact and influence in almost every nation of the world. These words apply to Christ Jesus , as well as Semiramis, according to Christian Father Ignatius.

Here we have the crucified Dove, the Sun, for it is well known that the ancients personified the Sun female as well as male.

We also have the fable of the Crucified Rose, illustrated in the jewel of the Rosicrucians. The jewel of the Rosicrucians is formed of a transparent red stone, with cross on one side and a red rose on the other thus forming a crucified rose. This idea stems from the fable of Adonis who was the Sun whom we have seen often crucified whereupon he was then changed into a red rose by Venus (The Rosicrucians, p. 260).

The emblem of the Templars is a red rose on a cross. This is usually surrounded with a glory, and placed on a calvary. This is the Naurutz, Natsir, or Rose of Isuren, of Tamul, or Sharon, or the Water Rose, the Lily Padma, Pena, Lotus, crucified in the heavens for the salvation of man (Ibid.).

Answer for yourself: Is it just coincidence that Jesus Christ was called the Rose, the Rose of Sharon?

Jesus was believed by his followers to be the incarnation of Divine Wisdom. He was the son of Mair or Maria. He was the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley, which bloweth in the month of his mother Maia. Thus, when the angel Gabriel gives the salutations to the Virgin, he presents her with the lotus or lily; as may be seen in hundreds of old pictures in Italy. We see therefore that Adonis, "the Lord," "the Virgin-born," "the Crucified," "the Resurrected Dove," "the Restorer of Light," is one and the same with the "Rose of Sharon," the crucified Christ Jesus.

Plato (429 B.C.E.) in his Pimaeus, philosophizing about the Son of God says:

"The next power to the Supreme God was decussated or figured in the shape of a cross on the universe."

This brings to recollection the doctrine of certain so-called Christian heretics, who maintained that Christ Jesus was crucified in the heavens.

The Chrestos was the Logos, the Sun was the manifestation of the Logos or Wisdom to men; or, as it was held by some, it was his peculiar habitation. The Sun being crucified at the time of the winter solstice was represented by the young man playing the Bull (emblem of the Sun) in the Mithraic ceremonies. The Chrest was the Logos, or Divine Wisdom, or a portion of divine wisdom incarnate; in this sense he is really the Sun or the solar power incarnate, and to him everything applicable to the Sun will apply.

Lund, in his Monumental Christianity, provides a great picture of the Christian Savior crucified in the heavens. The pattern of the illustrations can be traced to Chrishna who is also represented crucified in "space." This is exactly displayed in the form of a Romish crucifix, but not fixed to a piece of wood, though the legs and feet are put together in the usual way. There is a glory over the top of it, coming from above, not shining from the figure, as is generally seen in a Roman crucifix. It has a pointed Parthian coronet instead of a crown of thorns. All the avatars, or incarnations of Vishnu, are painted with Ethiopian or Parthian coronets. For these reasons the Christian author will not own that it is a representation of the "True Son of Justice," for he was not crucified in space; but whether it was intended to represent Chrishna, Wittoba, or Jesus, it tells a secret: it shows that someone was represented crucified in the heavens, and undoubtedly has something to do with "The next power to the Supreme God," who, according to Plato, "was decussated or figured in the shape of a cross on the universe." The Sun-gods Apollo, Indra, Wittoba, or Chrishna, and Christ Jesus, are represented as having their feet pierced with nails (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. p. 28).

Answer for yourself: Who was the crucified god whom the ancient Romans worshipped, and whom they, according to Justin Martyr, represented as a man on a cross?

Answer for yourself: Can we doubt, after what we have seen, that he was this same crucified Sol, whose birthday they annually celebrated on 25th of December?

In the poetical tales of the ancient Scandinavians, the same legend is found. Frey, the Deity of the Sun, was fabled to have been killed, at the time of the winter solstice, by the same boar who put the god Adonis to death, therefore a boar was annually offered to him at the great feast of Yule (Knight, Anct. Art and Myth, pp. 87-88). "Baldur the Good," son of the supreme god Odin, and the virgin-goddess Frigga, was also put to death by the sharp thorn of winter.

The ancient Mexicans crucified Savior, Quetzalcoatle, another personification of the Sun, was sometimes represented as crucified in space, in the heavens, in a circle of nineteen figures, the number of the metonic cycle. A serpent (emblem of evil, darkness, and winter) is depriving him of the organ of generation (Higgins, Anacalypsis, vol. ii. p. 32).

It is a well known fact that Christ Jesus, and many of the heathen saviors, healers, and preserving gods, were represented in the form of a Serpent. This is owing to the fact that, in one of its attributes, the Serpent was an emblem of the Sun (think of Moses and the serpent on the cross...the Sun crucified). It may, at first, appear strange that the Serpent should be an emblem of evil, and yet also an emblem of the beneficent divinity; but, as Prof. Renouf remarks, in his Hibbert Lectures, "The moment we understand the nature of a myth, all impossibilities, contradictions, and immoralities disappear."

The serpent is an emblem of evil when represented with his deadly sting; he is the emblem of eternity when represented casting off his skin; and an emblem of the Sun when represented with his tail in his mouth, thus forming a circle. This idea is quite consistent with the ideas entertained by the Phenicians as to the Serpent, which they supposed to have the quality of putting off its old age, and assuming a second youth (Sanchoniation: quoted by Wake: Phallism, p. 43). This idea even existed in the Americas. The great century of the Aztecs was encircled by a serpent grasping its own tail, and the great calendar stone is entwined by serpents bearing human heads in their distended jaws. The annual passage of the Sun, through the signs of the zodiac, being in an oblique path, resembles, or at least the ancients thought so, the tortuous movements of the Serpent, and the facility possessed by this reptile of casting off his skin and producing out of itself a new covering every year, bore some analogy to the termination of the old year and the commencement of the new year. Accordingly, all the ancient spheres: Persians, Indian, Egyptian, Barbaric, Mexican, etc., were surrounded by the figure of a serpent holding its tail in its mouth (Squire: Serpent Symbol, p. 249).

Thus there came to be, not only good, but also bad, serpents, both of which are referred to in the narrative of the Hebrew exodus, but still more clearly in the struggle between good and the bad serpents of Persian mythology, which symbolized Ormuzd, or Mithra, and the evil spirit Ahriman (Wake, Phallism, p. 42).

As the Dove and the Rose, emblems of the Sun, were represented on the cross, so was the Serpent (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. p. 128). The famous "Brazen Serpent," said to have been "set up: by Moses in the wilderness, is called in the Targum (the Aramaic versions of the Old Testament) the Savior! It was probably a serpentine crucifix, as is called a "cross" by Justin Martyr. The crucified serpent denoted the dormant Phallos, or the Sun after it had lost is power. It is the Sun in winter, crucified on a tree, which denoted its fructifying power. Being the most intimately connected with the reproduction of life on earth, the Linga became the symbol under which the Sun, invoked with a thousand names, has been worshipped throughout the world as the restorer of the powers of nature after the long sleep or death of Winter. In the brazen Serpent of the Pentateuch, the two emblems of the Cross and the Serpent, the quiescent and energizing Phallos, are united (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. pp. 113-118). As Mr. Wake remarks, "There can be no doubt that both the Pillar (Phallus) and the Serpent were associated with many of the Sun-gods of antiquity (Wake, Phallism, p. 60).

This is seen often when the serpent is represented with rays of glory surrounding its head.

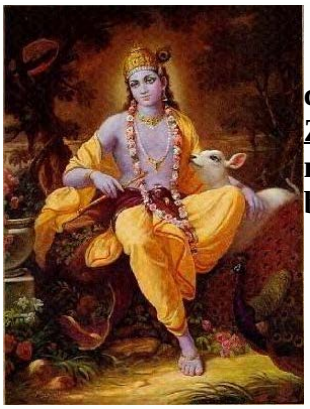
The Ophrites, who venerated the serpent as an emblem of Christ Jesus, are said to have maintained that the serpent of Genesis, who brought wisdom into the world, was Christ Jesus. The brazen serpent was called the Word by the Chaldee paraphrast. The Word, or Logos, was Divine Wisdom, which was crucified; thus we have the cross, or Phallus, with the serpent upon it. Besides considering the serpent as the emblem of Christ Jesus, or of the Logos, the Ophites are said to have revered it as the cause of all the arts of civilized life. Several females have been believed to have been selected and impregnated by the Holy Ghost, and is was, in some cases, the form of a serpent which was the form the Holy Ghost chose to impregnate them. This was the incarnation of the Logos.

The serpent was held in great veneration by the ancients, who, considered it as the symbol of the beneficent Deity, and an emblem of eternity. As such it has been variously expressed on ancient sculptures and medals in various parts of the globe.

Although generally, it did not always, symbolize the god Sun, or the power of which the Sun is an emblem; but, invested with various meanings, it entered widely into the primitive mythologies. As Mr.. Squire observes:

"It typified wisdom, power, duration, the good and evil principles, life, reproduction; in short, in Egypt, Syria, Greece, India, China, Scandinavia, America, everywhere on the globe, it has been a prominent emblem" (Squire, Serpent Symbols, p. 155).

The serpent was the symbol of Vishnu, the preserving god, the Savior, the Sun (Wake, Phallism in Acnt. Religs., p. 72). It was an emblem of the Sun-god Buddha, the Angel-Messiah (Ibid. p. 73; Squire, Serpent Symbol, p. 195). The Egyptian Sun-god Osiris, the Savior, is associated with the snake (Faber, Orig. Pagan Idol., in Squire, p. 158). The Persian Mithra, the Mediator, Redeemer, and Savior, was symbolized by the serpent (Ibid.). The Phenicians represented their beneficent Sun-god, Agathodemon, by a serpent (Kendrick, Egypt, vol. i. p. 375). The serpent was, among the Greeks and Romans, the emblem of a beneficent genius. Antipator of Sidon, calls the god of Ammon, the "Renowned Serpent" (Ibid.). The Grecian Hercules, the Sun-god, was symbolized as a serpent; and so was AEsculapius and Apollo. The Hebrews, at one time in their antiquity, worshipped the Sun-god Sol, and represented him in he form of a serpent. This the the "seraph" spoken of above as set up by Moses (Num. 21:3) and worshipped by the children of Israel. Seraph is the singular of seraphim, meaning Semilice (splendor, fire, light); emblematic of the fiery disk of the Sun, and which, under the name of Nehush-tan, "Serpent-dragon," was broken up by the reforming Hezekiah.



The principal god of the Aztecs was Tonac-actcoatl, which means the Serpent Sun (Squire, p. 161).

The Mexican virgin-born Lord and Savior, Quetzalcoatle, was represented in the form of a serpent. In fact, his names signifies "Feathered Serpent." Quetzaloatle was a personification of the Sun (Ibid. p. 185).

So we see it is relatively easy to connect the Serpent and the Sun, as corresponding symbols of the reproductive or creative powers.

The mysteries of Osiris, Isis, and Horus, in Egypt; Attis and Cybele, in Phrygia; Ceres and Proserpine, at Eleusis; of Venus and Adonis, in Phenicia; of Bona Dea and Priapus, in Rome, and all susceptible of one explanation. They all set forth and illustrated, by solemn and impressive rites, and mystical symbols, the grad phenomenon of nature, especially as connected with the creation of things and the perpetuation of life. In all, it is worthy of remark, the Serpent was more or less conspicuously introduced, and always as symbolical of the invigorating or active energy of nature, the Sun.

In early Christian art Christ Jesus was represented as a crucified lamb. The crucified lamb is "the Lamb of God taking away the sins of the world, and slain from the foundation of the world" (Lundy, Monumental Christianity, p. 185). In other words, the crucified lamb typifies the crucified Sun, for the lamb was another symbol of the Sun and one of the signs of the Zodiac. This concept had been applied since the beginning to the crucified Sun-heroes of myth as seen in the example of Chrisha being connected with the constellation Aires and being called the "Lamb of God."

We find, then, that the stories of the crucifixion of the different so-called Saviors of mankind all melt into one, and that they are allegorical, for "Savior" was only a title of the "Sun," and his being put to death on the cross, signifies no more than the restruction of the power of the Sun in the winter quarter.

With Justin Martyr, then, we can say:

"There exists not a people, whether Greek or barbarian, or any other race of men, by whatsoever appellation or manners they may be distinguished, however ignorant of arts or agriculture, whether they dwell under the tents, or wander about in crowed wagons, among whom prayers are not offered up in the name of a CRUCIFIED SAVIOR to the Father and creator of all things" (Justin Martyr, Dialog. With Typho, quoted in Gibbons' Rome, vol. i. p. 582).

THERE WAS DARKNESS ALL OVER THE LAND...TRUTH...OR SUN-MYTH RETOLD?

If you have been diligent to read up and through this article then you should be impressed at the evidence presented.

Answer for yourself: Can such parallels be resigned to mere "coincidence"?

If you have ever spent much time in serious study of the New Testament then you have already seen how many of the events of the life of Jesus have been embellished by the early Gentile Church to "make Jesus greater" than those who came before him. And let me say that I believe he was greater than any. However, we need not make the "fish story" longer if you know what I mean for the truth is enough. The next example is really not of any major importance, but is included as it again is a parallel to the Sun-Myths and can be easily interpreted in such a manner.

In the same manner ends the tale of the long toil and sorrows of other Sun-gods. The last scene exhibits a manifest return to the spirit of the solar myth. He (the Sun personified) must not die the common death of all men, for no disease or corruption can touch the body of the brilliant Sun. After a long struggle against he dark clouds who are arrayed against him in an effort to prevent his light, he is finally overcome, and the Sun eventually dies beneath the horizon. Such are the stories of all the preceding Sun-gods who became men. With the setting of the Sun it was understood to "die" only to be "raised" again. Blacker and blacker grow the evening shades, and finally "there is darkness on the face of the earth," and the din of its thunder crashes through the air (Description of the death of Hercules, Tales of Ancient Greece, pp. 61-62).

It is the picture of a sunset in wild confusion, of a sunset more awful, yet not more sad, that which is seen in the last hours of many other Sun-gods. It is nothing more than a picture of the battle of the clouds over the dead or dying Sun, which is to be seen in the lengendary history of many Sun-gods. Just described is the "battle of the clouds over the dead or dying Sun..." (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. p. 91).

LEO, THE LION

Around 6,000 to 3.000 B.C.E. the stars of Leo were the heliacal rising stars of the summer solstice, linking this constellation with hot summers and the longest days. When we consider the precession of the equinoxes we see Leo being later replaced at the Vernal Equinox with Cancer, Gemini, Taurus, Aries, and Pisces over the next thousands of years. This connection, occurring during the dawn of writing, permanently linked Leo with the Sun. Recognized as a lion by the Persians, Syrians, Babylonians, and Egyptians, and then later by the Turks and the Jews (Allen, Star Names, p. 253), this constellation seems to have been seen as a lion from the beginning of cultivation and civilization. See Star Map 21, page 260.

The earliest known use of the lion as a symbol appears to be Sekhmet, the sister form to Bast-Hathor of Egyptian mythology. She was a sphinx-lioness symbolizing wrathful destruction and an active aggressor against her father's enemies. She sat beside Ra and poured forth blazing fire that scorched and consumed Ra's enemies, or else used fiery darts to strike them from afar (Budge, The Gods of the Egyptians, vol. 1, p. 515). At all times in Egyptian mythology the lion is linked to a goddess, aggressive, assertive, known by many titles and names, the "Lady of Flame" or "great lady, holy one, powerful one," for example (Budge, The Gods of the Egyptians, vol. 1, p. 517).

The Nile flooded in the period of Leo's heliacal rising, and so the life-giving waters of the Nile were also connected with the great fiery goddess. Thus she was called upon to protect the precious water in the same way that she would fight for her father. The goddess lion's head would often be sculpted on the irrigation gates that opened to allow the Nile into the fields (Jobes, Outer Space, p. 194). In this manner the Egyptians saw the Lion as a guardian of water, a belief still echoed in fountains which use a lion's head as a font.

However, as Leo moved from its summer solstice position due to the effects or precession, and Egyptian culture declined, it started to lose its importance in the same manner as Cancer when it slipped from prominence. By 243 B.C.E. the lion had lost the tuft of its tail and this group of stars was redefined as Coma Berenices, with both the Egyptian and Greek cultures claiming creation of the event (Jobes, Outer Space, p. 195).

The stars of the lion no longer claiming the important solstice position, the Greeks and Romans associated the constellation with the Nemean Lion that Hercules killed. The Nemean Lion was no ordinary beast but a grandchild of Gaia, Mother Earth, and the child of a destroying Moon goddess (Walker, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, p. 721, [remnants of the destroying Sun goddess of the Egyptians, but by this period the Moon, not the Sun, was associated with the goddess]. He was a giant, magical lion whose coat was impenetrable to the masculine weapons of sword or spear. In Greek mythology this lion had laid waste to the countryside around the town of Nemea. One of Herculesμ labors was to kill this lion. After his weapons proved ineffective, he cornered the beast, wrapped his arms around its back and squeezed the lion to death (Grimal, The Dictionary of Classical Mythology, p. 197).

It is possible to think of the Nemean Lion (grandchild of Gaia) as a representative of the matrilineal culture, and its activities around the town of Nemea imply that the worship of the goddess, or practice of a non-Zeus-centered religion, was still active in that area. Hercules, whose main duty seemed to be to destroy all the symbols of older religions, was sent to rout these "pagans," in the same manner that the Christian Church in the Middle Ages killed nine million men and women, mostly in the countryside, because these people were supposed to believe in an older religion.

THE VIRGIN BIRTH OF JESUS CHRIST AS RECORDED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT TRUTH...OR A SUN-MYTH RETOLD?

In antiquity, filled with legend, lore, and superstition, the report of a virtuous woman giving birth to a child with the usual form, and possessing the usual characteristics of a human being, but without a male partner in the conception, might in an age of miracles and ignorance of natural law, be believed with implicit credulity. But in an age of intelligence, when the keys of science have provided modern man the answers for such lengeds and myths. Modern investigations into religous histories of pagan nations have laid bare the fact that most ancient religious countries abound in reports of these "virgin births." That being the case then the only recourse for a Christian who is a "thinking believer" is to obtain a profound and general skepticism after he has done personal study into into such legends.

We continue our search for the truth and origin of the "virgin birth" stories that not only were applied to Jesus in the New Testament, but which also can be traced to the beginning of time for other "god-men" and the various religions of the heathen nations.What is truth? How do we know we have? How do we know we don't have it? Well, the last question is easy: You study!

My research has again linked such "virgin birth" stories to the Sun. Nothing is new here as you shall quickly see. In this respect these immaculately conceived "virgin born" gods are personified from the Sun.

THE EVIDENCE

Mankind will not emulate extraordinary leaders but instead fall to their knees, adore and worship them. Rather than follow a difficult example it is easier to deify the exemplar thus providing an excuse for not emulating him. It has been said: "How can mere men do what gods can do?" This inclination to worship Jesus as a god rather than follow him as a man stems from the earliest days of Christianity. Within 60 years of the crucifixion Jesus's adoring followers had created the myth of the conception of Jesus by the Holy Ghost making him at least half a god from the start. He thus became an impossible role model for merely mortal men. Yet even the half of him that was human passed on by his mother was too much for the adorers. They they wanted a fully fledged god. After centuries as a tolerated heresy, in 1854 the doctrine of "The Immaculate Conception of the Mother of God" was adopted by the Roman Church rendering Jesus's mother a perfect being from her own birth, free of original sin, incapable of sin throughout her life - a sinless mate for God Almighty to conceive a divine son. Jesus as a fine example of loving manhood had been usurped by the adorers and worshippers.

But lets look at the text. No mention is made of the Virgin Birth in the epistles and in fact Paul could not be more explicit in recording that Jesus was "of the seed of David according to the flesh" as if he were refuting the suggestion. For Paul Jesus was the Son of God through the "Spirit of Holiness" which did not require a supernatural conception. Nor does the earliest gospel mention the virgin birth. The mystical Book of the Revelation of John the Divine does not mention it, though it would be perfect for inclusion in such an allegorical piece. None of the Jewish patriarchs were born of virgins and, though older women beyond the menopause had their wombs "opened" to conceive Isaac, Jacob and Samuel, no divine impregnation was suggested.

The virgin birth appears in Luke and Matthew, years after the event, to prove Jesus's divinity. The birth stories in the two gospels come from different sources and differ widely but both contradict their central thesis that Jesus's mother was a virgin by giving a genealogy to show that Joseph was descended from David, an irrelevancy if Joseph had not impregnated his wife. The original idea was obviously to trace Jesus's lineage through Joseph to David to fulfill messianic prophecy. Then the idea of making Jesus more divine through a virgin birth arose and was tacked on spoiling the object of the genealogy. The editors of both gospels see a problem and try to avoid it: in Luke by inserting "as people thought" to show Jesus was not really Joseph's son and in Matthew by slyly separating Joseph from his son by inserting after "...Joseph" "the husband of Mary, of whom was begotten" Jesus. If the intention was to imply that Mary was begetting Jesus then the person inserting the story was either ignorant or depended on the ignorance of his readers for only men could beget according to Jewish convention. Neither Luke nor Matthew refer to the birth story again and indeed it contradicts the main story. Presumably his family or at least his mother would have been aware of all that feting by kings and shepherds, and glory in the heavens, and the reason for it all. Yet later they are continually puzzled and disappointed by Jesus's behaviour. And why bother trying to establish a divine conception when both refer to Joseph in the main narrative as the father of Jesus.

The Ebionites, the first Jewish followers of Jesus accepted Joseph as the natural father. An attempt was made by the early Christians to justify the virgin birth story by referring to Isaiah 7:14 where is written, "Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son". The word employed in the Greek version of the Old Testament was parthenos. But a reference to the original Hebrew yields the word almah. Both parthenos and almah did not necessarily mean a virgin as we understand it, a woman who had never had intercourse. In Greek it could mean youth, the state of unmarriage, or even a person who is first married. In Hebrew it could mean beside the usual meaning, an immature girl who could not conceive because she had not yet started to menstruate. The idea of a virgin as a premenstrual girl allows her to have children and still be a virgin. If she were to conceive from her very first ovulation, she would not have menstruated but would be a mother and still a virgin. If she conceived at the first ovulation after the birth, she could be a virgin mother of two children of different ages. Since Jewish girls often married before menstruation - in Joel 1:8 an almah's husband is mentioned - virgin mothers were not unusual. Now Mary was described as "betrothed" to Joseph implying that she was a minor under the age of twelve and a half. After that age she could become his wife. Thus the "virgin" Mary could have given birth. If she did, the truth was misunderstood in the gentile world of the Roman Empire, and indeed beyond, where it was de rigeur not only for gods but also great men to be born of virgins. Ra, Hatshepsut, Amenophis III, Cyrus the Great, Julius Caesar, Perseus, Plato, Apollonius of Tyana, Fohi, Lao Kium, Zoroaster and Attis all came of virgin births according to their followers.

Herodotus explained that such conceptions occurred by way of a ray of light and according to Plutarch's book on Isis and Osiris it entered through the ear. Tertullian confirms it was a ray of light. Thus medieval pictures of Mary at the moment of conception show a ray of light entering her ear. Furthermore it is common for gods and those akin to gods to have mothers called Mary or a cognate name. Adonis was born of Myrrha, Hermes of Maia, Cyrus of Mariana or Mandane, Joshua of Miriam, Buddha of Maya and Khrishna of Maritala.

Many are the cases noted in history of young maidens claiming a paternity for their male offspring by a God.

Mr. Kenrick tells us the likeness of this virgin mother, with the divine child in her arms, may now be seen represented in sculpture on some of the ancient, ruined temples of that ruined empire. And Mr. Higgins (Anacalypsis) makes the broad declaration that "the worship of this virgin mother, with her God-begotten child, prevailed everywhere." This author also quotes Mr. Riquord as saying, this son of God "was exhibited in effigy, lying in a manger, in the same manner the infant Jesus was afterward laid in the cave at Bethlehem." Mr. Higgins further testifies that the worship of this virgin God-mother (that is, the God and the mother) is of very ancient date and universal prevalence in all the eastern countries, as is proved by sculptured figures bearing the marks of great age. By the way, the reprint of Anacalypsis is available on the Internet...I recommend it very highly if you want to get to the truth about many of the doctrines of Christendom.

Mr. Higgins remarks that the mother was still held to be a virgin, even after she had given birth to other children besides the deity-begotten bantling, which furnishes another striking parallel to the history of Mary, the mother of Jesus, as she was still called a virgin after she had given birth to Jesus and his brothers James and John. And it is an incident worth noticing here, that, in the case of Mayence, virgin-mother of the God-sired Hesus of the Druids, the ancient traditions of the country, more than two thousand years old, represent her body as being enveloped in light, and a crown of twelve stars upon her head, corresponding exactly to the apocalyptic figure described by St. John, in the twelfth chapter of his Revelation. She is also represented with her foot on the head of a serpent, according to Davie's Universal Etymology.

In corroboration of this statement one only needs to examine the evidence existing today of such legends; such evidence from the religious records of India, Egypt, Persia, Greece, Rome, Mexico, Tibet, etc.

Maia, mother of Sakia and Yasoda of Chrishna; Celestine, mother of the crucified Zunis; Chimalman, mother of Quexalcote; Semele, mother of the Egyptian Bacchus, and Minerva, mother of the Grecian Bacchus; Prudence, mother of Hercules; Alcmene, mother of Alcides; Shing- Mon, mother of Yu, and Mayence, mother of Hesus, were all as confidently believed to be pure, holy and chaste virgins, while giving birth to these Gods, sons of God, Saviors and sin-atoning Mediators, as was Mary, mother of Jesus, and long before her time.

Ceres, the virgin mother of Osiris, claimed that he was begotten by the "father of all Gods."

In Greece it became so common that the reigning king issued an edict, decreeing the death of all young women who should offer such an insult to deity as to lay to him the charge of begetting their children. The virgin Alcmene furnishes a case of a young woman claiming God as the father of her offspring, when she brought forth the divine Redeemer Alcides, 1280 years B.C.

Auguste Nichols tells us, in his Philosophical Essays on Christianity, that Io is called, in Eschylus, "the Chaste Virgin," and her son "the Son of God" If you would like to see other example you need look no further than Guigne's History of the Huns.

Gonzales informs us he found on an ancient temple in India the Latin inscription 'Partura, virginis,' "the virgin about to bring forth." And similar inscriptions have been found on pagan temples in the country of the ancient Gauls (Riquord's Theology of the Ancient Gauls, Chapter X.).

"He who hath ears to hear, let him hear," and treasure up these facts. According to Chinese history there were two beings -- Tien and Chang-Ti -- worshiped in that country as Gods more than twenty- five hundred years ago, born of virgins "who knew no man." The mother of the mighty and the almighty God Hercules, we are told, "knew only Jove."

If history and tradition, then, are to be credited, God had many "well-beloved sons," born of pious and holy virgins, besides Jesus Christ. And some of them are represented as being his only begotten," and others his "first begotten," sons. And all these cases appear to be equally as well authenticated as the story of Jesus Christ. All stand upon a level, the same kind and the same amount of evidence being offered in each case.

THE BLACK VIRGIN

Curiously, several of the above-named Saviors are represented as being black, Jesus Christ included with this number. There is as much evidence that the Christian Savior was a black man, or at least a dark man, as there is of his being the son of the Virgin Mary, or that he once lived and moved upon the earth. And that evidence is the testimony of his disciples, who had nearly as good an opportunity of knowing what his complexion was as the evangelists, who omit to say anything about it. In the pictures and portraits of Christ by the early Christians, he is uniformly represented as being black. And to make this the more certain, the red tinge is given to the lips; and the only text in the Christian bible quoted by orthodox Christians, as describing his complexion, represents it as being black. Solomon's declaration, "I am black, but comely, O ye daughters of Jerusalem" (Sol. i. 5), is often cited as referring to Christ. According to the bible itself, then, Jesus Christ was a black man.

But a little background into the "black virgin." Hundreds of icons of Mary have intentionally black faces and hands. In France they are called "Vierge Noires" or Black Virgins; in other countries they are called Black Madonnas. Some call her "the other Mary"; Jung said she is Isis; others consider her to be the iconic remains of prehistoric Earth Mother worship. She is linked with Cybele, Diana, Isis & Venus; cross-culturally she is associated with Kali, Inanna & Lilith. Historically she has ties to the Crusades and the Moorish occupation of Spain, to the Conquistadors, who brought her to the New World, and to the Merovingians and Knights Templars, who saw her as Mary Magdalene. As Sara-la-Kali she is revered by the Gypsies at Saintes Maries de la Mer. For modern psychologists she is said to express the archetype of the Dark Feminine. Whoever the enigmatic Black Virgin may be, she holds a powerful attraction for her millions of devotees around the world. Her sacred sites stand on highly charged earth energy centers, enhanced by megalithic ley-lines and sacred architecture. From ancient times to present, people have undertaken pilgrimages to her shrines as a way to explore her mysteries and to enable her to do her miraculous work of healing, transformation and inspiration. France has more than 300 Black Virgin sites, with over 150 Black Virgins still in existence.

Answer for yourself: It is believed by many that Jesus will return to this planet as Messiah. Let us suppose that, at some future time, he makes his second advent to the earth, as some Christians anticipate he will do, and that he comes in the character of a "black" Messiah, how would he be received negro-hating Christians or the sons of the Aryan nations?

Answer for yourself: Would they worship a negro God?

THE LINK TO ASTROLOGY

And the tradition of divine Saviors being born of undefiled and undeflowered virgins has an astronomical chapter we must not omit to notice. The virgin, with her God-begotten child, was pictured imaginarily in the heavens from time immemorial. They are represented on the Hindu zodiac, at least three thousand years old, and on the ancient Egyptian planispheres. And if you will examine Burritt's Geography of the Heavens, you will find the infant God-son (the sun) is represented as being born into a new year on the 25th of December (the very date assigned for Christ's birth), and may be seen rising over the eastern horizon, out of Mary, Maria, or Mare (the Latin for sea), with the infant God in her arms, being heralded and preceded by a bright star, which rises immediately preceding the virgin and her child, thus suggesting the text, "We have seen his star in the east, and have come to worship him." (Matt. 2:8).

If you have not you need to refresh yourself with the 280 cycle from the vernal equinox to Dec. 25 which the ancients believed was the gestation of the Sun-god impregnation of "mother earth." The ancients believed this "child god" was to be born of a Virgin. This, of course represents the constellation of Virgo. Virgo had command of teh Fall equinox at the time this passage was edited by the Gentile priesthood. And Virgo, as such, represented the fall of the fetus in the third trimester, before it's birth. A human fetus enter's it's third trimester after 186-187 days. The Fall equinox, Sept. 22 (when the fetus falls toward the vagina, birth) is 186 days from the Conception at the vernal equinox (March. 21). Again, we see the link between the human body and the Cosmos and the ancients interpreted this as man being made in the image of the Cosmos which delcared to them God.

Answer for yourself: Is this a coincidence and is the writers of the New Testament relating "truth" when they write of the birth of Jesus? Where is the Holy Spirit in any of this?

Such facts led the learned Alphonso to exclaim:

"The adventures of Jesus Christ are all depicted among the stars"

And such facts fasten the conviction on our mind that the stories of Gods cohabiting with young maids or virgins, and begetting other Gods, is of astrological origin -- the story of Jesus Christ included. A critical research shows that astronomy and religion were interblended, interwoven, and confounded together at a very early period of time, so indissolubly, that it now becomes impossible to separate them (at least without a considerable amount of study and finanes to procure the necessary documents for inspection).

INDIAN AND EGYPTIAN MYTHOLOGY

This Virgin, of whom the Sun, the true "Savior of Mankind," is born, is neither the bright and beautiful Dawn, or the dark Earth, or Night. Hence we have, as we have already seen if your have read the prior articles, the "Virgin," or "Virgo," as one of the signs of the Zodiac. The sign of the "Celestial Virgin" rises above the horizon at the moment in which we fix the birth of the Lord Jesus Christ (Higgins, Anacalypsis, vol. i. p. 314, and Bonwick, Egyptian Belief, p. 147). We have in the first decade the Sign of the Virgin, following the most ancient tradition of the Persians, the Chaldeans, the Egyptians, Hermes and Aesculapius, a young woman called in the Persian language, "Selinidos de Darzama; in the Arabic, Aderenedesa-that is to say, a chaste, pure, immaculate virgin, suckling an infant, which some nations call Jesus (Savior), but which we in Greek call "Christ" (Abulmazer). As a Christian you need to understand that this is the origin of the Mary and Jesus statues you see in many Catholic Churches. From this would come a whole host of "false doctrines" believed by millions today.

The "Dawn" was personified by the ancients as a "virgin mother, who bore the Sun" (Fiske, Myths and Mythmakers, p. 156). In Sanskrit "Ida" is the "Earth," the wife of Dyaus (the Sky), and so we have before us the mythical phrase, "the Sun at its birth rest on the earth." In other words, "the Sun at birth is nursed in the lap of the mother." The moment we understand the "nature" of a myth, all impossibilities, contradictions, and immoralities disappear. If a mythical personage be nothing more than a name of the Sun, his birth may be derived from ever so many different mothers. He may be the son of the Sky or the Dawn or of the Sea or of the Night (Renouf's Hibbert Lectures, p. 108).

This Celestial Virgin was feigned to be a mother. This Celestial Virgin is represented in the Indian Zodiac of Sr. William Jones, with ears of corn in one hand, and the lotus in the other. In Kircher's Zodiac of Hermes, she has corn in both hands. In other planispheres of the Egyptian priests she carries ears of corn in one hand, and the infant Savior Horus in the other. In Roman Catholic countries, she is generally represented with the child in one hand, and the lotus or lily in the other. In Vol. II. of Montfaucon's work, she is represented as a female nursing a child, with ears of corn in her hand, and the legend IAO. She is seated on clouds, a star is at her head. The reading of the Greek letters, from right to left, show this to be very ancient.

In the Vedic hymns Aditi, the "Dawn," is called the "Mother of the Gods." She is said to have given birth to the Sun (Max Muller, Origin of Religions, p. 261). "As the Sun and all the solar deities rise from the east," says Prof. M. Muller, "we can understand how Aditi (Dawn) came to be called the "Mother of the Bright Gods" (Ibid. p. 230). The poets of the Veda indulged in theogonic speculations and they knew of Indra as the greatest of gods, they knew of Agni as the god of gods, they knew of Varuna as the ruler of all; but they were by no means startled at the idea that their Indra had a mother, or that Varuna was nursed in the lap of Aditi. All this was true to nature; for their god was the Sun, and the mother who born and nursed him was the Dawn. Without scarcely an exception, all the names by which the "Virgin goddess" of the Akropolis was known point to this mythology of the Dawn (Cox, Aryan Myths, vol. i. p 228).

We find in the Vishnu Purana, that Devaki (the virgin mother of the Hindu Savior Chrishna, whose history corresponds in most every particular with that of Christ Jesus who would come over 800 years later) is called Aditi, which, in the Rig-Veda, is the name for the Dawn. Thus we see the legend is complete. Devaki is Aditi, Aditi is the Dawn, and the Dawn is the Virgin Mother. "The Savior of mankind," who is born of her is the Sun, the Sun is Chrishna, and Chrishna is Christ.

In the Mahabharata, Chrishna is also represented as the "Son of Aditi" (Cox, Aryan Myths, vol. iii, pp. 105, and 130, vol. ii). In other words, Chrishna is the son of the "Virgin Mother" as is the Christ.

Indra, the Sun, who was worshipped in some parts of India as the Crucified God, is also represented in the Vedic hymns as the Son of the Dawn. He is said to have been born of Dahana, who is Daphne, a personification of the Dawn (Fiske, Myths and Mythmakers, p. 118).

The humanity of this SOLAR GOD-MAN, this demiurge, is strongly insisted on in the Rig-Vida. He is the son of God, but also the son of Aditi. He is Purusha, the man, the male. Agni is frequently called the "Son of man." It is expressly explained that the titles Agni, Indra, Mitra, etc., all refer to one Sun-god under "many names." And when we find the name of a mortal, Yama, who once lived upon earth, included among these names, the humanity of the demiurge becomes still more accentuated, and we get at the root idea.

Horus, the Egyptian Savior, was the son of the virgin Isis. Now, this Isis, in Egyptian mythology, is the same as the virgin Devaki in Hindu mythology. She is the Dawn (Renouf, Hibbert Lectures, p. 111 and 161). Isis, as we have already seen, is represented suckling the infant Horus, and, in the words of Prof. Renouf, we may say, "in whose lap can the Sun be nursed more fitly than in that of the Dawn" (Ibid., p. 161, 179).

Among the goddesses of Egypt, the highest was Neith, who reigned inseparable with Amun in the upper sphere. She was called "Mother of the gods," "Mother of the sun." She was the femine origin of all things, as Amun was the male origin. She held the same rank at Sais as Amun did at Thebes. Her temples there are said to have exceeded in colossal grandeur anything every seen before. On one of these was the celebrated inscription thus deciphered by Champollion:

I am all that has been, all that is, all that will be. No mortal has ever raised the veil that conceals me. My offspring is the Sun

She was mother of the Sun-god Ra, and is commonly supposed to represent Heaven; but some expressions which are hardly applicable to heaven, render it more probable that she is one of the many names of the (Ibid., p. 179).

GREEK MYTHOLOGY

If we turn from Indian and Egyptian, to Grecian mythology, we shall also find that their Sun-gods and solar heroes are born of the same virgin mother. Theseus was said to have been born of Aithra, "the pure air," and Cedipus of Iokaste, "the violet light of morning." Perseus was born of the virgin Danae, and was called the "Son of the bright morning" (Tales of Ancient Greece, pp. xxxi). In Io, the mother of the "sacred bull, the mother also of Hercules, we see the violet-tinted morning from which the sun is born; all these gods and heroes being, like Christ Jesus, personifications of the Sun (Cox, Aryan Myths, vol. i. p. 229). The bull symbolized the productive force in nature, and hence it was associated with the Sun-gods. This animal was venerated by nearly all the peoples of antiquity (Wake, Phallism in Anct. Religs. p. 45).

"The Savior of Mankind" was also represented as being born of the "dusky mother," which accounts for many Pagan, and so-called Christian, goddesses being represented black. This is the "dark night," who for many weary hours travails with the birth of her child. The Sun, which scatters the darkness, is also the child of the darkness, and so the phrase naturally went "that he was born of her." Of the two legends related in the poems afterwards combined in the "Hymn to Apollo," the former relates the birth of Apollo, the Sun, from Leto, the Darkness, which is called his mother. The idea was entertained by the ancients that these god-begotten heroes were engendered without any carnal intercourse, and that they were they sons of Jupiter. This idea is later expanded and relates that such "virgin births" comes from the idea that the Holy Spirit was operating in some fashion on the virgin mother Earth (Knight, Ancient Art and Mythology, p. 156).

The dark earth was also represented as being the mother of the god Sun, who apparently came out of, or was born of her, in the East, as Minos (the sun) was represented to have been born of Ida (the earth) (Cox, Aryan Myths, p. 87).

In Hindu mythology, the Earth, under the name of Prithivi, receives a certain share of honors as one of the primitive goddesses of the Veda, being thought of as the "kind mother." Moreover, various deities were regarded as the progeny resulting from the fancied union of the Earth with Dyaus (Heaven).

Our Aryan forefathers looked up to the heavens and they gave it the name of Dyaus, from a root word which means "to shine." And when, out of the forces and forms of nature, they afterwards fashioned other gods, this name Dyaus became Dyaus pitar, the Heaven-father, or Lord of All; and in far later times, when the wester Aryans had found their home in Europe, the Dyaus pitar of the central Asian land became the Zeupater of the Greeks, and the Jupiter of the Romans, and the first part of his name gave us the word Deity.

According to Egyptian mythology, Isis was also the Earth (Williams, Hinduism, p. 24). Again, from the union of Seb and Nut sprung the mild Osiris, Seb in the Earth, Nut in Heaven, and Osiris is the Sun (Renouf's Hibbert Lectures, p.110-111).

Tacitus, the Roman historian, speaking of the Germans in A.D. 98, says:

There is nothing in these several tribes that merits attention, except that they all agree in worshipping the goddess Earth, or as they call her, Herth, whom they consider as the common mother of all (Manners of the Germans, p. xi).

These virgin mothers and virgin goddesses of antiquity, were also, at times, personifications of the Moon, or of Nature (Knight, Ancient Art and Mythology, pp. 81, 90, and 166). The moon was called by the ancients, "The Queen," "The Highest Princess," "The Queen of Heaven," "The Princess and Queen of Heaven," etc. She was Ishtar, Ashera, Diana, Artemis, Isis, Juno, Lucina, Astarte,etc. (Goldzhier, pp. 158; Knight, pp. 99-100).

Answer for yourself: Who is "God the Father," who overshadows the maiden?

The overshadowing of the maiden by "God the Father," whether he be called Zeus, Jupiter, or Jehovah, is simply the Heaven, the Sky, the "All-Father," looking down upon with love, and overshadowing the maiden, the broad flushing light of Dawn, or the Earth. From this union the Sun is born without any carnal intercourse. (virgin birth). The mother is not yet a virgin. This is illustrated in Hindu mythology by the union of Pritrivi, "Mother Earth," with Dyaus, "Heaven." Various deities were regarded as their progeny. The "God the Father" of all nations of antiquity was nothing more than a personification of the Sky or the Heavens. In one of the Chinese sacred books, the Shu-king, Heaven and Earth are called "Father and Mother of all things" (Taylor, Primitive Culture, pp. 294-296). The "God the Father" of the Indians is Dyaus, that is, the Sky (Williams, Hinduism, p. 24). Ormuzd, the god of the ancient Persians, was a personification of the sky. In Greek iconography Zeus is the Heaven. The Christian God supreme is still Dyaus Pitar, the "Heavenly Father."

NOW PAY ATTENTION: THE SUN BECOME THE SON!!!!!!!!!!

In the Vedic hymns the Sun, the Lord and Savior, the Redeemer and Preserver of mankind, is frequently called the "Son of the Sky" (Muller, Origin of Religions, pp. 261, 290).

Answer for yourself: Did you notice that the Sun is now become the "Son"? Get ready for incarnational theology for here it comes.

According to Egyptian mythology, Seb (the Earth) is overshadowed by Nut (Heaven), the result of this union being the beneficent Lord and Savior, Osiris (Renouf, Hebbert Lectures, pp. 110-111). The same thing is to be found in ancient Grecian mythology. Zeus or Jupiter is the Sky, and Danae, Leto, Iokaste, Io and others, are the Dawn, or the violet light of morning (Cox, Tales of Ancient Greece, pp. xxxi, and 82; and Aryan Mythology, vol. i. p. 229).

The sky appeared to men to perform the functions of a Father, as the Earth those of a Mother. The sky was the father, for it cast seed into the bosom of the earth (rain), which in receiving them became fruitful, and brought forth, and was the mother...Plutarch

The Phoenician theogony is founded on the same principles. Heaven and Earth (called Ouranos and Ghe) are at the head of a genealogy of aeons, whose adventures are conceived in the mythological style of these physical allegorists (Squire, Serpent Symbol, p. 66).

In the Samothracian mysteries, which seem to have been the most anciently established ceremonies of the kind in Europe, the Heaven and the Earth were worshipped as a male and female divinity, and as the parents of all things (Squire, Serpent Symbol, p. 64).

The Supreme God (the Al-fader), of the ancient Scandinavians was Odin, a personification of the Heavens. The principal goddess among them was Frigga, a personification of the Earth. It was the opinion among these people that this Supreme Being or Celestial God had united with the Earth (Frigga) to produce "Baldur the Good" (the Sun), who corresponds to the Apollo of the Greeks and Romans, and the Osiris of the Egyptians (Mallet, Northern Antiquitiess, pp. 90, 94, 98. 406, 510, 511).

Xiuletl, in the Mexican language, signifies Blue, and hence was a name which the Mexicans gave to Heaven, from which Xiuleti-cutli is derived, an epithet signifying "the God of Heaven," which they bestowed upon Tezcatlipoca, who was the "Lord of All," the "Supreme God." He it was who overshadowed the Virgin of Tule, Chimelman, who began the Savior Quetzalcoatle (the Sun).

Now I could go on but you get the point. As you have seen, the overshadowing of the Earth by the Sky produced the Sun. It would be a short step from personification to glorification to deification. And as you also saw, as far back as the Vedic hymns the Sun, the Lord and Savior, the Redeemer and Preserver of mankind, is frequently called the "Son of the Sky" (Muller, Origin of Religions, pp. 261, 290). It is this concept later accepted by Nicea that made Jesus "of the same essence as the Father;" therefore the Son is equal with the Father. This is how idolatry and Sun Worship crept into the faith of the early church and remains there today!

But back to the point, the whole concept of the immaculate virgin births of pagan godmen is found in the overshadowing of the Earth by the Sun thus producing the offspring of the Sun and Earth; namely the Son.

Answer for yourself: Now don't you think that these beliefs among the Gentiles of the world played a large part in the fashioning of many doctrines "about Jesus?' Could it be possible such doctrines were "read into the life of Jesus" by non-Jews who had ingrained anit-Semitism? Is is possible that they made "Jesus equal with God" and recorded such "beliefs" in documents that you have come to believe today are "inerrant" and "infallible"

(New Testament)?

Answer for yourself: Is the evidence not overwhelming? Where is a Jewish Rabbi to be found in any of this whose purpose was to bring men to God by preaching repentance and obedience to the Commandments of God?

Answer for yourself: As a Christian, could you have inherited and believed lies instead of the truths about the "historical Jesus" which fly in the face of such pagan traditions?

THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION....TRUTH...OR SUN-MYTH RETOLD?

Much of the life Jesus Christ, as recorded in the New Testament, are nothing more than allegorical representations of the Sun God. Long before Jesus the Ancients formulated their Mythology (Religion), after the Image of Astronomical Phenomena. They saw this as the best way to connect with the Creator God, that is by patterning their religious rituals in accordance with the most visible and observable aspect of God's creation, the Cosmos. Many of the stories and accounts in the life of Jesus in the New Testament are actually various dramas (metaphorical representations) of Solar Mythology. We are presently focusing on the Solar-Lunar aspects of ancient mythology and modern religion. We shall at this point commence a dissection of the New Testament gospels. As done previously, I wish to evaluate the most salient and popular episodes within these scriptures and show their parallel to the lives of the other mythical saviors that we have already discussed. And we will illustrate that much within the Gospels are analogous to Solar Mythology. Let me say this is done only to separate the lies and falsehoods from the truth about Jesus so those who follow him and his example can do so in truth.

First, we have the miraculous conception of a virgin.

- Mat 1:18 Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost.
- Mat 1:19 Then Joseph her husband, being a just man, and not willing to make her a public example, was minded to put her away privily.
- Mat 1:20 But while he thought on these things, behold, the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a dream, saying, Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife: for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost.
- Mat 1:21 And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name JESUS: for he shall save his people from their sins.
- Mat 1:22 Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying,
- Mat 1:23 Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us.

THE ASTRONOMICAL ANALOGY

The astronomical explanation of the first three points is as follows, The Miraculous Conception, as I explained in a previous article, refers to the Conjugation (Conception) that annually takes place at the vernal equinox. God, the Father, the Sun personified, at this time (the vernal equinox) is joined (the crossing of the celestial equator and the ecliptic of the sun) to commence the Gestation of the Son (Sun) of God (Father Sun), that will be born 280 days later on December 25th. There were many such "birth" of Sons of Sungods on this day; Jesus is just one in a long line of them!

The ancients felt that an offspring of a god, a son of god, should have a purer maternal origin than mortals, and this was evidence of his supernatural or divine origin. A man, even if he were thought of as a god, had to be born of a woman, and this could not be concealed, but paternal parentage is never so obvious, being known only to the mother, if anyone.

The purity of his maternal parentage required these Gentile Saviors to be born of a pure woman—a maiden. Hence, the Gentile saviours often were born of virgins and this "concept" continued even for the Gentile redactors of the New Testament. Besides normal conception ordinary birth was also too ignominious for a god. It had to be spotless, or immaculate. Jesus Christ in an apocryphal gospel, like Chrishna was born through his mother's side, rather than the impure route. Though not in the canonical works, some of the Christian fathers endorsed this story. I have even read Catholic dogma where it testifies that Jesus was born not through Mary's vagina, the normal birth canal, but through her navel!

Not only saviours but famous men, like Plato, Pythagoras, Alexander, Augustus and others, were thought to have been born miraculously. Plato was born of Paretonia, begotten of Apollo, not Ariston, his father, according to one authority.

The doctrine of immaculate conception is ancient but the manner of the holy conception was different in different countries. Zoroaster was immaculately conceived by a ray from the Divine Reason or Word and this was adopted by medieval artists.

But the idea of being overshadowed by the Holy Ghost seems to have been most current. God, the father of a god was believed to overshadow the mother of a god, to impregnate her. In 550 BC, Pythais, the mother of Pythagoras, conceived by a spectre or ghost of the god Apollo, the Sun-god.

Answer for yourself: Does the ghost of the sun god differ in principle from the Christian Holy Ghost?.

Juno of Rome grew pregnant at the touch of a flower to give birth to Mars. No impregnation could have been purer. So the most immaculate conception of all was that of the god of War! If it sounds absurd, how is it more senseless than conception by a ghost? Botany has shown that, at least, a flower can fertilize other flowers but no science has yet investigated the virility of ghosts.

The Greek Juno, Hera, was immaculately impregnated by the wind to give birth to Vulcan. Here is a close parallel indeed for the word habitually translated as spirit or ghost in the scriptures and continued into the Greek of the New Testament really means breath or wind! So literally the virgin Mary was impregnated by the wind just like Hera. The author of the Perennial Calendar tells us the miraculous conception of Juno Jugulis, the blessed virgin queen of heaven, fell on the second of February, the day of the early Christian festival of the date of the conception of the ever Blessed Virgin Mary.

A Chinese sect worshiped a saviour known as Xaca, who was conceived of his mother, Maia, by a white elephant, which she saw in her sleep, and for greater purity, she brought him forth from one of her sides. In Chinese popular religion, the virgin mother Shing-Mon gave birth to the God Yu from a conception by a water lily. The procreative refinement evinced here is equal to that of Juno. In another story Yu was conceived of a star!

Tamerlane's mother conceived having had sexual intercourse with the god of Day. The mother of Ghengis Khan, being too modest to claim that she was the mother of the son of God, said only that he was the son of the sun.

Osiris of Egypt and even Julius Caesar were immaculately conceived—the latter being the son of the beautiful virgin Cronis Celestine, and begotten by the Father of all Gods, Jupiter. His heir and nephew, Augustus Caesar, was curiously his half brother, as another son of Jove, by whose divine lust he was immaculately conceived in the temple of Apollo.

Both Buddha and Chrishna, of India, were immaculately conceived. The mother of Chrishna was overshadowed by the supreme God, Brahma, and the Holy Ghost was Naraan. Chrishna's mother had given birth seven times previously but remained a virgin. Philostratus, a disciple of Apollonius of Cappadocia, who was contemporary with Jesus Christ , tells that Damis, the mother of Apollonius, gave birth to this god and rival saviour of Jesus Christ, by being overshadowed by the god, Proteus.

Several of the virgin mothers of gods and great men go ten months between conception and delivery.

Plainly the tradition of the miraculous conceptions of gods, sons of gods, saviours and messiahs was prevalent in the world from ancient times on, beginning long before the mother of Jesus was overshadowed by the ghostly representative of the Most High. The belief in immaculate conception extended to every nation in the world. Grote, referring to Greece, declares that the furtive pregnancy of young women, often by a god, is one of the most frequently recurring incidents in the legendary narratives of the country.

Both the prevalence and antiquity of the idea of immaculate conception among the heathen is conceded by earlier Christian writers in their arguments from precedents of the divinity of Christ. St. Augustine, Origen and Lactanius tried to persuade us of the immaculate virginity of the mother of Jesus Christ by the example of similar pagan events. The doctrine of immaculate conception is, then, conceded as long anterior to Christ and therefore not unique in his case.

PROBLEMS WITH THIS DOCTRINE

- The gospels show that Christ himself did not claim to have a miraculous birth. He did not once allude to it, though as the principal evidence of his divinity, as Christians claim, he would have done so.
- His paternal genealogy, as made out by Matthew and Luke, completely confounds his virgin birth. They both trace his lineage through Joseph, which they could only do if Joseph was his father.
- His own disciple, Philip, declared him to be the son of Joseph, and several texts show that it was the original belief.
- The story of the virgin birth rests on the slender foundations of an angel and a dream. Mary got it by an angel, and Joseph by a dream, and thereby we have the whole of the story of the divinity of Jesus Christ.
- However, we have neither Joseph's nor Mary's report of these things, but only Matthew and Luke's. We do not know that either of them ever saw or spoke with Joseph or Mary on the subject.
- If Christ were a miraculously born god, would his mother would have reproved him for misconduct when she found him in the temple, as she, if no one else, must have known his nature?
- If Mary conceived miraculously, why was it kept so long from Joseph? Did the concubine of God intend to deceive her lawful husband? An angel had to be sent from heaven to let him into the secret.
- Why did not God inform Joseph by inspiration instead of using the round about way of sending an angel to do it?
- Mary was found with child of the Holy Ghost,* but as we are told nothing more about the circumstances, does it not leave us suspicious?
- Since it all seems to have been based on dreams, was carried on through dreams, and has no better foundation than dreams, why should we give it better credit than similar stories found in heathen mythology? Or is it that Gentile Christianity is just a dreamy religion?
- In an educated and scientific age, should we accept reports of the birth of a God based on no better a foundation than dreams, angels and the legends of oriental mythology? In particular, can any scientist entertain the idea of infinite beings, themselves mere conjecture, actually impregnating human females?

- Ancient Eastern belief was that sexual intercourse was sinful, procreation was impure and human children were born thus contaminated. Human beings were imperfect and any god sent into the world as a saviour had to avoid such contamination. The solution was that incarnate gods entered the world through human virgins to avoid the impurity and the slander that the saviour might have arisen in more normal ways if the mother were not a virgin. Can any unbiased deny that this is the source of the origin of the story of Christ's virgin birth?
- If Christ had to come into the world avoiding the impurity of human conception and birth, why did he not descend directly from heaven in person? If he can descend on the clouds at his—still awaited—second advent, why could he not do the same at his first advent, thereby pre-empting reasons for doubt and saving far more of fallen humanity?
- Could anyone, free of religious guilt and indoctrination, presented with these stories as the truth today, willingly and joyfully accept them as proof that someone was a god? Or would they consider them to be fraudulent inventions, intended to gull the credulous?
- If you have never taken the time as a Christian to study the origins of your faith I highly suggest it. If you would only familiarize yourself with the Council of Nicea in 325 A.D. one can quickly see how under the influence of Constantine, a Sun-worshipper, that in the conversion of the Empire to the Christian faith then its leader, Jesus, had to be moulded into the image of prior Sun-gods. Such was Constantine's wish and whatever the emperor desired was done or else. Check it out!

EVER WONDERED WHY THE GENTILES PICKED DEC. 25 FOR THE BIRTHDAY OF THE GODS?

Among some of the intellectuals, we may surmise that they viewed the myths as ascending from a true core, that was perverted and over time became legend. Again, this type of attitude is present in contemporary society. All of the Saviors of the Gentile nations, including Jesus who originally was a Jew, can be referred to as Solar Gods, Gods of the Sun. In other words, their births, lives, and deaths can be correlated to the Transit Cycles of the Sun. When the ancients formulated their religious beliefs, they used the Image of the creator God (that is to say the Cosmos) as their pattern. They personified the elements of the Cosmos, and recorded the movements of the stars and planets as personified deities and demons. They conjured fables and tales that hold exact correlation to the planetary (includes all elements of the universe) movements within the celestial heavens.

SO WHY PICK DEC. 25TH AS THE BIRTHDAY OF GOD?

We are now ready to explain why all of the ancient saviors mentioned earlier were alleged to have been born on December 25th and there are quite a few to which this event was described.

In astronomy/astrology, the beginning of cycles, that is to say, the Conception of a cycle is determined by a Conjunction, the point where elements of the universe Intersect (form a CROSS), or Pivot, or Join, or Come together, or Cross paths, or Occult each other. This is very important and will have a major impact upon the later creation of the crucifixion of the Sun-Gods.

This might be alarming for you to even consider, but within the New Testament is recorded the stories of these pagan solar-myths and the crucifixion of the sun as personified and applied to Jesus and his crucifixion.

The moon cycle begins at the new moon, the point at which the path of the moon around the earth intersects between the sun and the earth. This point of Conjunction commences a new moon cycle.

The summer cycle begins when the Sun reaches it's highest point in the celestial heavens at 23 1/2 degrees north declination, and pivots so as to retreat southward toward it's Fall. Thus, a Pivotal point commences a new cycle.

The Fall cycle (autumn) begins when the ecliptic of the sun crosses the celestial equator in the west. This point of intersection is the Genesis for fall type weather, a seasonal change. Thus this "Crossing" commences a new cycle.

The Winter cycle takes control when the sun bottoms out at it's lowest point south of the celestial equator and pivots so as to return to it's former position. Thus, the struggle of the sun to regain that (position) which was lost is the dawn of a new cycle.

CYCLE OF THE NEW YEAR....VIRGIN BIRTH AND IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

And the Cycle which the Ancients saw as the greatest of all, was the cycle of the new year. The point and time at which the ecliptic of the Sun, rising northward in the sky from its winter position, intersects the celestial equator at the Vernal Equinox.

This date March 21, was traditionally the commencement of the New Year. In ancient times, as well as today, they celebrated the victory of the Sun over the forces of the nether world (darkness). The ancient Gentiles, lacking the understanding of the laws of Science, foolishly believed that the Sun was emerging into it's glory since defeating the powers of the great Typhon, that evil serpent that lurked and prowled in the perilous celestial waters (the ancient writers often used the terms "waters and seas or rivers" in reference to regions of Space or the Cosmos), beneath the celestial equator (the winter with longer dark days). This point of the Sun's crossing the earth's equator in rising northward in the sky at the vernal equinox was the forecaster of new life, of Spring, fresh vegetation, greenery and relief from the oppressions of winter. It was the time, or beginning of the time (season) to plant new seed under the bosom of the earth, to Impregnate mother earth so that she may bring forth new life in her time. But not only did man Impregnate the soil of the earth by implanting her with his seed, the ancients surmised that the SUN, on this date of March 21, was indeed Impregnating the Cosmos with the Seed of Life for a New Sun, an Heir to His Throne of Glory (get ready for an immaculate conception). Remember in the Sun's northward track in the heavens the ancients were soon to expect Spring and Summer when the "dead" vegetation would bloom again and be "birthed anew."

On this date, March 21 (the beginning of spring), the ancients saw (perceived) the celestial Sun (God the Father) Impregnating the Cosmos (Virgin Mother) with the Sperm of Life (Rejuvenating Element) that would one day produce a New Sun (A Savior, A Christ) to replace and Renew the Kingdom of the Sun, once this present Sun's time had passed. We now have a virgin birth and this same story was told about one Sun-god after another from nation to nation for thousands of years. Christians believe it today.

The fact that so many nations had these same beliefs in vastly scattered locations of the world, throughout thousands of years of history, indicates a worldwide dissemination of a common mythology.

LOVING TRADITION MORE THAN THE WORD OF GOD...AND IT CONTINUES TODAY IN CHRISTIANITY

The early Greek-Jews of Alexandria, Egypt, even altered the Old Testament when they changed the word used by Isaiah ("young woman") the prophet and used "virgin" instead in their translation, or should I say, mistranslation, of the Septuagint (LXX). To sell a Jewish Rabbi to the world, since Judaism was a world religion at that time, it was necessary to recast Jesus in the form of the Gentile godmen if they had any hope of "selling" a Jewish Rabbi to the nations as a new godman.

This date, March 21 (the beginning of spring), marked the commencement of the period of Gestation for the future Savior (Sun) of the World. Now watch this!

We know that human gestation last for 280 days so it is also, with the Sun God. Most people think that human pregnancy lasts for 9 months, but that is an approximation. Check your encyclopedia or medical book, and you will discover that the actual term is for 280 days.

The period of Gestation for the Macrocosm (Celestial Sun-God) is the same as his Microcosm (Created Image) i.e., the Son Of God, as well as the human species in total. Let us Count the days leading from March 21 (the vernal equinox when the Sun crosses the equator in its northward track in the heavens) to see where 280 days will take us:

- 11 days (Including March 21) brings us to the end of March

Now we must add 30 days for April, 31 for May, 30 for June, 31 for July, 31 for August, 30 for September, 31 for October, 30 for November, and guess how many we need in December? That's right, let's try 25 for December (remember Jesus' birthday is taught by your Christian leaders as Dec. 25th).

That adds up to 280 days!

Now, we can easily see that Jesus Christ and all of the Gentile Saviors referred to in these articles were Born Right On Time, three days after the winter solstice, at the stroke of midnight on December 25th The evidence is clear that the Prophecy of the Birth of a Coming Savior was Astronomical, in Origin. The ancient Sages personified (gave human names and characteristics) the elements of the Cosmos, in order to produce a Theology (Mythology) that was intellectually compatible to every level of human society, preservable throughout history, because of it's Esoteric quality, and soundly based on Natural (Godly) Truth.

Answer for yourself: Do you really want the truth before you die? But we cannot end here.

Answer for yourself: Are there other doctrines taught by Christianity and contained in their documents that God never gave you and belief and action based upon them is sin and you might possibly not know it?

Sadly, that is the case and Bet Emet Ministries is devoted to help you see these in hopes of helping spread the unity of the Faith of Jesus and correct the false faith preached in his name today. Shalom.

THE BIRTH OF JESUS CHRIST AS RECORDED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT....IS IT A SUN-MYTH RETOLD?

Answer for yourself: Would you think it strange if you found out that the time of the birth of many of the incarnated Gods and Saviors of antiquity was fixed at the same period, and this period known as the 25th of December, was celebrated all over Christendom as the birthday of Jesus Christ?

This is all the more strange when you discover that this period formerly dated the birth of a new year -- the birth of King Sol. And when we find that the ancient pagans were in the habit of celebrating this venerated the twenty-fifth of December as the birthday of their Gods in the same manner Christians now celebrate it as the birthday of Christ, we are driven to admit that something more than mere fortuitous accident must be adduced to account for the coincidence?

THE TESTIMONY OF SCHOLARS...SHOULD TEACH US

According to Dr. Lightfoot, the temple of Jerusalem was employed in celebrating the birthday of a pagan God (Adonis) on the very night Christians assign for the birth of Christ.

The Reverend Robert Taylor (Diegesis) informs us that nearly all the nations of the East were once in the habit of rising at midnight to celebrate the birthday of their Gods, on the twenty-fifth of December. And to this statement Mr. Higgins adds that, "At the first moment after midnight of the twenty-fourth of December, the ancient nations celebrated the accouchement of the queen of heaven and celestial virgin, and the birth of the God Sol, the Infant Savior, and the God of Day" (Graves, The Sixteen Crucified Saviors, chapter 8)."

THE ROLL CALL IS IMPRESSIVE

Bacchus of Egypt, Bacchus of Greece, Adonis of Greece, Chrishna of India, Chang-ti of China, Chris of Chaldea, Mithra of Persia, Sakia of India, Jao Wapaul (a crucified Savior of ancient Britain), were all born on the twenty-fifth of December, according to their respective histories. Chrishna is represented to have been born at midnight on the twenty-fifth of the month Savarana, which answers to our December, and millions of his disciples celebrated his birthday by decorating their houses with garlands and gilt paper, and the bestowment of presents to friends. The Rev. Mr. Barret tells us, "It was once common for the women in Rome to perambulate the streets on the twenty-fifth of December, singing in a loud voice, "Unto us a child is born this day."

The twenty-fifth of December, then, it will be observed, was marked as the birthday of the incarnated Gods, Saviors, and Sons of God, of many of the religious systems of antiquity, long prior to the birth of Christ.

And why his birth was fixed at that date is not hard to account for. According to the celebrated Christian writer Mr. Goodrich, the Christian world had no chronology and recorded no dates for several centuries after the commencement of the Christian era (Goodrich, History of all Nations, p. 23.) No event of their history was marked by dates for nearly four hundred years. Hence, the time of Christ's birth is altogether a matter of conjecture, as is also every other event noticed in the Christian bible. This is proved by the fact that the ablest Christian writers and chronologists differ to the extent of thirty-five hundred years in fixing the time of every event in the bible. A Mr. Kennedy presents us with three hundred different chronological systems, by different Christian writers, all founded on the bible, and proving that the date of its various events are inextricably involved in a labyrinth of doubt, darkness and uncertainty.

Relative to the time of Christ's birth, the "Encyclopedia Britannica" says: "Christians count one hundred and thirty-three contrary opinions of different authors concerning the year the Messiah appeared on earth -- many of them celebrated writers." (Art. Chron.) Mark the declaration -- one hundred and thirty-three different opinions as to the year Christ was born in; one hundred and thirty-three different years fixed on by different Christian chronologists as the time of the birth of the most extraordinary and most noted being, as Christians would have us believe, that ever appeared on earth. Think of an omnipotent God descending from heaven, performing astounding miracles, and presenting other proofs of being a God, and yet not one of the three hundred writers of that era take any notice of him, or make any note of his birth or any event of his life. This circumstance is of itself sufficient to banish and dissipate all faith in his divinity.

As you well know, Christmas, December 25th, is a day which has been set apart by the Christian church on which to celebrate the birth of their Lord and Savior, Christ Jesus, and is considered by the majority of persons to be really the day on which he was born. This is altogether erroneous, as you are now beginning to see upon examination of the subject.

There was no uniformity in the period of observing the Nativity among the early Christian churches; some held the festival in the month of May or April, others in January (see Bible for Learners, vol. iii, p. 66; Chamber's Encyclopedia, Art, "Christmas").

MOST WHO PROFESS TO KNOW HIS BIRTHDAY....DON'T

The year in which he was born is also as uncertain as the month or day. " The year in which it happened," says Mosheim, the ecclesiastical historian, "has not hitherto been fixed with certainty, notwithstanding the deep and laborious researches of the learned" (Ecc. Hist., vol. i. p. 53. Quoted in Taylor's Diegesis, p. 104).

According to Irenaeus (a famous Church Father...A.D. 190), on the authority of "The Gospel," and "all the elders who were conversant in Asia with John, the disciple of the Lord," Christ Jesus lived to be nearly, if not quite, fifty years of age. If this celebrated Christian father is correct, and who can say he is not, Jesus was born some twenty years before the time which has been assigned as that of his birth.

The Rev. Dr. Giles says:

"Concerning the time of Christ's birth there are even greater doubts than about the place; for, though the four Evangelists have noticed several contemporary facts, which would seem to settle the point, yet on comparing these dates with the general history of the period, we meet with serious discrepancies, which involve the subject in the greatest uncertainty" (Hebrew and Christian Records, vol. ii. p. 189)

Again he says:

"Not only do we date our time from the exact year in which Christ is said to have been born, but our ecclesiastical calendar has determined with scrupulous minuteness the day and almost the hour at which every particular of Christ's wonderful life is stated to have happened. All this is implicitly believed by millions; yet all these things are among the most uncertain and shadowy that history has recorded. We have no clue to either the day or the time of year, or even the year itself, in which Christ was born" (Hebrew and Christian Records, p. 194).

It is evident, from the facts just presented, that all systems of Christian chronology are founded on mere conjecture, and hence should be rejected as worthless.

Answer for yourself: What event of Christ's life, then, can be accepted as certain, when no record was made of it till the time was forgotten, and none for at least half a century after the dawn of the Christian era, according to Dr. Lardner, when nearly all who witnessed it must have been dead?

We think the most reasonable conclusion in the case is, that Christ, instead of performing those Munchausen prodigies attributed to him -- such as casting out devils, raising the dead, controlling the elements of nature, etc. -- led such an ordinary, obscure life -- excelling only in healing the sick and other noble deeds of charity and philanthropy -- that he attracted but little notice by the higher classes, or by anybody but those of a similar turn of mind, till he was deified by Constantine, in the year 325 A.D. Hence, the time of his birth was not recorded, and was forgotten. Consequently, the twenty-fifth of December was selected as his birthday, because it was the birthday of other Gods, and because it was regarded by the heathen, from time immemorial, as the birthday of Sol, the glorious luminary of heaven, it being the period he is born again into a new year, and "commences again his journey and his life;" and because, also, this epoch was, as Sharon Turner informs us, in his History of the Anglo-Saxons, the commencement of a new year up to the tenth century.

These events signalized the twenty-fifth of December, and made it a period of sufficient importance to lead the early Christians to suppose it must have been the birthday of their Messiah. Mosheim, however, confesses that the day or the year in which it happened "has not been fixed with certainty, notwithstanding the profound researches of the learned." So that it is still an open question as to when Christ was born. What day of the month, what year, or what century it took place in, is still unknown. This circumstance is, as before suggested, sufficient of itself to utterly prostrate all faith in the divine claims for Jesus Christ. What would be thought of a witness who should testify in court to the truth of an occurrence of which he did not know the year, or even the century, in which it took place, or who could come no nearer than one hundred and thirty-three years in fixing or guessing at the time. Would the court accept such testimony?

Some Christian writers fix the year 4 B.C., as the time when he was born, others the year 5 B.C., and again others place his time of birth at about 15 B.C. The Rev. Dr. Geikie, speaking of this, in his Life of Christ, says: "The whole subject is very uncertain. Ewald appears to fix the date of the birth at five years earlier than our era. Petavius and Usher fix it on the 25th of December, five years before our era. Bengel on the 25th of December, four years before our era; Anger and Winer, four years before our era, in the Spring; Scaliger, three years before our era, in October; St. Jerome, three years before our era, on December 25th; Eusebius, two years before our era, on January 6th; and Idler, seven years before our era, in December" (Geikie, Life of Christ, vol. i. p. 559).

Albert Barnes writes in a manner which implies that he knew all about the year (although he does not give any authorities), but knew nothing about the month. He says:

"The birth of Christ took place four years before the common era. That era began to be used about A.D. 526, being first employed by Dionysius, and is supposed to have been placed about four years too late. Some make the difference two, others three, four, five, and even eight years. He was born at the commencement of the last year of the reign of Herod, or at the close of the year preceding" (Barnes' Notes, vol. ii. p. 402).

"The Jews sent out their flocks into the mountainous and desert regions during the summer months, and took them up in the latter part of October or the first of November, when the cold weather commenced. . . . It is clear from this that our Savior was born before the 25th of December, or before what we call Christmas. At that time it is cold, and especially in the high and mountainous regions about Bethlehem. God has concealed the time of his birth. There is no way to ascertain it. By different learned men it has been fixed at each month in the year" (Barnes' Notes, vol. ii. p. 25).

Canon Farrar writes with a little more caution, as follows:

"Although the date of Christ's birth cannot be fixed with absolute certainty, there is at least a large amount of evidence to render it probable that he was born four years before our present era. It is universally admitted that our received chronology, which is not older than Dionysius Exignus, in the sixth century, is wrong. But all attempts to discover the month and the day are useless. No data whatever exists to enable us to determine them with even approximate accuracy" (Farrar, Life of Christ, App., pp. 673-674).

Bunsen attempts to show (on the authority of Irenaeus, above quoted), that Jesus was born some fifteen years before the time assigned, and that he lived to be nearly, if not quite, fifty years of age (Bible Chronology, pp. 73-74).

According to Basnage (Hist. De Juif) the Jews placed his birth near a century sooner than the generally assumed epoch. Others have placed it even in the third century B.C. This belief is founded on a passage in the "Book of Wisdom," written about 250 B.C., which is supposed to refer to Christ Jesus, and none other. In speaking of some individual who lived at that time, it says:

"He professeth to have the knowledge of God, and he calleth himself the child of the Lord. He was made to reprove our thoughts. He is grievous unto us even to behold; for his life is not like other men's, his ways are of another fashion. We are esteemed of him as counterfeits; he abstaineth from our ways as from filthiness; he pronounceth the end of the just to be blessed, and maketh his boast that God is his Father . Let us see if his words be true; and let us prove what shall happen in the end of him. For if the just man be the son of God, he (God) will help him, and deliver him from the hand of his enemies. Let us examine him with despitefulness and torture, that we may know his meekness, and prove his patience. Let us condemn him with a shameful death; for by his own saying he shall be respected."

This is a very important passage. Of course, the church claims it to be a prophecy of what Christ Jesus was to do and suffer, but this does not explain it.

If the writer of the "Gospel according to Luke" is correct, Jesus was not born until about A. D. 10, for he explicitly tells us that this event did not happen until Cyrenius was governor of Syria. Now it is well known that Cyrenius was not appointed to this office until long after the death of Herod (during whose reign the Matthew narrator informs us Jesus was born), and that the taxing spoken of by the Luke narrator as leaving taken place at this time, did not take place until about ten years after the time at which, according to the Matthew narrator, Jesus was born (Josephius, Aniq. xviii.ch.i.sec.l.).

Eusebius was Bishop of Cesarea from A.D. 315 to 340, in which he died, in the 70th year of his age, thus playing his great part in life chiefly under the reigns of Constantine the Great and his son Constantius. Eusebius, the first ecclesiastical historian, places Jesus' birth at the time Cyrenius was governor of Syria, and therefore at about A. D. 10. His words are as follows:

"It was the two and fortieth year after the reign of Augustus the Emperor and the eight and twentieth year after the subduing of Egypt, and the death of Antonius and Cleopatra, when last of all the Ptolemies in Egypt ceased to bear rule, when our Saviour and Lord Jesus Christ, at the time of the first taxing— Cyrenius, then President of Syria— was born in Bethlehem, a city Judea, according unto the prophecies in that behalf promised" (Eusebius, Ecc. Hist. Lib. 1. ch.vi.).

Had the Luke narrator known anything about Jewish history, he never would have made so gross a blunder as to place the taxing of Cyrenius in the days of Herod, and would have saved the immense amount of labor that it has taken in endeavoring to explain away the effects of his ignorance. One explanation of this mistake is, that there were two assessments, one about tile time Jesus was born, and the other ten years after; but this has entirely failed. Dr. Hooykaas, speaking of this, says:

"The Evangelist (Luke) falls into the most extraordinary mistakes through out. In the first place, history is silent as to a census of the whole (Roman) world ever having been made at all. In the next place, though Quirinius certainly did make such a register in Judea and Samaria, it did not extend to Galilee; so that Joseph's household was not affected by it. Besides, it did not take place until ten years after the death of Herod, when his son Archelaus was deposed by the emperor, and the districts of Judea and Samaria were thrown into a Roman province. Under the reign of Herod, nothing of the kind took place, nor was there any occasion for it. Finally, at the time of the birth of Jesus, the Governor of Syria was not Quirinius, but Quietus Sentius Saturninus." (Bible for Learners, vol. iii. P. 56).

The institution of the festival of the Nativity of Christ Jesus being held on the 25th of December, among the Christians, is attributed to Telesphorrus, who flourished during the reign of Antonius Pius (A. D. 138-161), but the first certain traces of it are found about the time of the Emperor Commodus (A. D. 180-192) (Chamber's Encyclo., art. "Christmas").

"The pre-Christian Europeans practiced a variety of paganistic rituals that culminated each year, at the dawning of the winter type weather, on Dec. 25th. They celebrated this day as the day of the Birth or Resurrection of the Sun God. Not as a symbol. They actually looked upon Dec. 25 as the day when the Sun was Born anew-Resurrected into new life. This ritual worship of the resurrection (birth) of the Sun-God on Dec. 25th goes back thousands of years into pre-history" (Jabbar, The Astrological Foundation of the Christ Myth, p. 10).

For a long time the Christians had been trying to discover upon what particular day Jesus had possibly or probably come into the world; and conjectures and traditions that rested upon absolutely no foundation, led one to the 20th of May, another to the 19th or 20th of April, and a third to the 5th of January. At last the opinion of the community at Rome gained the upper hand, and the 25th of December was fixed upon (Bible for Learners, vol. iii. p. 66). It was not until the fifth century, however, that this day had been generally agreed upon. By the firth century, however, whether from the influence of some tradition, or from the desire to supplant Heathen Festivals of that period of the year, such as the Saturnalia, the 25th of December had been generally agreed upon (Encyclopedia Brit., art. "Christmas"). How it happened, that this day finally became fixed as the birthday of Christ Jesus, may be inferred from what we shall now see as look to the pagan sanctification of the day long before Jesus' birth. This was a "pagan holy day that commemorated the birth of the Sun" as we have shown.

PAGAN ANTECEDENTS ... UNREFUTABLE EVIDENCE OF THE PAGANIZATION OF JESUS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

On the first moment after midnight of the 24th of December (i.e., on the morning of the 25th), nearly all the nations of the earth, as if by common assent, celebrated the child birth of the "Queen of Heaven," of the "Celestial Virgin" of the sphere, and the birth of the god Sol.

In India this is a period of rejoicing everywhere (Monier Williams, Hinduism, p. 181). You need to remember that these Indo-Europeans would only hand-down their Sun-Myths to the Aryans at a later time; therefore it is here we find the earliest record of such belief. It is a great religious festival, and the people decorate their houses with garlands, and make presents to friends and relatives. This custom is of very great antiquity (Prog. Relig. Ideas, vol. i. p. 126).

In China, religious solemnities are celebrated at the time of the winter solstice, the last week in December, when all shops are shut up, and the courts are closed (Ibid. 216).

Buddha, the son of the Virgin Maya, on whom, according to Chinese tradition, "the Holy Ghost" had descended, was said to have been born on Christmas day, December 25th (Bunsen, The Angel-Messiah, pp. x-25, and 110, and Lillie, Buddha and Buddhism, p. 73).

Among the ancient Persians their most splendid ceremonials were in honor of their Lord and Savior Mithra; they kept his birthday, with many rejoicings, on the 25th of December.

The author of the Celtic Druids says:

"It was the custom of the heathen, long before the birth of Christ, to celebrate the birthday of their gods," and that, "the 25th of December was a great festival with the Persians, who, in very early times, celebrated the birth of their god Mithras" (Celtic Druids, p. 163; Prog. Relig. Ideas, vol. i. p. 272; Monumental Christianity, p. 167; Bible for Learners, vol. iii, pp. 66-67).

The Reverend Joseph B. Gross, in his Heathen Religion, also tells us that:

"The ancient Persians celebrated a festival in honor of Mithras on the first day succeeding the Winter Solstice, the object of which was to commemorate the birthday of Mithras" (The Heathen Religions, p. 287)

Among the ancient Egyptians, for centuries before the time of Christ Jesus, the 25th of December was set aside as the birthday of their gods. M. Le Clerk De Septehenes speaks of it as follows:

"The ancient Egyptians fixed the pregnancy of Isis (the Queen of Heaven and the Virgin Mother of the Savior Horus), on the last days of March, and towards the end of December they placed the commemoration of her delivery" (Relig. Of the Anct. Greeks, p. 214).

Mr. Bonwick, in speaking of Horus, says:

"He is the great God-loved of Heaven. His birth was one of the greatest mysteries of the Egyptian religion. Pictures representing it appeared on the walls and temples. One passed through the holy Adytum (the interior or sacred part of a heathen temple) to the still more sacred quarter of the temple known as the birth-place of Horus. He was presumably the child of Deity. At Christmas time, or that answering to our festival, his image was brought out of that sanctuary with peculiar ceremonies, as the image of the infant Bambino is still brought out and exhibited in Rome" (Bonwick, Egyptian Belief, p. 157).

Rigford observes that the Egyptians not only worshipped a Virgin Mother "prior to the birth of our Savior, but exhibited the effigy of her son lying in a manger, in the manner the infant Jesus was afterwards laid in the cave at Bethlehem" (quoted in Anacalypsis, p. 102, vol. ii).

The Chronicles of Alexandria, and ancient Christian work, says:

"Watch how Egypt has constructed the childbirth of a Virgin, and the birth of her son, who was exposed in a crib to the adoration of the people" (Bonwick, Egyptian Belief, p. 143).

Osiris, son of the "Holy Virgin," as they called Cerea, or Neith, his mother, was born on the 25th of December (Anacalypsis, vol. ii. p. 99).

This was also the time celebrated by the ancient Greeks as being the birthday of Hercules. The author of The Religion of the Ancient Greeks says:

"The night of the Winter Solstice, which the Greeks named the triple night, was that which they thought gave birth to Hercules" (Relig. Anct. Greece, p. 215).

He further says:

"It has become an epoch of singular importance in the eyes of the Christian, who has destined it to celebrate the birth of the Savior, the true Sun of Justice, who alone came to dissipate the darkness of ignorance" (Ibid.).

Bacchus, also, was born at early dawn on the 25th of December. Sir. Higgins says of him:

"The birth-place of Bacchus, called Sabizius or Sabaoth, was claimed by several places in Greece; but on Mount Zelmissus, in Thrace, his worship seems to have been chiefly celebrated. He was born of a virgin on the 25th of December, and was always called the Savior. In his Mysteries, he was shown to the people, as an infant is by the Christians at this day, on Christmas-day morning, in Rome" (Anacalypsis, vol. ii. p. 102; Dupuis, p. 237, and Baring Gould, Orig. Relig. Belief, vol. i. p. 322).

The birthday of Adonis was celebrated on the 25th of December. This celebration is spoken of by Tertullian, Jerome, and other Fathers of the Church (Anacalypsis, vol. ii. p. 99), who inform us that the ceremonies took place in a cave, and that the cave in which they celebrated his mysteries in Bethlehem, was that in which Christ Jesus was born.

This was also a great holy day in ancient Rome. The Rev. Mr. Gross says:

"In Rome, before the time of Christ, a festival was observed on the 25th of December, under the name of 'Natalis Solis Invicti' (Birthday of Sol the Invincible). It was a day of universal rejoicings, illustrated by illuminations and public games (The Heathen Religion, p. 287). "All public business was suspended, declarations of war and criminal executions were postponed, friends made presents to one another, and the slaves were indulged with great liberties".

A few weeks before the winter solstice, the Calabrian shepherds came into Rome to play on the pipes. This practice is kept up to the present day.

The ancient Germans, for centuries before "the true Sun of Justice" was ever heard of, celebrated annually, at the time of the Winter solstice, what they called their Yule-feast. At this feast agreements were renewed, the gods were consulted as to the future, sacrifices were made to them, and the time was spent in jovial hospitality. Many features of this festival, such as burning the yule-log on Christmas-eve, still survive among us (Bible for Learners, vol. iii. p. 67).

Yule was the old name for Christmas. In French it is called Noel, which is the Hebrew or Chaldee word Nule (Chambers's, art. "Yule," and Celtic Druids, p. 163).

The greatest festival of the year celebrated among the ancient Scandinavians, was at the Winter solstice. They called the night upon which it was observed, the "Mother-night." This feast was named Jul—hence is derived the word Yule—and was celebrated in honor of Freyr (son of the Supreme God Odin, and the goddess Frigga), who was born on that day. Feasting, nocturnal assemblies, and all the demonstrations of a most dissolute joy, were then authorized by the general usage. At this festival the principal received presents—generally horses, swords, battle-axes, and gold rings—at their departure" (Mallet, Northern Antiquities, pp. 110 and 355).

The festival of the 25th of December was celebrated by the ancient Druids, in Great Britain and Ireland, with great fires lighted on the tops of hills (Dupuis, 160; Celtic Druids, and Monumental Christianity, p. 167).

Godfrey Higgins says:

"Stuckley observes that the worship of Mithra was spread all over Gaul and Britain. The Druids kept this night as a great festival and called the day following it Nolagh or Noel or the day of regeneration and celebrated it with great fires on the tops of their mountains which they repeated on the day of the Epiphany or twelfth night. The Mithraic monuments which are common in Britain, have been attributed to the Romans but this festival proves that the Mithraic worship was there prior to their arrival (Anacalypsis, vol. ii. p. 99).

This was also a time of rejoicing in Ancient Mexico. Acosta says:

"In the first month which in Peru they call Rayme, and answering to our December, they made a solemn feast called Capacrayme (the Winter Solstice) wherein they made many sacrifices and ceremonies, which continued many days" (Hist. Indies, vol. ii. p. 354).

EVEN THE CHURCH FATHERS SPEAK OUT AGAINST IT...SOME FOR IT

The evergreens, and particularly the mistletoe, which are used all over the Christian world at Christmas time, betray its heathen origin. Tertullian, a Father of the Church, who flourished about A. D. 200, writing to his brethren, affirms it to be...

"rank Idolatry" to deck their doors "with garlands or flowers, on festival days, according to the custom of the heathen" (Middleton,Works, vol. i. p. 80).

St. Chrysostom, (A. D. 390), referring to this Pagan festival, says:

"On this day, also, the birth of Christ was lately fixed at Rome, in order that whilst the heathen were busy with their profane ceremonies, the Christians might perform their holy rites undisturbed" (Ibid.).

Add to this the fact that St. Gregory, a Christian Father of the third century, was instrumental in, and commended by other Fathers for, changing Pagan festivals into Christian holidays, for the purpose, as they said, of drawing the heathen to the religion of Christ.

These few examples show that the heathen in those days, did as the Christians do now.

Answer for yourself: What have evergreens, and garlands, and Christmas trees, to do with Christianity? Or with a Jewish Rabbi who preached repentance?

Simply nothing!

It is the old Yule feast which was held by all the northern nations, from time immemorial, handed down to, and observed at the present day. In the greenery with which Christians deck their houses and temples of worship, and in the Christmas-trees laden with gifts, we unquestionably see a relic of the symbols by which our heathen forefathers signified their faith in the powers of the returning sun to clothe the earth again with green, and hang new fruit on the trees. Foliage, such as the laurel, myrtle, ivy, or oak, and in general, all evergreens, were Dionysiac plants, that is, symbols of the generative power, signifying perpetuity of youth and vigor (Knight, Anct. Art and Mythol, p. 32).

Among the causes, then, that cooperated in fixing this period— December 25th—as the birthday of Christ Jesus, was, as we have seen, that almost every ancient nation of the earth held a festival on this day in commemoration of the birth of their virgin-born god.

On this account the Christians adopted it as the time of the birth of their God. Mr. Gibbon, speaking of this in his Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, vol. ii. p. 383, says:

"The Roman Christians, ignorant of the real date of his (Christ's) birth, fixed the solemn festival to the 25th of December, the Brumalia, or Winter Solstice, when the Pagans annually celebrated the birth of Sol"

And Mr. King, in his Gnostics and their Remains, says:

"The ancient festival held on the 25th of December in honor of the 'Birthday of the Invincible One,' and celebrated by the great games at the circus, was afterwards transferred to the commemoration of the birth of Christ, the precise day of which many of the Fathers confess was then unknown" (King's Gnostics, p. 49).

As Dr. Hooykaas remarks:

"The church was always anxious to meet the heathen half way, by allowing them to retain the feasts they were accustomed to, only giving them a Christian dress, or attaching a new or Christian signification to them (Bible for Learners, vol. iii. p. 67).

In doing these, and many other such things, which we shall speak of in our next articles, the Christian Fathers, instead of drawing the heathen to their religion, drew themselves into Paganism. Christianity, instead of being "Jewish," is Pagan to the core! And it is these same "pagan" and "heathen" beliefs and practices that people who confess that they love God continue to do today out of ignorance

It is evident, from the facts just presented, that all systems of Christian chronology are founded on mere conjecture, and hence should be rejected as worthless.

Answer for yourself: What event of Christ's life, then, can be accepted as certain, when no record was made of it till the time was forgotten, and none for at least half a century after the dawn of the Christian era, according to Dr. Lardner, when nearly all who witnessed it must have been dead?

Although I cannot agree with the entirety of the next quote as to the obscurity of Jesus (Sharon Turner, History of the Anglo-Saxons), yet it is yet worth reading especially in light of the reference to Sun Worship:

"We think the most reasonable conclusion in the case is, that Christ, instead of performing those Munchausen prodigies attributed to him -- such as casting out devils, raising the dead, controlling the elements of nature, etc. -- led such an ordinary, obscure life -- excelling only in healing the sick and other noble deeds of charity and philanthropy -- that he attracted but little notice by the higher classes, or by anybody but those of a similar turn of mind, till he was deified by Constantine, in the year 325 A.D. Hence, the time of his birth was not recorded, and was forgotten.....

Consequently, the twenty-fifth of December was selected as his birthday, because it was the birthday of other Gods, and because it was regarded by the heathen, from time immemorial, as the birthday of Sol, the glorious luminary of heaven, it being the period he is born again into a new year, and "commences again his journey and his life;" and because, also, this epoch was the commencement of a new year up to the tenth century"

(Sharon Turner, History of the Anglo-Saxons).

These events signalized the twenty-fifth of December, and made it a period of sufficient importance to lead the early Christians to suppose it must have been the birthday of their Messiah. Mosheim, however, confesses that the day or the year in which it happened "has not been fixed with certainty, notwithstanding the profound researches of the learned." So that it is still an open question as to when Christ was born. What day of the month, what year, or what century it took place in, is still unknown. This circumstance is, as before suggested, sufficient of itself to utterly prostrate all faith in the divine claims for Jesus Christ.

Answer for yourself: What would be thought of a witness who should testify in court to the truth of an occurrence of which he did not know the year, or even the century, in which it took place, or who could come no nearer than one hundred and thirty-three years in fixing or guessing at the time.

Answer for yourself: Would the court accept such testimony? Should you?

ASTRO-THEOLOGY: THE "SUN" ON THE CROSS…OR…THE "SON" ON THE CROSS?

It has been said that "The Christian religion is a parody on the worship of the Sun, in which they put a man whom they call Christ, in the place of the Sun, and pay him the same adoration which was originally paid to the Sun."- Thomas Paine

This is a most serious charge against Christianity as most know it and if such a charge can be shown to have validity then one should be honest enough before God to begin a serious investigation in his religious beliefs in order to separate truth from fiction.

Well it is for certain most who read our articles don't wish to be in "sin". A small article of this size cannot possibly do justice to such a complex and verbose subject as we have at hand but I hope to "break the egg" so to speak to help our readers begin to scrutinize the subject matter at hand in more detail by their personal study. Let's closely examine the original, conceptual foundations of the Christian faith, and then decide what to do with the serious "charge" made at the beginning of the article; that the Christian faith today is nothing but an evolution of "sun" worship transfigured into "Son" worship. Again I wish to reiterate the seriousness of such a charge if it can be proven.

IN THE BEGINNING…

But in order to do that, we must go back not 2000 years to the birth of Christ, but 10 to 15,000 years to the birth of modern man. For when one seeks to establish foundations, one must begin at the beginning.

Many thousands of years ago, in what we refer to as the "primordial world" of the ancients, human life was a far different experience from that which we enjoy today. While it is true that we have less documentation on that prehistoric world than we have on our own age, enough is known from the ancient writings to paint a rather clear picture of our remote ancestry. If we have learned anything at all, it is this: "That the more we change, the more we stay the same." And nowhere is this more clearly demonstrated than in the history of man's quest for "God", and the ancient religion we still keep holy.

According to the best understanding we have gleaned from the available records, life for our ancient forefathers was a mixture of wonder and fear. Each day, just finding food for one's family without becoming a meal oneself was a life-and-death struggle. It was from these meager, distressful conditions of the human race that our long history of the search for God and meaning of life has come.

Any evolution, at its most accelerated rate, is always agonizingly slow. But from the beginning, man's profound questions demanded answers. When no clear answers were forthcoming from the universe, man turned inward and developed his own. The study of this subject is termed "Astro-Theology" or the "worship of the heavens ".

It did not take ancient man very long to decide that in this world the single greatest enemy to be feared was the darkness of night. Simply stated, man's first enemy was darkness.

With this one fact alone, one can readily understand why the greatest and most trustworthy friend the human race would ever have was heaven's greatest gift to the world . . . the Glorious Rising Orb of Day . .THE SUN. With this simple truth understood, we can now begin to unravel ascent of man and the origin of the "crucifixion of the sun"; or should I say the "crucifixion of the Son". Notice the word-play and stay tuned!

Today, as in all of mankind's history, from almost every nation under the sun, we find the same religious story told over and over. This story transverses all races and nationalities as far as recorded history can be discovered. This is of major importance as it has a direct bearing of what you have been told as "religious truth" by your religious authorities. This same story has once again been told anew to most of you, as well as I, in the churches we attend as well as in the New Testaments we carry. This is the story of Christianity: "The Greatest Story Ever Told." If one could undertake only a simple inquiry into the matter one would quickly see the hundreds of parallels between Christian metaphors concerning its "crucified savior" and the natural reality of the sun and sky which are so striking and startling that one would come to the conclusion rather easily that the "Christian revelation of its crucified savior" does constitute a new and unique revelation, but rather a re-telling of the same old myths which have been handed down since the earliest times of mankind which the earliest written records attest!

Modern-day Christianity has often belittled our ancient ancestors who are not here to defend themselves. They accuse them of being nothing more than ignorant worshippers of miscellaneous gods. Therefore we can, with assurance, summarily dismiss 14,000 years of human spirituality as ignominious myth believed by well-meaning but gullible primitives. Too much of this kind of spiritual arrogance and religious pride has continued without challenge . . Until now! The time has come to set matters straight.

WHAT EVERY CHRISTIAN NEEDS TO KNOW…BUT WHICH FEW HAVE EVER READ OR SEEN FOR HIMSELF

The "Greatest Story" went something like this . . .

The ancient peoples reasoned that no one on Earth could ever lay claim of ownership to the Great Orb of Day (the sun). Such a magnificent heavenly body must belong to the unseen Creator of the universe. It became, figuratively speaking, not man's, but "God's Sun." It was only a short hop and skip to the understanding that "God's Sun" was . . ."The Light Of The World."

As stated before, in the dark cold of night man realized his utter vulnerability to the elements. Each night, mankind was forced to wait for the "Rising of The Sun" (resurrection of the Sun) to chase away the physical and mental insecurity brought on by the darkness. Therefore, the morning Sun focused man's attention on heavenly dependence for his frail, short existence on Earth. Doing so, it became an appropriate symbol of divine benevolence from heaven.

So just as a small fire brought limited light into man's own little world of darkness, likewise, the "Great Fire of Day" served the whole Earth with its heavenly presence. For this reason, it was said at Deut. 4:24 and Heb. 12:29 that the God of the Bible was a "Consuming Fire" in heaven. And so He was!

It was accepted by all that man was bound to a life on Earth, but the sky was the abode of God's Sun. He resides "up there" in. . . "Heaven."

Ancient man saw in his male offspring his own image and likeness, and his own existence as a father was proved by the person of his son. Thus, it was assumed that "God's Sun" was but a visible representative of the unseen Creator in heaven. So it was said, "When you have seen the Son, you have seen the Father." Said another way, "The Father is glorified in His Son."

Ancient man had no problem understanding that all life on Earth depended directly on life-giving energy from the Sun. Consequently, all life was lost without the Sun. It followed that "God's Sun" was nothing less than "Our very Savior." This is a major concept in the evolution of religion and should not be under estimated in the creation of future theologies; especially in the Gentile nations who will have their multitudes of "crucified saviors" which would serve again as precursors to the Jesus story of Rome. Logically, even if man himself dies, as long as the Sun comes up each day, life on Earth will continue forever. Therefore, it was said in the ancient texts that everlasting life was "the gift" that the Father gives through his Sun. Not for you personally but for the Earth . . . everlasting life!

Since evil and harm lurked at every turn in the fearful dark of night, all evil or harmful deeds were naturally the . . ."Works of Darkness." And of course the evil of night was ruled over by none other than . . . "The Prince of Darkness." Hence, evil is of the Dark or of the "D-Evil"…the Devil.

Mankind progresses through his history but he retains his fears and phobias as well as his religious concepts based upon such superstitions as we have shown. We now have before us two cosmic brothers - one very good, and one very bad. This would be the basis for all Dualistic Religions that preceded Christianity. One brings the "truth to light" with the "light of truth." The other is the opposite, or in opposition to the light - "The Opposer" . . . Prince of the World of Darkness.

EGYPTIAN RELIGION AND THE SUN/SAVIOR

At this point we come to Egypt. More than three thousand years before Christianity began, the early morning "Sun/Savior" was pictured in Egypt as the "New Born Babe." The infant savior's name was "Horus."

At daybreak each day, this wonderful, newborn child (represented by the Sun…the Sun/Savior) is of course "Born Again". Horus is risen on the Horizon as the sun rises in the East daily.

And of course "God's Sun" goes to His death at sundown wearing a "crown of thorns" or "corona" (the rays of the sun so clearly seen at sunset)/ Remember the Statue of Liberty? To this day, kings still wear a round crown of spikes, symbolizing the rays of the Sun!

The Egyptians knew that the Sun was at its highest point in the sky (or high noon) when no shadow was cast by the pyramid. At that point, all Egypt offered prayers to the "Most High" God! As stated before, to the ancients, the sky was the abode, or heavenly temple, of the "Most High." Therefore, "God's Sun" was doing His heavenly Father's work in the temple at 12 noon!

IMPORTANCE OF THE SUN DIAL & CROSS OF THE ZODIAC… RELIGION ADVANCES

The world of ancient man kept track of times and seasons by the movement of the Sun - daily, monthly, yearly. For this, the sundial was devised. Not only the daily movement of the Sun was tracked on the round dial, but the whole year was charted on a round calendar dial. Examples: Ancient Mexican, Mayan, Inca, Aztec, Sumerian, Babylonian, Assyrian, Egyptian, Celtic, Aryan, etc. With this method, certain new concepts emerged in the mind of ancient man

Since the Earth experiences four different seasons, all the same and equal (in time) each year, the round calendar was divided into four equal parts. This represented the complete story of the life of "God's Sun." The famous painting of The Last Supper pictures the 12 followers of the Son in four groups (of 3) . . . the four seasons of the year! Think on this for a minute!

On the round surface of the yearly calendar, you draw a vertical line directly across the middle, cutting the circle in half - one end being the point of the winter solstice; the other end being the point of the summer solstice. Then draw another straight line (crossing the first one). One end of the new line is the spring equinox; the other end is the autumn equinox.

You now have the starting points for each of the four seasons. This is referred to by all major encyclopedias and reference works, both ancient and modern, as "The Cross of the Zodiac." Thus, the life of God's "Sun" is on "the Cross." This is why we see the round circle of the Sun on the crosses of Christian churches. The next time you pass a Christian church, look for the circle (Sun) on the cross.

On December 21 or 22, the Sun, going south, reaches its lowest point in the sky (our winter solstice). By December 25th, it is clear that the Sun its returning northward. Therefore on December 25th the sun is "Born Again." Christians stole December 25th from the Roman celebration of Sol Invictus-the Sun Unconquered. And to this day, worshippers still celebrate the birthday of the Sun only under the disguise of the birthday of the Son…Jesus.

It was well understood by ancient man that our weather was caused and controlled by the Sun. It was a simple fact that God's Sun had the power to control storms at will. The ancient Egyptians taught that He did this as He rested in His heavenly boat while crossing the sky. The story of Jesus calming the storm (Matt. 8:23-27) echoes this.

The next point to be made requires first a little background. Christians have always referred to God as "The Father." But viewing God as a father didn't start here - it goes back far into the ancient world. The reason is: Our planet was always viewed as our "Mother Earth or Mother Nature." And since rain (the life-bringing fluid), falling from heaven, impregnated and brought life to Mother Earth, it was therefore believed that our Father was in Heaven.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE INFLUENCE OF THE PHARAOHS

Though all of the essential pieces of the Christian story were long in existence before Egypt, it was with the coming of the Pharaohs that the story was finally codified and became religious dogma. Though the story varied in some details from place to place in Egypt, the essence was always the same: God's Sun was the "Light of the World," who gave His life for us.

In ancient Egypt it was said that if you wanted to follow the life of God's Sun and thereby "live in the light of God's Word," one would have to leave his old ways of life to "Follow the Sun." But before beginning this new life in "The Word," one must die to the old way of life and be "Born Again." Your first birth was "out of water" your mother formed you in. Because her water broke and your new life began, rebirth is symbolized by coming out of total immersion in water-baptism-or being born again.

In Mal 4:2, the God of Heaven is described as the "Sun of Righteousness with healing in His wings." The Sun with healing in His wings?? Then in the New Testament in Matt. 23:37 and Luke 13:34, we see God's Son wanting to gather all under "His wings." This is most appropriate for, in Egypt, the Sun was always pictured with His wings. I mention this only to show you that even the Old Testament is not immune from such symbolism within itself.

These points here mentioned are a few of hundreds, if not thousands of direct connections that can be made between the Christian Bible Story and the far more ancient, original story from the origin of religion among mankind. My purpose for drawing your attention to this literary plagiarism is best stated by Alfred North Whitehead who said, " No lie can live forever," and Egyptologist Gerald Massey, "They must find it difficult, those who have taken authority as the truth, rather than truth as the authority."

I would like to leave you with a quote which I hope will serve as an impetus for your further study into these areas in order that you "cast out the leaven" of perverse lies taught as truth:

"All Indo-Germanic nations have worshipped crucified Saviors and overwhelming proof was obtained that the sun-myths of the ancient Aryans were the origin of the religion in all the countries which were peopled by the Aryans"…Charles Morris. Let us study to show ourselves approved by God. Anyone wanting to look into this subject more thoroughly might read Aryan Sun Myths …The Origin of Religion by Charles Morris…and Bible Myths by T. W. Doane.

WHY CHRISTIANITY PROSPERED...THE INFLUENCE OF THE ESSENES

Answer for yourself: Why did Christianity prosper, and why was Jesus of Nazareth believed to be a divine incarnation and Saviour when no such teachings can be found in the unaltered Hebrew Jewish Masoretic Text of the Tanakh?

This is a long article chocked full of vital information that will explain to you the following things:

- How the Jewish Messiah, thought by many to be Jesus, was later interpreted as a Phythagorean-Buddhist-Iranian sun-godman by the Essenes and later by the Greek Fathers that they taught
- How the truth concerning Jesus and related religious concepts were later blurred as we find today in the writings of the New Testament as quoted from a forged and adulterated Old Testament which was purposefully mistranslated by the Hellenized Jewish Essenes of Alexandria to further their authority for their corporate religious body in Alexandria, Egypt
- How with the crucifixion of Jesus these "Essene Phythagoreian-Buddhist-Iranian sungodman beliefs" were applied to Jesus following his death and with the conversion of this corporate body of these Essenes into the early Jewish Messianic Movement how these "Essenic beliefs" would later divide the conservative Pharisees from the Essenes (called Christians today because they end up with Essene beliefs and not those of normative Judaism)
- How this Essene separatist movement would gather steam as the documents of this Essene sect and their teachings highly influenced the Greeks who were coming to faith in God as well as their intellectuals which were again influenced by the Alexandrian religious thought.

There were many causes that created and transformed of a Jewish Rabbi preaching repentance into a god or godman, but as we can devote volumes to the subject, I will try to treat it briefly in this article.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE ESSENES AND THEIR RELIGIOUS BELIEF SYSTEM ON THE NEW TESTAMENT

For many centuries before the time of Jesus there lived a sect of religious monks known as Essenes, or Therapeutae. Numerous bodies of ascetics (Therapeutae), especially near Lake Mareotis, devoted themselves to discipline and study, abjuring society and labor, and forgetting it is said, the simplest wans of nature, in contemplating the hidden wisdom of the Scriptures. Eusebius even claimed them as Christians; and some of the forms of monasticism (by Christians) were evidently modeled after the Therapeutae" (Smith's Bible Dictionary, art, "Alexandria").

Answer for yourself: What happened to the Essenes, for after all, we have their existing theological literature from the Dead Sea Scroll?

"An in-depth study of early church history will show you that the Essenes entirely disappeared from history shortly after the time assigned for the crucifixion of Jesus"...Christian Ginsburg, The Essenes: Their History And Doctrines,1864.

Simply said these Essenes became believers and followers of Jesus and entered the Jesus Movement after his crucifixion. One should not forget that what began as a righteous separation from the Temple by the Zadok priests in the early second century B.C.E. would later evolve into the current "Essenes" of Jesus' day. The word "Zadok" in Hebrew means:

6659 Tsadowq- Zadok = "righteous";

Zadok was the high priest, son of Ahitub of the house of Eleazar the son of Aaron, and 11th in descent from Aaron; he joined David after Saul's death and supported him against Absalom and Adonijah; and later anointed Solomon as king

Acts 6:7 7 And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith. (KJV)

These priests were not the traditional Sadducees of the day in league with Rome. These were the Essenic residue of the Zadok priesthood which no longer had control or ties with the Temple. There were thousands of them, and their monasteries were to be counted by the score. C.F.D. Moule, of page 13 of his The Birth Of The New Testament, says: "...we have some idea, through the accounts of the Essenes in Philo and Josephus, and recently, through the Qumran writings of how differently a sectarian, but still priestly, group might be behaving at the same time. Evidently the Qumran sect maintained a priesthood and a ritual organization."

Many have asked the question, "What became of these priestly Essenes?"

If we examine the Essenes and their religious beliefs we find:

- That they were expecting the advent of an *Angel-Messiah
- That they considered Jesus of Nazareth to be this Angel-Messiah
- That they came over to Christianity in a body; and,
- That they brought the legendary histories of the former Angel-Messiahs as taken from their sun-myths.

The origin of the sect known as Essenes is enveloped in mist, and will probably never be revealed fully. To speak of all the different ideas entertained as to their origin would make a volume of itself, we can therefore but glance at the subject. I am indebted to many authors for their informative books on the Essenes who have given us the ability to understand the religious climate of the first century in Palestine; authors like James Charlesworth, Lawrence Schiffman, A. DuPont-Summer, John Allegro, Hugh Schonfield, Millar Burrows, Geza Vermes, Hershel Shanks, and especially Martin Larson for his excellent treatment of the Essenes and their evolution as a sect within Judaism of the Second Temple Period in his many books [The Story Of Christian Origins, The Essene Christian Faith, The Essene Heritage, On The Religion Of The Occident].

What escapes most Christian writers today is that the Essenes contemporary with the Jesus era are completely different in theology and scope from the original Zaddok Priests of Qumran from the early second century B.C.E. which were Torah believers. What began as a righteous "separatist movement" by the Zadok priesthood since being prevented from returning to their rightful priesthood following Israel's victory over Antiochus

Epiphanies, they protested the Hasmoneans' control of the Temple and possession of the Priesthood by separating from the Temple cult and beginning a "New Israel" and a "New Covenant" in the desert of Qumran. Sadly, what began as a righteous movement of Judaism will culminate in the days of Jesus and following in a synchronistic Phythagorean-Buddhist-Jewish sect containing a synthesis of religious beliefs built upon astrology and sun-worship mixed with their Jewish heritage; many of these "Essene" beliefs deviated significantly from conservative Torah faith and the traditional Messianic hope. On must look deeper than the superficial accounts of the Essenes provided by Pliny, Philo, and Josephus to acquaint oneself with such facts, as their accounts are somewhat superficial in many aspects and tend to provide only summaries of the sect and their beliefs. In-depth theological analysis of their beliefs is not possible from these accounts; one must be quite familiar with the individual writings to be able to understand the nuances of their theology.

Theophilus Gale, who wrote a work called The Court of the Gentiles, Oxford, 1671, undoubtedly hits upon the truth when he says:

> "Now, the origination or rise of these Essenes (Jewish sect of apocalyptic believers) I conceive by the best conjectures I can make from antiquity, to be in or immediately after the Babylonian captivity, though some make them later."

With such an admission one must understand that implied in "Babylonian captivity" is the borrowing of many theological beliefs by the returning Jews from their captors. Needless to say, the Persian victory over the Babylonians only furthered such borrowing of beliefs as these captive Jews were now introduced into the Persian Mysteries and Zoroastrianism. Now it is understandable with the Jewish nation's return by Cyrus to Palestine that another "mixed multitude" was to find its way to Palestine as had once before again possessing a syncretism of beliefs; the irony of the whole story is found that behind the Jewish, Babylonian, and Persian beliefs was an Egyptian religious substrate that had contributed to all of the above as well. The out-working of such beliefs are to be found the the new Apocalyptic of the Jewish faith held by some, but not all. Thus we find in the Judaism that developed after the return from Babylonian captivity the multitude of competing "sects" all with varying religious belief systems.

This new Apocalyptic literature consists of those parts of the Jewish Bible and other Jewish and Christian books that embody an apocalypse, or revelation, given through a symbolic vision of the future. Apocalyptic literature concerns the final period of world history, and depicts the final confrontation between God and the powers of evil. The conflict frequently culminates in a world catastrophe; sometimes a messianic figure is responsible for the triumph over evil. It will be here we find the Essenic Angel-Messiah. Frequently the authors recount history up to their own time in symbolic form (as in Dan. 7:1-8) and then give a vision of the future salvation to be brought by God at the end of the present world. Classic examples are the books of Daniel and Revelation. Passages such as Isaiah 24-27, Zechariah 9-14, and Mark 13 belong to this type of literature. Other examples of literature held sacred by the Essenes are Enoch, Jubilees, and the Apocalypse of Baruch today which can be found in the Jewish Pseudepigrapha, as well as the Apocalypse of Peter in the Apocryphal New Testament.

Apocalyptic literature is usually pseudonymous, written under the name of a famous person. Books such as Daniel and Enoch are examples. But St. John, the author of Revelation in the New Testament, apparently wrote in his own name. Sometimes apocalypses, especially the Apocalypse of Adam and others in the literature of Gnosticism, contain elements drawn from Greek Mythology as well as from the Bible and from Jewish tradition. The New Testament contains all of the above.

Many Christian writers trace the origin of the Essenes all the way back to an origin in India (that is where they picked up many of their sun-myths) and were a sort of Buddhist sect. All of these influences will be amalgamated into a complex theological system that found its latest expression among the Essenes of Qumran in the first century A.D. and their literature attests to it.

Gfrorer, who wrote concerning them in 1835, and said that "the Essenes and the Therapeutae (of Egypt) are the same sect, and hold the same views," was undoubtedly another writer who was touching upon historical ground.

PARALLELS WITH THE NEW TESTAMENT

The identity of many of the precepts and practices of Essenes and those of the New Testament is unquestionable (T.W. Doane, Bible Myths and Parallels In Other Religions, 1882, p. 420).

Essenism urged on its disciples to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness. The Essenes forbade the laying up of treasures upon earth. The Essenes demanded of those who wished to join them to sell all heir possessions, and to divide it among the poor brethren. The Essenes had all things in common, and appointed one of the brethren as steward to manage the common bag. Essenism put all its members on the same level, forbidding the exercise of authority of one over the other, and enjoining mutual service. Essenism commanded its disciples to call no man master upon the earth. Essenism laid the greatest stress upon being meek and lowly in spirit. The Essenes commended the poor in spirit, those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, the merciful, the pure in heart, and the peacemaker. They combined the healing of the body with that of the soul. They declared that the power to cast out evil spirits, to perform miraculous cures, etc. They taught that such power should be possessed by their disciples as signs of their belief. The Essenes did not swear at all; their answer was yea, yea, and nay, nay. When the Essenes started on a mission of mercy, they provided neither gold nor silver, neither took coats, neither shoes, but relied on hospitality for support. The Essenes though repudiating offensive war, yet took weapons with them when they went on a perilous journey. The Essenes abstained from connubial intercourse! The Essenes did not offer animal sacrifices, but strove to present their bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God, which they regarded as a reasonable service! It was the great aim of the Essenes to live such a life of purity and holiness as to be the temples of the Holy Spirit, and to be able to prophesy.

Many other comparisons might be made, but these are sufficient to show that there is a great similarity between the two. These similarities have led many Christian writers to believe that Jesus, if he did not belong to this order, was influenced by them. Dr. Ginsburg, an advocate of this theory, says :

"It will hardly be doubted that our Saviour himself belonged to this holy brotherhood. This will especially be apparent when we remember that the whole Jewish community, at the advent of Christ, was divided into three parties, the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes, and that every Jew had to belong to one of these sects. Jesus, who, in all things, conformed to the Jewish law, and who was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners, would therefore naturally associate himself with that order of Judaism which was most congenial to his holy nature. Moreover, the fact that Christ, with the exception of once, was not heard of in public until his thirtieth year, implying that he lived in seclusion with this fraternity, and that though he frequently rebuked the scribes, Pharisees and Sadducees, he never denounced the Essenes, strongly confirms this conclusion" (Ginsburg, Essenes, p. 24).

We hear very little of the Essenes after A.D. 40, therefore, when we read of the "primitive Christians," we are reading of Essenes, and others (Ginsburg, Essenes, p. 27).

Ginsburg tell us: "We hear very little of them after A.D. 40; and there can hardly be any doubt that, owing to the great similarity existing between their precepts and practices and those of primitive Christians, the Essenes as a body must have embraced Christianity" (Dr. Ginsburg, Essenes, p. 27).

The similarity of the sentiments of the Essenes, or Therapeutae, to those of the Church of Rome, induced the learned Jesuit, Nicolaus Serarius, to seek for them an honorable origin. He contended therefore, that they were Asideans and derived them from the Rechabites, described so circumstantially in the thirty-fifth chapter of Jeremiah; at the same time, he asserted that the first Christians monks Essenes. (Hardy, Eastern Monachism, p. 358).

There is strong evidence to believe the first Christians were Essenes, or as you are more familiar with the term "Nazarenes."

Mr. King, Gnostics and their Remains, on page 1 speaking of the Christian sect called "Gnostics," says:

"Their chief doctrines had been held for centuries before (their time) in many of the cities of Asia Minor. There, it is probable, they first came into existence as "Mystae," upon the establishment of a direct intercourse with India under the Seleucidae and the Ptolemies (Egypt). The colleges of Essenes and Megabyzae at Ephesus, the Orphics of Thrace, the Curetes of Crete, are all merely branches of one antique and common religion, and that originally Asiatic.

Answer for yourself: Why is the above statement SO VERY IMPORTANT? Because many read the New Testament and especially Paul never knowing that Paul was affiliated with the Essenes and was a Gnostic himself and we read this New Testament materials never knowing that much of it is a serious departure from normative Judaism and what Jesus believed!

Again King says:

" The introduction of Buddhism into Egypt and Palestine affords the only true solution of innumerable difficulties in the history of religion (Ibid., p. 6).

Again:

"That Buddhism had actually been planted in the dominions of the Seleucidae and Ptolemies (Palestine belonging to the former) before the beginning of the third century B.C.E., is proved to demonstration by a passage in the Edicts of Asoka, grandson of the famous Chandragupta, the Sandracottus of the Greeks. These edicts are engraven on a rock at Girnur, in Guzerat." Again notice the link to Egypt, in particular we will find Alexandria, Egypt to be of importance in this regard (King, Gnostics and their remains, p. 23).

Eusebius, in quoting from Philo concerning the Essenes, seems to take it for granted that they [the Essenes] and the Christians were one and the same, and from the manner in which he writes, it would appear that it was generally understood so. He says that Philo called them "Worshipers," and concludes by saying:

"But whether he himself gave them this name, or whether at the beginning they were so called, when as yet the name of Christians was not everywhere published, I think it not needful curiosity to sift out" (Ecc. History, lib. 2, ch. xvii).

This celebrated ecclesiastical historian (Eusebius) considered it very probable that the writings of the Essenic Therapeuts in Egypt had been incorporated into the gospels of the New Testament, and into some Pauline epistles.

His words are:

"It is very likely that the commentaries (Scriptures) which were among them

(the Essenes) were the Gospels, and the works of the apostles, and certain expositions of the ancient prophets, such as partly that epistle unto the Hebrews, and also the other epistles of Paul do contain" (Ecc. Hist., lib. 2, ch. xvii).

You need to stop and think about what was just said. The key word was "incorporated"! These Essene Therapeuts did not possess the Gospels in Egypt "after their writing;" but had before their writing much that would be incorporated into these "gospels" when they would be written....this would come from their existing theologies long before Jesus ever lived. In other words, stories and doctrines from these Pythagorean-Buddhist Essenes were later to be ascribed to Jesus which had no historical value or relationship to the real man from Galilee. The synthesis of their Egyptian, Babylonian, and Persian religious beliefs would be filtered through Biblical Judaism and like as before "out jumped this golden-calf" which we call the Christian Jesus today. Instead of understanding Jesus as a Jew we attach to him the theologies of pagan nations never knowing that when reading the New Testament today we are reading a lot of Pythagorean-Buddhist theology from their sun-myths and we think we are reading the truth about the Jesus who really lived. Nothing could be further from the truth!

It would be a serious mistake on your part to assume that the above reference to the "Gospels" included the Four Gospels which most are familiar with today since it can be shown that at the destruction of Qumran and the Essenic library and community in 68 A.D. that these particular "Four Gospels" did not yet exist and that no quotes from them can be found prior to roughly 200 A.D. in the early Church Fathers. You should consider this amazing if they yet existed. Yet understand, many such references in the writings of these Church Fathers came from nothing more than oral tradition or possibly some of the hundreds of conflicting "gospels" possessed by competing sects which were in circulation after the death of Jesus as we are informed by the writer of the Gospel today called by the name of Luke.

THE ANGEL-MESSIAH OF THE ESSENES

"The principal doctrines and rites of the Essenes can be connected with the East, with Parsism, and especially with Buddhism. Among the doctrines which Essenes and Buddhists had in common was that of the Angel-Messiah" (Bunsen, The Angel-Messiah, p. vii).

"The New Testament is the Essene-Nazarene Glad Tidings!" (S.F. Dunlap, The Son of Man, p. iii).

Godfrey Higgins says:

"The Essenes were called physicians of the soul, or Therapeutae; being resident both in Judea and Egypt. they probably spoke or had their sacred books in Chaldee (Babylon)." He goes on to say:

"These Essenes were Pythagoreans, as is proved by all their forms, ceremonies, and doctrines, and they called themselves sons of Jesse. If the Pythagoreans or Conobitae, as they are called by Jamblicus, were Buddhists, the Essenes then held many beliefs of Buddhism mixed among their own. Many of the Essenes lived in Egypt, on the lake of Parembole or Maria, in monasteries. These are the very places in which we formerly found the Gymnosophists, or Samaneans, or Buddhist priests to have lived ; which Gymnosophistae are placed also by Ptolemy in north-eastern India." Let us stop just a minute to focus on the links we have seen so far that affect the assimilation by the Essenes of other world religions: Egypt, Babylon, Persian, India, and Judaism. The syncretism of religious beliefs is being formed and will find its full expression in the New Testament." He goes on to say:

"Their (the Essenes) parishes, churches, bishops, priests, deacons, festivals are all identically the same (as the Christians). They had apostolic founders ; the manners which distinguished the immediate apostles of Christ; Scriptures divinely inspired; the same allegorical mode of interpreting them, which has since obtained among Christians, and the same order of performing public worship. They had missionary stations or colonies of their community established in Rome, Corinth, Galatia, Ephesus, Phillippi, Colosse, and Thessalonica, precisely such, and in the same circumstances, as were those to whom St. Paul addressed his letters in those places. All the fine moral doctrines which are attributed to the Samaritan Nazarite, and I doubt not justly attributed to him, are to be found among the doctrines of these ascetics" (Higgins, Anacalypsis, vol. i. p. 747).

And Arthur Lillie says in Buddha and Early Buddhism, p. vi:

"It is asserted by calm thinkers like Dean Mansel that within two generations of the time of Alexander the Great, the missionaries of Buddha made their appearance at Alexandria. "In this he was supported by philosophers of the calibre of Schilling and Schopenhauer, and the great Sanscrit authority, Lassen. Renan also sees traces of Buddhist propagandism in Palestine before the Christian era. Hilgenfeld, Muter, Bohlen, King, all admit the Buddhist influence. Colebrooke saw a striking similarity between the Buddhist philosophy and the Pythagoreans. Dean Milman was convinced that the Therapeuts sprung from the "contemplative and indolent fraternities" of India. And, he might have added, the Rev. Robert Taylor in his Diegesis, and Godfrey Higgins in his Anacalypsis have brought strongest arguments to bear in support of this theory"

This is confirmed in the east by the Asoka monuments-in the west by Philo.

Lillie expressly maintains the identity in creed of the higher Judaism and that of the Gymnosophists of India who abstained from the 'sacrifice of living animals', in a word, the Buddhists. It would follow from this that the priestly religion of Babylonia, Palestine, Egypt, and Greece were undermined by certain kindred mystical societies organized by Buddha's missionaries under the various names of Therapeutae, Essenes, Neo- Pythagoreans, Neo-Zoroastrians etc. Thus Buddhism prepared the ground work and the way of Christianity and its interpretation of the Messiah of Israel. (Arthur Lillie, Buddha and Early Buddhism, p. vi).

THE DOCTRINE OF THE "ANGEL MESSIAH" OF THE ESSENES CONSISTED OF:

- the man from heaven,
- the Creator of the world
- the doctrine of the atoning sacrificial death of the Angel-Messiah thought cosmic crucifixion PERSONIFIED on a cross as taken from their sun-myth synthesis (this is not as simple as it sounds because the crucifixion they understood was a personified crucifixion or crossing of orbits of plants and suns...see our website for further understanding and how this concept was later personified and applied to Jesus by the Essenes after his death:http://bennoah1.calliejo.com
- the doctrine of the Messianic antetype of the Paschal lamb
- the resurrection of the Angel-Messiah on the third day as determined by the winder solstice and the failure of the sun to rise any higher in sky for 3 days at the winter solstice...again personified into the person of Jesus.

What is alarming to those who study enough to see this is that many of the doctrines of Paul can, with more or less certainty, be connected with the Essenes and their Phythagorean-Buddhist-Iranian sun-myths and seem less than a "unique revelation from God." Sad but true in the final analysis for Christians who study enough to see this. It has taken me over 15 years of comprehensive and extensive research to put the puzzle pieces together to see this clearly for myself. Today I see what those courageous men of old tried to tell the masses about the truth of the Christian faith as it has been passed down to us by the Roman juggernaut called the "church."

Instead of the faith of Jesus we have a faith derived from sun-myths moulded around him. Instead of "the" faith of Jesus we were given a "faith about Jesus" which is not the truth

With the later creation of falsified documents bearing the Apostle's names it is a small miracle that anyone could find the truth about such a matter when the deception has been so extensive. It becomes almost a certainty that Eusebius was right in surmising that Essenic writings have been used by Paul and others who would later write the "gospels" and later apply the Apostle's names to them. The sun-myths were later applied to a Jewish Rabbi and authority was given to them through various writings proposing such beliefs by competing sects to which final authority was later to be given by attaching the names of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John to them.

Now is should be getting very clear to you that is was not Jesus, but Paul who would be the cause of the separation of the Jews from the Christians (Bunsen, Angel-Messiah, p. 240). The later "Gospels," written under such a Pauline and an Essenic influence thereby attesting to the Angel-Messiah instead of a Davidic human Messiah would be the last straw to break the camel's back along with the repudiation of the Torah by the evolving Gentile Christian community. The Jews had their Palestinian Jewish Scriptures preserved that read completely different from the corrupted Greek translation and they looked yet for the Davidic Messiah and not a cosmic sun-godman as taught in the doctrine of the Angel-Messiah. One only needs to read the Gospel of John and compare it with the Jesus of the Synoptic Gospels to see we are talking about two very different persons!

The probability, then, that that sect of vagrant quack-doctors, the Therapeutae, who were established in Egypt and its neighborhood many ages before the period assigned by later theologians as that of the birth of Jesus, were the original fabricators of the writings contained in the New Testament, becomes a certainty on the basis of evidence and the positive statement of the historian Eusebius, that "those ancient Therapeutae were Christians, and that their ancient writings were our gospels and epistles."

The Essenes, the Therapeuts, the Ascetics, the Monks, the Ecclesiastics, and the Eclectics, are but different names for one and the self-same sect.

The word "Essene" is nothing more than the Egyptian word for that of which Therapeutae is the Greek, each of them signifying "healer " or "doctor," and designating the character of the sect as professing to be endued with the miraculous gift of healing; and more especially so with respect to diseases of the mind.

Their name of "Ascetics" indicated the severe discipline and exercise of self-mortification, long fastings, prayers, contemplation, and even making of themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake, as did Origen, Melito, and others who derived their Christianity from the same school; Jesus himself is represented to have recognized and approved their practice.

Their name of "Monks" indicated their delight in solitude, their contemplative life, and their entire segregation and abstraction from the world, which Jesus, in the Gospel, is in like manner represented as describing, as characteristic of the community of which he was a member.

Their name of "Eccleastics" was of the same sense, and indicated their being called out, elected, separated from the general fraternity of mankind, and set apart to the more immediate service and honor of God.

Answer for yourself: Did you catch the unique name above for the Essenes, Therapeutae, and their Monks? There were called "Ecclesiastics." On the surface this is rather boring until you understand that "ecclesia" is the term from which we get the English translation "church." The name translated from the Greek means "CHURCH". This give a whole new meaning to the passage supposedly where Jesus said he was to build his "Essenic Community." The follow of such an interpolation to the New Testament is readily seen in the fact that Jesus never envisioned a movement of any great length or duration as he expected the appearance imminently of the Kingdom of God well before 70 C.E. He had no 2000 year plan. He was made to have one after the crucifixion by these Ecclesiastics who considered themselves the "New Israel."

THE ALEXANDRIAN LINK AND THE TRANSLATION OF THE JEWISH SCRIPTURES INTO GREEK

These Essenes had a flourishing university, or corporate body, established upon these principles, at Alexandria in Egypt, long before the period assigned for the birth of Christ Jesus. The Essenes abounded in Egypt, especially about Alexandria (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist., lib. 2, ch. xvii). They esteemed this "corporate body" to such a degree that went so far as to mistranslate on purpose much of the Hebrew Scriptures to promote their theological agenda in Alexandria, Egypt!

C.D.F. Moule, in The Birth Of The New Testament, records for us on page 59 that the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures is "a wildly inaccurate translation." Likewise, Lucetta Mowry, in The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Early Church, again tells us on page 11-12: "...the Qumran authors....altered the stories of the Pentateuch by pious and frequently fanciful embellishments. A more serious purpose of alteration was the attempt to use the stories as authoritative expression of the tenants of the Sect....rewriting familiar events of Israel's history and by inserting legendary details to make the Law of Moses correspond with Qumran thought. These documents, together with the commentaries, testify to the Sect's interest in supplementing biblical authority by adapting canonical works to its own purpose. The community desired in particular to prove that its members were the true heirs of Israel's tradition and that the promise of redemption revealed by God to the patriarchs and to Moses now belonged to their brotherhood." This is just the tip of the iceberg and you should understand that many Greek Fathers of the church, men like Clement of Alexandria, who grew up and was schooled in Alexandria, not only heard this Essene theology and their teachings on the Angel-Messiah, but their documents, even the Greek translation of the Jewish Bible had such tenants of the group included within it. This explains the natural tendency for these early Greek Fathers to accept and promote a theology that was in opposition to what the conservative Jews of Palestine believed as preserved in their Jewish Scriptures, which now read quite differently from the Greek translation of the Essenes in Alexandria.

There are literally hundreds of embellishments, but let me give you one such example as I have dealt with hundreds of examples of the corruption of the Jewish Scriptures when then were translated on another website that you might wish to examine to see the evidence for yourself: http://faithofyeshua.faithweb.com.

Now for example... Christian Ginsburg details for us on page 32 of his monumental work The Essenes, Their History and Doctrines, when these Greek-Jews of Alexandria were employed to translate the Prophet and the Psalms into Greek, that they availed themselves of the opportunity to introduce their tenants and rites into their version of the translation. This version is called the Septuagint and is a grossly mistranslated version of the Jewish Scriptures. Millions of Christians are not aware of this and many of the Christian scholars stop short to examine the evidence for themselves; simply they just don't know it happened. Not being able to read Hebrew for themselves, they accept the Greek translation bequeathed to them as if it came for God. Your evaluation of the facts concerning this translation will show you otherwise. One example should suffice to begin your curiosity into the matter. Thus, for instance, when David said "Sacrifice and burn offering thou didst not desire, mine ears has thou opened" (Psalm 40:6) was changed by the Essenes translators of Alexandria to: "Sacrifice and burnt offering thou didst not desire, but a body hast thou prepared me." The Essenes, by changing this verse and taking away and adding to the Word of God introduced three of their tenets:

1. They made the Prophets speak absolutely as if God had entirely rejected sacrifices because they themselves would offer none

2. By dropping my the words, "mine ears has thou opened," they showed disapproval of slavery:

Exod 21:6 6 Then his master shall bring him (his slave) unto the judges; he shall also bring him to the door, or unto the door post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an aul; and he shall serve him for ever. (KJV)

3. By substituting "a body has thou prepared me," the were promoting their college of devout Essenes in Alexandria who met together as a body, and whom they believed God had appointed instead of the corrupt Priesthood. This body of Essenes was to be the now corporate "body" of Israel; the New Israel. Along with this the Torah and the Tanakh had been replaced with the religious and Apocalyptic writings of the community.

From this Essene corporate body of the "New Israel" they sent out missionaries promoting their theologies, and had established colonies, auxiliary branches, and affiliated communities, in various cities of Asia Minor, which colonies were in a flourishing condition before the preaching of St. Paul. Now you can understand that when Paul went on his journeys preaching "Christ crucified" that this was not a new message to his recipients. Jesus was just another name in a long line of crucified sun-god saviors that had come before. Chrishna crucified was now Christ crucified: http://bennoah1.calliejo.com. There had been a long line of "personified sun-godmen" who were crucified; first in the heavens due to the blending of astrology and religion, and later personified in human terms reflecting the "heroes" of various Indo-Germanic nations since the beginning of time.

Col 1:23 23 If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven; whereof I Paul am made a minister; (KJV) Notice please Paul used the "past tense" indicating that "his gospel" had already gone into all the world. A little study in comparative religion verifies the truth to his statement.

Answer for yourself: Have you ever wondered what was "the gospel" preached all over the world before Paul took the Christian message? These nations had already received the cosmic sun-myths from these Buddhist-Essene missionaries which covered according to their own testimony the whole of the known world. So Christ crucified was not a new message, but the personification of sun-myths long held by primitive mankind. Paul was only reiterating what they already knew and this explains the rapid spread of the Christian message...he had to give them nothing new...only a new name for their crucified godman. This also explains why the Jews continually followed Paul on his travels troubling him in their efforts to "undo" his preaching as the men from Jerusalem knew the distortions Paul was preaching about the Jesus that had personally known! Sadly, the New Testament blasts these men as "Judaizers." Redactionist history at its best!

The very ancient and Eastern doctrine of an Angel-Messiah had been applied to Gautama-Buddha, and so it was applied to Jesus Christ by the Essenes of Egypt and of Palestine, who introduced this new Messianic doctrine into Essenic Judaism and Essenic Christianity (Bunsen, Angel-Messiah, p. 255).

In the Pali and Sanscrit texts the word Buddha is always used as a title, not as a name. It means "The Enlightened One." Gautama Buddha is represented to have taught that he was only one of a long series of Buddhas, who appear at intervals in the world, and who all teach the same system. After the death of each Buddha his religion flourishes for a time, but finally wickedness and vice again rule over the land. Then a new Buddha appears, who again preaches the lost Dharma or truth. The names of twenty-four of these Buddhas who appeared previous to Gautama have been handed down to us. The Buddhavansa, or "History of the Buddhas," the last book of the Khuddaka Nikaya in the second Pitca, gives the lives of all the previous Buddhas before commencing its account of Gautama himself ; and the Pali commentary on the Jatakas gives certain details regarding each of the twenty-four (Rhys David, Buddhism, p. 179).

An Avatar (one descended from Heaven as an incarnated deity ...from Oriental and Iranian religious beliefs) was expected about every six hundred years. This interval is clearly shown by Mr. Higgins in his Anacalypsis. It should be remembered that Gautama Buddha, the "Angel-Messiah," and Cyrus, the "Anointed" of the Lord, are placed about six hundred years before Jesus, the "Anointed." This cycle of six hundred years was called the "great year." Josephus, the Jewish historian, alludes to it when speaking of the patriarchs that lived to a great age (Josephus, Antiq., bk. i. c. iii.). "From this cycle of six hundred," says Col. Valliancey, "came the name of the bird Phoenix, called by the Egyptians Phenu, with the well-known story of its going to Egypt to burn itself on the altar of the Sun (at Heliopolis) and rise again from its ashes, at the end of a certain period."

MESSIANIC EXPECTATIONS IN THE FIRST CENTURY

At the time of Jesus of Nazareth an Avatar was expected, not by some of the Jews alone, but by most every eastern nation.

"Philo's writings prove the probability, almost rising to a certainty, that already in his time the Essenes did expect an Angel-Messiah as one of a series of divine incarnations. Within about fifty years after Philo's death, Elkesai the Essene applied this doctrine to Jesus, and it was promulgated in Rome about the same time, if not earlier, by the Pseudo-Clementines" (Bunsen, The Angel-Messiah, p. 118).

Many persons were thought at that time to be, and undoubtedly thought themselves to be, the Christ, and the only reason why the name of Jesus of Nazareth was connected with crucifixion and salvation above all others, is because the Essenes, who were expecting an Angel-Messiah, espoused it after identifying Jesus with their killed "Teacher of Righeousness" who was their Avatar. Following the crucifixion and death of Jesus these Essenes made the connection with their "crucified-sun-god man" and made conversion to the Jesus Movement. Had it not been for this almost indisputable fact, the name of Jesus of Nazareth would undoubtedly not be known at the present day as connected with the pagan doctrines which it has been. In place of this would be the truth concerning the Davidic Messiah and the Torah instead of a paganized New Testament which originated from a strong Essenic influence and Alexandrian philosophy of religion which influence the Greeks as well and their writings which today we call "Early Church Fathers." Without such perversion of truth the Jerusalem church's legacy would have succeeded instead of the one of Rome.

Epiphanius, a Christian bishop and writer of the fourth century, says, in speaking of the Essenes:

"They who believed on Christ were called Jessaei (or Essenes), before they were called Christians. These derived their constitution from the signification of the name Jesus, which in Hebrew signifies the same as Therapeutes, that is, a saviour or physician."

Thus we see that, according to Christian authority, the Essenes and Therapeutes are one, and that the Essenes espoused the cause of Jesus of Nazareth, accepted him as an Angel-Messiah, and became known to history as Christians, or believers in the Anointed Angel.

This ascetic Buddhist sect called Essenes were therefore expecting the Angel-Messiah, because Gautama announced to his disciples that another Buddha, and therefore another angel in human form, another organ or advocate of the wisdom from above, would descend from heaven to earth, and would be called the "Son of Love."

The learned Thomas Maurice says:

"From the earliest post-diluvian age, to that in which the Messiah appeared, together with the traditions which so expressly recorded the fall of the human race from a state of original rectitude and felicity, there appears, from an infinite variety of hieroglyphic monuments and of written documents, to have prevailed, from generation to generation, throughout all the regions of the higher Asia, a uniform belief that, in the course of revolving ages, there should arise a sacred personage, a mighty deliverer of mankind from the thraldom, of sin and of death. In fact, the memory of the grand original promise, that the seed of the woman should eventually crush the serpent, was carefully preserved in the breasts of the Asiatics; it entered deeply into their symbolic superstitions, and was engraved aloft amidst their mythologic sculptures."' (Hist. Hindostan, vol. ii. p. 273).

That an Angel-Messiah was generally expected at this time may be inferred from the following facts: Some of the Gnostic sects of Christians, who believed that Jesus was an emanation from God, likewise supposed that there were several AEons, or emanations from the Eternal Father.

Among those who taught this doctrine was Basilides and his followers! (Lardner's Works, vol. viii. p 352).

MESSIANIC HOPE BREEDS TOO MANY MESSIAHS

Simon Magus was believed to be "He who should come." Simon was worshiped in Samaria and other countries, as the expected Angel-Messiah, as a God.

Justin Martyr says:

> " After the ascension of our Lord into heaven, certain men were suborned by demons as their agents, who said that they were gods (i.e., the Angel Messiah). Among these was Simon, a certain Samaritan, whom nearly all the Samaritans and a few also of other nations, worshiped, confessing him as a Supreme God" (Apol. 1, ch. xxvi).

His miracles were notorious, and admitted by all. His followers became so numerous that they were to be found in all countries. In Rome, in the reign of Claudius, a statue was erected in his honor.

Clement of Rome, speaking of Simon Magus, says that:

"He wishes to be considered an exalted person, and to be considered 'the Christ.' He claims that he can never be dissolved, asserting that he will endure to eternity. "

Montanus was another person who evidently believed himself to be an Angel-Messiah. He was called by himself and his followers the "Paraclete," or "Holy Spirit" (Lardner's Works, vol. viii. p 593)

Socrates, in his Ecclesiastical History, tells us of one Buddhas (who lived after Jesus):

> "Who afore that time was called Terebynthus, which went to the coasts of Babylon, inhabited by Persians, and there published of himself many false wonders : that he was born of a virgin, that he was bred and brought up in the mountains, etc."

He was evidently one of the many fanatics who believed themselves to be the Paraclete or Comforter, the "Expected One."

Another one of these Christ was Apollonius. This remarkable man was born a few years before the commencement of the Christian era, and during his career, sustained the role of a philosopher, religious teacher and reformer, and a worker of miracles. He is said to have lived to be a hundred years old. From the history of his life, written by the learned sophist and scholar, Philostratus, we glean the following:

Before his birth a god appeared to his mother and informed her that he himself should he born of her. At the time of her delivery, the most wonderful things happened.' All the people of the country acknowledged that he was the "Son of God." As he grew in stature, his wonderful powers, greatness of memory, and marvelous beauty attracted the attention of all. A great part of his time was spent, when a youth, among the learned doctors; the disciples of Plato, Chrysippus and Aristotle. When he came to man's estate, he became an enthusiastic admirer and devoted follower of Pythagoras. His fame soon spread far and near, and wherever he went he reformed the religious worship of the day. He went to Ephesus, like Christ Jesus to Jerusalem, where the people flocked about him. While at Athens, in Greece, he cast out an evil spirit from a youth. As soon as Apollonius fixed his eyes upon him, the demon broke out into the most angry and horrid expressions, and then swore he would depart out of the youth. He put an end to a plague which was raging at Ephesus, and at Corinth he raised a dead maiden to life, by simply taking her by the hand and bidding her arise. The miracles of Apollonius were extensively believed, by Christians as well as others, for centuries after his time. In the fourth century Hierocles drew a parallel between the two Christs -Apollonius, and Jesus - which was answered by Eusebius, the great champion of the Christian church.

In it he admits the miracles of Apollonius, but attributes them to sorcery.

Apollonius was worshiped as a god, in different countries, as late as the fourth century. A beautiful temple was built in honor of him, and be was held in high esteem by many of the Pagan emperors. Eunapius, who wrote concerning him in the fifth century, says that his history should have been entitled "The Descent of a God upon Earth."

It is as Albert Reville says:

"The universal respect in which Apollonius was held by the whole pagan world, testified to the deep impression which the life of this Supernatural Being had left indelibly fixed in their minds; an expression which caused one of his contemporaries to exclaim, We have a God living among us."

A Samaritan, by name Menander, who was contemporary, with the apostles of Jesus, was another of these fanatics who believed himself to be the Christ. He went about performing miracles, claiming that be was a Savior, "sent down from above from the invisible worlds, for the salvation of mankind" (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist., lib. 3, ch. xxiii). He baptized his followers in his own name. His influence was great, and continued for several centuries.

Justin Martyr and other Christian Fathers wrote against him.

Manes evidently believed himself to be "the Christ," or "he who was to come." His followers also believed the same concerning him. Eusebius, speaking of him, says:

”He presumed to represent the person of Christ; he proclaimed himself to be the Comforter and the Holy Ghost, and being puffed up with this frantic pride, chose, as if he were Christ, twelve partners of his new-found doctrine, patching into one heap false and detestable doctrines of old, rotten, and rooted out heresies, the which he brought out of Persia" (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist., lib. 7, ch. xxx).

The word Manes, says Usher in his Annals, has the meaning of Paraclete or Comforter or Saviour. This at once lets us into the secret, a new incarnation, an Angel-Messiah, a Christ, born from the side of his mother, and put to a violent death, flayed alive, and lung up, or crucified, by a king of Persia. This is the teacher with his twelve apostles on the rock of Gualior.

Du Perron, in his Life of Zoroaster, gives an account of certain prophecies to be found in the sacred books of the Persians. One of these is to the effect that, at successive periods of time, there will appear on earth certain "Sons of Zoroaster," who are to be the result of immaculate conceptions. These virgin-born gods will come upon earth for the purpose of establishing the law of God. It its also asserted that Zoroaster, when on earth, declared that in the “latter days" a pure virgin would conceive, and bear a son, and that as soon as the child was born a star would appear, blazing even at noonday, with undiminished splendor. This Christ is to be called Sosiosh. He will redeem mankind, and subdue the Devs, who have been tempting and leading men astray ever since the fall of our first parents.

Among the Greeks the same prophecy was found. The Oracle of Delphi was the depository, according to Plato, of an ancient and secret prophecy of the birth of a "Son of Apollo," who was to restore the reign of justice and virtue on the earth (Plato in Apolog. Anac., ii. p. 189)

Those who believed in successive emanations of AEons from the Throne of Light, pointed to the passage in the Gospels where Jesus is made to say that he will be succeeded by the Paraclete or Comforter. Mohammed was believed by many to be this Paraclete, and it is said that he too told his disciples that another Paraclete would succeed him. From present appearances, however, there is some reason for believing, that the Mohammedans are to have their ancient prophecy set at naught by the multiplicity of those who pretend to be divinely appointed to fulfill it. The present year was designated as the period at which this great reformer was to arise, who should be almost, if not quite, the equal of Mohommed. His mission was to be to purify the religion from its corruptions; to overthrow those who had usurped its control, and to rule, as a great spiritual caliph, over the faithful. According to accepted tradition, the prophet himself designated the line of descent in which his most important successor would be found, and even indicated his personal appearance. The time having arrived, it is not strange that the man is forthcoming, only in this instance there is more than one claimant. There is a “holy man" in Morocco who has allowed it to be announced that he is the designated reformer, while cable reports show that a rival pretender has appeared in Yemen, in southern Arabia, and his supporters, sword in hand, are now advancing upon Mecca, for the purpose of proclaiming their leader as caliph within the sacred city itself.

History then relates to us the indisputable fact that at the time of Jesus of Nazareth an Angel-Messiah was expected, that many persons claimed, and were believed to be, the “Expected One," and that the reason why Jesus was accepted above all others was because the Essenes - a very numerous sect - believed him to be the true Messiah, and came over to be his followers in a body.

It was because there were so many of these Christs in existence that some follower of Jesus ,but no one knows who, wrote as follows:

"If any man shall say to you, Lo, here is Christ, or, lo, he is here; believe him not; for false Christs and false prophets shall rise, and shall show signs and wonders to seduce, if it were possible, even the elect" (Mark, xiii. 21-22).

WHY JESUS WAS NOT ACCEPTED AS MESSIAH BY THE MAJORITY OF THE JEWISH PEOPLE FOLLOWING HIS DEATH

- 1. Because the majority expected a daring and irresistible warrior and conqueror, who, armed with greater power than Caesar, was to come upon earth to rend the fetters in which their hapless nation had so long groaned, to avenge them upon their haughty oppressors, and to re-establish the kingdom of Judah; and this Jesus - although he evidently claimed to be the Messiah -did not do.
- 2. Besides this the kingdom was to come through righteousness and Israel, expected to be a Holy Nation of Priests, had to merit the Kingdom and her King. Her failure in this regard meant the prophecies were not fulfilled and the Davidic King redeemer would not succeed.

There are many reasons why the true Messianic prophecies were not fulfilled and why "false" messianic prophecies had to be created in order to "sell" Jesus as Messiah to the Gentile world.

Tacitus, the Roman historian, says

> " The generality had a strong persuasion that it was contained in the ancient writings of the priests, that at that very time the east should prevail : and that some one, who should come out of Judea, should obtain the empire of the world ; which ambiguities foretold Vespasian and Titus. But the common people (of the Jews), according to the influence of human wishes, appropriated to themselves, by their interpretation, this vast grandeur foretold by the fates, nor could be brought to change their opinion for the true, by all their adversities."

Suetonius, another Roman historian, says:

> " There had been for a long time all over the east a constant persuasion that it was recorded in the fates (books of the fates, or foretellings), that at that time some one who should come out of Judea should obtain universal dominion. It appears by the event, that this prediction referred to the Roman emperor ; but the Jews, referring it to themselves, rebelled."

This is corroborated by Josephus, the Jewish historian, who says:

"That which chiefly excited them (the Jews) to war, was an ambiguous prophecy, which was also found in the sacred books, that at that time some one, within their country, should arise. that should obtain the empire of the whole world. For this they had received by tradition, that it was spoken of one of their nation; and many wise men were deceived with the interpretation. But, in truth, Vespasian's empire was designed in this prophecy, who was created emperor (of Rome) in Judea."

As the Rev. Dr. Geikie remarks, the central and dominant characteristic of the teaching of the rabbis, was the certain advent of a great national Deliverer - the Messiah - but not a God from heaven.

For a time Cyrus appeared to realize the promised Deliverer, or, at least, to be the chosen instrument to prepare the way for him, and, in his turn, Zerubabel became the center of Messianic hopes. In fact, the national mind had become so inflammable, by constant brooding on this one theme, that any bold spirit, rising in revolt against the Roman power, could find an army of fierce disciples who trusted that it should be he who would redeem Israel (Geikie, The Life Of Christ, vol. i. p. 79).

The "taxing " which took place under Cyrenius, Governor of Syria (A. D. 7), excited the wildest uproar against the Roman power. The Hebrew spirit was stung into exasperation; the puritans of the nation, the enthusiasts, fanatics, the zealots of the law, the literal constructionists of prophecy, appealed to the national temper, revived the national faith, and fanned into flame the combustible elements that smoldered in the bosom of the race. The Messianic hope was strong in these people; all the stronger on account. of their political degradation. Born in sorrow, the anticipation grew keen in bitter hours. That Jehovah would abandon them could not be believed.

The thought would be atheism. The hope kept the eastern Jews in a perpetual state of insurrection. The cry “Lo here, lo there! " was incessant. Claimant after claimant of the dangerous supremacy of the Messiah appeared, pitched a camp in the wilderness, raised the banner, gathered a force, was attacked, defeated, banished, or crucified; but the frenzy did not abate.

The last insurrection among the Jews, that of Bar-Cochba, "Son of the Star," revealed an astonishing frenzy of zeal. It was purely a Messianic uprising. Judaism had excited the fears of the Emperor Hadrian, and induced him to inflict unusual severities on the people. The effect of the violence was to stimulate that conviction to fury. The night of their despair was once more illumined by the star of the east. The banner of the Messiah was raised. Potents, as of old, were seen in the sky; the clouds were watched for the glory that should appear. Bar-Cochba seemed to fill all the popular idea of the deliverer. Miracles were ascribed to him; flames issued from his mouth. The vulgar imagination made haste to transform the audacious fanatic into a child of David. Multitudes flocked to his standard. The whole Jewish race throughout the world was in commotion. The insurrection gained head. The heights about Jerusalem were seized and occupied, and fortifications were erected; nothing but the “host of angels" was needed to insure victory.

The angels did not appear; the Roman legions did. The " Messiah," not proving himself a conqueror, was held to have proved himself an impostor, the "son of a lie" (Frothingham, Cradle of the Christ).

The impetuous zeal with which the Jews rushed to the standard of this Messianic impostor, in the 130th year of the Christian era, demonstrates the true Jewish character, and shows how readily any one who made the claim, was believed to be " He who should come." Even the celebrated Rabbi Akiba sanctioned this daring fraud. Akiba declared that the so-called prophecy of Balaam: "a star shall rise out of Jacob, "was accomplished. Hence the impostor took his title of Bar-Cockabas, or Son of the Star; and Akiba not only publicly anointed him " KING OF THE JEWS," and placed an imperial diadem upon his head, but followed him to the field at the head of four-and-twenty thousand of his disciples, and acted in the capacity of master of his horse.

In the absence of the fulfillment of the Jewish prophecies in the Jewish Scriptures, faith in Jesus as the Messiah waned, especially in the failure of him to reappear before the destruction of the Temple as well as the war of 135 A.D. Those who yet believed on the meek and benevolent Jesus, and whose number was very small, were of that class who believed in the doctrine of the Angel-Messiah, first heard of among them when taken captives to Babylon. The Davidic Messiah did not appear. Hopes were split between the yet coming of the Biblical Messiah with those of the Angel-Messiah of the Essene-Christians. These believed that just as Buddha appeared at different intervals, and as Vishnu appeared at different intervals, the avatars appeared among the Jews. Adam, and Enoch, and Noah, and Elijah or Elias, might in outward appearance be different men, but they were really the self-same divine person successively animating various human bodies! This is clearly seen from the statement made by the writer of the Gospel of Matthew (xvii:9-13) that the disciples of Jesus supposed John the Baptist was Elias.

The prevailing opinion of the Rabbis and the people alike, in Jesus' day, was, that the Messiah would simply be a great prince, who should found a kingdom of matchless splendor. With a few, however, like the Essene-Christians, the conception of the Messiah's kingdom was pure and lofty...Daniel, and all who wrote after him, painted the "Expected One," as a heavenly being. He was the "messenger," the "Elect of God," appointed from eternity, to appear in due time, and redeem his people (Geike, Life of Christ, vol. 1, pp. 80-81). In the book of Daniel, by some supposed to have been written during the captivity, by others as late as Antiochus Epiphanies (B.C.E. 175), the restoration of the Jews is described in tremendous language, and the Messiah is portrayed as a supernatural personage, in close relation with Jehovah himself. In the book of Enoch, supposed to have been written at various intervals between 144 and 120 B.C.E., and to have been completed in its present form in the first half of the second century that preceded the advent of Jesus, the figure of the Messiah is invested with supernatural abilities. He is called "The Son of God," "whose name was spoken before the Sun was made;" "who existed from the beginning in the presence of God," that is, was pre-existent. At the same time his human characteristics are insisted on. He is called "Son of Man," even "Son of Woman," "The Anointed," or "The Christ," "The Righteous One" (Frothingham,The Cradle of the Christ, p. 20).

JESUS AS AN AVATAR

Christ Jesus was the avatar of the ninth age, Christ Cyrus was the avatar of the eighth. Of the hero of the eighth age it is said: "Thus said the Lord to his Anointed (i.e., His Christ), his Messiah, to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden to subdue nations.'" The eighth period began about the Babylonish captivity, about six hundred years before Christ Jesus.

The ninth began with Christ Jesus, making in all eight cycles before Jesus.

"What was known in Judea more than a century before the birth of Jesus Christ cannot have been introduced among Buddhists by Christian missionaries. It will become equally certain that the bishop and church-historian, Eusebius, was right when be wrote, that he considered it highly probable that the writings of the Essenic Therapeuts in Egypt had been incorporated into our Gospels, and into some Pauline epistles" (Bunsen, The Angel-Messiah, p. 17).

Well there you have it in summary form: How the Jewish Messiah, thought by many to be Jesus, was later interpreted as a Phythagorean-Buddhist-Iranian sun-godman and how the concepts were later blurred as we find today in the writings of the New Testament as quoted from a forged and adulterated Old Testament which was purposefully mistranslated by the Greek-Jewish Essenes of Alexandria to further their authority for their corporate religious body. With the crucifixion of Jesus these "beliefs" were applied to him following his death and with the conversion of this corporate Essene body into the early Jewish Messianic Movement these "Essenic beliefs" would later divide the conservative Pharisees from the Essenes. The separatist movement would gather steam as the documents of this sect and their teachings highly influenced the Greeks who were coming to the faith as well as their intellectuals which were again influenced by the Alexandrian religious thought. For further information on the subject of the connection between Essenism and Christianity, the reader is referred to Taylor's Diegesis, Bunsen's Angel-Messiah, and the works of S. F. Dunlap.

IS THE SON OF GOD...THE SUN OF GOD?

...there is nothing new under the sun. (Ecclesiastes 1:9)

Over the ages, the ancients did not simply observe the movements of the celestial bodies but personified them and created stories about them that were recreated upon the earth. Out of this polytheistic, astrological atmosphere came the "greatest story ever told," as the gospel tale is, in many places in fact, astro-theological and non-historical, recording the mythos found around the globe for eons. Thus, the Christian religion, for the most part, created and shored up by forgery, fraud and force, is in reality astro-theological more than historical and its many stories and accounts of Jesus' life in the New Testament mythical, based on many thousands of years of observation by the ancients of the movements and interrelationships of the celestial bodies and the earth, one of the favorite of which was, understandably, the sun.

One has to understand and know of these solar myths in order to read the New Testament and discern the truth from fiction about the life of Jesus as both are intermixed!

The sun figured in the stories of virtually every culture worldwide. In many places and eras, the sun was considered the most visible proxy of the divine and the most potent bestower of Spirit. It was regarded as the first entity in "the Void" and the progenitor of all life and matter. The sun also represented the Archetypal Man, as human beings were perceived as "solar entities." In addition to being a symbol of the spirit because it rises and sinks, the sun was the "soul of the world," signifying immortality, as it is eternally resurrected after "dying" or setting. It was also considered the purifier of the soul, as noted. Hence, from at least the Egyptian age down to the Gnostic Christians, the sun, along with the moon and other celestial bodies, was viewed as a "guide" into the afterlife. By the Gnostic Zoroastrians, the sun was considered "the Archimagus, that noblest and most powerful agent of divine power, who 'steps forth as a Conqueror from the top of the terrible Alborj to rule over the world which he enlightens from the throne of Ormuzd'" (Pike, Albert, The Morals and Dogma of Scottish Free Masonry, LH Jenkins, 1928, p. 612). Long before the Christian era, the sun was known as the" Son of Ormuzd," the "Mediator," while his adversary, Ahriman, (Devil) represented the darkness, which caused the fall of man (Ibid., p. 613).

The sun was considered the "Savior of the World," as it rose and brought light and life to the planet. It was revered for causing seeds to burst and thus giving its life for plants to grow; hence, it was seen to sacrifice itself in order to provide fertility and vegetation. The sun is the "tutelary genius of universal vegetation," as well as the god of cultivation and the benefactor of humankind (Ibid., p. 475). When the sun" dies" in winter, so does the vegetation, to be "resurrected" in the spring. The first fruits, vine and grain were considered symbols of the sun's strength and were ritualistically offered to the divine luminary. The solar heroes and gods were said to be teachers as well, because agriculture, a science developed out of astronomy, freed mankind to pursue something other than food, such as other sciences and the arts.

The various personifications of the sun thus represent the "image of fertility which perpetuates and rejuvenates the world's existence (Ibid., p. 594). In their fertility aspects, the sun was the phallus, and the moon was the vulva, the male and female generative principles, the generators of all life on Earth.

In the mythos, the two pillars or columns of the Celestial Temple, the mysterious Jachin and Boaz, are the sun and moon (Ibid., p. 776). Of the relationship between the sun and moon, Hazelrigg adds:

The Sun may be likened to a wire through which the planetary messages are electrically transmitted, and of which the lunar moisture is the insulation" (Hazelrigg, John, The Sun Book, Health Research, 1971, p. 56).

In the ancient world, light was the subject of awe, and the sunlight's ability to make plants grow was considered magical and miraculous. So special is light that the writer of Ecclesiastes waxes, "Light is sweet, and it is pleasant for the eyes to behold the sun." We know that it is not pleasant for the eyes to behold the direct light of the sun; it is, however, pleasant for humanity to behold the sun as it rises in the morning, bringing light and life. Indeed, the sun itself is the "face of the divine" upon which it is impossible to look.

Thus, the sun was very important to the ancients, so much so that around the world for millennia a wide variety of peoples have built solar temples, monuments and entire religions with priestesses and priests of the Sun, along with complex rituals and accoutrements. Within these religions is contained the ubiquitous mythos, a template or archetypical story that personifies the heavens and Earth, and rolls them into a drama about their interrelationship. Rather than being an entertaining but useless "fairytale," as myths are erroneously considered to be, the mythos is designed to pass along from generation to generation information vital to life on Earth, so that humans do not have to learn it repeatedly but can progress. Without the knowledge, or gnosis, of the celestial mythos, humankind would still be in caves.

The celestial mythos is complicated because the solar myth is intertwined with the lunar, stellar and terrestrial myths. In addition, some of the various celestial players were introduced later than others, and many of them took on new functions as t he focus switched from stars to moon to sun to other planets, and back again. For example, Horus is not only the sun but also the North Pole star, and his twin brother-cum-adversary, Set, represents not only darkness but also the South Pole star.

Furthermore, as time progresses and the skies change, as with the precession of the equinoxes and the movements of the sun annually through the zodiac and daily through its "houses," as well as with cataclysm, the attributes of the planetary bodies within the mythos also change. Moreover, the incorporation of the phases of moon into the mythos adds to its complexity:

The Moon, like the Sun, changed continually the track in which she crossed the Heavens, moving ever to and fro between the upper and lower limits of the Zodiac; and her different places, phases, and aspects there, and her relations with the Sun and the constellations, have been a fruitful source of mythological fables (Pike, Albert, The Morals and Dogma of Scottish Free Masonry, LH Jenkins, 1928, p. 469).

An example of the complexity of the mythos is provided by the story of the "Queen of Heaven," the goddess Isis, mother of Horus, who is not only the moon that reflects the sun, she is the original creator, as well as the constellation of Virgo. As the moon, she is the "woman clothed with the sun, and as the Virgin, she is the sun's mother." She is also Stella Mans, the "Star of the Sea," as she regulates the tides, a fact known of the moon beginning eons ago, as were the facts of the roundness of the earth and of the heliocentricity of the solar system-again, knowledge never actually "lost" and "rediscovered," as popularly portrayed.

The sun and moon were deemed to be one being in some cultures or twins in others. When eclipses occurred, it was said that the moon and sun were uniting to create lesser gods. Thus, the pantheon kept growing.

Although it is generally now considered to be "male," the sun was also regarded as female in several places, including Alaska, Anatolia, Arabia, Australia, Canaan, England, Germany, India, Japan, North America and Siberia. The sun's feminine side was, naturally, suppressed by the patriarchy. As Walker says:

The popular European tradition usually made the sun male and the moon female, chiefly to assert that ·hisº light was stronger, and that ·sheº shone only by reflected glory, symbol of the position of women in patriarchal society. However, Oriental and pre-Christian systems frequently made the sun a Goddess (Walker, Barbara, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, Harper, p. 353).

When one factors into this complexity the fertility aspect of the gods and goddesses of the grape and grain, along with the sexual imagery found in all mythologies and religions, one can understand why it has been so difficult to sort it all out.

THE ZODIAC

As the mythos developed, it took the form of a play, with a cast of characters, including the 12 divisions of the sky called the signs or constellations of the zodiac. The symbols that typified these 12 celestial sections of 30 degrees each were not based on what the constellations actually look like but represent aspects of earthly life. Thus, the ancient peoples were able to incorporate these earthly aspects into the mythos and project them onto the all-important celestial screen.

These zodiacal designations have varied from place to place and era to era over the tens of thousands of years during which the skies have been observed, for a number of reasons, including the changes in the skies brought on by the precession. For example, Scorpio is not only the eagle but also the scorpion. It is difficult to determine absolutely all of their origins, but the current zodiacal symbols or totems are or may have been devised as follows, based on the formula made by inhabitants of the northern hemisphere:

- Aries is represented as the Ram/Lamb because March/April is the time of the year when lambs are born.
- Taurus is the Bull because April/May is the time for ploughing and tilling.
- Gemini is the Twins, so-called for Castor and Pollux, the twin stars in its constellation, as well as because May/June is the time of the "increase" or "doubling" of the sun, when it reaches its greatest strength.
- After the sun reaches its strength at the summer solstice and begins to diminish in Cancer (June/July), the stars are called the Crab, who "backslides."
- Leo is the Lion because, during the heat of July/August, the lions in Egypt would come out of the hot desert.
- Virgo, originally the Great Mother Earth, is the "Gleaning Virgin, who holds a sheath of wheat," symbolizing August/ September, the time of the harvest.
- Libra (September/October) is the Balance, reflecting the autumnal equinox, when the days and night are again even in length.
- Scorpio is the Scorpion because in the desert areas the fierce storms of October/November were called "scorpions" and because this time of the year is the "backbiter" of the sun as it begins to wane.
- "Sagittarius is the "vindictive Archer" who side-wounds and weakens the sun during its approach in November/ December towards the winter solstice.
- In Capricorn, the weakened sun encounters the "filthy, illomened He-goat," who drags the solar hero down in December/January.
- Aquarius is the Water-Bearer because January/February is the time of winter rains.
- Pisces is represented by the Fishes because February/ March is the time when the thinning ice is broken and the fattened fish are plucked out (Hazelrigg, John, The Sun Book, Health Research, 1971, p. 43)

The story of the skies was so important to the ancients that they were singularly focused on it and their lives in effect revolved around it. The heavens were revered not only by so-called Pagans but also by biblical peoples, including the Israelites, whose name and various Elohim were also stars and aspects of the solar-celestial mythos. In the Bible, the sun is worshipped in various forms by the Hebrews and "kings of Judah." It is also overtly personified and imbued with divine and ethical qualities, as in Deuteronomy: "But thy friends be like the sun as he rises in his might." Throughout the Old Testament important deeds are done "in the sight of this sun," "before the sun," or "under the sun," revealing the ages-old perception of the sun as God's proxy, judge or "eye." So significant was the solar orb that it was ever a grave concern that the sun would "go down on the prophets."

At Psalms 113:3, the chosen are instructed to praise the Lord from the "rising of the sun to its setting." Psalms 85:11 states, "Faithlessness will spring up from the ground, and righteousness will look down from the sky." Psalms 84:11 reads, "For the Lord God is a sun and shield." At Psalms 68:32-32, the faithful are instructed to "sing praises to Jah, to him who rides in the heavens, the ancient heavens . . . whose majesty is over Israel, and his power is in the skies," exactly as was said about the ubiquitous solar hero.

At Psalms 72:17, we read, "May his name endure for ever, his fame continue as long as the sun," and, at Malachi 1:11: "For from the rising of sun to its setting my name is great among the nations." The Lord's name is not said to be great after the setting of the sun, during the night, because his "name" is the sun, as we have seen lao, Jah, YHWH and so on, to mean. Thus, the esteem of the sun by the Hebrews is evident; yet, the story of the solar hero is also found in numerous places in the Old Testament, but these stories are masked by carnalization and historicization.

Indeed, so important was the sun to the ancients, including the Israelites, that they created a "Sun Book, a "Helio Biblio," or "Holy Bible," (Hotema, EBD), the original of which can be found in the myths encoded in stone and story around the ancient world millennia before the Judeo-Christian bible was compiled.

The word "Bible" itself comes from the City of the Great Mother: Byblos, in Phoenicia.

Need we remind our reader that Byblos is where Osiris washed up in his wooden casket and was hung on a tree/cross?

As Walker relates, "'Bibles were named after her city because the earliest libraries were attached to her temple" (Walker, Barbara, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, Harper, p. 127). As noted, the Judeo-Christian bible was written by a number of hands, edited numerous times and contains countless errors and inaccuracies. It is a rehash of ancient legends and myths, and is not, therefore, the "infallible Word of God." "Such," says Graham, "is the Bible's 'revealed truth'-other races' mythology, the basis of which is cosmology" (Graham, Lloyd, Deceptions and Myths Of The Bible, Citadel, 1991, p. 74).

The cosmology or celestial mythos has in reality been hidden from the masses for many centuries for the purposes of enriching and empowering the ruling elite. Its conspiring priest-kings have ruled empires in full knowledge of it since time immemorial and have "lorded" it over the heads of the "serfs."

THE SUN OF GOD

Within the Sun Book or Holy Bible was incorporated by such priestcraft the most consolidated version of the celestial mythos ever assembled, the story of the "son of God."

- First, we have seen that "God" is the sun
- Second, in Job 38 the stars are called "sons of God"

Therefore, one star would be a "son of God," as well as the "son of the Sun." Thus, the son of God is the sun of God.

The solar mythos, in fact, explains why the narratives of the sons of God previously examined are so similar, with a godman who is crucified and resurrected, who does miracles and has 12 disciples, etc.: To wit, these stories were in actuality based on the movements of the sun through the heavens. In other words, the majority of the accounts of Jesus Christ in the New Testament and the others upon whom he is predicated are personifications of the sun, and the gospel fable is merely a repeat of a mythological formula revolving around the movements of the sun through the heavens.

For example, many of the world's crucified godmen have their traditional birthdays on December 25th ("Christmas"). This date is set because the ancients recognized that (from a geocentric perspective in the northern hemisphere) the sun makes an annual descent southward until after midnight of December 21st, the winter solstice, when it stops moving southerly for three days and then starts to move northward again. During this time, the ancients declared that "God's sun" had "died" for three days and was "born again" after midnight of December 24th. Thus, these many different cultures celebrated with great joy the "sun of God's" birthday on December 25th.

THE FOLLOWING ARE THE MAIN CHARACTERISTICS OF THE "SUN OF GOD":

- The sun "dies" for three days at the winter solstice, to be born again or resurrected on December 25th.
- The sun of God is "born of a virgin," which refers to both the new or "virgin" moon and the constellation of Virgo.
- The sun's "birth" is attended by the "bright Star," either Sirius/Sothis or the planet Venus, and by the "Three Kings," representing the three stars in the belt of Orion.
- The sun at its zenith, or 12 noon, is in the house or heavenly temple of the "Most High"; thus, "he" begins "his Father's work" at "age" 12. Maxwell relates, "At that point, all Egypt offered prayers to the "Most High" God!" (Leedom, Tim, ed.,The Book Your Church Doesn't Want You To Read, Kendall/Hunt, 1993, p. 23).
- The sun enters into each sign of the zodiac at 300; hence, the "Sun of God" begins his ministry at "age" 30. As Hazelrigg states, ". . . the Sun of the visible heavens has moved northward 300 and stands at the gate of Aquarius, the Water-bearer, or John the Baptist of the mystic planisphere, and here begins the work of ministry in the Palestine" (Hazelrigg, John, The Sun Book, Health Research, 1971, p. 163).
- The sun is the "Carpenter" who builds his daily "houses" or 12 two-hour divisions.
- The sun's "followers" or "disciples" are the 12 signs of the zodiac, through which the sun must pass.
- The sun is "anointed" when its rays dip into the sea. (Anderson, Karl, Astrology Of The Old Testament, Health Research, 1970, p. 206).
- The sun "changes water into wine" by creating rain, ripening the grape on the vine and fermenting the grape juice.
- The sun "walks on water," referring to its reflection. (Massey, Gerald, The Historical Jesus And The Mythical Christ, Health Research, p. 21).
- The sun "calms the sea" as he rests in the "boat of heaven." (Leedom, Tim, ed., The Book Your Church Doesn't Want You To Read, Kendall/Hunt, 1993, p. 27). (Mt. 8:23-7)
- When the sun is annually and monthly re-born, he brings life to the "solar mummy," his previous self, raising it from the dead.

- The sun triumphantly "rides an ass and her foal" into the "City of Peace" when it enters the sign of Cancer, which contains two stars called "little asses," and reaches its fullness. (Pike, Albert, The Morals and Dogma of Scottish Free Masonry, LH Jenkins, 1928, p. 465).
- The sun is the "Lion" when in Leo, the hottest time of the year, called the "throne of the Lord."
- The sun is "betrayed" by the constellation of the Scorpion, the backbiter, the time of the year when the solar hero loses his strength.
- The sun is "crucified" between the two thieves of Sagittarius and Capricorn.
- The sun is hung on a cross, which represents its passing through the equinoxes, the vernal equinox being Easter.
- The sun darkens when it "dies": "The solar god as the sun of evening or of autumn was the suffering, dying sun, or the dead sun buried in the nether world. (Massey, Gerald, The Egyptian Book of the Dead, Health Research, p. 9).
- The sun does a "stutter-step" at the winter solstice, unsure whether to return to life or "resurrect," doubted by his "twin" Thomas.
- The sun is with us "always, to the close of the age" (Mt. 28:20), referring to the ages of the precession of the equinoxes.
- The sun is the "Light of the World," and "comes on clouds, and every eye shall see him."
- The sun rising in the morning is the "Savior of mankind."
- The sun wears a corona, "crown of thorns" or halo.
- The sun was called the "Son of the Sky (God)," "All- Seeing," the "Comforter," "Healer," "Savior," "Creator," "Preserver," "Ruler of the World," and "Giver of Daily Life." (Doane, T.W.,Bible Myths And Their Parallels In Other Religions, Health Research, 1985, p. 472, 476, 492, 562).
- The sun is the Word or Logos of God.
- The all-seeing sun, or "eye of God," was considered the judge of the living and dead who returned to Earth "on a white horse." (Doane, T.W., Bible Myths And Their Parallels In Other Religions, Health Research, 1985, pp. 497-498).

THE IMPORTANCE OF EGYPT

A. Churchward demonstrates the complex yet poetic celestial mythology of the Egyptians, developed around the core mythos long prior to the Christian era:

The Sun was not considered human in its nature when the Solar force at dawn was imaged by the Lion-faced Atum, the flame of the furnace by the fiery serpent Uati, the Soul of its life by the Hawk, the Ram, or the Crocodile. Until Har-ur the elder Horus was depicted as the child in the place of the calf or lamb, fish, or shoot of papyrus plant, which now occurred in the Solar Cult, no human figure was personalized in the Mythology of Egypt.

Isis in this Cult takes the place of Hathor as the Mother-Moon, the reproducer of light in the underworld. The place of conjunction and of rebegettal by the Sun-god was in the underworld, when she became the woman clothed with the sun. At the end of lunation the old Moon died and became a corpse; it is at times portrayed as a mummy in the underworld and there it was revivified by the Sun-god, the Solar fecundation of the Moon representing the Mother, resulting in her bringing forth the child of light the "cripple deity," who was begotten in the dark. (Churchward, Albert, The Origin And Evolution Of Religion, p. 226).

Massey provides another sketch of the mythos as applied to Horus, who, like Baal, was the sun in the Age of Taurus:

"...[The] infant Horus, who sank down into Hades as the suffering sun to die in the winter solstice and be transformed to rise again and return in all his glory and power in the equinox at Easter. (Massey, Gerald, The Egyptian Book of the Dead, Health Research, p. 9).

As we have seen, the story of Jesus is virtually identical in numerous important aspects to that of Horus, a solar myth. Higgins spells it out:

The history of the sun. . . is the history of Jesus Christ. The sun is born on the 25th of December, the birthday of Jesus Christ. The first and greatest of the labours of Jesus Christ is his victory over the serpent, the evil principle, or the devil. In his first labor Hercules strangled the serpent, as did Cristna, Bacchus, etc. This is the sun triumphing over the powers of hell and darkness; and, as he increases, he prevails, till he is crucified in the heavens, or is decussated in the form of a cross (according to Justin Martyr) when he passes the equator at the vernal equinox. (Higgins, Godfrey, Esq., Anacalypsis, A&B Books, 1992, p.144).

At Malachi 4:2, YHWH says, "But for you who fear my name the sun of righteousness shall rise, with healing on its wings." Who is this sun of righteousness with healing on its wings" Malachi is the last book of the Old Testament, and this scripture is one of the last in that book, which leads directly into the story of Jesus, who was indeed called by the Church fathers the "sun of righteousness." Malachi's sun of righteousness rising with "healing on its wings" is, in reality, the saving light that ends the gloom of night, the daily resurrection of sunrise, and the birth of the sun of a new age, who was carnalized and historicized in Jesus Christ. As "shamash," which is the Hebrew word for sun and the name of the Babylonian sun god, Malachi's righteous sun is also Solomon's Moabite god Chemosh, which is the same as shamash in Hebrew, an ironic development considering Chemosh was later demonized by the Christians.

Jesus's solar attributes are also laid plain by the story of his followers waiting to go to his "tomb" until sunrise, when "he is risen." In John 2, Jesus says, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up"; however, as John relates, ". . . he spoke of the temple of his body," an admission of biblical allegory. In this statement Jesus describes his own solar resurrection, not that of the Jerusalem Temple, although the original "Temple of the Most High" is indeed the same Temple of the Sun that is Jesus's "body." In fact, Jesus is called the "son of the Most High God" (Lk. 8:28; Mk. 5:7) and a priest after the order of Meichizedek, who was the priest of the Most High, El Elyon, or Helios, the sun. At Acts 26:13, regarding his conversion Paul says, "At midday, 0 king, I saw on the way a light from heaven, brighter than the sun, shining round me and those who journeyed with me," the light, of course, being Jesus. The words "at midday" represent the sun at its zenith, when it is doing its work in the Temple of the Most High, brighter than at any other time.

As expected, the early Christians were considered sun-worshippers, like their "Pagan" counterparts, although "sun-worship" is an inaccuracy, since the ancients did not "worship" the sun as the "one god" but revered it as one of the most potent symbols of the quality of divinity.For example, Krishna was considered not just the sun itself but the light in the sun and moon, (Doane, T.W., Bible Myths And Their Parallels In Other Religions, Health Research, 1985, p. 224), making him, like Jesus, brighter than the sun. Like their predecessor temples, many early Christian churches faced the east, or the place of the rising sun. In fact, as Doane relates, "Tertullian says that Christians were taken for worshipers of the Sun because they prayed towards the East, after the manner of those who adored the Sun." (Doane, T.W., Bible Myths And Their Parallels In Other Religions, Health Research, 1985, pp. 500-502). Ex-Pagan and Bishop of Carthage Tertullian's actual words from his Apology are as follows:

Others, again, certainly with more information and greater verisimilitude, believe that the sun is our god. We shall be counted Persians perhaps, though we do not worship the orb of day painted on a piece of linen cloth, having himself everywhere in his own disk. The idea no doubt has originated from our being known to turn to the east in prayer. But you, many of you, also under pretence sometimes of worshipping the heavenly bodies, move your lips in the direction of the sunrise. In the same way, if we devote Sun-day to rejoicing, from a far different reason than Sun-worship, we have some resemblance to those of you who devote the day of Saturn to ease and luxury, though they too go far away from Jewish ways, of which indeed they are ignorant.

In his protestations and refutations of critics, Tertullian further ironically admits the true origins of the Christ story and of all other such godmen by stating, "You say we worship the sun; so do you." (Wheless, Joseph, Forgery In Christianity, Health Research, 1990, p. 147). Interestingly, a previously strident believer and defender of the faith, Tertullian later renounced Christianity (Ibid., p. 144).

Christ was frequently identified as and/or with the sun by other early orthodox Christian fathers, including St. Cyprian (A.D., 258), who "spoke of Christ as the true sun (sol verus)," and St. Ambrose (339-397 A.D.), Bishop of Milan, who said of Christ, "He is our new sun." Other Church fathers who identified Christ with, if not as, the sun include St. Gregory of Nazianzus (330- 389 A.D.), and St. Zeno of Verona (375), who "calls Christ "Sol foster, sol verus." Moreover, this overt Christian sun-worship was not a short-lived aberration, as Christian proponents would portray it. Wheless relates that "Leo the Great in his day (440-461) says that it was the custom of many Christians to stand on the steps of the Church of St. Peter and pay homage to the Sun by obeisance and prayers " (Wheless, p. 30).

As to such "insider" knowledge of the true meaning of Christianity, Doane remarks

Many Christian writers have seen that the history of their Lord and Saviour is simply the history of the Sun, but they either say nothing, or, like Dr. Parkhurst and the Rev. J. P. Lundy, claim that the Sun is a type of the true Sun of Righteousness.

This "type of" sophistry has been used frequently in "religious" debate to squeeze out of a tight corner. Yet, the Christian conspirators cannot hide the fact that their "Lord's Day" is indeed Sun-day; hence, their Lord is the sun.

Even though this information has been well hidden, the early Christians were aware that Christ was the sun, as they were truly Gnostic and the solar myth was known all around them. When a member of at least one such Gnostic sect wished to become orthodox, he was compelled to renounce his "heresy" of equating Christ with the sun. Higgins relates of the influential and widespread Gnostic group called the Manichaeans:

When a Manichaean came over to the orthodox he was required to curse his former friends in the following terms: "I curse Zarades [Zarathusta/Zoroaster], who, Manes said, had appeared as a God before his time among the Indians and Persians, and whom he calls the sun. I curse those who say Christ is the sun, and who make prayers to the sun, and to the moon, and to the stars, and pay attention to them as if they were really Gods, and who give them titles of most lucid Gods, and who do not pray to the true God, only towards the East, but who turn themselves round, following the motions of the sun, with their innumerable supplications. I curse those persons who say that Zarades and Budas [Buddha] and Christ and Manichaeans and the sun are all one and the same (Higgins, Godfrey, Esq., Anacalypsis, A&B Books, 1992, p. 722).

In his 2nd Apology, Justin Martyr acknowledges that the Gnostic-Christian Manichaeans were "sun-worshippers" and says:

Accordingly, Menander seems to me to have fallen into error when he said: "0 sun! for thou, first of gods, ought to be worshipped, by whom it is that we are able to see the other gods." For the sun never could show me the true God; but that healthful Word, that is the Sun of the soul, by whom alone, when He arises in the depths of the soul, the eye of the soul itself is irradiated.

In order to obfuscate the origins of Christianity, Justin is attempting to distinguish between the sun of the Gnostics, which was the solar orb, and the "sun (sol) of the soul" in the "person" of Jesus Christ. In fact, the sun of the Gnostics and other "sun-worshippers" also represented the cosmic and cellular "sun" found in living things, including human beings, who, it was perceived, by Gnosticism can become illuminated. Thus, both Gnostic and orthodox Christians were addressing the same "sun of the soul," but the orthodoxy insisted on putting a particular face and shape to it. One might also wonder how the omnipresent divine is separated out of its creation, such that it is "everywhere" but not in the sun, moon, stars, sky, earth and all of creation. To reiterate, the ancients were not just monotheistic, polytheistic and "atheistic"-as the Christians called and were called by their adversaries-but pantheistic, seeing the divine in everything, as is the definition of omnipresence.

It is clear that from early times Christ was correctly perceived by the Gnostic sects as the sun, a fact that the historicizing Christians were continuously compelled to combat, as is evidenced by the anti-Manichaean oath specifically designed to refute such assertions. Yet, as Higgins states, ". . . the Sun, Iao, and Jesus, were all taken for the same being by the ancients, and it will require more than the skill of the whole priesthood to disprove it" (Higgins, Godfrey, Esq., Anacalypsis, A&B Books, 1992, p. 325).

Furthermore, the adoption (or, rather, creation) of Christianity was not much of a stretch for the Roman conspirators:

In the early Christian era, Roman emperors were routinely identifying themselves with the sun god and all his symbols: cross, eagle, fire, gold, lion, and so on. Constantine I, whom conventional history hails as the first Christian emperor, was actually a worshipper of the sun god, whose image he placed on his coins, dedicated to "the invincible sun, my guardian." (Walker, Barbara, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, Harper, 1983, p. 15).

EXAMINING EVIDENCE TO PROVE THAT CHRISTIANITY IS SUN-WORSHIP TO THE VERY CORE.....THE EUCHARIST

Exo 20:4 Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth: Exo 20:5 Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them:

Before we begin I think it best to remind our readers that Osiris, the original and earliest Sun-godman had his own Eucharist whereby his devotees and followers would "eat his body and drink his blood." This same "Eucharist" has been handed down for thousands of years and few know of its relationship with Sun-Worship and Idolatry.

Note that the commandment of God forbids making and bowing down to images. Among pagans, perhaps the most common form of idolatry is sun worship, and the above prohibition would clearly exclude bowing down before images of the sun or moon (things in the heaven above). With that in mind, lets look at solar and lunar images directly associated with the Catholic Mass.

Here is Pope John Paul II holding what is called a Monstrance or Ostensorium. It is used to display a roundwafer of bread, called the host, which is used in what is called the Mass, Lord's Supper, Communion or Eucharistic meal. The Catholic believes this wafer of bread turns into the actual body of Christ when consecrated during the Mass. The Roman Catholic Church even admits the Monstrance to be a sunburst: "During the baroque period, it took on a rayed form of a sun-monstrance with a circular window surrounded by a silver or gold frame with rays." (The Dictionary of the Liturgy by Rev. Jovian P. Lang, OFM., published and copyrighted © 1989 by Catholic Book Publishing Co., New York, ISBN 0-89942-273-X, page 436).

The priest (here the Pope) sometimes holds up the sunburst monstrance with the host encased for the congregation to adore and venerate. Virtually any time the monstrance, a pagan sun symbol, is viewed by the congregation, they kneel in submission. A Catholic cannot walk past this sun symbol without acknowledging it by kneeling and or making the sign of the cross with their hands.

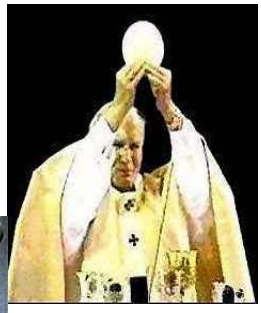
Remember God's commandment forbidding bowing down to images? How can the Catholic justify bowing down before a sun image in veneration? They will tell you that they are paying homage to the host, bread they believe has actually turned into the actual body and blood of Jesus after being consecrated by a priest. Since the wafer, they believe, has been transformed into God Himself, it is the round wafer god inside the sunburst monstrance that they bow down to in worship, not the sunburst monstrance. However, the round wafer of bread itself is also a sun symbol, which is sometimes made quite obvious in Catholic representations of the host in various forms of artwork..

This is the general sunburst pattern used to symbolize the host, the supposed "true body" of Christ. This design has also been adopted by the Jesuits as their symbol. The IHS is thought by some to represent the first letters of each word in the Latin phrase Iesus Hominum Salvator (Jesus Saviour of Men), although according to the Catholics themselves they actually represent the first three letters of the name "Jesus" in Greek .(spelled in Greek iota-eta-sigma-omicron-upsilon-sigma). The pagan though, would quickly see the same sun disk symbol associated with many pagan deities of Egypt, among them Isis, Horus, and Seb. In Egyptian mythology Seb (Geb) was the father of the goddess Isis (Aset), the mother and protectress of her divine son Horus (Harpocrates). Horus (the younger) is frequently depicted on Egyptian temples as a winged sun disk, representing the rays of the rising sun.

On the right is a statuette of the Egyptian goddess Isis. Her headdress shows the sun disk within the horns of an Apis bull, symbology which is virtually identical to that of the sunburst monstrance. Also of note, in Isis lap is her infant son, Horus. In this one image you have the symbology of the Catholic monstrance and Mother / child worship which is so prominent in Catholicism. The Egyptian pharaoh also claimed to be the embodiment of Horus on earth, much like the pope claims to be the infallible Vicar of Christ on earth.

The Apis bull, as depicted in this Egyptian statuette, is likely to be the pattern used for the golden calf the Israelites made at Mount Sinai (Exo. 32), since they were undoubtedly quite familiar with it as a result of their long captivity in Egypt. Note that in front of the sun disk and horns, which looks virtually identical to some Catholic monstrances, there is the serpent poised to strike. In Scripture the serpent is symbolic of Satan. (Gen 3, Rev. 12:9)

At the right is the reverse side of a medal commemorating the Catholic Eucharistic Congress held in Chicago in 1926 (On the front there is a bust of Pope Pius XI). Note that the round wafer host above the golden cup is portrayed as a radiant sunburst.

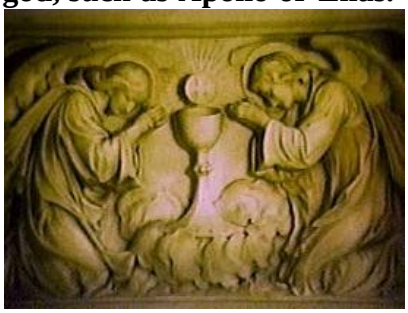


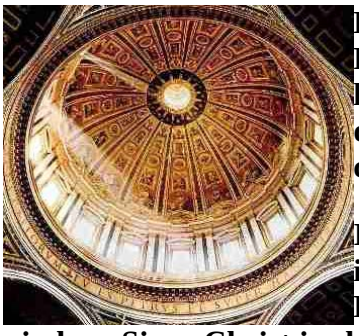
On the left is an artifact unearthed in the holy of holies of the pagan temple in the Canaanite city of Hazor, in northern Israel. It is described as follows: "Of special interest is a square basalt altar for burning incense. On one of its sides, a circle with a cross in the center – the divine symbol of the Canaanite storm god – is carved in low relief..."... a basalt offering table, pillar-shaped, with a carved symbol of the storm god Baal on its side. That symbol was a circle with a cross in the center." Again we need take time to notice that within Sun-Worship we find the concept of a "cross" connected with Sun-Worship; setting the stage for the developing theology of "crucified Sun-godmen" in the Heavens.

Here the Eucharistic host, as Catholics call it, has actually been made as a sunburst (note the flames around the edge). This sun symbol, after consecration, is called the true body of God, to be adored and bowed down to and worshipped by the laity, especially when displayed inside a sunburst monstrance.

At left is a pagan Canaanite cultic pillar or "matstsebah", also found in excavations of the city of Hazor,showing hands raised in praise to the sun disk, portrayed within the crescent moon. Now compare the picture on the right of pope John Paul II celebrating Mass, elevating a large host for adoration. Note the similarity with the pagan Canaanite pillar!

Below notice the pagan sunburst wafer god, inscribed with IHS and the cross, is portrayed above the cup ofwine. This is the door to a place where the wine and wafers are stored.





A 100-lire coin issued by the Vatican depicts a woman, symbolizing the Church, holding a cup in her right hand, which represents the "pagan sunburst wafer god." The cup of wine of the apostate woman (church) represents spiritual and doctrinal fornication, a mixing of truth and error, Christianity and paganism, which she has taught to the world (made the nations drink). This "wafer" or host used in Communion by the Catholic Church as a symbol for the body of Christ is actually a very ancient symbol for the sun. The Catholic "monstrance" or "ostentorium," the device used to serve the "Lord's host," is also a sunburst, as admitted by Catholic authorities. Christian art, like that of Buddhism and Hinduism, makes extensive use of the halo or sunburst behind its godman, mother of God, and saints. As Massey says, "The halo of light which is usually shown surrounding the face of Jesus and Christian saints, is another concept taken from the sun god." The solar nature of Jesus Christ is thus reflected in art, explaining "nobody knew what he looked like" and why he was variously represented as a sun god, such as Apollo or Elias.

At the right notice a carving depicting angels kneeling in idolatrous adoration or worship of the wafer god and wine.

Here you see a photo looking up into the dome of St. Peter's. Notice the very obvious sun wheel. Indeed the light from the sun streams into the center hub of the dome making a genuine sun-lit sunburst image at the center of the wheel.

In Christian iconography the sun, rising over and over again in the East, symbolizes immortality and resurrection. There are fourth-century mosaics showing Christ as a Helios-figure in a solar chariot surrounded by sunbeams, or surrounded by a solar nimbus. Since Christ is also triumphant over time (chronocrator), he is frequently associated with the sun (which measures out the length of each day) in Romanesque art.

The term "associated with" is a typical historicizing obfuscation, because Christ is the sun, which Christian artists have obviously known. The Apollo/Helios/Jesus image is often very light of complexion, with short blond hair, reflective not of an actual person but of the light and color of the sun. Other solar depictions include men with red hair, representative of the setting and summer sun, and black images symbolizing the orb in the dark underworld of night, which is the reason for the black bambinos and crucifixes in churches around the globe, not only of Jesus but also Krishna and other solar heroes. As stated, these black crucifixes have led some to posit that Jesus was black, i.e., African; however, despite this compulsion to make Christ "all things to all people," these images depict the black or nighttime sun. In fact, they are part of the mythos, which holds that the solar orb and night sky are a dual-natured god, represented by "twins" battling for supremacy.

SOLAR MYTHS WITHIN THE JESUS STORIES...FOLLOWING THE SUN'S ANNUAL MOVEMENT THROUGH THE HEAVENLY ZODIAC

Notice if you will that the following astrological accounts have been "personified" into human stories; many of which were applied to the man Jesus after his death by some of his ardent followers. Later such "solar-myths" were recorded in the New Testament and passed off as Divine and unique revelation concerning Jesus. Make no mistake about it but the position of the Sun and the stars had a prior determining effect on the "shaping and the evolution" of the Christ myth in the New Testament.

- According to legend, Jesus was born in a stable between a horse and a goat, symbols of Sagittarius and Capricorn.
- He was baptized in Aquarius, the Water-Bearer.
- He chose his first disciples, fishermen, in Pisces, the sign of the fishes.
- He became the Good Shepherd and the Lamb in Aries, the Ram.
- Jesus told the parables of the sowing and tilling of the fields in Taurus, the Bull.
- In Cancer, "the celestial Sea of Galilee," he calmed the storm and waters, spoke of backsliders (the Crab), and rode the ass and foal in triumph into the City of Peace, Jerusalem.
- Jesus was the Lion in Leo.
- In Libra, Christ was the true vine in the Garden of Gethsemane, the "wine press," as this is the time of the grape harvest.
- Jesus was betrayed by Judas, the "backbiter," or Scorpio.
- In Sagittarius, Jesus was wounded in the side by the Centaur, or centurion.
- He was crucified at the winter solstice between the "two thieves" of Sagittarius and Capricorn, who sapped his strength.

TRACING THE COURSE OF THE SUN...THE SOLAR DRAMA

Roberts elaborates the solar drama:

the passage of the Sun, in its annual course through the constellations of the Zodiac; having his birth in the sign of the Goat, the Augean stable of the Greeks; his baptism in Aquarius, the John the Baptist in the heavens; his triumph when he becomes the Lamb of God in Aries; his greatest exaltation on St. John's, the beloved disciple's day, on the 21st of June, in the Sign of the Twins, the emblem of double power; his tribulation in the Garden of Gethsemane, in the sign of the rural Virgo; his betrayal in the sign of Scorpio, the malignant emblem of his approaching death in the stormy and adverse sign, Sagittarius, and his resurrection or renewed birth on the twenty-fifth of December in the same sign of the celestial Goat...

Regarding the mysterious Garden of Gethsemane, Wells says, "They went to a place which is called Gethsemane". Nothing is known of such a place (Wells, Did Jesus Exist?,Pemberton, 1986, p, 136). In fact, the Garden exists in the sky.

In addition, Jesus in the "upper room" symbolizes the sun in the "upper signs," as the two equinoxes divide the solar orbit into two halves, also represented by the two genealogies of Jesus in the gospels (Hazelrigg, John, The Sun Book, Health Research, 1971, p. 120).

Hazelrigg gives the astrological meaning of the annunciation of the divine one's birth:

Directing our gaze to the right, we see rising on the eastern angle of the planisphere the constellation of the Virgin,

the sixth sign of the Zodiac, or sixth month, reckoning from March (Aries). And in the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent from God...to a virgin espoused by a man whose named was Joseph, of the house of David; and the virgin's name was Mary."-Luke 1. 26, 27 (Hazelrigg, John, The Sun Book, Health Research, 1971, p. 105).

He further explains the Passion as it appears in the mythos:

In due order, the next quarter introduces the Passion-a term appositely chosen and applied-prefaced under Aries, the first sign of the fiery triplicity, which is the Vale of Gehenna. . Thence comes Calvary, conformably with the crossification of the Sun of Nature at the gate of Libra, with the zodiacal Virgin recumbent next to this point of supreme sacrifice.

The story of the sun is a daily, monthly, annual and precessional drama that takes place cyclically and over thousands of years. In order to change the mythos into the life of a man-in other words, to personify and historicize it-it was necessary to make the tale linear, such that there are discrepancies between the stories of the sun and that of the "historical" Jesus. For example, while the sun "dies" and is "reborn" or "resurrected" daily, monthly, annually and precessionally, as a "person" Jesus can only undergo such experiences once. In the early Christian period, when the story as still being formulated, yet another debate raged as to how long after beginning his ministry Christ was supposed to suffer his passion, with a common portrayal that it occurred "in the 12th month after his baptism," i.e., at the winter solstice, following his baptism in Aquarius, as acknowledged by Irenaeus, who wrote against the "heretics": They affirm that He suffered in the twelfth month, so that He continued to preach for one year after His baptism." Irenaeus then insists that Christ "did not suffer in the twelfth month after his baptism, but was more than fifty years old when he died." Irenaeus's statements reveal not only Jesus's solar nature but also that by his time (c. 140-c. 200) the gospel story was not "set in stone," as it would have been, had it happened in history. In fact, some of the writings of the early Christian fathers demonstrate that they are discussing a number of different individuals, which is to be expected, since the "Christ character" which finds its way into the New Testament is a composite of many.

These various debates reflect the complexity of the mythos, as further illustrated by Massey:

When it was discovered that the moon was a mirror to the solar light, the sun-god as Osiris was reborn monthly in or of the moon! Thus, the resurrection in three days became that of the luni-solar god. . . . The Christ who rose again in three days for the fulfillment of scripture must be the Christ according to that scripture which contained the mythos, and the fulfillment of scripture was the completion of astronomical cycles, whether lunar, solar, or Precessional.

As stated, the character of Jesus Christ was in fact created as the solar avatar or hero of the Age of Pisces, into which the sun was moving during the first centuries before the Christian era, an illomened time between ages of celestial "no man's land."

Jesus as the Lamb of God was a remnant of the previous Age of Aries:

And as it approached the "gates of Spring," "the Lamb of God," or the Lamb of March gathered up "the sins of the world," or the sins of the Winter, and bore them away. And thus was realized, astronomically, not only "the Lamb of God taking away the sins of the world," but also the death and resurrection of the Son of God, or the sun-God, more properly.

Massey describes the changes of the ages:

When Horns had fulfilled the period of 2155 years with the Easter Equinox in the Sign of Aries, the birthplace passed into the Sign of Pisces, when the Ever-Coming One, the Renewer as the Eternal Child who had been brought forth as a Lion in Leo, a Beetle in Cancer, as one of the Twins in Gemini, as a calf in the Sign of the Bull, and a Lamb in the Sign of the Ram, was destined to manifest as the Fish, in the Sign of the Fishes. The rebirth of Atum-Horus, or Jesus, as the Fish Iusaas, and the Bread of Nephthys, was astronomically dated to occur in Beth Lechem-the House of Bread-about 255 B.C., at the time the Easter Equinox entered the Sign of Pisces, the house of Corn and Bread.

Massey also states that "Horus in Egypt had been a fish from time immemorial, and when the equinox entered the sign of Pisces, Horus was portrayed as Ichthys with the fish sign of over his head." He further says, "The Messiah who manifested in this sign was foreordained to come as Ichthys the fisherman, or, doctrinally, the fisher of men" (Massey, The Historical And The Mythical Christ, Health Research, p. 20).

Thus, Jesus is the Piscean fish god, who, at Luke 24:11-2, upon his resurrection is made to ask, "Do you have any fish"?, establishing the choice of communion food of the new age. Hence, the fish was ordered to be eaten in Catholicism. In addition, the early Christians were called "Pisciculi"-"little fishes" (Higgins, Godfrey, Esq., Anacalypsis, A&B Books, 1992, p. 568). As the solar hero of the Piscean Age, Jesus is also made to say, "I am with you always until the close of the age." It is now the close of the Age of Pisces, and the sun is moving into the Age of Aquarius, a "second coming" that signifies the changing of the guard.

WHAT YOU DON'T KNOW CAN HURT YOU

The attention of the writer having been called to the fact that all Indo-Germanic nations have worshipped crucified Saviours, an investigation of the subject was personally made by me over the last 5 years. Overwhelming proof, both in this and other articles, was obtained that the sun-myths of the ancient Aryans were the origin of the religions in all of the countries which were peopled by the Aryans. The Saviours worshipped in these lands are personifications of the Sun, the chief god of the Aryans. That Pagan nations worshipped a crucified man, was admitted by the Fathers of the early Christian Church. The holy Father Minucius Felix [d. c. 250], in his Octavius ["earliest known work of Latin Christian literature"], written as late as A.D. 211, indignantly resents the supposition that the sign of the cross should be considered as exclusively a Christian symbol; and represents his advocate of the Christian argument as retorting on an infidel opponent thus: "As for the adoration of crosses, which you object to against us, I must tell you that we neither adore crosses nor desire them. You it is, ye Pagans, who worship wooden gods, who are the most likely people to adore wooden crosses, as being parts of the same substance with your deities. For what else are your ensigns, flags, and standards, but crosses gilt and beautified? Your victorious trophies not only represent a simple cross, but a cross with a man upon it"' (Minucius Felix (Octavius)]. "Not until the pontificate of Agathon (A.D. 608 [680]) [Agatho: pope 687 -681] was Christ represented as a man on a cross. During the reign of Constantine Pogonatus [Constans II Pogonatus, Byzantine emperor 641 - 668], by the Sixth Synod of Constantinople (Canon 82) it was ORDAINED that instead of the ancient symbol, which had been the lamb, the figure of a man nailed to a cross should be represented. All this was confirmed by Pope Adrian I ["Hadrian I (d. 795), Pope from 772." (Ox. Dict. C.C.). Quoted in Higgins's Anacalypsis, vol. ii. p. 3."]."

Now please pay attention to what is said next. The whole purpose in presenting this information is to tie such information with the Essenes/Qumran sect which "adopted Sun-Worship" over Judaism in their "theological evolutions" over 250 years. Having said this then the next piece of information is incredible since the documents mentioned are Essene/Qumran writings...admitted by all scholars today. This is the undeniable connection to the FACT that the Essenes/Qumran cult had adopted "Solar-Myths" of crucified Sungods over the Messiah mentioned in the Tanakh:

'THE MESSIAH, AS EARLY AS THE SECOND CENTURY B.C., WAS REGULARLY LIKENED TO THE SUN (The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Testament of Levi, xviii, ed. R.H. Charles, pp. 62 sq.). THE EARLY CHRISTIANS who, like the Essaeans, TURNED TO THE EAST WHEN PRAYING, HELD THEIR FEASTS ON SUN-DAYS, ASSOCIATED THE DEATH OF CHRIST WITH AN

ECLIPSE OF THE SUN, and later celebrated His birthday on the Mithraic 'Natalis dies solis,' were likewise held by the pagans to be SUN-WORSHIPPERS (Tertullian [c. 160 - c. 220], Apologia, xvi). Indeed, CHRIST WAS ALWAYS ASSIMILATED TO THE SUN. The Clementine Homilies state that the disciples of John, the Hemerobaptist ["Jewish sect" ("daily ablution")], looked upon Jesus as the sun, and that he had therefore twelve apostles, whereas they regarded John the Baptist as the moon, and he accordingly had thirty disciples, or, more precisely, twenty-nine and a half, one being a woman, "for a woman, being half a man, made up the number of the triacontad ["set of thirty"], as with the moon whose revolution does not make the complete course of the month" (Clementine Homilies, ii. 23).'

No more evidence needs be presented...the case is proven beyond any doubt!

CONCLUSION

As you can see from the Bible verses quoted above, these symbols of pagan sun worship were associated with Baal worship, or Baalim, which is strongly condemned in scripture. So why are they so prevalent in the Roman Catholic Church and Protestant Christianity if they are associated with paganism and apostasy? Not wanting to "pick" on Catholics, my Protestant friends need to know that they have "inherited" the same "solar-dogmas" as well.

Without a doubt such "beliefs" are an affront and an abomination to God and those who hold such religious beliefs which have been attached to Jesus in the New Testament end up as Sun-Worshipers and Idolators...without ever knowing. Simply, they "do evil in the sight of the LORD"...AND THEY DON'T EVER KNOW IT...UNTIL THEY DIE THAT IS!

Let us close with this thought as taken from Mark 8:27:

27 And Jesus went out, and his disciples, into the towns of Caesarea Philippi: and by the way he asked his disciples, saying unto them, WHOM DO MEN SAY THAT I AM? (KJV),

That is a good question, and after reading this article as well as others on this website, as well as our websites, we sure know "who he is not" as well as "what is and is not a "Divine Document." We know for sure that Jesus and the "Jesus stories" in the New Testament are not an accurate picture as to whom he is; the vast majority of the New Testament accounts of Jesus are sadly "recycled" Sun-Worship and "Solar-Myths" whereby Jesus has been turned into a "new" Osiris/Horus/dying and raising/crucified Sun-godman.

Eccl 1:9 9 The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done is that which shall be done: and there is no new thing under the sun. (KJV)

...pardon my pun!

Having come to this stark revelation and conclusion, don't you think it is about time for you to study and investigate the historical Jesus to determine who he really is and what the "true Gospel" that he both lived and taught really is?

A Christian's religious belief system, when tested and exposed to contradictory facts from Biblical languages, Biblical history, Biblical culture, Religious history, and archeology, must in the Spirit of Truth and Repentance, be flexible enough to change!

We at Bet Emet Ministries stand ready to help you in your search for truth in order that your worship of YHVH be in Spirit and in Truth.

THE BIRTH OF JESUS CHRIST....WAS IT TAKEN FROM SUN-MYTHS?

The birth of Jesus Christ is said to have been taken place at early as dawn on the 25h day of December. The Christian ceremonies of the Nativity are celebrated in Bethlehem and Rome, even at this present time, very early in the morning.Now, this is the Sun's birthday. At the commencement of the sun's apparent annual revolution round the earth, he was said to have been born, and, on the first moment after midnight of the 24th of December, all the heathen nations of the earth, as if by common consent, celebrated the announcement of the "Queen of Heaven," of the "Celestial Virgin of the Sphere," and the birth of the god Sol.

On that day the sun having fully entered the winter solstice, the Sign of the Virgin was rising on the eastern horizon. The woman's symbol of this stellar sign was represented first by ears of corn, then with a new-born male child in her arms. Such was the picture of the Persian sphere cited by Aben-Ezra:

"the division of the first decan of the Virgin represents a beautiful virgin with flowing har, sitting in a chair, with two ears of corn in her hand, and suckling an infant called Iesus by some nations, and Christ in Greek" (Volney, Ruins, p. 166 and note).

This denotes the Sun, which, at the moment of the winter soltice (25th December), precisely when the Persian magi drew the horoscope of the new year, was placed on the bosom of teh Virgin, rising heliacally in the eastern horizon. On this account he was figured in their astronomical pictures under the form of a child suckled by a chaste virgin (Volney, Ruins, p. 155; Dupuis, Origin of Religious Belief, p. 236).

Thus we see that Christ Jesus was born on the same day as Buddah, Mithras, Osiris, Horus, Hercules, Bacchus, Adonis, and other personifications of the Sun.

THE ESSENE INFLUENCE AT ALEXANDRIA ON THE TRANSLATION OF THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES INTO GREEK (LXX)

Answer for yourself: Why did Christianity prosper, and why was Jesus of Nazareth believed to be a divine incarnation and Saviour when no such teachings can be found in the Jewish Masoretic Text of the Tanakh?

There were many causes for this, but as we can devote volumes to the subject, I will try to treat it briefly.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE ESSENES AND THEIR RELIGIOUS BELIEF SYSTEM ON THE NEW TESTAMENT

For many centuries before the time of Jesus there lived a sect of religious monks known as Essenes, or Therapeutae. Numerous bodies of ascetics (Therapeutae), especially near Lake Mareotis, devoted themselves to discipline and study, abjuring society and labor, and forgetting it is said, the simplest wans of nature, in contemplating the hidden wisdom of the Scriptures. Eusebius even claimed them as Christians and some of the forms of monasticism (by Christians) were evidently modeled after the Therapeutae" (Smith's Bible Dictionary, art, "Alexandria").

Answer for yourself: What happened to the Essenes, for after all, we have their existing theological literature from the Dead Sea Scroll?

"An in-depth study of early church history will show you that the Essenes entirely disappeared from history shortly after the time assigned for the crucifixion of Jesus"...Christian Ginsburg, The Essenes: Their History And Doctrines,1864.

Simply said these Essenes became believers and followers of Jesus and entered the Jesus Movement after his crucifixion. One should not forget that what began as a righteous separation from the Temple by the Zadok priests in the early second century B.C.E. would later evolve into the current "Essenes" of Jesus' day. The word "Zadok" in Hebrew means:

6659 Tsadowq- Zadok="righteous";

Zadok was the high priest, son of Ahitub of the house of Eleazar the son of Aaron, and 11th in descent from Aaron; he joined David after Saul's death and supported him against Absalom and Adonijah; and later anointed Solomon as king

Acts 6:7 7 And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith. (KJV)

These priests were not the traditional Sadducees of the day in league with Rome. These were the Essenic residue of the Zadok priesthood which no longer had control or ties with the Temple. There were thousands of them, and their monasteries were to be counted by the score. C.F.D. Moule, of page 13 of his The Birth Of The New Testament, says: "...we have some idea, through the accounts of the Essenes in Philo and Josephus, and recently, through the Qumran writings of how differently a sectarian, but still priestly, group might be behaving at the same time. Evidently the Qumran sect maintained a priesthood and a ritual organization."

Many have asked the question, "What became of these priestly Essenes?" If we examine this group and their religious beliefs we find:

- That they were expecting the advent of an *Angel-Messiah
- That they considered Jesus of Nazareth to be this Angel-Messiah
- That they came over to Christianity in a body; and,
- That they brought the legendary histories of the former Angel-Messiahs as taken from their sun-myths.

The origin of the sect known as Essenes is enveloped in mist, and will probably never be revealed fully. To speak of all the different ideas entertained as to their origin would make a volume of itself, we can therefore but glance at the subject. I am indebted to many authors for their informative books on the Essenes who have given us the ability to understand the religious climate of the first century in Palestine; authors like James Charlesworth, Lawrence Schiffman, A. DuPont-Summer, John Allegro, Hugh Schonfield, Millar Burrows, Geza Vermes, Hershel Shanks, and especially Martin Larson for his excellent treatment of the Essenes and their evolution as a sect within Judaism of the Second Temple Period in his many books [The Story Of Christian Origins, The Essene Christian Faith, The Essene Heritage, On The Religion Of The Occident].

What escapes most Christian writers today is that the Essenes contemporary with the Jesus era are completely different in theology and scope from the original Zaddok Priests of Qumran from the early second century B.C.E. which were Torah believers. What began as a righteous "separatist movement" by the Zadok priesthood since being prevented from returning to their rightful priesthood following Israel's victory over Antiochus Epiphanies, they protested the Hasmoneans' control of the Temple and possession of the Priesthood by separating from the Temple cult and beginning a "New Israel" and a "New Covenant" in the desert of Qumran. Sadly, what began as a righteous movement of Judaism will culminate in the days of Jesus and following in a synchronistic Phythagorean-Buddhist-Jewish sect containing a synthesis of religious beliefs built upon astrology and sun-worship mixed with their Jewish heritage; many of these "Essene" beliefs deviated significantly from conservative Torah faith and the traditional Messianic hope. On must look deeper than the superficial accounts of the Essenes provided by Pliny, Philo, and Josephus to acquaint oneself with such facts, as their accounts are somewhat superficial in many aspects and tend to provide only summaries of the sect and their beliefs. In-depth theological analysis of their beliefs is not possible from these accounts; one must be quite familiar with the individual writings to be able to understand the nuances of their theology.

Theophilus Gale, who wrote a work called The Court of the Gentiles, Oxford, 1671, undoubtedly hits upon the truth when he says:

> "Now, the origination or rise of these Essenes (Jewish sect of apocalyptic believers) I conceive by the best conjectures I can make from antiquity, to be in or immediately after the Babylonian captivity, though some make them later."

With such an admission one must understand that implied in "Babylonian captivity" is the borrowing of many theological beliefs by the returning Jews from their captors. Needless to say, the Persian victory over the Babylonians only furthered such borrowing of beliefs as these captive Jews were now introduced into the Persian Mysteries and Zoroastrianism. Now it is understandable with the Jewish nation's return by Cyrus to Palestine that another "mixed multitude" was to find its way to Palestine as had once before again possessing a syncretism of beliefs; the irony of the whole story is found that behind the Jewish, Babylonian, and Persian beliefs was an Egyptian religious substrate that had contributed to all of the above as well. The out-working of such beliefs are to be found the the new Apocalyptic of the Jewish faith held by some, but not all. Thus we find in the Judaism that developed after the return from Babylonian captivity the multitude of competing "sects" all with varying religious belief systems.

This new Apocalyptic literature consists of those parts of the Jewish Bible and other Jewish and Christian books that embody an apocalypse, or revelation, given through a symbolic vision of the future. Apocalyptic literature concerns the final period of world history, and depicts the final confrontation between God and the powers of evil. The conflict frequently culminates in a world catastrophe; sometimes a messianic figure is responsible for the triumph over evil. It will be here we find the Essenic Angel-Messiah. Frequently the authors recount history up to their own time in symbolic form (as in Dan. 7:1-8) and then give a vision of the future salvation to be brought by God at the end of the present world. Classic examples are the books of Daniel and Revelation. Passages such as Isaiah 24-27, Zechariah 9-14, and Mark 13 belong to this type of literature. Other examples of literature held sacred by the Essenes are Enoch, Jubilees, and the Apocalypse of Baruch today which can be found in the Jewish Pseudepigrapha, as well as the Apocalypse of Peter in the Apocryphal New Testament.

Apocalyptic literature is usually pseudonymous, written under the name of a famous person. Books such as Daniel and Enoch are examples. But St. John, the author of Revelation in the New Testament, apparently wrote in his own name. Sometimes apocalypses, especially the Apocalypse of Adam and others in the literature of Gnosticism, contain elements drawn from Greek Mythology as well as from the Bible and from Jewish tradition. The New Testament contains all of the above.

Many Christian writers trace the origin of the Essenes all the way back to an origin in India (that is where they picked up many of their sun-myths) and were a sort of Buddhist sect. All of these influences will be amalgamated into a complex theological system that found its latest expression among the Essenes of Qumran in the first century A.D. and their literature attests to it.

Gfrorer, who wrote concerning them in 1835, and said that "the Essenes and the Therapeutae (of Egypt) are the same sect, and hold the same views," was undoubtedly another writer who was touching upon historical ground.

PARALLELS WITH THE NEW TESTAMENT

The identity of many of the precepts and practices of Essenes and those of the New Testament is unquestionable (T.W. Doane, Bible Myths and Parallels In Other Religions, 1882, p. 420).

Essenism urged on its disciples to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness. The Essenes forbade the laying up of treasures upon earth. The Essenes demanded of those who wished to join them to sell all heir possessions, and to divide it among the poor brethren. The Essenes had all things in common, and appointed one of the brethren as steward to manage the common bag. Essenism put all its members on the same level, forbidding the exercise of authority of one over the other, and enjoining mutual service. Essenism commanded its disciples to call no man master upon the earth. Essenism laid the greatest stress upon being meek and lowly in spirit. The Essenes commended the poor in spirit, those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, the merciful, the pure in heart, and the peacemaker. They combined the healing of the body with that of the soul. They declared that the power to cast out evil spirits, to perform miraculous cures, etc. They taught that such power should be possessed by their disciples as signs of their belief. The Essenes did not swear at all; their answer was yea, yea, and nay, nay. When the Essenes started on a mission of mercy, they provided neither gold nor silver, neither took coats, neither shoes, but relied on hospitality for support. The Essenes though repudiating offensive war, yet took weapons with them when they went on a perilous journey. The Essenes abstained from connubial intercourse! The Essenes did not offer animal sacrifices, but strove to present their bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God, which they regarded as a reasonable service! It was the great aim of the Essenes to live such a life of purity and holiness as to be the temples of the Holy Spirit, and to be able to prophesy.

Many other comparisons might be made, but these are sufficient to show that there is a great similarity between the two. These similarities have led many Christian writers to believe that Jesus, if he did not belong to this order, was influenced by them. Dr. Ginsburg, an advocate of this theory, says :

"It will hardly be doubted that our Saviour himself belonged to this holy brotherhood. This will especially be apparent when we remember that the whole Jewish community, at the advent of Christ, was divided into three parties, the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes, and that every Jew had to belong to one of these sects. Jesus, who, in all things, conformed to the Jewish law, and who was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners, would therefore naturally associate himself with that order of Judaism which was most congenial to his holy nature. Moreover, the fact that Christ, with the exception of once, was not heard of in public until his thirtieth year, implying that he lived in seclusion with this fraternity, and that though he frequently rebuked the scribes, Pharisees and Sadducees, he never denounced the Essenes, strongly confirms this conclusion" (Ginsburg, Essenes, p. 24).

We hear very little of the Essenes after A.D. 40, therefore, when we read of the "primitive Christians," we are reading of Essenes, and others (Ginsburg, Essenes, p. 27).

Ginsburg tell us: "We hear very little of them after A.D. 40; and there can hardly be any doubt that, owing to the great similarity existing between their precepts and practices and those of primitive Christians, the Essenes as a body must have embraced Christianity" (Dr. Ginsburg, Essenes, p. 27).

The similarity of the sentiments of the Essenes, or Therapeutae, to those of the Church of Rome, induced the learned Jesuit, Nicolaus Serarius, to seek for them an honorable origin. He contended therefore, that they were Asideans and derived them from the Rechabites, described so circumstantially in the thirty-fifth chapter of Jeremiah; at the same time, he asserted that the first Christians monks Essenes. (Hardy, Eastern Monachism, p. 358).

There is strong evidence to believe the first Christians were Essenes, or as you are more familiar with the term, "Nazarenes."

Mr. King, Gnostics and their Remains, on page 1 speaking of the Christian sect called "Gnostics," says:

"Their chief doctrines had been held for centuries before (their time) in many of the cities of Asia Minor. There, it is probable, they first came into existence as "Mystae," upon the establishment of a direct intercourse with India under the Seleucidae and the Ptolemies (Egypt). The colleges of Essenes and Megabyzae at Ephesus, the Orphics of Thrace, the Curetes of Crete, are all merely branches of one antique and common religion, and that originally Asiatic.

Again King says:

" The introduction of Buddhism into Egypt and Palestine affords the only true solution of innumerable difficulties in the history of religion (Ibid., p. 6).

Again:

"That Buddhism had actually been planted in the dominions of the Seleucidae and Ptolemies (Palestine belonging to the former) before the beginning of the third century B.C.E., is proved to demonstration by a passage in the Edicts of Asoka, grandson of the famous Chandragupta, the Sandracottus of the Greeks. These edicts are engraven on a rock at Girnur, in Guzerat." Again notice the link to Egypt, in particular we will find Alexandria, Egypt to be of importance in this regard (King, Gnostics and their remains, p. 23).

Eusebius, in quoting from Philo concerning the Essenes, seems to take it for granted that they [the Essenes] and the Christians were one and the same, and from the manner in which he writes, it would appear that it was generally understood so. He says that Philo called them "Worshipers," and concludes by saying:

"But whether he himself gave them this name, or whether at the beginning they were so called, when as yet the name of Christians was not everywhere published, I think it not needful curiosity to sift out" (Ecc. History, lib. 2, ch. xvii).

This celebrated ecclesiastical historian (Eusebius) considered it very probable that the writings of the Essenic Therapeuts in Egypt had been incorporated into the gospels of the New Testament, and into some Pauline epistles.

His words are:

> "It is very likely that the commentaries (Scriptures) which were among them (the Essenes) were the Gospels, and the works of the apostles, and certain expositions of the ancient prophets, such as partly that epistle unto the Hebrews, and also the other epistles of Paul do contain" (Ecc. Hist., lib. 2, ch. xvii).

You need to stop and think about what was just said. The key word was "incorporated"! These Essene Therapeuts did not possess the Gospels in Egypt "after their writing;" but had before their writing much that would be incorporated into these "gospels" when they would be written....this would come from their existing theologies long before Jesus ever lived. In other words, stories and doctrines from these Pythagorean-Buddhist Essenes were later to be ascribed to Jesus which had no historical value or relationship to the real man from Galilee. The synthesis of their Egyptian, Babylonian, and Persian religious beliefs would be filtered through Biblical Judaism and like as before "out jumped this golden-calf" which we call the Christian Jesus today. Instead of understanding Jesus as a Jew we attach to him the theologies of pagan nations never knowing that when reading the New Testament today we are reading a lot of Pythagorean-Buddhist theology from their sun-myths and we think we are reading the truth about the Jesus who really lived. Nothing could be further from the truth!

It would be a serious mistake on your part to assume that the above reference to the "Gospels" included the Four Gospels which most are familiar with today since it can be shown that at the destruction of Qumran and the Essenic library and community in 68 A.D. that these particular "Four Gospels" did not yet exist and that no quotes from them can be found prior to roughly 200 A.D. in the early Church Fathers. You should consider this amazing if they yet existed. Yet understand, many such references in the writings of these Church Fathers came from nothing more than oral tradition or possibly some of the hundreds of conflicting "gospels" possessed by competing sects which were in circulation after the death of Jesus as we are informed by the writer of the Gospel today called by the name of Luke.

THE ANGEL-MESSIAH OF THE ESSENES

"The principal doctrines and rites of the Essenes can be connected with the East, with Parsism, and especially with Buddhism. Among the doctrines which Essenes and Buddhists had in common was that of the Angel-Messiah" (Bunsen, The Angel-Messiah, p. vii).

"The New Testament is the Essene-Nazarene Glad Tidings!" (S.F. Dunlap, The Son of Man, p. iii).

Godfrey Higgins says:

"The Essenes were called physicians of the soul, or Therapeutae; being resident both in Judea and Egypt. they probably spoke or had their sacred books in Chaldee (Babylon)." He goes on to say:

"These Essenes were Pythagoreans, as is proved by all their forms, ceremonies, and doctrines, and they called themselves the sons of Jesse. If the Pythagoreans or Conobitae, as they are called by Jamblicus, were Buddhists, the Essenes then held many beliefs of Buddhism mixed among their own. Many of the Essenes lived in Egypt, on the lake of Parembole or Maria, in monasteries. These are the very places in which we formerly found the Gymnosophists, or Samaneans, or Buddhist priests to have lived ; which Gymnosophistae are placed also by Ptolemy in north-eastern India." Let us stop just a minute to focus on the links we have seen so far that affect the assimilation by the Essenes of other world religions: Egypt, Babylon, Persian, India, and Judaism. The syncretism of religious beliefs is being formed and will find its full expression in the New Testament." He goes on to say:

"Their (the Essenes) parishes, churches, bishops, priests, deacons, festivals are all identically the same (as the Christians). They had apostolic founders ; the manners which distinguished the immediate apostles of Christ; Scriptures divinely inspired; the same allegorical mode of interpreting them, which has since obtained among Christians, and the same order of performing public worship. They had missionary stations or colonies of their community established in Rome, Corinth, Galatia, Ephesus, Phillippi, Colosse, and Thessalonica, precisely such, and in the same circumstances, as were those to whom St. Paul addressed his letters in those places. All the fine moral doctrines which are attributed to the Samaritan Nazarite, and I doubt not justly attributed to him, are to be found among the doctrines of these ascetics" (Higgins, Anacalypsis, vol. i. p. 747).

And Arthur Lillie says in Buddha and Early Buddhism, p. vi:

"It is asserted by calm thinkers like Dean Mansel that within two generations of the time of Alexander the Great, the missionaries of Buddha made their appearance at Alexandria. "In this he was supported by philosophers of the calibre of Schilling and Schopenhauer, and the great Sanscrit authority, Lassen. Renan also sees traces of Buddhist propagandism in Palestine before the Christian era. Hilgenfeld, Muter, Bohlen, King, all admit the Buddhist influence. Colebrooke saw a striking similarity between the Buddhist philosophy and the Pythagoreans. Dean Milman was convinced that the Therapeuts sprung from the "contemplative and indolent fraternities" of India. And, he might have added, the Rev. Robert Taylor in his Diegesis, and Godfrey Higgins in his Anacalypsis have brought strongest arguments to bear in support of this theory"

This is confirmed in the east by the Asoka monuments-in the west by Philo.

Lillie expressly maintains the identity in creed of the higher Judaism and that of the Gymnosophists of India who abstained from the 'sacrifice of living animals', in a word, the Buddhists. It would follow from this that the priestly religion of Babylonia, Palestine, Egypt, and Greece were undermined by certain kindred mystical societies organized by Buddha's missionaries under the various names of Therapeutae, Essenes, Neo- Pythagoreans, Neo-Zoroastrians etc. Thus Buddhism prepared the ground work and the way of Christianity and its interpretation of the Messiah of Israel. (Arthur Lillie, Buddha and Early Buddhism, p. vi).

The doctrine of the "Anointed Angel-Messiah," consisted of :

- 1. The incarnation of a man from heaven...the Angel-Messiah [origin in the sun-myths of Gentile nations]
- 2. The Angel-Messiah as the Creator of the world
- 3. The doctrine of the atoning sacrificial death of the Angel-Messiah through cosmic crucifixion personified on a cross as taken from their sin-myth synthesis (this is not as simple as it sounds because the crucifixion they understood was a personified crucifixion or crossing of orbits of plants and suns...see our website for further understanding and how this concept was later personified and applied to Jesus by the Essenes after his death
- 4. The resurrection on the 3rd day of this Angel-Messiah as determined by the winter solstice and the failure of the sun to rise any higher in the sky for 3 days...again a personification of sun-myths of Gentile nations

What is alarming to those who study enough to see this is that many of the doctrines of Paul can, with more or less certainty, be connected with the Essenes and their Phythagorean -Buddhist-Iranian sun-myths and seem less than a "unique revelation from God." Sad but true in final analysis. It has taken me over 15 years of comprehensive and extensive research to put the puzzle pieces together to see this clearly for myself. Today I see what those courageous men of old tried to tell the masses about the truth of the Christian faith as it has been passed down to us by the Roman juggernaut called the "church." Instead of the faith of Jesus we have a faith derived from sun-myths moulded around him. With the later creation of documents bearing the Apostle's names it is a small miracle than anyone could find the truth about such a matter when the deception has been so extensive. It becomes almost a certainty that Eusebius was right in surmising that Essenic writings have been used by Paul and others who would later write the "gospels" and later apply the Apostle's names to them. The sun-myths were later applied to a Jewish Rabbi and authority was given to them through various writings proposing such beliefs by competing sects to which final authority was later to be given by attaching the names of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John to them.

Now is should be getting very clear to you that is was not Jesus, but Paul who would be the cause of the separation of the Jews from the Christians (Bunsen, Angel-Messiah, p. 240). The later "Gospels," written under such a Pauline and an Essenic influence thereby attesting to the Angel-Messiah instead of a Davidic human Messiah would be the last straw to break the camel's back along with the repudiation of the Torah by the evolving Gentile Christian community. The Jews had their Palestinian Jewish Scriptures preserved that read completely different from the corrupted Greek translation and they looked yet for the Davidic Messiah and not a cosmic sun-godman as taught in the doctrine of the Angel-Messiah. One only needs to read the Gospel of John and compare it with the Jesus of the Synoptic Gospels to see we are talking about two very different persons!

The probability, then, that that sect of vagrant quack-doctors, the Therapeutae, who were established in Egypt and its neighborhood many ages before the period assigned by later theologians as that of the birth of Jesus, were the original fabricators of the writings contained in the New Testament, becomes a certainty on the basis of evidence and the positive statement of the historian Eusebius, that "those ancient Therapeutae were Christians, and that their ancient writings were our gospels and epistles."

The Essenes, the Therapeuts, the Ascetics, the Monks, the Ecclesiastics, and the Eclectics, are but different names for one and the self-same sect.

The word "Essene" is nothing more than the Egyptian word for that of which Therapeutae is the Greek, each of them signifying "healer " or "doctor," and designating the character of the sect as professing to be endued with the miraculous gift of healing; and more especially so with respect to diseases of the mind.

Their name of "Ascetics" indicated the severe discipline and exercise of self-mortification, long fastings, prayers, contemplation, and even making of themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake, as did Origen, Melito, and others who derived their Christianity from the same school; Jesus himself is represented to have recognized and approved their practice.

Their name of "Monks" indicated their delight in solitude, their contemplative life, and their entire segregation and abstraction from the world, which Jesus, in the Gospel, is in like manner represented as describing, as characteristic of the community of which he was a member.

Their name of "Eccleastics" was of the same sense, and indicated their being called out, elected, separated from the general fraternity of mankind, and set apart to the more immediate service and honor of God. From the Greek word "ecclesia" we get the term so often used today: "church."

Answer for yourself: Did you catch the unique name above for the Essenes, Therapeutae, and their Monks? There were called "Ecclesiastics." On the surface this is rather boring until you understand that "ecclesia" is the term from which we get the English translation "church." The name translated from the Greek means "CHURCH". This give a whole new meaning to the passage supposedly where Jesus said he was to build his "Essenic Community." The follow of such an interpolation to the New Testament is readily seen in the fact that Jesus never envisioned a movement of any great length or duration as he expected the appearance imminently of the Kingdom of God well before 70 C.E. He had no 2000 year plan. He was made to have one after the crucifixion by these Ecclesiastics who considered themselves the "New Israel."

THE ALEXANDRIAN LINK AND THE TRANSLATION OF THE JEWISH SCRIPTURES INTO GREEK

These Essenes had a flourishing university, or corporate body, established upon these principles, at Alexandria in Egypt, long before the period assigned for the birth of Christ Jesus. The Essenes abounded in Egypt, especially about Alexandria (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist., lib. 2, ch. xvii). They esteemed this "corporate body" to such a degree that went so far as to mistranslate on purpose much of the Tanakh to promote their own theological beliefs and theological agenda. I have for your examination overwhelming evidence as to this purposeful mistranslation and adulteration of the Jewish Scriptures at another website: http://geocities.com/faithofyeshua where the corruption of the Jewish Bible is revealed and how the Gentile Church only built off such a corrupt substrate owing that they found parallels with such "corrupted texts" with their prior paganism.

C.D.F. Moule, in The Birth Of The New Testament, records for us on page 59 that the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures is "a wildly inaccurate translation." Likewise, Lucetta Mowry, in The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Early Church, again tells us on page 11-12: "...the Qumran authors....altered the stories of the Pentateuch by pious and frequently fanciful embellishments. A more serious purpose of alteration was the attempt to use the stories as authoritative expression of the tenants of the Sect....rewriting familiar events of Israel's history and by inserting legendary details to make the Law of Moses correspond with Qumran thought. These documents, together with the commentaries, testify to the Sect's interest in supplementing biblical authority by adapting canonical works to its own purpose. The community desired in particular to prove that its members were the true heirs of Israel's tradition and that the promise of redemption revealed by God to the patriarchs and to Moses now belonged to their brotherhood." This is just the tip of the iceberg and you should understand that many Greek Fathers of the church, men like Clement of Alexandria, who grew up and was schooled in Alexandria, not only heard this Essene theology and their teachings on the Angel-Messiah, but their documents, even the Greek translation of the Jewish Bible had such tenants of the group included within it. This explains the natural tendency for these early Greek Fathers to accept and promote a theology that was in opposition to what the conservative Jews of Palestine believed as preserved in their Jewish Scriptures, which now read quite differently from the Greek translation of the Essenes in Alexandria.

There are literally hundreds of embellishments, but let me give you one such example as I have dealt with hundreds of examples of the corruption of the Jewish Scriptures when then were translated on another website that you might wish to examine to see the evidence for yourself: http://faithofyeshua.faithweb.com.

Now for example... Christian Ginsburg details for us on page 32 of his monumental work The Essenes, Their History and Doctrines, when these Greek-Jews of Alexandria were employed to translate the Prophet and the Psalms into Greek, that they availed themselves of the opportunity to introduce their tenants and rites into their version of the translation. This version is called the Septuagint and is a grossly mistranslated version of the Jewish Scriptures. Millions of Christians are not aware of this and many of the Christian scholars stop short to examine the evidence for themselves; simply they just don't know it happened. Not being able to read Hebrew for themselves, they accept the Greek translation bequeathed to them as if it came for God. Your evaluation of the facts concerning this translation will show you otherwise. One example should suffice to begin your curiosity into the matter. Thus, for instance, when David said "Sacrifice and burn offering thou didst not desire, mine ears has thou opened" (Psalm 40:6) was changed by the Essenes translators of Alexandria to: "Sacrifice and burnt offering thou didst not desire, but a body hast thou prepared me." The Essenes, by changing this verse and taking away and adding to the Word of God introduced three of their tenets:

1. They made the Prophets speak absolutely as if God had entirely rejected sacrifices because they themselves would offer none

2. By dropping my the words, "mine ears has thou opened," they showed disapproval of slavery:

Exod 21:6 6 Then his master shall bring him (his slave) unto the judges; he shall also bring him to the door, or unto the door post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an aul; and he shall serve him for ever. (KJV)

3. By substituting "a body has thou prepared me," the were promoting their college of devout Essenes in Alexandria who met together as a body, and whom they believed God had appointed instead of the corrupt Priesthood. This body of Essenes was to be the now corporate "body" of Israel; the New Israel. Along with this the Torah and the Tanakh had been replaced with the religious and Apocalyptic writings of the community.

From this Essene corporate body of the "New Israel" they sent out missionaries promoting their theologies, and had established colonies, auxiliary branches, and affiliated communities, in various cities of Asia Minor, which colonies were in a flourishing condition before the preaching of St. Paul. Now you can understand that when Paul went on his journeys preaching "Christ crucified" that this was not a new message to his recipients. Jesus was just another name in a long line of crucified sun-god saviors that had come before. Chrishna crucified was now Christ crucified. There had been a long line of "personified Sun-god-men" who were crucified; first in the heavens due to the blending of astrology and religion, and later personified in human terms reflecting the "heroes" of various Indo-Germanic nations since the beginning of time.

Col 1:23 23 If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven; whereof I Paul am made a minister; (KJV) Notice please Paul used the "past tense" indicating that "his gospel" had already gone into all the world. A little study in comparative religion verifies the truth to his statement.

Answer for yourself: Have you ever wondered what was "the gospel" preached all over the world before Paul took the Christian message? These nations had already received the cosmic sun-myths from these Buddhist-

Essene missionaries which covered according to their own testimony the whole of the known world. So Christ crucified was not a new message, but the personification of sun-myths long held by primitive mankind. Paul was only reiterating what they already knew and this explains the rapid spread of the Christian message...he had to give them nothing new...only a new name for their crucified godman. This also explains why the Jews continually followed Paul on his travels troubling him in their efforts to "undo" his preaching as the men from Jerusalem knew the distortions Paul was preaching about the Jesus that had personally known! Sadly, the New Testament blasts these men as "Judaizers." Redactionist history at its best!

The very ancient and Eastern doctrine of an Angel-Messiah had been applied to Gautama-Buddha, and so it was applied to Jesus Christ by the Essenes of Egypt and of Palestine, who introduced this new Messianic doctrine into Essenic Judaism and Essenic Christianity (Bunsen, Angel-Messiah, p. 255).

In the Pali and Sanscrit texts the word Buddha is always used as a title, not as a name. It means "The Enlightened One." Gautama Buddha is represented to have taught that he was only one of a long series of Buddhas, who appear at intervals in the world, and who all teach the same system. After the death of each Buddha his religion flourishes for a time, but finally wickedness and vice again rule over the land. Then a new Buddha appears, who again preaches the lost Dharma or truth. The names of twenty-four of these Buddhas who appeared previous to Gautama have been handed down to us. The Buddhavansa, or "History of the Buddhas," the last book of the Khuddaka Nikaya in the second Pitca, gives the lives of all the previous Buddhas before commencing its account of Gautama himself ; and the Pali commentary on the Jatakas gives certain details regarding each of the twenty-four (Rhys David, Buddhism, p. 179).

An Avatar (one descended from Heaven as an incarnated deity ...from Oriental and Iranian religious beliefs) was expected about every six hundred years. This interval is clearly shown by Mr. Higgins in his Anacalypsis. It should be remembered that Gautama Buddha, the "Angel-Messiah," and Cyrus, the "Anointed" of the Lord, are placed about six hundred years before Jesus, the "Anointed." This cycle of six hundred years was called the "great year." Josephus, the Jewish historian, alludes to it when speaking of the patriarchs that lived to a great age (Josephus, Antiq., bk. i. c. iii.). "From this cycle of six hundred," says Col. Valliancey, "came the name of the bird Phoenix, called by the Egyptians Phenu, with the well-known story of its going to Egypt to burn itself on the altar of the Sun (at Heliopolis) and rise again from its ashes, at the end of a certain period."

MESSIANIC EXPECTATIONS IN THE FIRST CENTURY

At the time of Jesus of Nazareth an Avatar was expected, not by some of the Jews alone, but by most every eastern nation.

"Philo's writings prove the probability, almost rising to a certainty, that already in his time the Essenes did expect an Angel-Messiah as one of a series of divine incarnations. Within about fifty years after Philo's death, Elkesai the Essene applied this doctrine to Jesus, and it was promulgated in Rome about the same time, if not earlier, by the Pseudo-Clementines" (Bunsen, The Angel-Messiah, p. 118).

Many persons were thought at that time to be, and undoubtedly thought themselves to be, the Christ, and the only reason why the name of Jesus of Nazareth was connected with crucifixion and salvation above all others, is because the Essenes, who were expecting an Angel-Messiah, espoused it after identifying Jesus with their killed

"Teacher of Righeousness" who was their Avatar. Following the crucifixion and death of Jesus these Essenes made the connection with their "crucified-sun-god man" and made conversion to the Jesus Movement. Had it not been for this almost indisputable fact, the name of Jesus of Nazareth would undoubtedly not be known at the present day as connected with the pagan doctrines which it has been. In place of this would be the truth concerning the Davidic Messiah and the Torah instead of a paganized New Testament which originated from a strong Essenic influence and Alexandrian philosophy of religion which influence the Greeks as well and their writings which today we call "Early Church Fathers." Without such perversion of truth the Jerusalem church's legacy would have succeeded instead of the one of Rome.

Epiphanius, a Christian bishop and writer of the fourth century, says, in speaking of the Essenes:

"They who believed on Christ were called Jessaei (or Essenes), before they were called Christians. These derived their constitution from the signification of the name Jesus, which in Hebrew signifies the same as Therapeutes, that is, a saviour or physician."

Thus we see that, according to Christian authority, the Essenes and Therapeutes are one, and that the Essenes espoused the cause of Jesus of Nazareth, accepted him as an Angel-Messiah, and became known to history as Christians, or believers in the Anointed Angel.

This ascetic Buddhist sect called Essenes were therefore expecting the Angel-Messiah, because Gautama announced to his disciples that another Buddha, and therefore another angel in human form, another organ or advocate of the wisdom from above, would descend from heaven to earth, and would be called the "Son of Love."

The learned Thomas Maurice says:

"From the earliest post-diluvian age, to that in which the Messiah appeared, together with the traditions which so expressly recorded the fall of the human race from a state of original rectitude and felicity, there appears, from an infinite variety of hieroglyphic monuments and of written documents, to have prevailed, from generation to generation, throughout all the regions of the higher Asia, a uniform belief that, in the course of revolving ages, there should arise a sacred personage, a mighty deliverer of mankind from the thraldom, of sin and of death. In fact, the memory of the grand original promise, that the seed of the woman should eventually crush the serpent, was carefully preserved in the breasts of the Asiatics; it entered deeply into their symbolic superstitions, and was engraved aloft amidst their mythologic sculptures."' (Hist. Hindostan, vol. ii. p. 273).

That an Angel-Messiah was generally expected at this time may be inferred from the following facts: Some of the Gnostic sects of Christians, who believed that Jesus was an emanation from God, likewise supposed that there were several AEons, or emanations from the Eternal Father.

Among those who taught this doctrine was Basilides and his followers! (Lardner's Works, vol. viii. p 352).

MESSIANIC HOPE BREEDS TOO MANY MESSIAHS

Simon Magus was believed to be "He who should come." Simon was worshiped in Samaria and other countries, as the expected Angel-Messiah, as a God.

Justin Martyr says:

> " After the ascension of our Lord into heaven, certain men were suborned by demons as their agents, who said that they were gods (i.e., the Angel Messiah). Among these was Simon, a certain Samaritan, whom nearly all the Samaritans and a few also of other nations, worshiped, confessing him as a Supreme God" (Apol. 1, ch. xxvi).
